(Q) Maimon tells us, out of the last part of the Mishna, that Moses gave the Israelites three express commands, namely, 1. To chuse them a king. 2. To destroy Amalek: And 3. To build a temple, after they were possessed of the land of Canaan. The same we find likewise enjoined in the 114, 115, and 116 affirmative precepts of their oral law, according to which that rabbi observes, that they chose Saul for their king before they declared war against the Amalekites. But, if this had been the case, there could have been no room for God's relenting, and Samuel's reproofing them so severely for it. Maimon doth indeed endeavour to waive this objection, by pretending that what displeased God was their coming in a tumultuous and disrespectful manner to Samuel, and asking a king, not in obedience to the divine command, but out of an itch to be like their neighbours; but this is neither agreeable to the text (46), nor to Josephus, who imputes this desire of a kingly government to the intolerable corruption which had crept into all the courts of justice, through the baseness and avarice of Samuel's two sons, whom he appointed to officiate for him in his old age (47).

(R) The Jews understand by multiplying wives, his having above eighteen at a time, that is, two more than David had, who, they say, is recorded to have had but sixteen; and, by multiplying horses, they understand having more than served him and his retinue (48); but we shall shew, that, if there was any such oral law, Solomon made very light of it in either case, even from the first year of his reign.

(S) The Talmudists tell us, that the immediate heir of a king, who had been anointed, was himself proclaimed king without unction, especially in the family

(46) Vide 1 Sam. viii. pass. (47) Ant. lib. v. c. 6. (48) Vide præc. neg. 222, & seq.

scripture calls a royal priesthood<sup>a</sup>; gave them a full power, not only in matters purely civil and military, but in ecclesiastical also. This is indeed denied by very many divines, who think that they never exercised any authority in the latter as kings of Israel, but as prophets, and inspired persons, such as were David and Solomon. But the contrary doth plainly appear from the reformatations and regulations which Hezekias, Jehoshaphat, Josiah, and others made, who were neither prophets, nor inspired persons. We have already taken notice, that they had power to consult the oracle of Urim, and, indeed, they were commanded so to do upon all emergencies, as well as the grand council or sanhedrin, over which they presided, whenever they pleased to assist at it<sup>b</sup>. Thus we find that David, after he had been appointed king, even in Saul's time, did consult the divine oracle concerning the success of his undertaking<sup>c</sup>. They had likewise an absolute power of life and death; and though, according to the law of Moses, no man was to be capitally punished before he had been convicted before proper judges, and upon the evidence of at least two or three witnesses, yet we meet with frequent instances of persons being put to death by the sole will of the prince. The same may be presumed to have been, with respect to property, by the instances of Mephibosheth and his servant Ziba<sup>d</sup>, and others of the like nature. From that of Naboth † we may likewise conclude that, in some cases, the estates of persons condemned devolved to the king: But, from the laws lately mentioned against oppressing the subjects, it appears rather to have been a tyrannical usurpation, than a command, or even permission from God. What profound respect was paid to the regal dignity, appears both from the submissive language with which they were addressed<sup>e</sup>, and the humble manner of approaching them; insomuch, that even queens and prophets did prostrate themselves with their faces to the ground before them, as Nathan and Bathsheba did to David<sup>f</sup>, though there is no doubt, but his son Solomon raised the grandeur of the throne to a much greater height. The Jews affirm, that even the high-priest was obliged to stand before the king, whereas the latter only stood before the high-priest, when he was consulting God by Urim<sup>g</sup>. They add, that he alone was allowed to sit down in the court of the temple, even in the most sacred part of it, namely, that of the priests, provided he was of the lineage of David, whereas their senators were only allowed to sit in that which belonged to the people<sup>h</sup>. The magnificence of their dress did not a little contribute to raise an awe in their subjects. It is true, that there is nothing prescribed concerning it, either in the Mosaic law, or any other inspired writer, and that we have no clear description of it in the sacred books; but it is plain from Jehoshaphat's going to fight against the Syrians in his royal robes, whilst Ahab changed his own for a common dress<sup>i</sup>, that there was a manifest difference between them, if not in shape, at least in beauty and costliness, such as family of David; and that the ceremony was only used when a younger son was preferred to the eldest, as in the case of Solomon (49). Maimon tells us, that the consecration of this oil, or royal ointment, was also prescribed by God, and gives us the receipt of it; he adds, that it was hid with that of the priests, with the ark, &c. just before the captivity, and that it could never be found after their return. Where he had all these particulars is hardly worth enquiring (50). The Jews observe further, that Saul and Jehu were anointed בִּשְׁמֵן בִּשְׁמֵן Bepak haschemen, with a viol of oil, to denote the shortness of their reign; but that David and his posterity were anointed בִּשְׁמֵן בִּשְׁמֵן Bekeren, with a horn of oil, to signify the uninterrupted succession of it (51); but there seems to be more subtilty than truth in that remark. One thing is certain, that the custom of consecrating any thing to God, by this profusion of oil, is very ancient, as appears from the instance of Jacob's anointing the pillar of Bethel (52). How much earlier it began, and how introduced, is impossible to guess; but it is plain, that it became in use during the whole Mosaic dispensation, in the dedication both of men and things to the immediate service of God. Of the first kind were the kings, priests, and prophets; and of the second, all the sacred utensils of the tabernacle. But how far this ceremony was typical of Christ, who is emphatically called the Messiah, or anointed, or of the spiritual unction under the gospel, is out of our province.

<sup>a</sup> Exod. xix. 6, & alib. <sup>b</sup> Maim. Halak Melakim, c. 2. <sup>c</sup> 1 Sam. xxx. 7, & 8. Vide BASNAG. ubi sup. <sup>d</sup> 2 Sam. xix. 29. <sup>e</sup> 1 Kings xxi. pass. <sup>f</sup> Vide int. al. 1 Sam. xxv. 23, & seq. & ver. 40. 2 Sam. xiv. pass. xxiv. 3, & alib. <sup>g</sup> 1 King. i. 16, 23. <sup>h</sup> Maim. ubi sup. <sup>i</sup> Id. Halak. Beth. Habbkir. <sup>j</sup> 1 King. xxii. 30.

(49) 1 Kings i. pass. (50) Maim. Halak Kele Hammikdash, c. 1, & alib. (51) KIMCH. Comm. in 1 Sam. ii. 1. Vide HOTTING. in GOODWIN'S Mos. & Ar. lib. i. c. 4. § 2, & 3. BASNAG. in CUN. lib. i. c. 14. (52) Gen. xxviii. 18, & seq.

a jewels about their crown (T), the purple mantle, and the like. Josephus tells us <sup>c</sup>, that Solomon did usually go clad in white, but this was a colour common both to the priests and nobles (V); so that the difference must be in the richness, whether of the linnen or silk of which they were made. However, as they were not tied by the law to any dress, we need not to doubt but they followed the fashions of other countries, and were more sumptuously clad upon some particular occasions than ordinary <sup>d</sup>. The psalmist has likewise given us a beautiful description of the dress of queens <sup>e</sup>, which was still richer than that of kings; but we shall dwell no longer upon it.

b Laws and customs relating to judges and courts of judicature.

WE need not speak here of those judges, emphatically so called, who governed Israel from Josbua to Saul; these being appointed from time to time by God himself, we find, were entirely governed by his laws, and in doubtful cases by his spirit, with which they were endowed; they had the supreme authority during their life, and differed in nothing from kings, but in title, pomp, and grandeur, and their dignity not being hereditary; in all other cases their power was the same. They could make peace and war, summon the tribes to arms, consult God by Urim, and the like. They are said to have judged Israel, and that the people repaired to them for judgment, and that they took yearly circuits through the land to administer justice <sup>f</sup>; but whether this was done by way of appeal from the judgment of inferior courts, as the dernier resort, or by way of consulting them in doubtful cases, is not easy to determine (W).

BUT besides these, Moses, and after him, those who were at the head of the Israelitish common-wealth, were commanded to appoint a number of judges

<sup>c</sup> Ant. lib. viii. c. 2. <sup>d</sup> Vide 1 Sam. xxviii. 8. 1 Kings xxii. 10, 30. JOSEPH. Ant. lib. vi. c. 10. & alib. Rasc. & al. <sup>e</sup> Ps. xlv. <sup>f</sup> Vide Jud. iv. 5. 1 Sam. iii. 20. iv. 1. vii. 15, & seq. & alib.

(T) It is plain; that this ornament was so far from being peculiar to crowned heads, that the priests and persons of high rank were allowed to wear them. Nay, it seems from Ezekiel's being forbid by God to take his own off his head, in token of mourning (53), that every private man did wear something of the same nature. This ornament, which the Hebrews calls פֶּהַר, Pheer, is supposed to have been a kind of ribbon or fillet, which went round the head, and was wore, not only by the Jews, but by other eastern nations; from which those of princes, though called by other names, are thought to have differed only in the richness of the materials, and of the precious stones that adorned them (54). Hence David calls his own כִּסֵּי־עֹרֹת, Hattereth-phax, a crown of the purest gold (55). We read, indeed, of one which that monarch took from the king of the Ammonites, which is said to have weighed a talent of gold (56). But we shall shew in its proper place, that it means not that it weighed, but that it was worth so much, by reason of the precious stones that were about it.

(V) Hence came persons of high birth and rank to be called חֹרִי־בֵּרִי, Chorim, albat, præclari, in opposition to those of obscure birth, who were called חֹשֶׁבֶר־בֵּרִי, Chasbukim, tenebresi, obscuri. To this distinction the apostle St. James seems to allude (57), when he says, if a man come into your assemblies—in goodly apparel, or, as the original has it, εν σποδῇ λαμπρᾷ, in a white or splendid robe—and a poor man εν σποδῇ στυγρᾷ, in a dark or dirty one. We read, indeed, in the book of Esther, of the royal scepter, crown, and princely apparel (58). But besides that these are of a later date, we do not know how far these ornaments were imitated by the Jewish kings. However, it is plain, that, even in Ahasuerus's court, neither the golden crown, nor the purple, or any other colour, were peculiar to the kings; since we find Mordecai adorned with them, as a reward of his merit (59); and we have elsewhere shewn, that the crown was the distinguishing ornament of persons of the highest rank, in the courts of all the eastern princes <sup>g</sup>.

(W) The latter, however, seems most probable, from the command of Moses, that in all doubtful cases, whether criminal or civil, wherein the inferior judges could not easily determine, they should apply themselves to the priests, and to the judge or head of the people then in being, to whose judgment they should submit under pain of death (60). The Jews, indeed, pretend, that this application was to be made to the great council, or sanhedrin <sup>h</sup>, which they pretend to have subsisted ever since the time of Moses. But we have elsewhere shewn, that the council, which Moses appointed, lasted only during the lives of those elders, and that this sanhedrin was a new institution of a much later date <sup>i</sup>. So that, in all doubtful and disputed cases, no persons could be more proper to be applied to, than these judges, who were endued both with the spirit of God, and with the supreme authority, since even this latter was thought sufficient afterwards in the time of their kings, as appears from very many instances, especially those quoted in the margin (61).

(53) Conf. Ezek. xiv. 17, & 24. (54) Vide CALM. Comm. in Exod. xxiv. 17. & aut. ab eo citat. (55) Psal. xxi. 3. (56) 2 Sam. xii. 30. 1 Chron. xx. 2. (57) Jacob. ii. 2. (58) Esth. iv. 11. vi. 8. (59) Ibid. c. viii. 15. * Vide sup. p. 465. (R) (60) Deut. xviii. 8. & seq. <sup>g</sup> Præc. affirm. 3. † Vide sup. p. 525. (H) (61) 2 Sam. xiv. pass. 1 Kings iii. 16, & seq. 2 Kings viii. 3, & alib. pass.

and magistrates in all cities to administer justice to the people in every tribe. These were to be men of wisdom and probity, well versed in the law of Moses, free from covetousness and partiality; such as would protect the innocent, the fatherless and widow, the helpless and stranger, and punish the guilty and wrong-doer (X). We find, likewise, several denunciations against those who should suffer themselves to be bribed, to act contrary to the strict laws of justice; but as they were appointed by the kings, so their virtue did rise and fall, according to the goodness or wickedness of these. We may say more: Samuel was himself a most upright judge, and yet his two sons, who acted under him, proved, most unrighteous. David was likewise a pious monarch, and yet, had there not crept a great deal of corruption in the courts of judicature, his son Abshalom could have had no pretence for wishing that he had been a judge, that he might do justice to every one that applied to him for it <sup>a</sup>.

THESE courts were held at the gates of the cities, as we have elsewhere shewn †, and became in time very considerable; but how they were kept, or how many judges belonged to each; whether their power was equal, or some subordinate to others, the scripture gives us no light into. We read indeed, that Moses, during their abode in the wilderness, appointed rulers over thousands, over hundreds, fifties, and tens <sup>b</sup>, and these were in all likelihood subordinate to one another; but how far this model was followed, when they came into the land of Canaan, doth not appear. However, we may suppose, that these courts consisted at first but of very few persons, and that every thing was transacted in them with the utmost plainness and simplicity; neither were there many kinds of offices or dignities, since we read but of four sorts of officers, even in Joshua's time; namely, the elders, the heads, the judges, and the officers <sup>c</sup>. It is impossible to determine what their officers were, only the last are supposed to have been a kind of beaules or executioners. In the flourishing reigns of David and Solomon, they encreased very much <sup>d</sup>, and in process of time became so corrupted, that the prophets were obliged, from time to time, to exclaim against them. One of them having been sent to Jehoshaphat, to denounce God's heavy judgment against Israel for those abuses, wrought so upon that good king, that he immediately set about making a thorough reformation, appointing new judges in every walled city, some of whom were of the tribe of Levi, and charging them, in the most pressing terms, to be more watchful and upright than their predecessors. He likewise appointed two tribunals for the city of Jerusalem, the one consisting chiefly of priests and Levites, for matters of religion; and the other, which was mostly made up of the heads of families, for matters of state. In this condition they are supposed to have continued till the captivity, bating that as the princes became more and more wicked, so did the judges under them, till God was provoked to drive them out of the land. This is all we can say upon that article, with any tolerable certainty. As for what Josephus and the Talmudists do add concerning magistrates and their courts, as their accounts differ from one another; and as we are not sure, but even the former doth rather describe them as they were after, than before the captivity, we shall

<sup>a</sup> Exod. xxiii. 8, & seq. Deut. xvi. 18, & seq. xvii. 2, & seq. xix. pass. xxiv. 16, & seq. xxv. 1. & seq. & alib. pass. Ezek. xlv. 24. præc. affirm. 97. 10. <sup>b</sup> 2 Sam. xv. 2. & seq. † Vide sup. p. 432. note (F). <sup>c</sup> Exod. xviii. 24, & seq. <sup>d</sup> Josh. xxiv. 1. <sup>e</sup> Vide 1 Chron. xxiii. & seq. pass.

(X) To these excellent requisites in the Israelitish judges, the Talmud has added 'a great number of others, some of which are impracticable, and others quite ridiculous. Such are those which oblige them to be masters of seventy-two languages, that they may have no occasion for an interpreter, in cases wherein strangers are concerned; that they be well versed in the magick art, not in order to practise it themselves, but to be able to judge rightly in all cases of that nature. In this they seem even more cautious than Josephus, who, tho' otherwise far from imitating them in their rabbinical fooleries, seems nevertheless to have a particular fondness for that pretended science, making Solomon to have been the greatest master of it, and to have left behind several noble secrets, by which some of his own countrymen made themselves famous even in his days (62). The Talmudists moreover exclude from the courts of judicature all childless and superannuated persons, strangers and eunuchs. The former indeed is agreeable to reason, and the two latter are expressly excluded by Moses (63); but we dare not warrant the reason which they give against the last of them, viz. that their being eunuchs inclines them to cruelty. In other cases, their directions for the choice of these magistrates, as well as for their behaviour in that office, are very reasonable and judicious (64).

(62) Ant. lib. viii. c. 2.

(63) Deut. xvii. 15, & xxiii. 1.

(64) Vide præc. neg. 194, & seq. & affirm. 95, & seq.

- 1 chuse to subjoin it in the margin (Y). Thus much we know concerning those tribunals; that they took cognisance of all civil and criminal cases, even where the offence was of a religious nature; such as idolatry, blasphemy, witchcraft, sacrilege, and the like, for which reason the priests and Levites were appointed

(Y) Besides the grand council of seventy, mentioned above, to which they pretend all other tribunals throughout the land were subordinate; the Talmudists tell us, there were two other courts, the one consisting of three, and the other of three and twenty judges; and these, they say, were to be in every city and town that had 120 inhabitants, according to some; or families, according to others. The first of these courts were only chosen, pro re nata, one by each party, and the third by the other two. Their cognisance extended no farther than to small matters, such as servants wages, petty larcenies, restitution, and the like. Neither could they inflict a heavier punishment than whipping. That of twenty-three was allowed to judge of all capital causes, and to condemn criminals to death. And if there arose any difference in their judgment, it was carried by the majority, for which reason they say their number was to be odd. But in cases of moment, and of a dubious nature, the high-priest was to be consulted. If a man was condemned to death, he was to be immediately led to execution. A cryer was to go before him, and proclaim the crime he was to die for; to the end, that, if any person knew any thing that could clear him of it, he might be brought back to the judges, and have a second, and, if occasion offered, a third hearing. The same indulgence was to be allowed him, if he complained of being unjustly condemned, whilst he went to the place of execution, in which case he was to chuse two wise men to plead for him, and, if possible, to obtain a reversion of the sentence; but if in neither case he could prove himself innocent, he was then to be forthwith executed by the witnesses; for it is here to be observed, that, if the crime was such as deserved hanging, the criminal was first to be stoned to death, and then hanged. But before execution, he was to be exhorted to confess his crime, and to pray that his death might atone both for it, and for all his other sins; which if he did, they gave him then a dose of wine mixed with myrrh or frankincense to stupify him, after which he was put to death. If he was to be hanged after it, as in cases of idolatry, blasphemy, and such like, they stayed till about an hour before sun-set, and then tied his hands behind him, and hoisted him up till just before sun-set, at which time he was taken down, and both the halter and the gallows or tree were buried with him (65). They except, however, out of the cognisance of these courts of twenty-three all cases, whether criminal or civil, which related to the high-priest, to a whole tribe, and to false prophets, which they pretend were only to be tried by the grand council (66). To this a learned author thinks that expostulation of Christ to allude to (67), O Jerusalem!—thou that killest the prophets (68). We own, indeed, this to have been the case of the sanhedrin, in our Saviour's time, and even some time before, but not before the captivity; but how, or by what court or judges these extraordinary cases were to be tried, is impossible to say, unless we suppose, that it was done by a general assembly of the whole nation, or at least of the heads of them, as we find it in several instances (69).

There are several other things mentioned in the Talmud, concerning all these courts, and the choice of their judges, which we shall not dwell upon, seeing neither the scripture nor Josephus speak of them; the reader may see them quoted in the margin (70). As for Josephus, his account is different from them, and all that he says on this matter is, that Moses ordered seven judges to be chosen in every city, men of known probity and learning, to which they should add two priests or Levites, so that he reckons but nine judges in every court, viz. seven lay-men, and two Levites (71); and his testimony is most generally followed, because he lived when the Jewish common-wealth was still flourishing, whereas the Talmudists did not live till after the destruction of it.

We shall, however, conclude this note with an account of the form of the court of the twenty-three judges, according to the Jewish doctors, because it had a near resemblance, not only to that of the sanhedrin, but also to those of other polite nations. They sat in the form of a half-moon. In the center of it was the president, whom they call נשיא, Nassi, or prince, having the אב בית דין, Abbet bet din, or father of the senate, at his right-hand; the rest sat on each side, according to their seniority or merit. At each end was a clerk or secretary, who took the depositions in writing. Some add a third, whose office was to gather the votes of the court. At the feet of the judges sat their disciples, in three rows or forms, whose business was to observe every thing that was said or done; and these were chosen to succeed those on the bench, either at their death, or when they became unqualified by old age, or any other impediment. The accused person was placed upon an eminent place in the court, that he might be easily seen by all, and the witnesses stood fronting him. These were to be diligently examined, and their character inquired into, and if any flaw was found in it, they were set aside; but if any was found to have given false evidence, the Talion law was his portion (72); that is, he was condemned to the same punishment as his evidence would have brought upon the innocent. The סוֹטְרִים, Soterim, that is, the officers or executioners, were also to attend the court constantly, with rods and leathern scourges in their hands, to execute the sentence of the judges. The accused person was likewise allowed a counsellor to plead for him, who was called בעל ריב, Bahal-rib, the master of the process; and he stood on his right hand and pleaded for him. Many expressions there are in the Psalms, in the prophets, and other places of the old testament, that seem so plainly to allude to one or other of these judicial forms, as make it more than probable, that they were in use long before the captivity. After a full hearing, the votes were gathered and examined, and according to them, the person was either absolved or condemned in words to this purpose. Thou Simeon art innocent: thou Judah art guilty; and if the latter and his crime was capital, he was immediately put into the executioner's hands, and led to execution: But if the crime was such as only deserved whipping, it was forthwith performed before the whole court (73).

(65) Vide præc. aff. 97, 98, & seq. ad. 111. (66) Vide Mishnah, Traß. סנהדרין, c. 1. (67) Cun. Rep. Habr. lib. i. c. 12. (68) Luke xiii. 34. (69) Vide Josh. xxii. 11. & seq. Judg. xx. 1, & seq. xxi. pass. (70) Vide Mishn. ubi sup. MAIM. in loc. & alib. Mos. KOTZ, SELDEN, de Synedr. GOODWIN, Mos. & Aar. lib. v. cap. 3, & seq. LAMY, CALM. Dissert. sur la police des Hebreux, & al. (71) Ant. lib. iv. c. ult. (72) Deut. xix. 18, 19. (73) Vide de his Mishn. Traß. Sanhedr. c. 5. MAIM. M. KOTZ, & al. sup. citat. vide & præc. affirm. sup. citat.

to assist, if not to preside in them. The next in authority to the magistrates were a natural parents, and these were to be honoured and obeyed in a most particular manner<sup>a</sup> (Z). St. Paul observes, that this is the first command with a promise<sup>b</sup>; and the punishment of disobedient and wicked children was no less severe. It was death for any to curse or strike their parents<sup>c</sup>; or even to continue in a stubborn disobedience to their commands. In this last case, they had power to inflict any punishment but death upon them: And if that proved ineffectual, they might then bring and accuse them before the judges, who, upon full proof, were obliged to condemn them to death<sup>d</sup>, without mercy or delay. And now we are upon the subject of punishments, it will not be improper to conclude this article, with an account of those which were either appointed by the Mosaic law, or made use of at b the prince's will, against obnoxious persons, before the captivity.

Punishments.

Of the first kind were the smaller sort of punishments, which were either 1. Fines by way of compensation for wrongs, theft, and the like: And in this respect the Jews were so strict, that if a man had built a house, in which there was but one single piece of timber, or a stone that was stolen, they made no difficulty of pulling down the house, if they could not get it out without it, to restore it to the owner. 2. Selling for slaves those who were not able to pay their debts, or make satisfaction for a wrong. 3. The Talion law, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, stripe for stripe, and so on. Lastly, whipping, and this last was not to exceed forty lashes<sup>e</sup> (A). The capital punishments were of four kinds; namely, stoning, burning, beheading, c and strangling<sup>f</sup>. 1. Stoning was the most usual, and when the law condemned a person to death, without naming the kind, this was always understood to be meant by it<sup>g</sup>. Some modern Jews rather think that it was strangling, because it was an easier death, and that in cases where the particular kind is not expressed, the most favourable is to be chosen<sup>h</sup>; but it is more probable from the case of adultery, that stoning was the punishment understood; for it is said in Ezekiel<sup>i</sup>, I will judge thee with the judgment of wedlock-breakers, &c. and two verses after, they shall stone thee with stones—and it is plain, that the Jews understood it in that sense in our Saviour's time, by what they said to him, when they brought the adulterers before him<sup>j</sup>. The crimes, which deserved this death, were all kind of incest, so- d domy, bestiality, ravishing a betrothed virgin, or her consenting to be defiled by another man; blaspheming, sabbath-breaking, witchcraft, idolatry, enticing others to idolatry, rebellious children, offering one's seed to Moloch, and some others of the like nature. For some of these last, the criminal was likewise to be hanged, after he had been stoned to death, as we have seen in a former note, where we have also hinted something concerning the manner of this execution, and to which we have nothing to add, but that it was always done out of the city,

<sup>a</sup> Exod. xx. 12. Deut. v. 16, & alib. <sup>b</sup> Eph. vi. 2. <sup>c</sup> Exod. xxi. 15, 17. Levit. xx. 9. <sup>d</sup> Deut. xxi. 18, & seq. <sup>e</sup> Ibid. xxv. 3. <sup>f</sup> Ex. Levit. xxiv. 14. & Num. xv. 35. 1 Kings xxi. 13. Vide sup. p. 557. note (F). <sup>g</sup> Vide Deut. xvii. 7. <sup>h</sup> Vide R. SALOM. in Exod. xxi. 16. <sup>i</sup> Ch. xxvi. 38, 40. <sup>j</sup> John viii. 5.

(Z) The Talmudists observe, that the law lays a greater stress upon honouring our parents, than upon honouring God, because we are only enjoined to honour the latter with our substance (74); whereas we are bound to honour the former, whether we have any substance or not, and to work, in order to be able to maintain them (75). This is a duty to which the Egyptians seem to have been strangers, if what Herodotus says of them be true, that the sons were not bound to maintain their parents, unless they were willing, but that the daughters were obliged to it, whether willing or not (76). It likewise excelled that of the Persians, Greeks, Romans, and other polite people, in that it included both parents, whereas these only, or at most, principally the father. This appears by the Persian law mentioned by Aristotle, by the Roman digests, and institutions mentioned by Epictetus, Simplicius, Philosophe de legatione, and others (77). We shall observe farther, that the words of the promise annexed to this command run thus in the original: That they may prolong thy days, and so on; from which the generality of Jewish interpreters conclude the word they to relate to the father and mother so honoured, namely, that they might prolong by their prayers and blessings the life of their dutiful children. The words are indeed capable of either sense; but, if the Jews had taken them in this last in our Saviour's time, they would not have met with so severe a reproof from him for eluding that precept.

(A) In this last case, the Talmudists say, the criminal was to be strapp'd down as low as his breast, or heart, tho' they were forced to tear his clothes for it. The executioner was to have a lash made of calves leather, of a convenient breadth, and long enough to go round his middle; and in cases where the utmost severity was to be used towards the criminal, he was to give him 39 strokes with all the strength he had (78).

(74) Prov. iii. 9. (75) Rabb. SIMEON. Vide præc. affirm. 112, & 113. (76) HERODOT. lib. ii. c. 25. Vide CARLET, Harmon. of N. and P. laws, c. 6. (77) Idem ibid. (78) Vide præc. 8. affirm. 105.

as it was out of the camp during their abode in the wilderness. Here, after he had confessed his fault, the witnesses came and laid their hands upon his head, and said aloud, Thy blood be upon thee, and threw the first stones, and the rest of the spectators helped to dispatch him * (B). This, however, must be understood of regular cases, for there were others of an irregular nature, wherein it was allowed to stone the criminal, such as a blasphemer, idolater, adulterer, upon the spot, without further trial. But these ought rather to be looked upon as zealous mobbings, though encouraged under the specious title of judgment of zeal, founded upon the action of Phineas, mentioned in another part of this history †.

2. BURNING. This punishment was used before Moses; as appears by Judab's condemning his daughter-in-law to the flames ‡. Some interpreters, indeed, think, that he meant no more than to have her burnt in the forehead, or stigmatised her for her incontinency; but without any probability. We shall not here repeat what we said on that subject *. The Mosaic law condemned the daughters of priests to be burnt for incontinency †; and Achan was condemned to be stoned and burnt for sacrilege ‡. These are the only two places where that punishment is mentioned. The Jews tell us also of some other crimes which were punished with it, particularly some kinds of incest †. They add, that it was two-fold; namely, burning with fire, and with melted lead poured down the criminal's throat (C).

3. BEHEADING. This, the Jewish doctors say, was a punishment appointed only for murderers, and for towns that were fallen into idolatry. But we find, indeed, nothing like it to have been practised before the captivity, in a judicial way. It is true, indeed, that Abimelech, one of Gideon's sons, caused seventy of his brothers to be beheaded upon one stone at Ophra †; that the men of Samaria sent the heads of the same number of Abab's sons to the new king of Israel ‡; and that forty-two of Abaziah's brethren were put to death, probably in the same way, by the same Jehu's orders †; but it is plain, that none of these were done in a judicial way. We find, likewise, instances of persons being put to death by the sword. Thus Samuel killed the king of Amalek †; in the same manner David ordered the messenger of Saul's death to be slain †: And Adonijah, Joab, and Shimei were killed by Solomon's order, d one of them at the very foot of the altar †.

4. STRANGLING. The text makes no explicit mention of this kind of death; but the Talmudists reckon six sorts of criminals that were condemned to it; namely, 1. Those that struck their parents. 2. Men-stealers. 3. The priests that refused to conform to the determination of the court. 4. False prophets, or those who prophesied in the name of false Gods. 5. He that defiled another man's bed. And 6. He that had criminal conversation with a priest's daughter. These were executed as follows: They were immersed in dung up to the knees; two executioners tied a napkin about their neck, and twisted it till he was quite suffocated. All kinds of criminals were buried apart by them-

* Deut. xvii. 7. † Pag. 536. a. ‡ Gen. xxxviii. 24. * Sup. p. 451. (R) † Levit. xxi. 9. ‡ Josh. vii. 28. See before p. 557. (F). † Vide Mos. KOTZ in Tract. Sanhedr. c. 1. GOODWIN'S Mos. and Aar. lib. v. c. 7. § 13. † Jud. ix. 5. ‡ 2 Kings x. 7. † Ibid. ver. 13, & seq. † 1 Sam. xv. 33. † 2 Sam. i. 15. † 1 Kings ii. 25, 30, & 40.

(B) The Talmudists mention another kind of stoning, by precipitating a man from some considerable eminence, at least of the height of two men. One of the witnesses tied his hands behind him, and the other threw him down; and if he did not die by the fall, they threw stones upon him till he was dead. The Mosaic law doth not indeed mention this kind of punishment, but we find it practised in our Saviour's time (78). They add, that when the criminal was within ten cubits of the place of execution, in either way of stoning, they exhorted him to confess his crime; when within four cubits, they stripped him. R. Jebuda says, that a man's middle was to be covered before, and a woman's behind; others, that the men only were to be stripped, and the women to die in their cloaths (79).

(C) The first they call burning of the body, and the other, burning of the soul. This last was the most frequent among them, and some of the rabbies acknowledge no other way but this to have been used, though the places, mentioned above, imply rather the former. The Talmudists do, indeed, condemn it, and think it unlawful to burn the bodies of their brethren to ashes. They infer it from what is said of the sons of Aaron, who, though killed by a supernatural fire, yet remained unconsumed, since the text says (80), that they were carried dead out of the camp, in their coats; but rabbi Eleazar is said, in the Talmud, to have disallowed the conclusion, affirming, that he had seen a priest's daughter burnt to ashes; to which he is only answered, that her judges were ignorant Cutheans; that is, a mungrel kind of Samaritans, who knew nothing of the law (81).

(78) Luke iv. 29. (79) Mishn. ubi sup. c. 6. § 1, & seq. COCCIO Interpret. (80) Levit. x. 5. (81) Mishn. Tract. Sanhedr. ubi sup.

Excommunication.

selves, and on the same day, together with the instruments of their death, whatever they were, to blot out as much as possible the remembrance of it<sup>a</sup> (D).

BUT the most dreadful of all their punishments, though not a capital one, was excommunication; especially that which they called Shematta (E), answering to the Syrian Maran-atta used by St. Paul<sup>b</sup>, which signifies in both tongues, the Lord comes, or is at hand. Enoch, the seventh from Adam, is supposed the author of it, because St. Jude quotes that saying of his, behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his Saints to execute judgment; and so on<sup>c</sup>, which must have been, at least, owing to some tradition among the Jews. However, these fetch the original of it, both from those frequent expressions in the Mosaic writings, that soul shall be cut off from Israel, and thou shalt put away evil from the midst of thee; and more particularly from the words in Deborah's song, Curse ye Meroz, said the angel of the Lord, curse ye bitterly the inhabitants of it<sup>d</sup>. But without enquiring into the validity of these subtil etymologies, we find a more express form of it in Ezra and Nebemiah<sup>e</sup>, who excommunicated all those that refused to repudiate their strange wives; and exacted an oath from the people, to avoid all affinity and commerce with them. The same account of it we find in Josephus, who adds, that the goods of the excommunicated person were to be confiscated to the holy treasury<sup>f</sup>. It is true, this was done after the captivity; but we need not doubt but they had precedents and laws for it before that time; for it is said, that it was performed in a legal way, and pursuant to the laws of God. As for the form and method of pronouncing

<sup>a</sup> Tract. Sanhedr. ubi sup. <sup>b</sup> 1 Cor. xvi. 22. <sup>c</sup> Ver. 14. <sup>d</sup> Judg. v. 23. <sup>e</sup> Ezr. x. 7, & seq. Nehem. xiii. 25. <sup>f</sup> Ant. lib. xi. c. 5.

(D) To these we may add some foreign punishments, which were afterwards adopted by their kings; such were those which David caused to be inflicted on the Ammonites (82), and that which Manasseh put the prophet Isaiah to, whom he is supposed, by several ancient fathers (83), to have caused to be sawn in two from the head downward, with a wooden saw, from the words of the apostle (84), some were sawn asunder. The difficulty here is about the wooden saw, how it could be fit for such a purpose. But allowing the thing to be really fact, and a tradition of it to have been preserved, we need but suppose the expression to be an Hebraism, that is, a wooden saw, for a saw with which wood used to be sawn, which is a common idiom in that tongue. This expression of cutting in two, and cutting asunder, is indeed frequent in the old testament, and in the apocryphal book of Susanna. We omit some other punishments of the like nature, which would only fill our readers with horror. As for that of crucifixion, such as Christ suffered, tho' some have fancied it to be implied in the words of Deuteronomy (85), if a man be hanged on a tree, his body shall not remain all night on it, &c. yet it is generally allowed to have been, not a Jewish, but a Roman punishment, and so foreign to our purpose.

(E) The Jews reckon three kinds, or rather degrees of excommunication. The first they call Niddui, from נדה, Nadah, to separate, or put from one. So that this word was indifferently used, to express those that were separated for any uncleanness, or for any crime that came within this degree of excommunication (86). The time of its lasting was limited to 30 days, and yet the delinquent could either shorten it by doing penance, or lengthen it by stubbornness, even to the end of his life, if he persisted in it. In this last case, they refused to circumcise his children, and if he died penitent, the judge ordered a stone to be thrown into his coffin or bier, to shew that he deserved to have been stoned.

The second degree they called Cherem, anathema, and this they pretend was more severe than the Niddui, because it excluded the person from the synagogue, and from all civil commerce, which the other did not. But we have shewn elsewhere, that this word signified quite another thing, and was applicable to men and things vowed to death or destruction (87); and our learned Selden has proved, that there were really but two kinds of excommunication, the lesser and the greater, and that the terms, Niddui, Cherem, and Shematta, were used indifferently (88).

The last, however, according to them, was this, Shematta, which they pretend was proclaimed by the sound of 400 trumpets, as, they say, it was done at the cursing of Meroz by Deborah. A person, so excommunicated, was never to be received again into the congregation, and some pretend, that it was even lawful to put him to death. For this reason they derive the word from שם, Sham, there, and מתה, Mattah, death. To which the expression of St. John is supposed to allude; there is a sin unto death; that is, according to them, a sin that deserves to be devoted to death (89). But all this is forced, and that which derives it from שם, Shem, the name, (which word they commonly use instead of any of the names of God, as we have seen elsewhere) and אתה, comes, or is at hand; seems to us the most rational, and answers to the Syrian Maran-atta, which bears the same sense. As for the crimes to which these excommunications were annexed, and the manner of pronouncing them, or of absolving these that had incurred them, we can affirm nothing certain; and so shall go no further with this point. The reader may consult Selden and Buxtorf in the places above quoted, or the learned J. Jam. Horstinger (90), and others.

(82) 2 Sam. xii. ult. (83) JUSTIN MART. Dialog. cont. Tryph. ORIG. ex lib. apocr. HIERON. in Isai. & al. (84) Hæbr. xi. 37. (85) Deut. xxi. 22. (86) Vide int. al. Ezek. xxiii. 6. (87) Vide Levit. xxvii. 29. Job. vii. 11, & seq. Vide sup. p. 630. b. (O). (88) De Synedr. vet. Hæbr. lib. i. c. 7, & 8. (89) 1 John v. 16. Vide BERTRAM, de Polit. Jud. cap. 2. (90) Diff. Hist. Theol. de penitent. p. 49, & seq.

it,

- a it, and in what cases it was to be done, we cannot be certain. Buxtorf hath indeed given us a full account of it from the Talmudists <sup>a</sup>, but besides that, we dare not vouch for its antiquity, the form of it is so full of the most dreadful imprecations, that they cannot be read without horror. Some of them seem to have been taken from the 109th psalm, and improved with all the dire curses both of this world and the next. As excommunication passed from the Jews to the Christians, St. Paul makes use of some other of their expressions, besides that of Maran-atta ; particularly that of delivering up to satan <sup>b</sup> ; but it is plain, by what he subjoins immediately after ; for the mortifying the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord, that it was not used by the primitive church in that damning sense in which the Jews and some modern churches understand it.

Laws against murder.

- MOSESES tells us, that, from the time of the flood, murder could not be expiated, but by the death of the murderer <sup>a</sup>, whatever might be the punishment of it before that time. Under the law, God seems to express a much greater abhorrence against it ; he not only forbade it in the decalogue <sup>b</sup>, but appointed avengers to punish the guilty person wherever they found him <sup>c</sup>, and permitted him to be torn from the most sacred places of sanctuariship to condign punishment <sup>d</sup>, as was lately hinted ; and expressly forbade both the avenger and judges to make any composition, or to accept of any other recompense for the crime <sup>e</sup>. These laws extended equally to Israelites and to the strangers that dwelt amongst them <sup>f</sup>. The only cases therefore, in which one man might lawfully kill another, were, 1. When the avenger of blood found a man-slayer out of his place of refuge. 2. In a man's own defence. 3. In defence of a brother Israelite. And lastly, an infant might likewise be destroyed to preserve the life of the mother, but not vice versa (F). To these the Jews add that, which they call the right of zeal, hinted under the last head, by which it was lawful for any number of men to fall upon a person who was caught in any abominable fact, such as blaspheming, offering his seed to Moloch, and the like, and to kill him upon the spot. Thus the Levites went out and killed three thousand of the worshippers of the golden calf ; and Phineas punished an abominable whoredom with death. We may also add another institution, extremely proper to inspire the people with an uncommon horror against wilful murder ; namely, that for the expiation of an uncertain murder. It was as follows. As soon as the Uncertain murder judges, who lived near the place where a man was found murdered, were informed of it, they were to examine what town was nearest to it, and to summon the elders of that city, who were thereupon obliged to bring a heifer that had never been yoked, and to drive her into a rough uncultivated valley, and there strike her head off. These and the priests were then to wash their hands over her, and to profess that their hands had not shed this blood, neither their eyes seen it done ; after which they were to pray to God not to lay it to their charge <sup>g</sup>. One may see by all this solemn ceremony, and by all the above-mentioned laws, what care was taken to deter them from the guilt of shedding innocent blood. It was for this very reason also, that God gave them several laws, whose only tendency was to divert them from cruelty ; such were those that forbade them to seeth a lamb or kid in its mother's milk ; to kill the dam and her young, both in one day ; to catch the old birds and their brood together ; to muzzle the ox that treadeth the corn ; to refuse to assist a neighbour's, or even an enemy's beast, that sunk under its burden ; and many

<sup>a</sup> Buxtorf. Lex. Talmud. p. 828.    <sup>b</sup> 1 Cor. v. 5.    <sup>c</sup> Gen. ix. 6. See before p. 114. c.    <sup>d</sup> Exod. xx. 13. xxi. 12. Deut. v. 17. Levit. xxiv. 17, & alib.    <sup>e</sup> Num. xxxv. 19.    <sup>f</sup> Exod. xxi. 14.    <sup>g</sup> Num. xxxv. 31, 32.    <sup>h</sup> Levit. xxiv. 12.    <sup>i</sup> Deut. xxi. 1, & seq.

(F) The Jews add, that he that seeth his brother in danger of his life, as for instance, of drowning, of being killed by another, or by a wild beast, or of being unjustly put to death, when he could save his life, is guilty of wilful murder. This they infer from that prohibition of Moses, thou shalt not stand against the blood of thy neighbour (91). The man likewise that swears falsely against another, in order to have him adjudged to death, was also to be deemed and punished as a murderer (92).

(91) Levit. xix. 16. Vide Munster. in loc. & prac. neg. 164, & 165.    (92) Vide Deut. xix. 19.

more of the like nature, all highly proper to inspire them with sentiments of humanity and good nature, which the slaughter they were going to make of so many nations, justly doomed to it for their wickedness, might otherwise have been apt to extinguish in them.

Laws against adultery, and all other unlawful commerce of sexes. The tryal of adultery, or waters of jealousy; concerning marriage and levirate.

Against adultery.

1. IT will scarcely be thought needful to enquire how far the words, thou shalt not commit adultery*, excluded all other carnal gratifications which were not confined within the bounds of lawful wedlock (G). It is sufficient to say that incest, rape, sodomy, and bestiality are forbid by other express laws, and made capital, as well as adultery†. As for fornication, though it was not made capital in some cases, yet was it forbid by several laws‡. The difference was, that any woman who ventured to marry under the notion of being a virgin, and was proved to be otherwise, was to be stoned§; whereas if a man deflowered a virgin, he was to pay her fifty shekels of silver, and to marry her, without having it in his power to put her away, during her life¶. Adultery was punishable with death in both parties, whether they were both married, or only the woman; but we cannot affirm the punishment of a married man to have been the same, who committed adultery with an unmarried woman; for besides that, the crime was not alike, with respect to society, it is plain that Moses was forced to indulge them in some other particulars, as unjustifiable as this, such as polygamy, divorce, and the like, which are justly condemned in the gospel.

HOWEVER, with respect to the wives, as there was a necessity that they should be kept under stricter ties, to prevent strange mixtures in families; so in order to deter them from all unlawful liberties of that kind, as well as perhaps to prevent those that were innocent, from being unjustly suspected, and ill treated by their jealous husbands; Moses was commanded to appoint the waters of jealousy, with the promise of a constant miracle, by which the guilty should be punished in a very dreadful manner, and the innocent would be cleared with applause. The ceremony was to be performed in the following manner¶.

Waters of jealousy.

2. WHENEVER a man had conceived a mistrust of his wife's incontinency, he was to bring an offering for her, peculiar to this case, namely, a cake made of barley meal, without oil or incense, and to put it into the hands of the priest. At the same time he brought his wife also, and declared what grounds he had for suspecting her. The priest then took the accused woman before the Lord, either to the tabernacle or temple, uncovered her head (H), and put the offering into her hand, whilst himself took some holy water, made bitter with some such * Exod. xx. 14. Deut. v. 18. † Vide Levit. xviii. pass. ibid. xx. 10, & seq. Deut. xxii. 25. ‡ Ibid. xxiii. 17, 18. Levit. xxi. 7. § Deut. xxii. 20, 21. ¶ Ibid. ver. 28, 29. † Num. v. 24, & seq.

(G) This is, indeed, the received opinion of many Jews and Christians, who by the word DNJ, Naph, understand all kind of illicit coition and unnatural lusts (93). Yet we beg leave to take notice, that some of the ancients on both sides understood it of the breach of conjugal faith. Accordingly, we find by Philo and Tertullian, that some of the Greek copies placed this law against adultery, before that against murder in the decalogue; and these two great orators have taken the pains to prove the former to be the more grievous crime of the two, and to describe the great hurt it doth to human society; the latter concluding it to be the greater crime, because forbidden before murder (94). However, it is certain, that Moses has no where given such a weighty reason against that, as he doth against this, when he says, for in the image of God created he man (95).

(H) The Jews understand by it shaving her hair, or at least cutting the curls off. They add, that they tore her cloaths down to her breast, and tied them with a pack-thread; others say, that her cloaths were exchanged for a black suit, in token of mourning, and in this manner she was exposed to publick view. These circumstances, they tell us, had something so dreadful to the Jewish women, especially the chaste ones, that they studied nothing more than to keep themselves free from any suspicion, which might expose them to that, which they esteemed worse than death. For this reason they did not suffer a woman to be brought to this tryal upon every slight suspicion. The husband was to bring some proofs that he had forewarned her more than once or twice against being seen in such a man's company, as he was jealous of, notwithstanding which, they had been found together in private, or in some remote place, at least, as long a time as a man might boil an egg and eat it †.

(93) Vide ABENEZR. in Exod. xx. Et Comment. ser. om. in loc. (94) TERTUL. de Pudicit. Vide CARLTON. Concord. c. 7. (95) Gen. ix. 6. † Vide MUNST. in Num. v.

- a herb as wormwood, into which he put some of the dust of the floor or pavement ; together with the words of the curse written at full length, to this effect : That, if she had been guilty of defiling her marriage-bed, those waters should swell and burst her belly, and rot her thigh ; but, if she was innocent, they should have no power to hurt her. These words he first read to her aloud, and, if she persisted to go on with the tryal (I), she answered, Amen. He was then to blot out the words of the curse in the bitter water, they being, according to the Jews, written with an ink made without vitriol, which would be easily washed away ; after which he gave her the water to drink, whilst he took the offering or cake of jealousy off her hand, and waved it to the Lord, and burned part of it upon the altar. The consequence was,
- b that, if she was guilty, the water did burst her belly, and rot her thigh, and she died soon after her drinking of it ; but, if she was innocent, she not only came off unhurt, but, as a token and reward of her continence, she became more healthy and fruitful, and the husband was to take her home, and cherish her the more, for having given him such an eminent proof of her chastity. This is all that we find in the Mosaic law. The Talmudists have added several other circumstances relating to this ceremony, which we should be loath to warrant, both because, by their own confession, it had been disused several centuries, before their time, since which adultery became more frequent ; and because neither the canonical, nor apocryphal books, or, indeed, any of their writings that we know of, afford us one single instance of
- c its ever having been used before that time, whereby one might guess where they had them ; for which reason we chuse to give them in the margin (K). For aught appears therefore, this ceremony might be instituted only in terrorem, and yet prove very effectual, both to keep the wives within the bounds of conjugal fidelity, and the husbands from too lightly suspecting them of a breach of it ; especially, if another circumstance which the Jews tell us be true, or was believed to be so, that these waters could have no effect upon the wife, how guilty soever, if the husband had likewise been guilty of transgressing the laws of wedlock<sup>d</sup>. Whether the Israelites had seen any the like custom in Egypt, or in any other nation, which made it expedient to have something among them in imitation of it, we will not affirm ;
- d but it is plain, that almost every country, since, had a kind of tryal or ordeal, not only for cases of incontinency, but almost for every crime.

3. MARRIAGE. We find but few laws concerning this institution, besides Marriage. those which we have mentioned under the last article against adultery (L). Moses

<sup>d</sup> SELD. de Synedr. & Uxor. Hæbr. BUXTORF. MUNIT. in Num. v. BASNAG. Rep. Hæbr. lib. i. c. 12. CALM. sub voc. Adult. & al. mult. post rabbin.

(I) Here they tell us likewise, that a great deal of pains was taken to persuade her to confess her fault, if she was guilty, rather than to expose herself to the dreadful effects of the miraculous water ; and that they would even force her to walk so long and so fast, till she was quite tired, in order to extort a confession from her, either through weariness, or shame of being thus exposed to publick view. If she confessed the fact, she was not obliged to drink the water, but was immediately divorced from her husband, lost her dowry, and went and lived single ; but, if she still insisted upon her being innocent, the priest was then to conduct her to the east porch of the temple, where he told her aloud, that, if she was really so, she had nothing to fear ; but, if guilty, she must expect the punishment threatened by Moses to fall immediately upon her.

(K) Accordingly, they affirm, that, if she was guilty, she had no sooner drank the water, than she began to look pale and ghastly, her eyes swelled out of her head, and she lost the use of them : Her belly likewise swelled so visibly, that they made all the haste imaginable to convey her away, lest she should defile the place by her death. They add, what is still more remarkable, that the man, who had had criminal commerce with her, died at that very instant, and much in the same manner, how distant soever from her, and ignorant of what was done. The time of this miraculous ceremony, being set aside, is not agreed ; some affirming, that it was disused after the captivity, and others, that it continued till about an hundred years before the destruction of the second temple. All own, however, that the reason of its being set aside was, that adulteries became not only more frequent, which consequently would have kept the priests and judges continually employed, but were likewise more publick, so that the tryal of clandestine or doubtful ones became useless, when men committed them so publickly, that all the world was apprised of them (96).

(L) Tho' the Mosaic law doth no where oblige men to marry, yet the Jews have always looked upon it as an indispensable duty implied in the words, increase and multiply (97) ; so that a man, who did not marry before he was twenty years of age, was counted accessory to any irregularity which the young women might be tempted to, for want of being timely married. They had a proverb in the Talmud, Who is he that prostitutes his daughter, but he who keeps her too long unmarried, or gives her to an old man? For this reason they used to marry them as soon as they came of age, which with them was at twelve ; but, if their fathers married them before, they might, when they came to it, be parted from their husband, if they did not like him.

(96) Vide SELD. BUXT. MUNIT. LAMY, CUN. BASNAG. & al. sup. citat. (97) Gen. i. 28. ix. 1. VOL. I. NUMB. IX. 8 I con-contented himself with restraining the Israelites from marrying within certain degrees of consanguinity, which had till then been permitted, to prevent their taking wives from among the idolatrous nations, with whom they lived. This was the reason which Abraham gave for chusing a wife for Isaac, from his own kindred<sup>a</sup>, and his descendants, for following his example<sup>b</sup>; but which was now entirely ceased, by their being so exceedingly multiplied. These are therefore the degrees which that law-giver forbade as incestuous, under pain of death. 1. To marry one's own father or mother. 2. Father or mother-in-law. 3. The brother or sister of one's father or mother. 4. A grand-son or grand-daughter. 5. An uncle or aunt. 6. A son or daughter-in-law. 7. Two brothers or sisters, by which the Jews understood those only by the mother's side, because they looked upon this consanguinity to be greater than the paternal ones, perhaps from a belief, that the mother contributed most to the generation of the child<sup>c</sup>. 8. A brother or sister-in-law. 9. The husband or wife of an uncle or aunt. 10. The father and son, or mother and daughter, either together, or one after the death of the other<sup>d</sup>. As for the other laws relating to matrimony, they seem rather to be taken from the practice of the patriarchs. Thus he forbids the first-born to be disinherited out of favour or affection to another wife, as when a man has two wives, and loves one more than the other. In such a case, it was not lawful for him to transfer the inheritance to the children of the favourite wife, if that of the other was the first-born<sup>e</sup>. This is in imitation of Abraham, who gave portions to all his other children, and the inheritance to Isaac<sup>f</sup>. The only difference here is, that Moses orders but a double portion to the eldest<sup>g</sup>. Herein is also a second law, tacitly implied at least, for a man to have two wives: To which he adds a third, namely, that, upon the marriage of a second wife, a man shall still be bound to continue to the former her food, her raiment, and the duty of marriage<sup>h</sup>. This last is also conformable to what Laban exacted of Jacob, when he married the second sister after the first<sup>i</sup>. These laws are in imitation of the practice of several of the old patriarchs (M).

Levirate.

THE same thing may be said of that law which is called the Levirate, which obliged a man, whose brother died without issue, to marry his widow, and to raise up seed to his brother<sup>j</sup>; for this is no more than what we find had been the practice in Judab's time<sup>k</sup>. However, Moses doth here leave it in some measure to a man's choice, whether he will comply with the law or not; and, in case of a refusal, the widow could only summon him before the judges of the place, where, if he persisted, she untied his shoe, and spit in his face, and said, Thus shall it be done unto the man that refuses to build up his brother's house, or family; after which he was branded with the appellative of the man whose shoe was unloosed (N). In this number we may also

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xxiv. 3, & seq. <sup>b</sup> Ibid. xxvi. 34, 35. xxviii. 1, & alib. <sup>c</sup> Vide PHILLO de Spec. Leg. CLEM. ALEX. Strom. ii. <sup>d</sup> Levit. xviii. 6, & seq. <sup>e</sup> Deut. xxi. 15, & seq. <sup>f</sup> Gen. xxv. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> Deut. xxi. 17. <sup>h</sup> Exod. xxi. 10. <sup>i</sup> Gen. xxxi. 50. <sup>j</sup> Deut. xxv. 5, & seq. <sup>k</sup> Vide Gen. xxxviii. 6, & seq.

(M) The Jews did not content themselves with this small allowance of two wives, as we may infer from the examples of David and Solomon, and many others. But it must be observed, that they made a distinction between the wives of the first rank, and those of the second. The first they called נָשִׁים, Nashim, and the others פִּלְגָּשִׁים, Pilgashim, which last, tho' most versions render by the word Concubines, Harlots, and Prostitutes, yet in none of those places of scripture where that word occurs, which are about 36, is any such sinister sense implied. However, there is a twofold difference between these and wives of the first rank†; first, with respect to the manner of taking them, namely, the latter with the usual ceremonies, and the former without; and secondly, with respect to their authority, and the honour paid to them and their children. One thing Maimon (98) tells us from the Talmud, that a man might have as many wives as he could maintain, even to an hundred, and that it was not in their power to hinder him, provided he had riches and strength sufficient for them all; the rule, with respect to this last, was, that he should pay them the conjugal debt at least once a week, and not run in arrears above a month with any one. But as to the concubines, they could claim no more than what the man was pleased to allow them.

(N) From the words here used by Moses, if brethren dwell together (99), one would be apt to conclude, that this law was only intended for such as dwelt still in their father's house, which seems to have been the case of Judab's three sons, mentioned above. Accordingly, the rabbies have understood this law in a very restrained sense, both in this and some other particulars; such as that the eldest only of the survivors was obliged to marry the widow, and not even he, if he was already married, in which case, they pretend that it was left to his option. But if we look into the ancient practices, in the times of the judges, we shall find that Boaz, who was neither

† Conf. 1 Kings xi. 3. & 2 Chron. xi. 21. (98) Halak. Issotb. c. 14. (99) Deut. xxx. 5.

- a also add another law, which obliged the husband to pay down a competent dowry for the wife, or, as the Jews termed it in their contracts, to pay the price or equivalent of her virginity<sup>1</sup>. Thus Abraham sent his steward with a considerable quantity of riches to present his future daughter-in-law and her relations<sup>2</sup>: Jacob purchased his two wives at the price of fourteen years servitude<sup>3</sup>; and when Hamor came to ask his daughter for his son Shechem, he bid him raise the price of her dowry as high as he pleased<sup>4</sup>. David likewise modestly confessing his inability to pay a dowry answerable to Saul's daughter, the king acquitted him for a hundred prepuces of the Philistines; and the prophet Hosea bought a wife for fifteen pieces of silver, and a small quantity of barley<sup>5</sup>; so that a man might be truly said to have purchased as well as to marry a wife. However, if we may believe the rabbies, they tell us, that the father generally accompanied the husband's presents with some of his own; such as cloaths, and some money, not exceeding the sum of fifty suzims, or about five and twenty shillings.

- FROM these and such like instances, we may likewise conclude, what was their way of courtship, or rather of contracting and celebrating their marriages; the former was transacted by the parents or relations, on both sides, and when the matter was agreed, the bridegroom was introduced to his bride: Presents were exchanged on all sides, the contract signed before witnesses, and, after consummation, the bride tarried still some time with her relations, how long or how short, we cannot exactly say (O), after which she was sent away to her husband's habitation, with singing and dances at the sound of several instruments. This last was generally performed in the night, and the parable of the ten virgins plainly alludes to it<sup>6</sup>. It was likewise customary with them to contract these marriages, whilst their children were very young, and this was called espousing; after which, both parties continued with their parents, till they were of age to consummate it. As for the daughters, whether they were espoused or not, they were kept very strict and out of sight by the Israelites, tho' this custom seems rather to have been taken up after the misfortune of Jacob's daughter, than borrowed from their neighbours, who made no scruple to send theirs to feed, and water their flocks; as we find it was done by Laban's sister and daughters, as well as by those of Jetbro among the Midianites<sup>7</sup>. From this privacy with which the unmarried damsels were kept, they came to be called Almah's, which signifies hidden or concealed (P). We have elsewhere taken notice of a law which forbade heiresses to marry out of their own tribe<sup>8</sup>, from which the rest were exempted:

<sup>1</sup> Vide MARR. in Isaiah. c. 3. § 1. <sup>2</sup> Gen. xxiv. pass. <sup>3</sup> Ibid. xxix. 18, & seq. <sup>4</sup> Ibid. xxxiv. 12, & seq. <sup>5</sup> 1 Sam. xviii. Hof. iii. 2. <sup>6</sup> Matt. xxv. 1, & seq. <sup>7</sup> Vide Gen. xxiv. 13, & seq. xxix. 9. Exod. ii. 16. <sup>8</sup> Num. xxxvi. pass. Vide sup. p. 537. b.

neither brother, nor nearest of kin to the deceased, did yet think himself obliged to marry Ruth, upon the nearest kinsman's refusing to do it (100); from which one would be apt to conclude, that the law rather extended farther, and that, where no brothers were left to marry the widow, that duty became incumbent on the nearest relation in course. However, it is plain from the case which the Sadducees put to our Saviour, about the seven brethren that had had the same woman successively (1), that this law was not understood in that limited sense which the Talmudists have since done.

(O) This interval is, however, supposed to have been a week, from the words of Laban to Jacob, fulfil her (Leah's) week, and thou shalt have Rachel also (2); but this is at best but a conjecture. The same may be said of what some Jews tell us of the space allowed between the betrothing and consummation, which they will have to be about a year. This they gather from what Rebecca's relations said to Abraham's servant, let her tarry at least ten days, by which they understand so many months (3), but neither the original, nor Septuagint, admit of that exposition; and it is more likely, that it was left to the discretion of the parents.

(P) From the word אָלַם, Alam, or rather Gblam, to hide. To this seems to allude that saying of Agur (4), if rightly translated—the way of the man, בְּעֵלְמָה, Behalmah: that is, (not with, as our version hath it, but) in the maid or virgin. And here we beg leave to observe, that an anonymous English author took upon him, under the name of the famous Monf. Le Clerc, to quarrel with this text, as trifling and obscene (5); whereas, our version being the only one we know of that renders it with a maid, the objection could flow but from an English pen; and we may venture to add one that had but a superficial knowledge of the original, which is not only capable of, but doth manifestly carry a much sublimer sense; we hope therefore the reader will not think amiss, if we take this opportunity of doing justice to the text, and its divine author, by setting it in its full light.

Whoever examines the preface, in the four or five first verses of this chapter, will easily own, that such lofty expressions could only be designed to usher in some sublime mystery; but who can find any such in these words, whether we read them in or with the maid? that is, whether we understand them of cotition or generation? Besides, where is there either the empted: But a man was left to his liberty to marry, not only in any of the twelve tribes, but even out of them, provided it was with such nations as used circumcision<sup>a</sup>, such as were the Midianites, Ismaelites, Edomites, Moabites, and Egyptians (Q). This law seems also founded upon what the subtle sons of Jacob said to the Sabeans, it is not lawful for us to contract affinity with one that is uncircumcised<sup>b</sup>. However, this must be understood of such only as were admitted into the Jewish religion; as for those that were not so, they were not so much as permitted to have any carnal commerce with them, except in the case of an Hebrew soldier's having taken a Gentile captive, to whom Moses indulged the liberty of lying once with her, before the marriage was confirmed: This at least seems to be the sense of the words<sup>c</sup>; because, if he did not like her, he might put her away, only he was to give her liberty<sup>d</sup> as a recompence for her virginity. A maid servant, tho' converted to Judaism, was not capable of matrimonial right, whilst her servitude continued; but if her redemption was paid, or she was manumitted, she might become a wife<sup>e</sup>. If a woman was not wholly free, her marriage seems to have been neither in force, nor absolutely void, because, in cases of unchastity, she was not to be put to death, as the free women were, but came off with a whipping<sup>f</sup>.

(100) Ruth iv. pass. (1) Matt. xxii. 24, & seq. (2) Gen. xxix. 27. (3) Vide ORIEL. & R. SALOM. Vide MUNST. in Gen. xxiv. 55. GOODWIN'S Mos. & Aar. lib. vi. c. 4. § 8. — (4) Prov. xxxi. 19. (5) Letters concerning Inspiration.

THESE are the main laws relating to marriage. As for the manner of its celebration, Moses has left no direction about it. Some few ceremonials may be gathered from scripture, and the rest from the rabbies. We do not find that it was accompanied with any religious ceremony, such as going to the tabernacle or temple, offering of sacrifices, or even that it was performed by or before a priest; only from the examples of Isaac with Rebecca, of Boaz with Ruth, and of Tobias with Sarah, we may conclude, that the parents and the rest of the company did pray for the prosperity of the new married couple. These nuptials were accompanied with feasting and mirth, which lasted a whole week: Thus Sampson's wedding is said to have lasted seven days<sup>g</sup>; and Tobias was desired by his father-in-law, that his might last twice that space<sup>h</sup>, probably, because they were not likely to see one another alter that time. What splendor did usually accompany these feasts, where their circumstances would admit of it, we may conclude from that beautiful comparison of the psalmist, of the glory of a rising sun to a bridegroom coming out of his nuptial chamber<sup>i</sup>. He likewise describes, in another psalm, the richness of the bride's attire, the pomp of her attendance, and the grandeur of the solemnity in most elegant terms<sup>j</sup>. The paranymph, or friend of the bridegroom (R), and the bridesmaids are likewise mentioned here, and in the Canticles. Besides these, the bride-the analogy or climax implied in the beginning of the verse, there are three things too hard for me, yea four, or rather, a fourth, which I cannot comprehend; what analogy doth the way of a man, whether in or with a maid, bear to that of an eagle in the air, or a ship in the midst of the sea, &c. or wherein is the former harder to be understood than the latter? But if we understand it of the conception of a man in a virgin, as the words seem plainly to imply, then both the analogy and climax will be very natural; and the conception of the man, or as the word גִּבּוֹר, Gebber, imports, the mighty man in a virgin, continuing still such, will appear most fully compared to the flight of an eagle in the air, &c. which leave no trace behind, and at the same time be most justly esteemed the hardest of all the rest to be accounted for. This text may therefore justly be looked upon as parallel to that of Jeremiah xxxi. 22.—The Lord has, or will, create a new thing, a woman shall encompass Gebber, a man, or the mighty man.

<sup>a</sup> Compar. Deut. vii. 3, & xxiii. 7, 8. <sup>b</sup> Gen. xxxiv. 14. <sup>c</sup> Deut. xxi. 10, & seq. <sup>d</sup> Seld, Jus Nat. & Gent. lib. v. c. 17. Vide Jos. Ant. lib. iv. c. 8. CARLTON'S Concord. pt. i. c. 7. <sup>e</sup> Levit. 20. <sup>f</sup> Judg. xiv. 17. <sup>g</sup> Tobit viii. 19, 20. <sup>h</sup> Pf. xix. 5. <sup>i</sup> Pf. xlv. pass. vide & Isai. lxi. 10.

(Q) Accordingly we find, that Moses married a Midianite, Boaz a Moabite (6), Maacab, Asa's mother, was the daughter of Talmi, king of Jebus (7); Amasa was the son of Jeheber, an Ismaelite, by disgail, David's sister (8); and

Solomon, in the beginning of his reign, married Pharaoh's daughter (9). Whenever therefore we find him and other kings blamed for marrying strange women, we must understand it of those nations that were idolatrous and uncircumcised.

(R) His office was to invite, and compliment the guests, in the name of the new married, to preside over the solemnity, to see that nothing was wanting in the feast, to prevent confusion, and such like; for which reason he was called the בעל משתה, Babal mishtab, ruler or master of the feast; and is perhaps the same with the ἀρχιτεχνιτης, in the gospel, John ii. 9. But the Jews have added another part to his office, which was to watch over the wedding linnen, that there might be no fraud or injustice in the tokens of virginity, spoken of by Moses (10); that is, to prevent the husband's suppressing them, in order to calumniate his wife, and the bride's substituting false, instead of true ones (11); but Moses seems rather in this place to assign that office to the parents, especially those of the daniel, whom it concerned most, that she should not be falsely accused, since it not only brought a scandal on her family, but, as we observed before, she herself was to be put to death, if those tokens could not be produced.

(6) Ruth iiv. (7) 2 Sam. xxxiii. (8) 1 Chron. ii. 15, & seq. (9) 1 Kings iii. 1. (10) Deut. xxii. 13, & seq. (11) Vide GEMAR. Hierosol. Tract. Ketuboth. c. 2.

- a Besides these, the bridegroom and bride had a number of companions, that assisted during the whole feast. Sampson is said to have had thirty at his wedding<sup>a</sup>; however, we must not suppose both sexes to have assisted promiscuously, the custom of eastern countries did not allow of it; and it is much more likely, that they had separate tables, apartments, and diversions. These last were singing, dancing, playing upon musical instruments among the women; and some kind of manly exercises among the men. To these we may add the custom of propounding riddles, and assigning some sort of reward to those that expounded them, as we find it was done at Sampson's nuptials<sup>b</sup>; and which the Talmudists tell us was usually practised upon such and the like festivals<sup>c</sup>. They add, that both the bride and bridegroom
- b used to wear a crown during the whole solemnity, until the destruction of the last temple; but that, from that time, that ornament was set aside in memory of that catastrophe<sup>d</sup>. We read, indeed, of a nuptial crown made for Solomon, and presented to him by his mother<sup>e</sup>; but nothing of any such ornament for the bride. As for the other particular ceremonies relating to marriages, as we have no other authority for them, but that of the Talmudists, we shall chuse to give them in the margin (S).

<sup>a</sup> Judg. xiv. 11. <sup>b</sup> Ibid. pass. <sup>c</sup> Pirke. Aboth. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. Vide Seld. Ux. Hebr. lib. ii. c. 15. Buxton. Synag. & al. <sup>e</sup> Cant. iii. ver. ult.

(S) They had three ways of betrothing a woman. 1. By a written contract. 2. By a verbal one, accompanied with a piece of money. And 3. by carnal commerce. The written contract was conceived in words to this effect: Such a day, month, and year, A, the son of B, has said to D, the daughter of E, be thou my spouse, according to the law of Moses, and of the Israelites, and I will give thee, as a dowry for thy virginity, the sum of 200 zuzims, as it is ordered by our law. And the said D, hath promised to become his spouse upon the conditions aforesaid, which the said A, doth promise to perform on the day of marriage. And to this the said A, doth hereby bind himself, and all that he hath, to the very cloak upon his shoulders, engages himself to love, honour, feed, cloath, and protect her, and to perform all that is generally implied in contracts of marriage, in favour of Israelitish wives. Witnesses—(12).

The verbal contract was made in the presence of sufficient witnesses, the man saying to the woman, take this money as a pledge that I will take thee to be my wife.

The last, by carnal commerce, which the Talmudists pretend to have been allowed by the Mosaic law, from Deut. xxiv. 1. they say, was afterwards forbid, as liable to many abuses; so that the other two were the only ones which gave the parties the liberty of seeing one another, which was not permitted to them before. When the time agreed upon for the celebrating of the wedding was come, (the day of the week being generally Friday for a maid, and Thursday for a widow, the contract of marriage was read and signed before at least ten witnesses, which must be free, and of age; and the bride, who had taken care to bathe herself the night before, appeared in all her splendor (but veiled in imitation of Rebecca, who threw a veil over her face as soon as she came in sight of Isaac. She, being attended with her bride-maids, was given away by her parents, in words to this effect, take her according to the law of Moses, and received by her spouse with much the same words. Some blessings were then pronounced to the new couple, both by the parents and company, and the virgins sung a kind of epithalamium to them. After the most sumptuous repast that their circumstances could afford, the company began a dance, the men round the bridegroom, and the women round the bride. This dance is pretended to have been of divine institution, and an essential part of the nuptial ceremony.

But the main ceremony, which, according to the rabbies, did consummate the marriage, and made the bride a perfect woman, was her being introduced into the nuptial chamber. Without this, all the others left it still imperfect, but this completed it; tho' some Levitical impediment (13) should chance to hinder the consummation of it according to our sense of the word. But, before she was introduced thither, there were certain prayers and blessings to be said or sung by some proper persons in favour of the married couple. They were generally couched in very pious terms, such as these: Blessed art thou, O Lord of heaven and earth, who hast created man in thine own likeness, and hast appointed the woman to be his partner and companion: Blessed art thou—who fillest Zion with joy, for the multitude of her children: Blessed art thou—who makest the barren womb to bear—who sendest gladness to the bridegroom and his bride—who hast ordained for them love, joy, tenderness, peace, and mutual affection—be pleased to bless, not only this couple, but Judah and Jerusalem with songs of joy and praise, for the joy that thou givest them by the multitude of their sons and daughters, &c. They add, that the nuptial feast for a widow was to last but three days, and seven for a virgin; and that this last was so obligatory, that if a man married several wives in one day, or in the same week, he was to allow a feast of seven days to every one of them (14). We purposely omit many other ceremonies and injunctions of their wise men, which are superstitious and ridiculous; such as the situation of the nuptial bed; the choice of the proper hour for consummation, for coition at all other times, in order to beget a son or a daughter, and many others of the like nature (15), which they either learned from other nations, or forged out of their own astrological brains. As to that law of Moses, which interdicts the matrimonial commerce at certain periods, under such severe penalties (16), and which has been so scrupulously observed by them to this day, it is certain, that decency and cleanness were not the only reasons for it, seeing the heat of those climates would have made the breach of it very dangerous in several other respects, which are obvious to almost every reader.

(12) Vide Seld. Ux. Hebr. BERT. ex Talm. Babil. Buxton. Grammat. Chald. p. 383. GOODW. & al.

(13) Vide Levit. xx. 18.

(14) De his vide auct. sup. citat.

(15) Vide MUNT. in Gen. ii.

(16) Levit. ubi. sup.

THEIR plurality of wives was far from being either a charge or incumbrance a on them, considering their simple way of living. The domestick affairs were their province, whilst that of the husband was the business of the fields and vineyards. Dressing of victuals, the care of the children, spinning, carding, weaving, and the like, are often mentioned in the sacred books, as the womens occupation<sup>a</sup>; whilst their husbands chose the more laborious works. However, at the worst, Moses had indulged them with a remedy, namely, that of, Divorce.

4. DIVORCE. This was permitted to the Jews for the hardness of their heart, as our Saviour justly observes<sup>a</sup>; neither do we find that it had ever been practised by any of the patriarchs (T), whatever it might have been by other nations. The words of the law, or rather permission runs thus<sup>b</sup>: "When a man hath b " taken a wife, and married her, and it come to pass, that she find no favour in " his eyes, because he has found in her some uncleanness (V); then let him write
" her a bill of divorcement, and give it into her hand, and send her out of his " house. And when she is departed—she may go and be another man's wife;
" and if her second husband hate her, and write her a bill of divorce—or if he
" chance to die—her former husband shall not take her again to be his wife,
" after she is defiled; for that is an abomination to the Lord.—" The question is here, what is meant by the words, if he find any uncleanness, turpitude, or nakedness in her? We have seen in the last note, how the Jews are divided in their opinion about it; the Christians are no less so; some confining it to adultery, and c others to all enormous crimes, such as idolatry, apostacy, and the like, which the scriptures often call fornication, and is the word made use of by our Saviour for adultery. For our part, we cannot believe any of these cases to be meant by the words of Moses, because, as these were all capital crimes, it would have been ridiculous to have ordained a divorce against those that were to be put to death.
We rather think therefore that it meant some involuntary uncleanness, whether natural or contracted, which rendered her loathsome in his eyes, or unfit for the nuptial consorts; which Christ therefore discommends in the gospel, not only because it was become too frequent, and permitted upon every trivial occasion<sup>c</sup>; but also to assure the people, that the marriage knot was not to be dissolved, upon any pre- d tence, except that of infidelity (W).

<sup>a</sup> Vide int. al. 1 Sam. ii. 19. 2 Sam. viii. 13. Prov. xxxi. 13, & seq. & alib. pass. <sup>b</sup> Matt. xix. 8.
<sup>c</sup> Deut. xxiv. 1, & seq. <sup>d</sup> Vide Jos. Ant. lib. iv. c. 8, & lib. de vit. sua ad fin. & Paul. de special. leg. b. præc. 6, & 7.

(T) The Jews pretend, that Abraham divorced Hagar, and Moses, either Ziphorah, or Tarbis, the princess of Ethiopia, and that this was the reason of the quarrel which he had with Aaron and Miriam (17), and from thence conclude, that divorce was not only of earlier date; but that it was lawful upon many other accounts, besides that of adultery. But as to Hagar, whom they pretend to have been divorced for her intolerance; it is plain, first, that she was no wife, but a bond-woman, substitute to Sarah; and secondly, that her expulsion was not properly a divorce, because she was received again after the first fault, and that, at the second, it was her son's behaviour, and not her own, that sent her away (18). And as to the case of Ziphorah, and Tarbis, they are meer fictions, as we have shewn before†; so that we do not find one precedent of divorce before the law of Moses; but afterwards they became so frequent, that the prophets often upbraided the Jews with it (19); and Solomon doth as much condemn the divorce of a virtuous woman, as he doth the keeping of an adulterous one (20).

(V) As plain as the import of the text is, yet the famous Hillel has found out a way to evade it, in order to make divorce lawful, even upon the slightest fault, such as spoiling his meat in cooking; or, according to Akkiba, another of the same loose principles, if he finds another that pleases him better, or is more handsome in his eyes. To make this out, they divide the text thus: 1. If she do not find favour in his sight. And 2. If he find in her ערוה דבר, Harvath-dabar, or as the Septuagint render it, ἀνεκδοκία, he may then divorce her. But the more virtuous school of his co-rival Shammai, justly condemns such a perverse reading, tho' he confines this case of turpitude, which Moses assigns as the ground of the husband's dislike, to the case of unchastity; whereas that of Hillel extends it to all that he may dislike in her (21). This last has been most followed by the Jews, and sufficiently condemned by Christ (22).

(W) We may add, that the words (being ערוה דבר, Harvath-dabar, and not ערוה דבר, Debar-harvath, which last doth only signify the case of turpitude) may be more properly rendered, for any turpitude or immodesty of words, discourse, or even behaviour. So that this indulgence might have been designed to deter the wanton sort of wives from such immodest speeches or behaviour, as might be apt to disgust a sober husband; and to inspire them with such chaste deportment, as could alone preserve a true conjugal affection. According to this sense also, our Saviour's reflection will be very just; that it was their indocile temper that extorted such an indulgence from Moses, which was manifestly contrary to the original design and institution of marriage.

(17) Targ. ONKEL. & Hieros. & Rabbin. mult. in Num. xii. 1, & seq. (18) Corf. Gen. xxi. 1, & seq. & xxi. 9, & seq. † Vide sup. p. 480. (O). & p. 489. (Y). (19) Mic. ii. 9. Malach. ii. 14, & seq. (20) Vide Mishn. c. 9. § 10. SELD. Ux. Hebr. lib. iii. c. 18, & 20. (21) Vide Gloss. BARGENOR, הלכה בית הילל (22) Matt. v. 32, & alib.

- a ONE thing which shews, that the nuptial breach was not thought the ground of a divorcement in David's time, is, that that monarch did not repudiate those concubines, or wives of the second rank, whom his son Abshalom had publicly debauched; but contented himself with shutting them up for life<sup>a</sup>; and that the Levite did not divorce his concubine-wife, as the text calls her, after she had played the harlot, and was run away from him; but went to seek and bring her home again<sup>b</sup>. The same may be said of Sampson, who went and demanded his wife, after she had been given to another man<sup>c</sup>. To this we may add, that we do not find any instances through the whole Old Testament, of men divorcing their wives, either upon this or any other account, except those who put away the strange women they had brought with them from the captivity<sup>d</sup>. However that be, 'tis plain the Jews have understood it in another and more lax sense. The form of the bill of divorce was to this effect: Such a day, month, and year, I such a one, of such a place, upon or near such a river, do of my own free consent and choice repudiate thee, such a one, my late wife, banish thee from me, and restore thee to thy own liberty, and thou mayest henceforth go whither, and marry whom thou wilt; and this is thy bill of divorcement, and writing of expulsion, according to the law of Moses and Israel. Signed by two witnesses; and delivered in the presence of as many at least<sup>e</sup>. From this time the wife was as much at her liberty as if she had been a widow; only in both cases she was obliged to stay at least ninety days before she was married to another, lest she should prove pregnant by the last (X).

Laws against theft.

UNDER this head we shall include, not only those which are against taking Theft. away another man's property, whether privately, or by open force; but also against every act of fraud and injustice, which is contrary to the right and common faith of mankind. 1. As to theft, we have already observed, that the Jews understood the words in the decalogue, Thou shalt not steal<sup>a</sup>, of men-stealing, and thought that the other sort of theft was implied in the last precept, Thou shalt not covet<sup>b</sup>. But we shall include them under the same head.

- d THE stealing of a man was the only capital theft under the law of Moses (Y); and whether the stolen persons had been sold, or were still in the possession of the thief, he was to be put to death<sup>c</sup>. All other theft was punished by restitution, and the addition of a fine, according to the nature of the theft; only the man, that broke into a house in the night to rob, might be impunely killed, though not in the day time<sup>d</sup>. He that stole an ox was to restore five oxen; if a sheep or a goat, four sheep or four goats<sup>e</sup>; but if he had neither killed nor sold them, but they were found alive with him, he was only to pay two for one<sup>f</sup>.

In

<sup>a</sup> 2 Sam. xx. 3. <sup>b</sup> Judg. xix. 1, & seq. <sup>c</sup> Ibid. xv. 1, & seq. <sup>d</sup> Ezr. x. pass. Nehem. xiii. 23, & seq. <sup>e</sup> Vide Mos. KOTZ, fol. 133. & Mos. Egypt. pt. ii. fol. 59. SELB. BuxT. & Goodw. ubi sup. <sup>f</sup> Exod. xx. 15. <sup>g</sup> Vide sup. p. 516. sub fin. (X). <sup>h</sup> Exod. xxi. 16. <sup>i</sup> Ibid. xxii. 2. <sup>j</sup> Ibid. ver. 1. <sup>k</sup> Ibid. ver. 4.

(X) Touching the controversy, whether women might likewise divorce their husbands, upon the same grounds that they might be divorced by them, we can only say, that we do not find any such indulgence granted to them by Moses, unless in the case of a virgin betrothed by her parents before she was twelve years of age, who might then refuse to ratify the contract which her parents had made, without giving any other reason, than that she did not like the person designed for her; but this cannot be called a divorcement, because there is no marriage in the case. Josephus therefore thinks, that a divorce was so far from being permitted to women, that, if the husband forsook his wife, it was not lawful for her to marry another, till she had first obtained a divorce from him. He adds, that

Salome, sister to Herod the great, was the first who took upon her to repudiate her husband, whose example was soon followed by others, mentioned by the same author (23).

We omit several very prudent regulations made by the Talmudists, relating to the drawing up of these bills of divorcement, to prevent, as much as possible, all abuses, forgeries, and counterfeits, such as the kind of parchment, letter, and ink, which were to be used, how many letters, to each line, and the like, besides a great many other formalities, examinations, and enquiries, designed on purpose to draw the matter to such a length, that the parties might have time to cool, and, if possible, to be reconciled.

(Y) The Jews, however, confine it to the stealing of

(23) Ant. lib. xv. c. 11. xviii. 7. xx. 15, & in vit. sua.

In case the thief had not wherewith to make satisfaction according to the law, it was lawful for the prosecutor, if he was an Israelite, to sell him, but not if he was a proselyte of any kind, neither could the former sell him to any but to an Israelite. If he had a wife and children, they might likewise be sold with him, till satisfaction was made to the offended; at least it seems to have been so understood and practised by the Jews in cases of debt, though Moses mentions none here but the thief. This may be gathered from the words of the prophet Elisba <sup>b</sup> to the widow; and from the parable in the gospel, where the creditor commands the wife and children, as well as the insolvent debtor, to be sold, and payment to be made <sup>c</sup>. As soon as a sufficient equivalent had been made by servitude, they were to be restored to their freedom again, though by another law <sup>d</sup> (Z): but if the thief was unmarried, and his master gave him a wife during the time of his servitude, the children that he had by her were his master's property; he could not demand them from him. From this law they hammered another more inhuman, in order to shorten a married man's servitude, by allowing him to beget a number of slaves, for the benefit of his creditor, upon some woman whom his master gave him; with this pretended proviso, however, that he should not deprive his own wife of the nuptial due, or that she should consent to forego it, and that only one maid-servant should be conjoined to one such man, not two or more. In cases of petty larcenies the laws seem still more indulgent, and the crime was not looked upon as infamous, according to that of Solomon, A thief is not despised that stealeth to satisfy his hunger; but if he be found, he shall restore sevenfold, he shall give all the substance of his house <sup>e</sup>; where the word sevenfold means only more or less, according to the theft, as far as his whole substance would reach. It is plain however that the law of Moses was far enough from countenancing such kind of theft; since it allowed a man, in cases of extreme want, to sell himself to some master for any term of years, even to that of the Jubilee <sup>f</sup>. He was even permitted to sell an unmarried daughter, upon condition, either that the buyer should marry her, or if he did not, that she should be redeemed by the highest bidder that would <sup>g</sup>.

WHEN a man was suspected of theft, and the prosecutor had not sufficient proof against him, he might bring him before the judges, and have both him and those, whom he thought his accomplices, examined upon oath. If they swore <sup>d</sup> themselves off, and could be afterwards proved forsworn, they were to be put to death, not for the theft, but for the perjury. The same law reached also to the receiver, or concealer of stolen goods, knowing them to be such <sup>h</sup>: that is, if he was found out, he was fined as the thief, two, four, or fivefold; and being of an Israelite, and not without some ground, because Moses in another place (24) expresses it, if a man be found stealing any of his brethren, of the children of Israel, which exception the Targum of Onkelos (25) and Septuagint have added also to the text in Exodus. Aben Ezra doth even understand it of children that cannot speak. As for the stealing of strangers, the offender was not to be put to death according to them, but only to make restitution.

<sup>b</sup> 2 Kings iv. 1.    <sup>c</sup> Matt. xviii. 25.    <sup>d</sup> Levit. xxi. 3.    <sup>e</sup> Prov. xxix. 34.    <sup>f</sup> Levit. xiv. 30.    <sup>g</sup> Exod. xxi. 7, & seq.    <sup>h</sup> Levit. v. 1.

(Z) The Talmudists have made several exceptions to this law: They say, for instance, that the thief, that was sold as insolvent, was not bound to serve till he had repayed the four or fivefold, but only the equivalent of his theft. The overplus was remitted till he was in circumstances to pay it. Neither could he be sold, according to them, unless the theft was of greater value than the thief. Thus, if the latter was judged worth fifty shekels, and the theft not above forty, it was not in the plaintiff's power to sell him. A woman likewise that was guilty of theft, they pretend, could not be sold, but yet they do not tell us what punishment was inflicted on her in case of insolvency (26).

There are, however, some texts of scripture, which seem to imply a further punishment than these we have mentioned. Jacob tells Laban, that upon whomsoever his stolen gods were found, he should be put to death (27); and Solomon says, that he, who is a partner with a thief, hates his own soul or life (28). This made Eftius of opinion, that they were whipped at the second, and put to death after the third offence. But as to the first text, it being before the law of Moses, it is supposed by the rabbies, that theft was capital by the laws of Noah, and the punishment exchanged for a milder by Moses. As to the other, the most that can be made of the words is, that he is in danger of being killed if he steals with them in the night, or else of being tempted to forswear himself, if he should be examined upon oath, in which case, if he be found out, he will be put to death. So that, from the tenor of Moses's law, it is plain, no theft but that of men was punished with death.

(24) Deut. xxiiv. 7.    (25) In Exod. xxi. 16.    (26) Ita Rabbin. fir omni.    (27) Gen. xxxi. 31.    (28) Prov. xxix. 24.

examined

- a examined upon suspicion, he denied his having the goods upon oath, he was put to death likewise: For so they understood the words, he shall bear his iniquity. All these kind of matters were to be tried before the judges of the place where the fact was done, and it was left to them in many cases to appoint the fines and punishments of the offender, according to the nature and circumstances of the fact: Only the Jews add, that if the thief came and accused himself, and restored the stolen goods, he was not to have any further punishment, because, say they, he was condemned not by the judges, but by himself<sup>1</sup>. Moses gave them also many other wholesome laws relating to things committed to another's care, or pledged for a time, such as cattle, household-goods, garments, and the like, in case they came to be lost or damaged while they remained in that party's custody; how far in such cases he was or was not obliged to make satisfaction<sup>2</sup>, which we shall not dwell upon. Only thus much we may add, that, in all cases where any satisfaction was made, the person wronged, or his next heir, was the only person intitled to it; but if he died without heirs, then the priests might claim it as their due. He likewise forbid not only the use of false weights and measures<sup>3</sup>, but also all kind of frauds, circumvention in contracts, whether written or verbal, both in merchandising and all other dealings between man and man<sup>4</sup> (A). Even in bargains, the rule was, that, if the price was above one sixth part more or less than the true value of the thing sold, the party wronged might make the other refund the overplus.
- c All kind of usury, whether of money, grain, or of victual and apparel, was likewise forbid by the law of Moses in more places than one, from one Israelite to another; in which cases the usurer might be compelled by the judges to refund the ill-gotten wealth. They were commanded on the contrary, whenever a brother was waxed poor, to support and assist him with such things as he needed, without proposing to themselves any other advantage by so doing, than the blessing of God attending it<sup>5</sup>. But of strangers, that is, of the Gentiles, they were permitted to take some usury<sup>6</sup>; yet, so as not to oppress them by too great extortion, or, indeed, in any other way: For, in such cases, the stranger is put upon the same foot with the fatherless and the widow, whose protector God every where declares himself, with very severe threatenings against those who were wanting in kindness and hospitality towards them<sup>7</sup>. Oppressing of servants and hirelings; defrauding, or even detaining their wages, though but one night<sup>8</sup>, denying them necessary food and respite<sup>9</sup>; private mischiefs; such as misleading the blind, or even another's cattle<sup>10</sup>, removing of land-marks<sup>11</sup>; digging of pits, and leaving them uncovered<sup>12</sup>; and many more of the like nature, were likewise reckoned enormous crimes; which, if found out, were cognisable by the judges, who were empowered to cause suitable satisfaction to be made; if not, there were terrible curses denounced against the transgressors by God, from whose all-seeing eye they could not be concealed, and from whose justice they could not escape unpunished. Taking of such things in pledge from the needy, of which they stood in constant need, such as their garments, their bed-cloaths, the nether or upper millstone, and the like, was no less forbidden. The person so oppressed might appeal to the judge, and he cause them to be restored; but we do not find that any other punishment was ordained against the delinquent<sup>13</sup>. We omit several others of the same nature, which the reader may see among their negative precepts<sup>14</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Vide Maim. Tract Genubah. lib. i. ex. Exod. xxii. 9. <sup>2</sup> Exod. xxii. 5, & seq. <sup>3</sup> Deut. xxv. 13, & seq. <sup>4</sup> Levit. xix. 11. xxv. 14, & alib. <sup>5</sup> Exod. xxii. 25, & seq. Lev. xxv. 36, & seq. Deut. xxiii. 19. <sup>6</sup> Ibid. ver. 20. <sup>7</sup> Exod. xxii. 21. xxxiii. 9. Levit. xix. 33, & seq. & alib. <sup>8</sup> Levit. xix. 15. Deut. xxiv. 14, 15. <sup>9</sup> Ibid. v. 14. xxv. 4. <sup>10</sup> Levit. xix. 14. <sup>11</sup> Deut. xix. 14. <sup>12</sup> Exod. xxi. 33. <sup>13</sup> Deut. xxiv. 10. vi. 10, & seq. <sup>14</sup> Vide præc. 150, ad 196, & alib. pass.

(A) Here the Jews, from a particular fondness for their own nation, make a great difference between the strict justice which was due to an Israelite, and to a Gentile, as well as the punishment inflicted on either side for the breach of it (29). But the more honest part of them, founding the interdicti-on of fraud and injustice on the law of nature, affirmed, that a Gentile ought not in any case to be defrauded or over-reached in negotiations, &c. because, with respect to civil society, he was to be accounted a neighbour, though not with respect to the privileges peculiar to the Israelites (30).

(29) Vide Gemar. Babyl. Tract. Sanbedr. מאמ. גזילה ואבירה and גזובה sup. lib. vi. c. 5. & al.

(30) Vide Salm. ubi

Laws against false witness.

False witness. THE foundation of them is in that of the decalogue, thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour<sup>a</sup>; wherein we shall only observe, that the word, which our versions render peak, signifies, according to the original, to answer to an interrogation, such as the judges exacted from persons summoned to give evidence in any cases that came before them, either by oath, or bare examination. The judges were bound to abide by the testimony of two or three witnesses, especially in capital cases, a single one not being sufficient to condemn any man<sup>b</sup>. To deter men therefore, as much as possible, from giving false evidence, the law condemned a false witness to the same punishment which he would have inflicted on the innocent<sup>c</sup>; and if examined upon oath, and proved forsworn, he was to be put to death, as was hinted before, let the case in question be what it would. It required besides of the judges, that they should be very strict in examining the witnesses<sup>b</sup> (B), their character, and the nature of the evidence, in order to prevent, as far as possible, the guilty being acquitted, or the innocent being condemned. The Talmudists have collected several laws relating to the duty of judges, which lie dispersed in the writings of Moses, and added several very judicious expositions, for which we shall refer the reader to the authors themselves<sup>c</sup>.

Laws against coveting another's property.

THE tenth precept of the decalogue, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house, wife, and so on<sup>d</sup>, is justly esteemed by the Jewish doctors the prop and foundation of all the other laws of the second table, and he, that observes this, is in no danger of breaking the rest. Whether the ancient Jews understood it in that strict and refined sense which the gospel doth, or only of such overt acts as tended to the procuring of any thing by unlawful means, is not easy to determine. The Talmudists, however, do condemn by it the very desire formed and indulged in the heart, tho' it doth not proceed to action<sup>e</sup>.

An abridgment of some other mixt laws relating to food, raiment, planting, sowing, decency and cleanness, and of such diseases as excluded men from common society.

A man eating of blood. OF all the food that is forbidden by the Mosaic law, blood may be reckoned in the first place, because its prohibition was as old as the deluge<sup>f</sup>; when God having, immediately after it, given Noah the liberty of eating the flesh of animals, as is most generally supposed†, forbade the eating not only the blood itself, but the flesh also mixed with it, that is, of any animal, either strangled or killed by any other way than by drawing the blood thoroughly from it (C), under very severe threatenings. Accordingly we find it no less expressly forbidden by Moses in several

<sup>a</sup> Exod. xx. 16. xxiii. 2. Deut. v. 20. <sup>b</sup> Ibid. xvii. 1. <sup>c</sup> Deut. xix. 15, 16, & seq. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. ver. 18. <sup>e</sup> Tract. Sanhedr. Maim. in eund. prac. neg. 104, ad 218. <sup>f</sup> Exod. xx. 17. Deut. v. 21. <sup>g</sup> Vide prac. neg. 158. <sup>h</sup> Gen. ix. 4, & seq. <sup>i</sup> Vide sup. p. 108. c.

(B) The Jews excepted several persons from being witnesses, from a text in Exodus (31), namely, persons under age; those who had committed any misdemeanour which deserved whipping, thieves, extortioners, and such like (32).

(C) The reason given in the text is, that blood is the life of the animal; by which is meant, that no animal can live without it. But it is not improbable, that the end and design of this prohibition was, that it might be a kind of acknowledgement, that our privilege for killing, and eating the flesh of those living creatures, is not derived to us from the law of nature, which seems rather to be against it, but from an express permission from the author of nature. And this seems to be the reason why it was not only enforced by the Mosaic law, but also retained by the gospel, and enjoined to its proselytes from Gentilism (33). This law, we are told by a modern traveller (34), is still strictly observed by some eastern churches, nor, as our author says, by virtue of the law of Moses, but of the apostolic canon, which has been kept ever since by the eastern, and for several ages by the western church, and confirmed by several councils from time to time.

(31) Ch. xxiii. 1. (32) Prac. neg. 214. Atbiop. lib. iii. c. 1. num. 51.

(33) Vide Acts xv. 29. (34) LUDOLPH. Hist.

- a places, not only to the Israelites, but to the strangers that lived among them<sup>a</sup>; even under pain of death. God seems even to put it on the level with sacrificing one's seed to Moloch, when he threatens to set his face against him that transgresses in either case, which expression is not used in any other prohibition. Only, under this typical dispensation, God is pleased to give a new reason for this interdiction, namely, that it is the blood (which is also the life) of the victim, that makes atonement for sin<sup>b</sup> (D); pursuant to which, the tabernacle, with all its utensils, were at first purified with it, the covenant between God and the people was ratified with it, and without blood there could be no remission for sin<sup>c</sup>; all which the apostle fitly applies to that of Christ under the gospel<sup>d</sup>.
- b NEXT to the blood, was forbidden likewise the flesh of a considerable number Unclean meats. of beasts, fowls, fishes, and reptiles, which were therefore to be deemed unclean. This distinction, however, of clean and unclean, can hardly be supposed to have its origin from the Mosaic law, and to have been used proleptically, when the divine historian mentions it even before the flood<sup>e</sup>: But we shall not repeat what has been said on that subject in another place<sup>f</sup>; neither shall we enter into a nice scrutiny about those animals thus forbidden, but refer the curious reader to the learned Buchari's elaborate treatise on that subject<sup>g</sup>, and mention only the general rule which Moses has given to distinguish the clean from the unclean<sup>h</sup>.
- c OF beasts, whatever did both chew the cud and divide the hoof was to be reckoned clean, and whatever did not both these, as the swine, which divideth the hoof, but doth not chew the cud; or the camel, hare, rabbit, which chew the cud and do not part the hoof, was forbidden as unclean. Of fowl, all carnivorous birds, such as the eagle, vulture, and the like; all that had four feet and yet flew, as the bat. Of fishes, all that had fins and scales were lawful, and all that wanted either were forbidden. Of insects, all that had wings to raise itself from the earth might be eaten, but whatever did only crawl on the earth was unclean. Lastly, the fat of the clean beasts was forbidden, not because it was unclean, much less because it is hard of digestion, which is the reason which some authors give for this and blood, and swine's, and other flesh, being also forbid, seeing their laborious life
- d and healthy constitution made them more capable to digest them, than many among ours and other nations, who lead an indolent life, and yet can eat them all without any inconvenience. But the reason is given in the text, namely, because, in all sacrifices, the fat was to be burnt upon the altar, as appertaining unto God<sup>i</sup> (E). The flesh

<sup>a</sup> Levit. xvii. 10, & seq. Deut. xii. 23, & seq. <sup>b</sup> Levit. ubi sup. ver. 11. <sup>c</sup> Heb. ix. 22, & alib. pass. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. ver. 13, & seq. <sup>e</sup> Gen. vii. 2. <sup>f</sup> Sup. p. 108. <sup>g</sup> Hierosolic. pass. <sup>h</sup> Levit. xi. 1, & seq. <sup>i</sup> Vide Levit. iii. 14, & seq.

(D) The learned Maimon, not thinking these reasons sufficient, has fetched the origin of this prohibition from his old fountain of opposition to the Sabians, Amorites, and the other idolatrous nations, who, fancying blood to be the favourite food of Demons, contented themselves with the flesh of beasts, and poured their blood into a vessel, or a hole made in the ground, then, setting and feasting round it, imagined that those Demons would come and take their share of the feast. From this familiar conversation with their gods, they hoped to procure still a nearer intercourse with them in their dreams, by which they should gain an insight into futurity: So that, according to him, and those that have followed him (35), the main end of this prohibition was to prevent the worship of those demons. We need not to take notice how much more effectual the contrary method, that is, the allowing them to eat blood, would have been to have kept them from it; all that we shall observe here is, that, supposing this superstitious custom and notion to have been as old as Moses, it doth not appear to have been as old as the flood, or that any that came out of the ark were addicted to it, and yet it is to them, that this prohibition was first made, if Moses may be believed; and who knows how far it might in time contribute to this wild notion of the Sabians and Amorites, by making them fancy, that there was something so sacred in the blood of animals, that it was fit only for the gods?

(E) Josephus, however, and the generality of the Jews understand this, not of the fat of all clean beasts, but only of oxen, sheep, and goats, and this is not only conformable to what is laid in another place (36); but as these three creatures were the only ones that were sacrificed to God, the design of the prohibition, mentioned above, seems naturally to confine it to them only. What seems to confirm, that the fat of other clean beasts was permitted, is what Moses says elsewhere, that the fat of a beast that dieth of itself, or is torn to death, may be put to any other use, but must not be eaten in any case (37); which seems to imply, that that of those, which were duly killed, might be lawfully eaten. Neither is it reasonable to suppose, that this prohibition extended to all the fat, for in such a case, a scrupulous Jew would scarce have found one bit in the whole beast that could be safely eaten; but only to that flesh of beasts torn in pieces, or that died of themselves, was likewise forbidden <sup>a</sup>. All that needs to be further added, with respect to unclean animals, is, that though the touch of them, while alive, was not defiling, yet that of their carcases was; inasmuch, that even the vessels and liquors, into which it fell, were made unclean by it; the liquors were to be thrown away, the vessels, whatever they were, must be purified, and the person who touched them was to wash himself, and be unclean until evening. A well, however a fountain, or any large receptacle of water, were not defiled by it, but only the person who took the unclean creature out of them <sup>s</sup>.

(35) More Nusch, p. 3. c. 46. SPENC. de Leg. Ritual. GREGOR. in Oper. Post. vide CARLET. Concord. pt. 2. c. 11. (36) Levit. vii. 23. (37) Ibid. ver. 24.

Raiment.

RAIMENT. Moses has left no positive laws relating to dress, except that which belonged to the priests, of which we have spoken elsewhere, and where he orders the people to wear blue fringes to the borders of their garments, for a remembrance, that they were now no longer to live after their own will, but after the commands of God <sup>r</sup>. As to those of the negative kind, the two most considerable are, those which forbid the promiscuous habit of both sexes <sup>s</sup>, and the weaving of two different stuffs, such as linnen and woollen, in the same garment <sup>t</sup>; the first is supposed to have been designed to prevent the shameful abuses which might attend such unnatural disguises (F), and the second to prevent confusion. To the same purpose are those which relate to sowing divers seeds, or planting divers kind of trees in the same field; or forbid to plow with a mixture of cattle, such as an ox and an ass <sup>u</sup>. Cleanness and decency, tho' so necessary in hot climes, that there needs hardly any law to enforce them, are yet enjoined by Moses under severe penalties, as well as the neglect of those proper ceremonies, which he had enjoined to those who had laboured under any defilement, in order to their purification. We have already spoken of this latter under another head, and shall only mention the chief of the former; they were such as forbid all matrimonial commerce for a certain time after child-birth, during the monthly periods, or after any accidental weakness of that kind; in men, nocturnal pollutions, running sores, ulcers, gonorrhœas, and such like; whatever was touched by any person so defiled, whether chair, bed, table, or any other utensil, was also to be deemed unclean, and to defile those that touched them; and all were to be purified according to the law. In both sexes likewise, the touching of a dead body, carcass, or any unclean thing, had the same effect. But, of all diseases, the leprosy (G) was reckoned the most defiling, for which reason, those, who were infected with it, were forced to live separate from that which is separated from the flesh, such as that which covers the kidneys, and the bowels, the caul, &c. After all, we much doubt whether even the interdiction of this last extended farther than to that of victims offered to God. This seems at least probable, from what follows after the forbidding to eat the fat of either ox, sheep, or goat, where Moses adds, whosoever eateth the fat of the beast, of which men offer a burnt-offering unto the Lord—shall be cut off— (38).

Cleannefs.

<sup>a</sup> Exod. xxii. 31. Levit. xvii. 15. <sup>r</sup> Ibid. xi. 32, & seq. <sup>s</sup> Num. xv. 38, 39. Deut. xxii. 12. <sup>t</sup> Ibid. ver. 5. <sup>u</sup> Ibid. ver. 11. <sup>v</sup> Ibid. ix. 10.

(†) Interpreters fall into various other conjectures about the reason of this prohibition. Some think that Moses had an eye to some Heathenish ceremonies, used at particular festivals, in which the people dressed themselves in the habits of the contrary sex; such were, for instance, the Bacchanalia, and the feasts of Mars and Venus. Such were also those of the moon, and of the Cyprian goddess, which the men celebrated in women's habits, and the women in those of men (39). Some have thought that he meant to conceal, under that prohibition, an unnatural crime which he was afraid to acquaint the people with, by calling it by its name, because he adds, that such disguises are an abomination to God (40); but yet it is plain, that he forbade sodomy and bestiality in as plain terms, as those crimes could be couched in, and what other more abominable than these could be implied by it, we cannot guess. Lastly, a far more considerable number after Josephus understand it, not of an exchange of dress, but of occupations; that is, that the women should not play the Amazon, or handle the sword and spear, which do properly belong to men; and that these, on the contrary, should not busy themselves with such occupations as were fitter for women (41). The terms of the original, upon which they build this notion, run literally thus: The Kele, by which they understand, weapons of a man, shall not be upon a woman, and the man shall not put on the habit of a woman. But though Kele doth sometimes signify weapons, and, in its primitive sense, any kind of vessels and instruments used in any business whatsoever, yet since it doth sometimes signify dress, and the ornaments of it, who doth not see that the latter is an explication of the former, and consequently, that it is levelled against the promiscuous dress of sexes?

(G) Moses distinguishes three sorts of leprosy, namely, that of the body, garments, and of houses. The first of these is a cuticular disease, not unlike an invete-

(38) Levit. vii. 25. Vide præc. neg. 138. (39) LUCIAN. MAIMON. JUL. FIRMIC. SERVIUS, & al. (40) ALBERIC. GENT. apud CALM. sub voc. Habit. (41) JOSEPH. Ant. lib. iv. c. 8. Chald. Paraph. AUGUST. Quæst. 32. N. DE LYRA VATAB. FAG. MUNST. TREMEL. & al.

- a from the rest, till they had been cured of it; monarchs themselves were not exempted from this law, as appears from the instance of king Azariah, or Uzziah, as he is called in the Chronicles, who being smitten with that distemper, for intruding into the priestly office*, was smitten with an incurable leprosy, deprived of his government, and forced to live apart to the day of his death. And indeed one kind of it was of so infectious a nature, that too much caution could not be used to prevent its spreading; inasmuch, that even those that died of it were buried separately from the rest† (H); as for the other, namely, the dry one, it was rather an eye-sore than an infectious disease. The priests were the proper judges both of the disease and of the cure; concerning which Moses gave them several plain directions, tho' we find not that he prescribed any remedy against it; because, as the Jews think, it was an immediate judgment from God‡. The same they affirm also of the leprosy of houses and garments; which they pretend was peculiar to the Israelites, and to the land of Judea§, because God had promised to them, that, whilst they continued obedient to his laws, their bodies, houses, and garments should be preserved from that disease; but, when they proved stubborn and rebellious, he would send it as a punishment upon them||.

WHEN the priest had pronounced a man infected with leprosy, he was not only secluded from the society of clean persons, but he was obliged to go bare-headed, with his cloaths rent, and his upper lip covered with a kind of muffer, to prevent, in all likelihood, his infecting others by his death. But one may reasonably suppose, that they had places in which they lived together, and made a kind of community among themselves. Accordingly we read of four of inveterate itch or scurvy, which causes a violent itching, and whether caused by some prolific animalcula communicated by the touch, or by corrosive vitrioline salts (tho' the former seems the most probable) will in time corrode the flesh, even to the bone. We shall not disgust our readers with repeating the marks which he gives of that distemper (42); nor with what other physicians have writ concerning it; but only observe, that it was of a much more corrosive and dangerous nature in hot climates, than in cold ones. They observe three kinds, or rather degrees of it. The first of these, namely, whilst it is, as it were, in its infancy, may be easily cured: The second, when it has communicated itself to the blood, cannot be mastered without great difficulty, and a long regimen of diet and physic: The last, which is when it is grown inveterate, and has fixed itself, and corroded the solid parts, is reckoned incurable. However, Monsieur Tournefort, who had seen it in the Levant, thinks it rather a kind of venereal disease, and that, if taken in time, it might be cured by the same method. And, indeed, the symptoms of this, of the leprosy, and of an inveterate scurvy, are so alike, that unless a physician be very expert and cautious, he may easily condemn the innocent, and absolve the guilty. But be that as it will, it is certain, that this leprosy must have been sufficiently known by the Israelites in Egypt, since Moses speaks both of the disease and its marks, as of things which were plain and obvious.

* Comp. 2 Kings xv. 5, & 2 Chron. xxvi. 8, & seq. † Ibid. ver. ult. ‡ It. Rabbin. fer omn. & THEODOR. Quæst. 18. in Levit. § MOS. GERUND. RACANAT. ABR. SEPHARAD. & al. || Vide MUNST. in Levit. xiii. note (i).

The leprosy of the garments is supposed to have been owing to some defect in the management of the wool, skins, and stuffs, of which they were made; those manufactures being then very imperfect, to what they have been since. The heat of the climate, and perhaps many other things might contribute still more towards it. Moses has likewise described the marks of this kind of leprosy: They were spots either of a reddish or greenish hue, which appeared upon the garments, whether of linnen, woollen, or of skins. In these cases they were to be brought to the priests, and, according as they appeared to them, they were either to be burnt, or to be washed and cleaned, or the spots to be cut out, and the rest declared clean and wholesome. This garment leprosy is likewise supposed to be a kind of worm which breeds in those stuffs, occasioned by the oils, grease, and other ingredients used in the dressing of them.

The same may be said of the leprosy of houses; in the mortar and stones of which, another sort of vermin was bred, which had four jaws continually working, and eating holes in them. This was one of the tokens of its being infected; there were some others besides, which were a kind of rust or scurf, that spread itself along the walls. In all these cases, the priests were directed to shut the house up for a week, and it is probable, they made some kind of fumigation, during that time, though no mention is made of it, else we cannot see how the bare shutting it up could contribute to the cure. If, upon the opening it again, they found the marks gone, they pronounced it clean; if not, they caused them to be scraped off every where, and the house to be shut up another seven days; and if that did not work the cure, they ordered it to be demolished, and such materials of it only to be preserved, as were free from the infection, in order to build it up in some other place (43).

(H) At least, this seems to have been the meaning of the text, though the words in the original are not so clear and express. It would otherwise have been needless to have added that reason, because he was a leper: So that one may reasonably suppose, with the Septuagint and Vulgate, that they buried him in some corner of the ground where his ancestors were deposited, though apart from the rest.

(42) Vide Levit. xiii. per tot. (43) Ibid. ver. 47. & seq. & xiv. per tot. Vide Journal des Savants, ann. 1668. CALMET, Dissert. præf. x. at the head of his Comment on Levit.

them that went together out of some quarter of Samaria into the Assyrian camp, ■ when the famine raged in the city<sup>b</sup>; and of ten in the gospel, who applied themselves in a body to Christ, to be healed by him<sup>c</sup>. Persons, garments, and houses, being cured of this distemper, were to be further purified by the priest. We have already spoken of the sacrifices which were to be offered upon this occasion, in its proper place. As for the other ceremonies which were enjoined by Moses, we shall refer our reader to the two afore-quoted chapters of Leviticus, where, if he pleases, he may see a full account of them.

BUT here we shall beg leave to mention a story which Manetho, and several other Heathen writers after him<sup>d</sup>, have advanced, with great appearance of seriousness, against the Jews; and which, though every one of them tells in his own way, doth in the main amount to this: That the land of Egypt being grievously infected with the leprosy, and the king, Bochorus, having consulted the oracle, was advised to send all the lepers out of his dominions into a desert place, where they might perish with want. This was accordingly done, and they being come to the desolate place, Moses observed, by tracing the footsteps of a wild ass, a spot, where they might dig for water to refresh their thirst, and they, being revived with it, chose him for their guide, and were by him conducted and settled in Canaan in the space of seven days; in memory of which, he ordered the seventh day to be a day of rest, and forbade the eating of swine's flesh, because that creature is very subject to the leprosy. They add, that, in memory of their kind benefactor, the ass who saved their lives, he commanded an ass's head to be set up and worshipped in their temple. This story, which is false in every particular, is likewise ridiculous, and as such sufficiently confuted by Josephus; and the care which Moses took, with respect to this distemper, sufficiently shews, that, at least, the far greater part of the Israelites were free from it at their coming out of Egypt, else it would have been impossible to have segregated them from the rest, and to have forced these laws upon them, which excluded them from the commerce of those who were free from it. c

THIS body of laws, out of which we have omitted a considerable number d of less moment, besides several others, which we have avoided repeating here, because they have been occasionally mentioned in other places, is not only secured by a clause which expressly forbids the adding, or diminishing any thing from it<sup>e</sup>; but their obedience to them is likewise enforced by the most cogent promises and threatenings, interspersed through the whole, besides a strict charge to the Levites to instruct the people, and parents their children in it; though all too little to keep them to their duty.

II. Of the customs, learning, arts, and trade of the Jews.

Ceremonies at circumcision.

THEIR customs, both religious and civil, being chiefly founded upon e their laws, and the greatest part of them having been already mentioned under that article, we shall have the less to say here, especially considering the barrenness of the subject, for want of books and authors of a date old enough to be depended upon. We have already mentioned all that could be gathered concerning their customs at weddings and festivals; we shall say now something of those that were used at births, and feasts; to which we shall add a short account of some of their abominable practices at their high-places, groves, and others places of idolatrous worship; of their various kinds of divinations, games, and ceremonies used at burials. It may be remembered, that circum- f cision was not enjoined by the Mosaic law, but by virtue of the express command given to Abraham. But neither that nor this hath ordained any thing, either with respect to the person by whom, nor with what instrument, nor in what manner the ceremony was to be performed, but only that the foreskin should be cut off on the eighth day. So that it was left to the option of the parent, either to perform it himself, or to have some other person, whether a priest, surgeon, or any expert friend to do it for him. And in this last case, it was always looked upon as a high compliment to be chosen to that office. The instrument was generally a knife or razor made of some kind of stone, as being

<sup>b</sup> 2 Kings vii. 3, 8.    <sup>c</sup> Luke xvii. 12.    <sup>d</sup> MANETH. ap. JOSEPH. cont. APION. TACIT. JUST. ex TROG. PLUTARCH. & al.    <sup>e</sup> Deut. iv. 2. xii. 32.

- a less dangerous than those of steel †; the use of which they might have learned from the Egyptians, who opened those bodies with them, which were to be embalmed. They were not obliged to carry the child to the synagogue, much less to the temple, but had him circumcised at home. Here the father, or some friend deputed by him, held the child in his arms, whilst the operator took the prepuce either with one hand, or with pincers made for the nonce, and with the other cut off the fore-skin, whilst another held a porringer filled with sand, for him to fling it in, and to receive the blood that dropped. He then applied his mouth to the place, and having sucked the blood, which generally flowed plentifully, twice or thrice, and spit it out into a tumbler of wine, he threw some stiptic powder upon the wound, and
- b dressed it till it was well. As for the form of words that were used upon such occasions, as far as probable conjectures will go, we have had occasion to mention it under a former article *, to which they added, no doubt, some prayers and blessings. At present, the operator, having dressed the wound, puts the cup of wine and blood to the infant's lips, pronouncing these words of the prophet, live in thy blood †, repeats the 128th psalm, and wishes his parents joy, and that they may thus assist at his wedding *. But, how old these customs are, we cannot warrant; all that can be added is, that this ceremony was usually accompanied with great rejoicing and feasting, and it was at that time that the child used to be named by the parents, in the presence of the company † (1). These names, how harsh soever they may sound in
- c our ears, were generally significant of something relating to the parents, or the child, or to some other circumstances of time. We have already given some instances of it in those of the patriarchs. The devouter part used to tack the names of God Jab and El to that of the child; thus, Abijab signifies God my father, and Zechariah the memorial of the Lord: Uzziel and Daniel, the strength or judgment of God. Some had a quite different meaning, as Ishbosheth, the man of shame; Mephibosheth, shame of the mouth. Others were taken from living creatures; Tzipor, a bird; Rachel, a sheep; Chamor, an ass; Nachash, a serpent; Tamar, a palm-tree, and the like; and Eli's daughter-in-law called her son Iscabod, where is the glory, when she heard that the ark was taken by the Philistines †††. As for daughters, as they were not
- d circumcised, so there was no other ceremony used, that we can find, than giving them a name, unless it were, that, when the mother was purified, the priests did bestow a blessing upon the child, as well as upon the parents, as it is used to this day †.

THEIR feasting (if we except those that were commanded or permitted by At their feast. the law, or used at births, marriages, and such like occasions (K), were neither † Vide sup. p. 554. d. HERODOT. lib. ii. c. 86. * Vide sup. p. 490. (A). † Ezek. xvi. 6. * De his vide FAG. in Deut. x. Mos. KOTZ, in Tract. de Circumcis. fol. 115. MATM. Tract. Circumcis. c. 1, & 2. BUXTORF. Syn. Jud. c. 4, & alib. QUANDT. de Cultris Circumcis. Hæbr. † Luke i. 49. ††† 1 Sam. iv. 21. † LEO DE MODEN. Cerem. Jud. pt. iv. c. 8. GOODWIN'S Mos. & Aar. lib. vi. c. 1.

(1) The Jews did afterwards add several other superstitious customs, such as placing three stools, one for the circumciser, the second for the person that held the child, and the third for Elijah, who they say, assisted invisibly at the ceremony (44); writing the words Adam and Eur; Lillith, be gone hence, upon pieces of parchment, and sticking them to the four walls of the room, as also the names of three friendly angels, to preserve the child from the power of Lillith, who, according to them, was Adam's first wife, and, being parted from him, used to vent her spleen against women in child-birth, and new-born children, especially males (45). They had likewise taken it into their heads to circumcise children after their death, if they had not been so before, in order to avoid the curse pronounced against those that neglected it, and which had like to have fallen upon Moses at the inn (46); but they content themselves now with cutting off the prepuce, and flinging it into the coffin or grave with the body. But these the wiser sort among them have long since disused, as ridiculous and superstitious. The custom of godfathers, or, as they call them ברית בעל, Babal-berith, master of the convent, has been of ancient use (47); his office was to hold the child, during the operation. They think that Uriah the high-priest, and Zechariah, the son of Jeherechiah, stood godfathers to Isaiah's son Maber-shallal-bash-bash (48). As for the operation, Maimon (49) tells us, that all had a right to it, even an uncircumcised servant, or a woman, &c. in the absence of a man, unless she be a Gentile; though, even if such a one should perform the operation, it needs not to be repeated. And Moses Kotz adds out of the Talmud, that, in case the parents neglected to circumcise their children, the judges, as soon as they were informed of it, were bound to see it done; which if they did not, when the person came to age, he was to get it performed out of hand, because, every day he lived uncircumcised from that time, he was a transgressor of the law (50).

(K) Their religious feasting were called חג, Chag, from חגג, to celebrate; the others, if sumptuous and splendid, were called מושבת, Mishbat, from שבת, Sabat, to drink or carouse, and answered to the symposium and symposium of the Greeks, because it was a main part of the banquet (51); but, if it was only a moderate one, they called it ארוחה, Arucha, that is, a viaticum, or way bit, from ארר, A a. b. to journey (52).

(44) Vide CHRIST. CAST. in Malach. iv. (45) Vide LEO DE MOD. pt. iv. c. 8. (46) Exod. iv. 24. Vide sup. p. 490. (A). (47) Vide ELIA. THISBIT. in ברית בעל. (48) Vide JUM. & TRASMEL. in Isai. viii. (49) Tract. ברית בעל, p. 114. (50) Ibid. fol. 104. (51) Vide Gen. xliii. 35. (52) Vide Jerem. xl. 5. Prov. xv. 17.

many not sumptuous, because these came so often about, and lasted so long, that <sup>a</sup> they could hardly have time for more. As for the customs and ceremonies used at them, we shall only pick out such as bear an analogy with any passages in the gospel. These were the saluting of the guests, washing their feet, anointing with oil, the grace or blessing of the cup, and breaking of the bread, giving of thanks, and dismissing the company. The first salutation was performed to superiors, by bowing down to the ground, as Abraham and Lot did to their heavenly guests <sup>b</sup>; or by a kiss or embrace to a familiar (L). In the two former instances, we have likewise a form of invitation, and the ceremony of washing the feet, which Joseph ordered also to be performed to his brethren, when they came to dine with him in Egypt <sup>c</sup>; and thus Abigail, in her great modesty, answered David's servants, who came to propose marriage from him, "Let the handmaid of my lord the king be <sup>d</sup> a servant to wash the feet of the king's servants" <sup>e</sup> and to this custom, no doubt, the psalmist alludes, when he calls Moab his wash-pot <sup>f</sup>. As for the ceremony of anointing the head, tho' it was common in all the east, yet we find no instance of it before the gospel <sup>g</sup>, except in that allusion of the psalmist <sup>h</sup>, thou hast prepared a table for me——thou hast anointed my head with oil.

Washing the feet.

Blessing.

THESE first ceremonies being over, the master of the house began to crave a blessing, if there was no stranger, nor any person of a superior rank <sup>i</sup>, for in this case he complimented him with that office (M). He then took a cup full of wine, and, having blessed the creator of the vine, he sipped a little of it, and gave it to the next person, till it had gone round. This was called the ברכת היין, Birkath hajin, the blessing of the wine. Our Saviour is observed by St. Luke, to have begun with it, and distributed it among the twelve, at his last supper <sup>j</sup>. From thence he passed to the blessing, and breaking of the bread, and distributing it to the guests. This is what Christ likewise did to the apostles, and it was called the blessing of the bread <sup>k</sup>. As soon as they had done eating, the same person, who had craved the blessing, was obliged to give thanks, to which all the rest joined with him. It was concluded with another cup full of wine, and this was called the blessing of plenty. Our Saviour is supposed to have instituted the sacrament in this last cup <sup>l</sup> (N). However, it is likely, that some of these last ceremonies were only used at some of their grand festivals, especially that of the passover; though the first was seldom, if ever, omitted. Whether their custom was to sit at meat, or lie down, is a controversy of more nicety than moment. However, to us the former seems most probable, at least, before the captivity. We read that Joseph made his brethren sit down to eat with him <sup>m</sup>, and David said to Jonathab, To-morrow——I should sit, or as the original has it, sitting, I should sit down at meat with the king <sup>n</sup>; though we own, that, in our Saviour's time, the custom was altered into that of lying down (O). That

Sitting down.

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xviii. 2. xix. 1. <sup>b</sup> Gen. xliii. 24. <sup>c</sup> 1 Sam. xxv. 41. <sup>d</sup> Ps. cviii. <sup>e</sup> Matt. xxvi. 7. Luke vii. 44. <sup>f</sup> Ps. xxiii. 5. <sup>g</sup> Vide 1 Sam. ix. 13. <sup>h</sup> Ibid. xxii. 17. <sup>i</sup> Vide DRUS. in Nov. Test. pt. ult. & GOODW. ubi sup. lib. iii. c. 2. § 15. <sup>j</sup> Vide FAG. in præc. Hæbr. <sup>k</sup> Gen. xliii. 23. <sup>l</sup> 1 Sam. xx. 5.

(L) These two ceremonies were also used upon all other occasions; thus Nathan and Araunab bowed to David, and Obadiab to Elisha (53); and thus Esaü embraced and kissed his brother Jacob, and Moses his father-in-law (54). Our Saviour also in the gospel alludes to this and the other two ceremonies of reception, of washing and anointing; when he reproves the pharisee for having omitted them towards him (55); and himself we find washed his disciples feet at his last supper (56).

(M) This was not to be refused upon any pretence, for they believed, that he, who refused to crave a blessing, shortened his own days. But the master of the house was allowed, by way of civility, to let even an inferior to perform that office (57).

(N) In this cup of thanksgiving they blessed God. 1. For the present refreshment. 2. For their deliverance out of Egypt. 3. For the covenant of circumcision: And 4. For the law given by Moses. After this they prayed, that God would be merciful, 1. To his people Israel. 2. To his Jerusalem. 3. To his Sion, the residence of his majesty. 4. To the kingdom of David. 5. That he would send the prophet Elijah. And 6. That he would make them worthy of the kingdom of the Messiah. The ceremony ended with a psalm proper to the occasion. They have added, since, several other niceties, not worth mentioning (58). It is plain, however, that some of these ceremonies were added since the captivity, and we dare not take upon us to say, how many of the others were in use before that time; but we hope the affinity, they bear to some of the gospel institutions, will be apology sufficient for our taking notice of them here.

(O) The verb is ישב, Yashab, which is always used for sitting, whether at meat, on a throne, or the like, and is, as we think, incapable of the other meaning, which is always expressed by that of שב, Saba. As to their tables, they seem to have been of a round or oval figure, because it is often joined to the verb סבב, Savaf, to surround, to sit or stand round

(53) 2 Sam. xxiv. 21. 1 Kings i. 22. xviii. 7. (54) Gen. xxxiii. 4. Exod. xviii. 8. (55) Luke vii. 44. & seq. (56) John xiii. 4. & seq. (57) Jos. KARD. Shulchan baruk, n. 201. (58) Vide SES. MUNST. in Matt. xxvi.

- a That of pulling off of their shoes or sandals seems implied in the command of eating the passover, with them on. We shall only add, that, upon these and all such occasions, hospitality and liberality had been so strongly recommended to them by their Law-giver, and enforced by the examples of Abraham, Lot, and other patriarchs, and the many blessings attending it, that they became very conspicuous for it, seldom or never failing, at such times especially, to make the Levites, the fatherless, widows, and strangers, partakers of their joy, by inviting them to the feast, or sending them some portions of their good cheer.

- THEIR high-places were of two sorts, either those where they only worshipped the true God, by burning incense, and offering sacrifices to him; or such in which they served strange gods, and committed the most horrid wickedness in their worship. Both these became so common and universal, that we read but of few kings who had the courage to pull them down; whilst many others, though otherwise commended for their piety and zeal, are yet recorded for having left this evil unreformed. The first of these, though less criminal, and seemingly countenanced by the examples of Samuel, David, Elisba, and other inspired persons, were nevertheless expressly forbidden by God, unless it were done by his own command, as we have seen elsewhere †: But as to the last, it is certain, nothing could be more expressly forbid, or more severely threatened, we may say punished; notwithstanding which, Joshua had been scarcely dead above twenty years, ere they began to relapse into it. This defection began about the times of Othniel and Ehud, and increased so fast, and spread so wide, that it would be endless to enumerate their false deities, and the places dedicated to their worship, as well as the abominable ceremonies which were practised in them. But our design is not to dwell upon this subject, having already spoken of it in the histories of those nations, from whom they adopted them. It will be sufficient to observe upon the whole, that they adopted the false gods of all those nations, in the midst of whom they lived, and set up altars and idols to them upon every hill and high-places, from which they came to be called by that name; that the sun, moon, and stars were of the number of their deities, and that, as the rites of those false deities became more and more shameful, and unfit for common view, they betook themselves to set up tents and booths, and to plant groves, to conceal the abominable things that were done in them; the very women, who were become useless in that hellish commerce, finding out a way of prostituting themselves, as it were, at second hand, by furnishing the infamous votaries with all kind of conveniencies*. Solomon is justly branded in scripture for having brought this evil to its height, by the multitude of his strange women, and which was never thoroughly rooted out till Josiah's reign, that is, about 360 years after*.

- BESIDES these abominable idolatries, or rather, in consequence of them, they gave themselves up to all kinds of divinations and witcheries practised among the Heathen, though as expressly and distinctly forbid by the law of Moses as the former. These were of various kinds. Moses expresses them in the terms following<sup>b</sup>, There shall not be found among you any one that maketh his son or his daughter pass through the fire, or that useth divinations, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, or a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer (P). To these the prophets have added some few others, such as consulting by Teraphims, and by the flight of arrows, by the liver of beasts<sup>c</sup>, by stocks and staves<sup>d</sup>, and such like; several of which were even forbid under round. Thus it is said by Samuel (59), וְלֹא יֵשְׁבֹה, we will not sit down, or rather, round, till he come; and the psalmist says, thy children shall be like olive branches round about thy table (60). We do not pretend, indeed, that this argument is altogether conclusive, seeing the word יֵשְׁבֹה, Savif, round about, is made use of by Moses, where he speaks of a square table, as when he commands the priests to sprinkle the blood of the victim round about the altar, tho' it was of a square form (61).

† See before, p. 662. (H). † Vide Judg. iii. 5, & seq. * 1 Kings iii. 2, & seq. xii. 13, 28, & seq. xiv. 23, 24, & alib. pass. * Comp. 1 Kings xi. & 2 Kings xxiii. * Deut. xviii. 10, 11. <sup>c</sup> Ezek. xxi. 21. <sup>d</sup> Hof. iv. 12.

(P) We need not doubt but there might be many more of the like nature. But the most inhuman of all was that of passing their children thro' the fire. This rite seems to have been peculiar to Moloch, who is therefore also called עֶזְרַחֵלֶךְ, Anamelech, from עֲנֵה, Anah, to answer, because he

(59) 1 Sam. xvi. 11.

(60) Ps. cxxviii. 3.

(61) Conf. Levit. i. & Exod. xxvii. pass.

pain of death. But such was their invincible itch of prying into futurity, that they a left none of them untried : At least the prophets do generally upbraid them with resorting to those who practised them.

Games.

GAMES may, for aught appears, be said to have been the only custom, in which they did not imitate their neighbours, at least, which they did not introduce into their commonwealth. They had not so much as a name for them, but what doth properly signify to laugh<sup>c</sup>, play<sup>f</sup>, toy<sup>g</sup>, and such like innocent amusements. Even Solomon himself, who had imitated, or rather out-done the grandeur of other kingdoms, and had indulged himself in all other vanities, or what he calls the delights of the sons of men<sup>h</sup>, some of which were near of kin to these, as his singers and musicians of both sexes; doth yet make no mention of any kind of games, either b of hazard, or of the theatre; neither do the scriptures any where speak of them (Q). It seems rather that their solemn festivals served them instead of all such kind of spectacles and diversions; and indeed, if we consider the frequency and magnificence of them, especially after the building of the temple, we shall not need wonder at their preferring them to any others. Add to this, that all that we meet with in the writings of the ancient fathers, such as Tertullian<sup>i</sup> and St. Cyprian, both in his second epistle to Donatus, and in his book De Spectaculis, if that piece be really his, which is somewhat doubtful, by reason of the difference of stile; all agree in this, that the Israelites never admitted any such games among them. It even appears from Mr. Selden, that games of hazard, such as c dice-tables, and the like, were looked upon as a kind of theft, no gain being thought lawful, that resulted from a contract, which depended upon chance. The

<sup>a</sup> Vide Gen. xviii. 12, & alib. pass. <sup>f</sup> Exod. xxxii. 6. Judg. xvi. 25, & alib. <sup>g</sup> Gen. xxvi. 8. <sup>h</sup> Ecclesiast. ii. 8. <sup>i</sup> Lib. de Spectac. & apolog. c. 38.

he gave answers to those who consulted him by this rite, either by his priests, or by dreams (62). We shall not attempt to describe those various kinds of divination, either from the text, or from commentators, but only observe in general, that the chief of them were performed first, by consulting the stars, clouds, signs, tokens, and the like. This seems the meaning of the word מְנַחֵשׁ, Menachesh here, which is nevertheless sometimes used in a good sense. Thus Laban says to Jacob, נִחְשֵׁתִי, Nachashti, I have observed or experienced, that God has blessed me for thy sake (63); Joseph makes use of the same verb, speaking of his divining cup (64); but we much doubt, whether this is capable of so favourable a sense. However, as the word נִחְשֵׁתִי signifies properly a serpent: Bockart has also given us an account of several divinations that were performed by means of those creatures †. 2. Another way was by familiar spirits, which the Hebrew calls אוֹבֹת, Oboth, such as the witch of Endor is said to have had. 3. דְּרוֹשׁ אֶל הַמֵּתִים, interrogating the dead, which the Septuagint render ἐρωτάμενος τῶν νεκρῶν. This is what the same witch did for Saul, from which one would be apt to conclude these two to be much the same. 4. The מְכַשֵּׁשׁ, Mekasheph, may be properly enough rendered, by Leger-de-main, one who deceives the sight, and imposes upon the beholders; such are reasonably supposed, those whom Pharaoh set against Moses (65), who are there called מְכַשְׁפִּים, Mekashephim, and are said to have imitated some of his wonders בְּלִהְטִיהֶם, Belabatehem, which word seems derived from להט, which signifies a flame, or the glittering of a spear or lance, because it dazzles the sight. The Septuagint, however, have translated it φαρμακῆς, Apothecaries, from whence the Latin, Emphica, Poisoner. 5. The חֹבֵר, Chover, may also be properly rendered a Mutterer, from חָבַר, Chavar, to gather, couple, or associate, because he speaks with his lips joined (66), and is therefore rendered רִשְׁטִין by Onkelos. Bodinus doth indeed think it rather, because such a one associates himself with evil spirits by compact (67), and he tells us accordingly in another place, that an infant, by pronouncing a certain verse out of the Psalms, shall prevent a woman's churning her butter, and, by repeating the same verse backward, shall cause it to come immediately (68). The learned Maimon (69) tells us of a great many other wonderful pranks that are done by these חֹבְרִים, Mutterers, of whom, however, the psalmist says, that they cannot charm the deaf adder, though never so skilled in their art (70). The other kinds of prestigators, being still more obscure and inconsiderable, we purposely omit.

(Q) If we may believe the Talmudists, and other Jewish commentators, all kinds of games, spectacles, &c. were not only forbid, but abhorred by all good Israelites, by reason of the mischiefs which had befallen those who had ventured to be present at those of their neighbouring nations. The Talmud utterly condemns being present at any theatrical representations (71); they give several reasons which we shall omit, because they are not over modest; and R. Simon Ben-paki is there affirmed to have rendered the first words of the first psalm, Blessed is the man who hath not set his foot in a theatre, &c. The comment on the book of Ruth introduces old Naboni, dissuading her daughter-in-law from returning into the land of Israel, because it was not the custom of the daughters of it to go to the theatres and other spectacles of the Gentiles (72); and the large comment on the Lamentations introduces the Jewish church expostulating with God, that it had never entered into any such profane places (73).

(62) Vide Maim. & Abarban. in Leg. 170. (63) Gen. xxx. 27. (64) Ibid. xliii. 5, 15. † Hierosol. lib. i. c. 3. pt. 1. (65) Exod. vii. 11, & alib. pass. (66) BEKER. Monde enchanté. (67) Demon. Magic. lib. i. c. 6. (68) Lib. ii. c. 1. (69) עֲבוּרָה זָרָה, c. xi. § 10, 11. (70) Ps. lvi. 5. (71) Trad. עֲבוּרָה זָרָה, fol. 18. (72) מוֹסַדָא, in Ruth c. 1. (73) אִינֵיה רַב, fol. 5. col. 4.

- a same they likewise affirmed of such who made a gain of exposing beasts or fowls to fight one with another <sup>a</sup>.

As to their diversions, they seem to have consisted chiefly in eating, drinking, Diversions, dancing, and music. At least they are those which good old Barfillai seems to bewail his incapacity for <sup>b</sup>, and for the excess of which, they were often blamed by the prophets <sup>c</sup>. The scriptures do often express the simplicity of their happy lives, by sitting, and eating, and drinking, every one under his vine, and under his fig-tree.

- But even these diversions could not be very frequent, unless it were upon such solemn occasions as we have mentioned before, or at their sheep-shearing, harvest, and vintage; because they would else have had but little time to have minded their country-affairs. Whether they used hunting, fowling, fishing, and such like, by way of diversion, or rather to furnish their tables now and then with an uncommon dish, and to preserve their fields, orchards, and vine-yards, from being spoiled by those creatures, we will not pretend to say, but we find frequent mention made of nets, gins, traps, fowlers, hunters, and such like.

- THEIR diet, except on festivals, seems to have been very plain. Boaz, a mighty Diet man, complimented Ruth with drinking of the same water, eating of the same bread, and dipping her morsel in the vinegar with him <sup>a</sup>. Even the present of victuals which were brought to David and his men, whilst he was in a kind of exile, were chiefly several kinds of pulse, some parched corn, bread and flour, some dried raisins and figs, honey, butter, cheese, oil, and a few fatted beasts <sup>b</sup>. Their bread was made either of barley or wheat, baked into thin cakes, some in ovens, some upon the hearth, and others in a frying-pan, some with, and some without oil; they often used parched corn instead of bread. Honey was commended for its deliciousness <sup>c</sup>, and the fleece of the flocks, and the milk of the goats, were thought by the wise man sufficient for food and raiment, both for the master and his family <sup>d</sup>.

- HIGH titles were unknown among them, unless those which implied some Titles office, such as general, treasurer, recorder, and the like. They valued themselves more upon their genealogies, which is the reason why one man's name had five or six of his ancestors, and sometimes more tacked to it. Some regard was likewise had to the distinction of tribes or families; as for instance, to those of the priests and Levites, upon a religious account, to that of Judah, by reason of the scepter being promised to it, and to that of Ephraim, out of respect to Joseph's memory. The same respect was likewise paid in every tribe to those who were the heads or fathers of it, and to all the elder branches in general. Next to these, old men, of what tribe or branch soever, were had in great veneration. The name of old man, or elder, as our version renders it, seems all along to imply something of dignity in the Mosaic writings, and their experience and gravity seems to have entitled them to be the proper persons to take cognizance, and to judge of all important matters, in the places where they dwelt, as well as to the respect of the younger sort upon that account. But this respect did not consist in giving them, or indeed to any man, how great soever, the king excepted, any pompous title; but in a submissive approach and behaviour, and in a respectful phrase peculiar to the Hebrews; in which, though the second person was always used even to a prince, yet the speaker always expressed himself in the third, with the addition of servant or hand-maid: Let thy servant speak a word, instead of, let me speak — behold thy servant or hand-maid, for, here am I. The women, whether because they were more bashful and timorous, or perhaps greater flatterers, were still more remarkable for the modest turn of their expressions, and the humbleness of their behaviour <sup>e</sup>.

- f THEIR laborious and frugal lives, and the healthfulness of the country, were effectual means to prevent a vast number of those diseases which have been since ushered into the world by luxury and sloth. It is for this reason that we read of so few, if any diseases among them, much less of physicians, except such as are now known by the name of surgeons, whom the ancient Greeks, as well as the Hebrews, called physicians or healers. Thus the Mosaic law condemned the man who wounded another to pay, amongst other things, the salary of the physician. Such were those whom king Asab is blamed for his too great confidence in, when he laboured with a distemper in his feet, which the generality of interpreters take to have been a kind of gout; and whose skill extended no further than outward applications; for we read nothing in the sacred books of purges, sweats, vomits, diet drinks, and other such evacuating medicines, though often of plaisters, ointments, bandages, and such like. This seems indeed the reason of their living so long, as well as of their being so healthy and fruitful, even to the end of their lives.

<sup>a</sup> Jus Nat. & Gent. lib. vi. c. 11. <sup>b</sup> 2 Sam. xix. 35. <sup>c</sup> Isai. v. 11, 12. Amos vi. 3, & seq. <sup>d</sup> Ruth ii. 9, 14. <sup>e</sup> 1 Sam. xxv. 18. 2 Sam. xvi. 1. xvii. 28, 29, & alib. <sup>f</sup> Vide Ps. xix. 10, & alib. pass. <sup>g</sup> Prov. xxvii. 26, 27. <sup>h</sup> Vide Ruth ii. 13. 1 Sam. i. 15, 16. xxv. 23, & seq. & alib.

Mourning.

THEIR mourning was either for the death of their near relations, or for any misfortunes, either publick or private; and was expressed in both cases much after the same manner; not with such formalities as are used among us, which hardly reach beyond the outside; but by such as expressed all the tokens of an inward grief, or at least would be apt to cause a real one in those, who were obliged to go through such a series of mournful ceremonies. The first fallies of it were followed by rending their cloaths, uncovering their heads, smiting their breasts, tearing their hair and beards, putting ashes and dirt upon their heads, instead of perfumes (which were quite laid aside all the time of mourning) going barefoot, putting on sackcloth next the skin, lying upon the bare ground, and the like. The neighbouring nations had still more violent ways of expressing their grief, by pricking, cutting, and scarifying themselves; but these were expressly forbid by the law of Moses. As soon as these first fits of grief were ended, they changed their cloths for others that were streighter, coarser, dirtier, and more ragged. They covered their faces with their upper-garment, to hide their tears; they fasted till sun-set, and then contented themselves with the plainest diet; they kept a profound silence, which they never broke, but to utter some groans or complaints, or at most some doleful lamentation. Some did even chuse to lie in the ashes, or on a dunghill, and to avoid the sight of any light. This mourning lasted longer or shorter, according to the occasion; and when it happened for the death of a considerable person, even a whole month, as was done for Moses and Aaron; but when it was for an ordinary person, or near relation, it lasted but about a week (R). In publick mourning, the people were wont to get up to the top of their houses, there to give the greater vent to their grief; at least it seems probable, that there was some such custom by what the prophet says, speaking to Jerusalem, what aileth thee now, that thou art gone up wholly to the house-tops, and so on; and speaking elsewhere of the Moabites, he says, on the tops of their houses, and in their streets, every one shall howl and weep abundantly.

Funerals.

THEIR funeral ceremonies were no less mournful. As soon as a person was dead, all the near relations came to the house in their mourning habit, and sat down upon the ground, with a mournful silence, whilst another part of the house echoed with the voices of mourners, and the sounds of instruments suitable to the occasion, and hired for the purpose (S). These lasted till the funeral was over, when the nearest relations resumed their melancholy posture, and continued in it all the time

* 2 Sam. i. 11, 12. xii. 16. xiii. 31, & seq. Ezek. xxiv. 16, 17. * Levit. xix. 28. Deut. xiv. 1. Vide F.A.C. in loc. * 2 Sam. i. 17, & seq. * Num. xx. ult. Deut. xxxiv. 8. * Isai. xxii. 1. * Ibid. xv. 3. * Jerem. ix. 17.

(R) The Talmudists, however, have abated much of these severities, as being too often attended with great inconveniencies (74); for which reason they allow the mourners at first their full swing of crying, and all other expressions of the deepest sorrow; but expect that it should abate every day after, especially if it is to last a whole month, which Josephus thinks is as long as a wise man would desire to mourn for the loss of the nearest relation, or of the dearest friend (75).

And here we cannot but take notice of an observation of a celebrated author of a neighbouring church (76), that the Israelites, and other ancient nations, were more plain and undisguised than we. Their joy, says he, was accompanied with songs and dances, and their grief with loud complaints: Their fear expressed itself with cries, and their anger with ill language. The remark is no less just, than judicious; and is a severe reproof to his church and ours, for coming so short of that excellent pattern, which it was our duty to strive to outdo.

(S) As to the musical instruments, we have no instance of their being used upon these occasions in the old testament; only we find it practised in our Saviour's

(74) Tract. בבא בתרא, Maim. Tract. אבל, c. 4. Mœurs des Israélites, c. 18.

(75) Ant. lib. iv. c. 8.

(76) Fleury

- a time of the mourning, eating, sitting, and lying upon the ground, and never speaking to any, unless spoken to. Their very food was unclean and defiled by those that eat of it*. They neither made their beds, washed themselves, or pared their nails. In a word, they abstained from every thing that could yield them any delight. They made, indeed, a kind of banquet for the rest of the mourners, called by the prophets, the bread of men, and wine, or cup of consolation†; but even then their tables were covered with wooden, or common earthen platters and trenchers; and for the same reason they were not allowed to drink above ten glasses of wine at it, namely, three before, three at meat, and four after it, lest any should get drunk, and betray any token of mirth‡.
- b IN the mean time, there were proper persons appointed to make ready the corps for the burial. It was looked upon as a duty incumbent on the nearest relation present, to close the eyes of the deceased. This custom is taken from God's promise to Jacob, that his son Joseph should perform that office to him§. If the person was of a considerable rank, they embalmed him; if otherwise, they contented themselves with washing him (T). Sometimes they added a mixture of sweet drugs and spices; in which they either wrapped the body, or which they burnt about it. This last is what we find was done at the funeral of Asab, king of Judab, whose corps, the text says, was laid upon a stately bed, which he had caused to be filled with costly perfumes made with great art, and with which they made a very great burning for him¶ (V). Neither was this ceremony peculiar to that prince, but common to the kings of Judab, and as such promised by the prophet to Zedekiah*, and refused unto Jehoram†. How they dressed the corps, or how they conveyed him to the grave, we dare not affirm, the law having ordained nothing concerning these, or any other circumstances relating to funerals; it is probable that custom, and the circumstances of persons, made them more or less sumptuous (W). The accompanying the corps to the burying-place was rather an office of civility, than ob-
- c

* Vide Hosea ix. 4. † Ezek. xxiv. 17. Jerem. xvi. 7. ‡ In Tract. Abel. c. 4. § Gen. xli. 4. ¶ 2 Chron. xvi. ult. * Jerem. xxxiv. 5. † 2 Chron. xxi. 19.

Saviour's time (77); and the Talmudists assure us, that it was not only an ancient custom, but that it was even obligatory, and that the poorest husband could have no less than two of them for his wife (78). These instruments, according to them, were a kind of mournful flute; hence that proverb of theirs, flutes serve either for a bride or for the dead (79). As for the hired singers, their office was to sing some mournful ditty, proper to fill the company with the deepest sorrow. One of them is elegantly comprised in few words by one of their rabbies, Mourn for the mourners, and not for the dead, for he is at rest, and we in tears (80).

(T) This ceremony of washing, was at least practised in our Saviour's time (81), but how long before is not easy to guess. The  Jews indeed think it both ancient and necessary; and add, that it was no sooner performed, but they immediately stopped the main excretories of the body, that no defilement might issue forth (82). As to what is added above, about wrapping the body in spices, it is inferred from what is said of Jacob, that—ויקחם ויטבחו, Vajicanthubu (83), the verb טבחו, signifying, according to the Talmudists, to anoint with a mixture made up of spices and other sweet drugs. This we find was done to our Saviour (84), and Maimon mentions it as a constant practice used among the  Jews (85).

(V) From these places, and another still more obscure in Amos, some have taken up a notion, that burning of the dead had been adopted by the  Jews

(86). But neither the texts above quoted, nor any instance we can meet with in their history, doth countenance such an opinion, which all the  Jewish doctors do disown; affirming, that nothing was burned at those funeral obsequies, but those sweet perfumes above-mentioned. We may add, that Josiah's burning the bones of the priests of Baalim upon their idolatrous altars (87) implies, at least, a kind of abhorrence against such a practice, unless when it was done by way of punishment. Only R. Solomon adds, that they burned over those royal bodies שחן וכלי תשמישן, their beds, and other supellestilia veneris, sive quicquid veneri inserviebat (88).

(W) The gospel doth, indeed, give us some account of the manner of burying at that time, both by what we read concerning that of Lazarus, of the widow's son at Naim, and also by the ceremonies which were performed at that of our Saviour; but we cannot thence infer, that they are the same that were used before the captivity. Maimon tells us, that the richest persons, even princes, were allowed but one Zux, or winding-sheet, lest it should cast a shame on the poorer sort, who could afford no more. Neither was it allowed to be made of rich, or embroidered stuffs, because such pride did more become infidels, than the people of God. He adds, that they also covered the face of the dead, that it might not be discovered, when any died through poverty and want (89).

(77) Matt. ix. 23. (78) Mishn. Tr. כתובות, c. 4. Gemar. Babil. in eund. titul. (79) Tract. בבא מציעא, c. 6. (80) Bar. Abbis. ap. HOTT. in GOODW. lib. vi. c. 5. note 12. (81) Abi. ix. 37. (82) MAIM. in Tract. בבא מציעא, c. 4. (83) Gen. l. ver. ult. (84) John xix. 40. (85) Ubi sup. (86) Ch. vi. 10. (87) 2 Chron. xxxiv. 5. (88) Vide Maimon. in Jerem. xxxiv. sub nota. (89) Ubi sup.

ligation, and yet not only relations, neighbours, and acquaintance assisted at it, but a even those, who met the procession, thought it incumbent upon them to join with the company; only the priests were not to be present at it, unless it were a very near relation, as we have seen elsewhere. The funeral of Abner, one of David's generals<sup>a</sup>, doth give us an idea of the remainder of the ceremony. The king's servants, with Joab at their head, were commanded to march before the corps in deep mourning, with their cloaths rent, and girded with sackcloth, whilst himself followed the bier to Heshbon, Abner's burying-place. As soon as they were come to it, the king himself made a funeral oration in his praise, which was accompanied with the mournful voices of all the company, whilst they were depositing the body into the grave. It appears moreover, that the day could not be far spent when they buried b that great general, because, when, upon their return home, David was entreated by his servants to take some refreshment, he answered with an oath, that he would neither eat nor drink, till the sun was down<sup>c</sup> (X).

Sepulchres.

THEY had such an extreme abhorrence against having their own, or their friends bodies exposed after death, that they denied sepulture to none but such as were guilty of self-murder, and not even to these, but till after sun-set. They had burying places for strangers, and for such who were put to death for capital crimes. The provident care of the patriarchs to make sure of a sepulchre for their posterity, and several express threatenings in the sacred writings, made them esteem it as a severe curse from God, to be deprived of burial<sup>d</sup>, and a blessing to be interred among their ancestors. For this reason, those, who had inherited a burying-place, were extremely careful of preserving it to their posterity; and those, who had not, were no less solicitous to provide one for themselves and their families: And as the law had ordained nothing concerning them, so they thought it indifferent where they had them, whether in a garden, an orchard, a field, a mountain, or in a rock, so they could but secure the possession of it. We do not read, indeed, of any epitaphs or monumental inscriptions being used among them, yet we may reasonably suppose, that every family, at least, set some particular mark upon their burying-place: they were even under an obligation to distinguish them from other places, by some peculiar mark, that people might not be defiled by going over them. But there was d something still more particular to distinguish the graves of eminent persons, as we may infer from the instance of the man of God, who had foretold the destruction of the altar of Bethel, and whose grave was known by some inscription or mark above 300 years after, when Josiah was fulfilling his prediction<sup>e</sup>. The sepulchres of the kings of Judah were in that part of Jerusalem where the temple stood<sup>f</sup>. Ezekiel seems to hint, that they were cut in the rock under it, when he says, that the Lord's holy hill should be no more defiled by the carcases of their kings<sup>g</sup>. All his descendants are said to have been buried in the same place, except Manasseh, who was buried in the garden of Uzzah, adjoining to his own house<sup>h</sup>. Whether the sepulchre of David was built, or only begun by him, and finished by Solo- e mon, or any of his successors, is not certain, but it is still to be seen at this day, without the walls of the present Jerusalem, though some think it more likely, that it stood at first within the walls of the old. It is a most stately piece of work, and perhaps the only genuine monument of that ancient city. We have given a description of that surprising fabric in another section<sup>i</sup>, to which we have nothing to add on that head.

A LATE modern Jewish traveller<sup>j</sup> has added several other particulars relating to this royal tomb, but which we dare not insert, nor give credit to. However it was in this place, that Josephus tells us<sup>k</sup>, Solomon did lay up an immense treasure, which

<sup>a</sup> 2 Sam. iii. 31, & seq. <sup>b</sup> Ibid. ver. 35. <sup>c</sup> Vide Jerem. viii. 2. xxii. 19. Ecclef. vi. 3, & alib. <sup>d</sup> Comp. 1 Kings xiii. 1, & seq. & 2 Kings xxiii. 17. <sup>e</sup> 1 Kings ii. 10. xi. 43, & alib. pass. <sup>f</sup> Ch. xliii. 7, 9. <sup>g</sup> 2 Kings xxi. 18, 26. <sup>h</sup> See before, p. 589. b. <sup>i</sup> BENJ. TUDER, & al. <sup>j</sup> Ant. lib. vii. c. 12.

(X) It appears from the examples of Tobit, and of the Maccabees, that they used moreover to lay some kind of visitals over the sepulchres of the dead, that the poor might receive the benefit of them, and pray for the soul of the deceased, for whom they used also to offer sacrifices, that they might be absolved from their sins, and be at peace (90). But these, especially the last, seem rather to have been works of supererogation, being nowhere commanded or countenanced by any thing we meet with in the canonical books, and in all likelihood never practised till after the captivity.

(90) Vide Tobit iv. 17. vide & Ecclef. xxx. 18. 2 Maccab. xii. 42, & seq.

- a was not discovered, or at least broke in upon, till thirteen hundred years after, when, the city being streightly besieged by Antiochus, Hircan the high-priest had recourse to the tomb, and drew three thousand talents out, and bought off his enemy with a good part of it. He adds, that Herod did likewise find a way into another hidden cell, out of which he got a prodigious treasure, but that neither he nor any one else could ever discover the bones of David, his tomb being so artfully contrived, and so deep in the ground, as to elude the most curious search. Something like this Mr. Jay has given us in his polyglot, out of an ancient Arabic manuscript, but whether either of these had the account from any authentic records, or from a bare tradition, they do not tell us. The burying-places of the kings of Israel, after Jeroboam's revolt, were in Samaria; but we cannot suppose them to have equalled those of Judab, both because they were inferior to them in riches, and because the crown never stayed in one family above three or four generations. Those of private families were in all likelihood more or less sumptuous, according to their quality and opulence; they were, however, curious to have them, if possible, cut into the rock; which was no difficult matter in such a rocky and mountainous country. They were to be, according to the rules laid down in the Talmud<sup>a</sup>, which probably took them from the form of the ancient sepulchres that were built before the captivity, six cubits long, four in breadth, and seven in height. Round these there were likewise to be little niches or cells for the repositing of the dead bodies, to the number of eight, according to some, or thirteen according to others. The mouth of it was covered with a large stone, which they called Gallal, from the rolling it upon the cave. This stone, if there were no other ornaments over the grave, was to be often whited, that passengers might see it at a distance, and the same was done at least to those monuments which were erected for considerable persons. How they beautified them in our Saviour's time, his comparing the hypocritical Pharisees to them<sup>b</sup> sufficiently shews; and if those that are still extant, under the names of the tombs of Abraham, Rachel, Abshalom, Elisba, and others, be really theirs, which is much to be questioned, it must have required no small pains and cost to keep them so long in repair (Y).
- c FROM these houses of the dead, we now pass to those of the living; and here we observe in the first place, that they were plain, low, and flat, suitable to the climate, with rails round the tops, to keep people from falling. Their furniture was much after the same stile, chimnies, fashies, and casements, were needless, where they were forced to study coolness and freshness; for the same reason tapestry was of no use but upon the floor, to sit, eat, or sleep upon; and if they used any bed-curtains, they were made of some fine gauze, to keep off knats and other insects, whence comes the name of canopy. Their beds seem to have been at some considerable height from the ground, from their common phrase of climbing up to them †††. The prophet Amos, c. vi. 4. doth upbraid the effeminate with lying up-

<sup>a</sup> Tract. Bava Batra, c. vi. 2. Vide Gloss. BARTEN. ad Tract. Mohed. Katon. c. i. <sup>b</sup> Matt. xxiii. 27. ††† Pl. cxxxii. 3. 2. 2 Kings i. 16.

(Y) The Jews called these burying-places the houses of the living. The Talmudists pretend, that Jerusalem had this peculiar privilege above other cities, that it had but two tombs, namely, that of David, and that of the prophetess Huldab, which they pretend had been built by the old prophets; and that, when a corps was to be transported from one place to another, it was not lawful to go through the city, tho' it was in their way, lest it should be defiled by it (91). We find a strange opinion among the Jews, how old it is we cannot affirm, that those, who die out of the land of Canaan, shall be excluded the resurrection, unless God be pleased to afford them a subterranean way, by which their souls, after a long tumbling, or volving about, may at length happily reach it. This notion is partly owing to that extreme solicitude, which the old patriarchs, especially Jacob and Joseph shewed, to have their bodies buried there, and partly to an excessive fondness themselves have for the land, not only upon account of its fancied holiness and excellence above all others, but more particularly, because they think that it will prove the scene of the resurrection. This last they infer from a mistaken place in Ezekiel (92), which, if rightly understood, rather implies, that God would rise his people out of their graves, and bring them from the lands in which they died, into their own land (that of Canaan): As one of their own rabbies has plainly shewn against them (93). However, this is one of the three reasons which the others give for Joseph's exacting an oath of his brethren to carry his body into Canaan. The second is, that he foresaw that the dust of Egypt would be turned into lice, which would have been a discredit to his ashes; and the third, lest the too great veneration of the Egyptians for his memory shou'd insensibly have drawn them into the worship of his relicks (94).

(91) Vide BASHAG. R. H. lib. i. c. 7. (92) Ezek. xxxvii. 11, 12. (93) KIMCHI in loc.
(94) Vide R. SAL. JARCH. in Gen. xlvii. 20.

on beds of ivory, and upon their soft couches; and the harlot in the Proverbs, vii. 16. speaks of the fine furniture and perfumes with which she has decked her own; and, no doubt, a great deal of luxury had been introduced by Solomon's wives, and was imitated by the softer; but it is plain, that lying hard must have been more suitable to the heat of the country, as well as the simplicity of their forefathers, and upon both accounts preferred by the wiser sort. If we might guess of the rest of their furniture, by that which the Shunamite put into the prophet's chamber, we must suppose, that they did not value themselves upon the richness or superfluity of it. And we may here observe in general, that there is more frequent mention made in the sacred books of vessels of wood and earth, than of those of more costly stuff.

From this prophet's chamber and furniture, we beg leave to make two remarks; the first is, that bed-chambers were raised at some distance from the ground, because they are called by a name that implies an ascent, and might be as properly rendered, an upper room. Perhaps the reason of their being thus raised was, to avoid the dampness of the earth, which may be reasonably supposed greater and more dangerous, especially to those who did lie upon the ground, within than without doors. The other is, that tho' they did not turn so much of the night into day as we do, yet they made use of artificial light, which was that of an oil lamp, and this had more or fewer branchers, according to the work that was done by it. Thus Solomon's housewife is represented in the Proverbs, rising whilst it is yet dark, and distributing her work among her servants; where there is also a beautiful description of a well regulated family. As to the largeness of their houses, and number of their apartments, we may suppose them to be answerable to the richness and numerousness of the family. The women had their separate apartments, both for privacy, in which they were like other eastern nations, and for legal infirmities, which secluded them from the rest of the family for a time; during which, none must make use of their beds, chairs, tables, or any other part of their furniture or utensils. All the females of a house were obliged to be exceedingly careful in this particular, from which the poorest sort were not exempted, though it could not fail of putting such to great inconvenience. Upon this account, as well as some others, they were likewise forced to have places for bathing in every house. Their laborious life, the heat and driness of the country made washing likewise necessary, and as it is apt to dry the skin too much, they used to anoint themselves, either with oil, or with some other ointments more or less costly, according to their circumstances, but generally perfumed.

Their arts and trades. THE arts, in which the Israelites did chiefly distinguish themselves, were those of war, husbandry, poetry, and music. The first of these was in a manner natural to them. We shall not venture to say how much they, especially Moses their leader, had learned of it in Egypt; but whoever observes the regular order of their encampments, intrenching, fighting, retiring, and such like, of which we have had occasion to speak in another place †, must allow him to have been as experienced a general as any of his time; and his people as well trained up in it as any of their neighbours. We need not to remind our reader here, in how short a time, not above six years, they conquered the greatest part of Canaan, in spite of all the natural and artificial strength of that country, and the united opposition of its warlike inhabitants. Neither was it possible for them to forget it at any time afterwards, because they were continually engaged in some war or other with their neighbours, from the days of Joshua, to the reign of Solomon; insomuch that it is recorded in one place, as a kind of wonder, that the land had rest forty years*. A late author† has moreover been at the pains to prove the ancient Jews to have been a warlike nation, not only from the many instances of their prowess, mentioned in holy writ, but likewise from the great number of warlike terms which he has collected out of those books, which manifestly shew them to have been very well versed in the military art. We shall refer our readers to the author himself for those curious remarks, and only observe here, that the writers, from whom he took them, were neither given to flattery or partial fondness for their own nation, but related these facts with the candour and simplicity which became inspired penmen. As to their generals, whether judges or princes, or officers who acted under them, their warlike deeds will

† Vide sup. p. 541, & seq. * Judg. v. ult. † FOLARD, Dissert. sur. la Tactique des Hebreux.

- a be mentioned in their proper place, in the sequel of this history ; and as to the people, tho' their courage was not always proof, but wanted often to be supported by art, yet we may say, that their men were all trained up to war, at least till David's reign, for we do not read of any regular troops till that time. Till then, as soon as their rulers had resolved upon a war, whether offensive or defensive, the summons were sent to every tribe, upon which, all, that were fit to bear arms, were obliged to repair to the place of rendezvous, both with their arms and with provision for a month : Here a certain number was drawn out according to the present exigence, and the rest sent back to their own home ; and as soon as they had achieved what they went upon, they returned every one to his own home *. This did happen
- b very often on the very day on which they set out ; the country being small, and their enemies at their elbow, it was a common thing for them to sally out, engage the enemy, beat or be beaten, and be at home on the same, or at most on the next night. It was easy for their army to be subsisted, when their greatest marches did not exceed two or three days journey : The whole people of Israel may therefore be looked upon as a body of militia trained up in war, and in time of peace inured to a laborious life, that of agriculture. Their generals, from Joshua to Saul, were either appointed over them by God, as Othniel, Gideon, Sampson * and others, or chosen by the people, as Jephtha †, or by treachery and cruelty, as Abimelech ‡. These, however, especially the two last, were not universally obeyed, but by those only who had chosen them,
- c which occasioned such commotions amongst them, that they found themselves under a necessity of having a king to prevent all further disputes, and to be ready upon all occasions against their enemies.

THEIR arms were, like those of other ancient nations, either offensive or defensive ; the former were swords, spears, javelins, bows and arrows, and slings. Their swords were short, crooked, broad, and sharp, which they girded upon their thigh * ; we read also of two-edged swords † ; as for their javelins, they seem rather to have been a kind of short pikes, such as that which Saul threw at David ‡. They were likewise very expert at slinging of stones, witness David's killing of Goliath, and the inhabitants of Gibeath, who are recorded to have hit within a hair's breadth §.

d The expression often used, gird every man his sword, and even by David in his fugitive state ¶, when he was exposed to continual dangers, shews the custom of wearing of swords at any time, but that of action, not to have been known, even to the Jewish warriors. Saul is the only person who is observed to have had his javelin or spear always about him **, and this, perhaps, not till his suspicion and rage against David made him think himself unsafe without it. Their defensive arms were, the helmet, shield, breast-plate, coat of mail, and target : Some wore even greaves upon their legs. We find a description of a compleat armour in that of Goliath † ; but it is probable, that all these were more common among their neighbours, than among the Israelites, at least before David's reign ; for we find, that, in Deborah's time, there were found neither shield nor spear among the forty thousand that fought against Sisera ‡ ; and that, when David came to be dressed cap-a-pie in Saul's armour, he was so little used to that kind of incumbrance, that he could not stir in it, and was forced to pull it off §. This might probably be owing to the policy of their neighbours, by whom they were often conquered, and not only stripped of all their old weapons, but likewise hindered from making of new ones ; insomuch that the text tells us, that, on the day of battle, there were neither sword nor spear found among Saul's army, except those which himself and his son Jonathan had ¶. This, indeed, is very surprising, considering that the preceding chapter mentions one single victory, which that new monarch had got over the Ammonites, in which they might have furnished themselves with the arms of the slain, and of those that ran away ; to say nothing of the impossibility of their cutting that army in pieces from morning till noon, unless they had had a considerable quantity of their own : So that unless we suppose, that there is an accidental transposition of the chapters and facts, or that the words must not be understood to mean more than that there was a greater scarcity of them than the army would require, we shall be at a loss to guess how the Philistines could in so short a time strip them of all their arms. But however that be, it is certain, that they became more common, after they had recovered their liberty under David and Solomon; and in process of time, Uzziab is said to have provided a sufficient quantity of all these kinds, to furnish his army with, tho' it consisted of upwards of three hundred thousand men<sup>k</sup>. These arms were commonly made of brass, sometimes also of iron, steel, and other materials<sup>l</sup> (Z). Job speaks of weapons of iron, and bows of brass<sup>m</sup>, and this last is likewise mentioned by the psalmist<sup>n</sup>, though our version translates it bows of steel in both places, the original being capable of both meanings. We read likewise of shields of gold and of brass, but these can only be supposed to have been plated over with it, and that they were underneath of some light sort of wood, else they must have been rather a burthen than a help to those that wore them. From the prophet's expression of anointing the shield<sup>o</sup>, some authors have thought, that they had got the art of covering them with leather or raw hides<sup>p</sup>; but those that were covered with brass might want oiling, as much to keep them bright, as those of leather, if any such there were, to preserve them from cracking. Upon the whole, their fighting being rather a kind of skirmishing, than close and regular engagements, we find that they chiefly aimed at excelling in the use of those weapons, which hurt at a distance, such as were the bow, the sling, and the javelin.

* 1 Sam. xi. pass. xiii. 2, & alibi. * Judg. iii. iv. & vi. pass. * Ibid. xi. 6, & seq. † Ibid. ix. pass. † Vide Exod. xxxii. 27. Ps. xlv. 3. lv. 4. † Ps. cxlix. 6. † 1 Sam. xviii. 16. † Judg. xx. 16. † 1 Sam. xxv. 13. † Ibid. xviii. 11. xxvi. 7. † 1 Sam. xvii. 5, & seq. † Judg. v. 8. † 1 Sam. xvii. 38, & seq. † Vide ibid. xiii. 19, & seq.

Chariots.

THE heat, narrowness, and mountainousness of their country rendered cavalry altogether needless and useless, for which reason they never incumbered themselves with any, that being only necessary in cold and spacious countries, where marches are long, and the ways difficult. Absalom was the first we read of, that made use of them in his revolt against David<sup>q</sup>; but his ill success and loss of the battle shews, that they were of no other service to him, than to facilitate his flight<sup>r</sup>. Solomon did, indeed, send for a considerable number of horses from Egypt, with a proportionable number of chariots<sup>s</sup>; but some think that he did it rather for grandeur than use; and indeed, the expence did so far out-weigh their service, that his successors contented themselves with hiring them of the Egyptians, upon any exigence; insomuch that Rabshakesh made their want of them a pretence for taunting king Ihezkiab, that, if he should lend him two thousand horses, none of his subjects were capable of riding them<sup>t</sup>. From all which it appears, that the Israelites did not much regard either chariots or horses. And yet as to the former, it is certain, they had not only seen them in Egypt, where they were in great plenty; but that the Canaanites, against whom they were at continual wars, brought an almost incredible quantity of them to the field. Sifra, we read, had nine hundred of them in his army<sup>u</sup>; but what is still more surprising is, that those which the Philistines made use of against Saul are said to have amount-

<sup>k</sup> 2 Chron. xxvi. 13, 14. <sup>l</sup> Vide CALM. Dissert. sur la Milic. des Hebr. <sup>m</sup> Job xx. 24. <sup>n</sup> Pf. xviii. 3. <sup>o</sup> Isai. xxi. 5. <sup>p</sup> CALM. & FOLARD. ubi sup. <sup>q</sup> 2 Sam. xv. 1. <sup>r</sup> Ibid. xviii. 6, & seq. <sup>s</sup> 1 Kings x. 26, & seq. 2 Chron. i. 14. <sup>t</sup> 2 Kings xviii. 23. <sup>u</sup> Judg. iv. 3, 13.

(Z) Some interpreters, both Jewish and Christian, think, that the coat of mail, which Saul died in, was made of some kind of linnen, so woven as to be impenetrable (95). They render the words, which the young Amalekites makes Saul to say, I am intangled in this coat of linnen (96), instead of anguish, or terror is come upon me, as ours and other versions have it. The truth is, the word שבץ, Shebetz, here in question, doth properly signify a sling, or a kind of net-work, such as we shewed the curtains of the court of the tabernacle to have been made of†, and the same word is used by the psalmist, when he speaks of the queen's vesture (97). Our version renders it barely, of wrought gold; but might be more properly rendered, veste scellata, a garment full of open work: If there had therefore been any truth in what the Amalekite told

David, the words אחוזי שבץ, Achazani shebetz, would be more properly rendered, I am caught, or, intangled in a net; but even this might as well allude to his enemies inclosing him as to his armour. But the text shews nothing like such an impenetrable coat, since, in fact, Saul, having in vain desired his armour-bearer to run him through with his sword, did put an end to his life, by falling upon his own (98).

We may observe here also, that the original has no less than four different names, for what ours and other versions render a shield, namely, מָגֶן, Magen, צִנּוּחַ, Zinnah, סוֹחֶרֶב, Socherab, and כֶּדֶן, Kiden; but whether they all signified the same kind of defensive weapon, and only distinguished their various shapes, and the materials they were made of, or otherwise, we dare not say.

(95) Rabb. LEVI, MUNTZ. & al. in 2 Sam. i. 9. CALM. sub voc. Arms. BUXTORF. sub voc. שבץ. (96) 2 Sam. ibid. † Vide sup. p. 659. c. (97) Pf. xlv. 13. (98) 1 Sam. xxxi. 4.

- a ed to about thirty thousand *: A prodigious number indeed, if there is not crept some error in the text; and such as one would scarce think their scanty country would have been large enough to turn them in. They were indeed small, being just fit to contain one or two men at most; some of them had four, and others but two wheels, and they were generally drawn by two horses*. The text calls them chariots of iron, because their poles, wheels, and axles, &c. were armed with sharp sithes. We are told, that they hindered, at first, the tribe of Judah from conquering those cities that were in the plains*, because they do most execution there. Besides the terror they were apt to inject on the enemy, by being placed along the front of the line of battle, they never failed of breaking the ranks, and sometimes of putting the adversary to a total rout; so that there was no way of preventing it, but by either their stopping their career, by killing the horses before their too near approach, or, if that failed, by opening a passage to them. It is likely the Israelites were very well skilled in both, seeing they so often engaged them, and still came off with victory, without opposing the same kind of destructive engines.

- W<sup>e</sup> hinted before, that they kept no regular forces before Saul's time; and <sup>Standing</sup> he is mentioned to have had but few standing troops, scarce a handful, in com-<sup>army.</sup> parison to that prodigious number which David did rise them up to, namely, to above two hundred and eighty thousand (A), besides the Cherethites and Pelishtites, of whom we shall speak in the sequel, * which were strangers kept in that monarch's pay *. All these were not only continued on foot by his son Solomon, but an addition was made to those forces, of a prodigious number of horses and chariots; inc somuch that he is recorded to have had forty-thousand stalls for his chariot horses; besides twelve thousand horses for his cavalry, or life-guard *, and fourteen hundred chariots of war *: It is certain also, that the history of his successors doth frequently mention such numerous armies, as would scarce be credited in a profane author. Such were those of Abijah, king of Judah, and of Jeroboam, the new king of Israel; the former of which consisted of four hundred thousand men, and the latter of double that number *, and of which five hundred thousand were killed on the spot, by the army of Judah*. Such was also that of his son Asa, which consisted of almost six d hundred thousand, with which he discomfited that of Zerah, king of Ethiopia, which consisted of a million of men *. But the greatest standing army we read of, of any of the Jewish kings, was that of Josaphat, which is said to have amounted to eleven hundred and sixty thousand, all men of valour, and prepared for the war, besides those which he kept in his garrisons throughout the kingdom*. To these we may add, that Uzziab introduced in Jerusalem a new invention of engines, which, being set up upon the walls and towers of it, did cast arrows, and other offensive weapons, and great stones, at a considerable distance*.

- W<sup>e</sup> find nothing in the sacred books that can give us an idea of their form-<sup>Art of war.</sup> ing such numerous bodies into order of battle; yet if we may make a judgment e from some scripture phrases, such as joining in battle, setting the battle in array, engaging army against army, and the like; or from their exact and regular division;
 1. Into twelve main bodies, according to their tribes; 2. Each of these into thousands or regiments; 3. Into hundreds or companies; 4. Into tens, and even into threes, every one having a proper officer set over them; but above all, from their admirable method of marching and encamping, mentioned elsewhere †, we may venture to affirm, that they observed no less regularity in their disposition of the order of battle, in their onsets, fighting, evolutions, retiring, and other military motions. If we may believe the Jewish authors, they ranged their army into one single line of a considerable depth, sometimes between twenty or thirty deep.
 f On the front of these, they placed their light-armed men, that is, their most expert archers, spear-men, and slingers, who began the onset with a warlike shout,

* 1 Sam. xiii. 5. * Vide STEWART in Veget. de Re Militar. † Judg. i. 19. * 1 Chron. xvii. ult. xxvii. 1, & seq. * See hereafter, p. 778 (C). * 1 Kings iv. 26. x. 26. † Ibid. x. 26. * 2 Chron. xiii. 3. † Ibid. ver. 17. † Ibid. xiv. 8, & seq. † Ibid. xvii. 14, & seq. † Ibid. xxvi. 15. † See before, p. 541, & seq.

(A) The book of the Chronicles tells us, that he had 24,000, which came regularly upon duty every month throughout the year, under their respective officers (99), which, being therefore multiplied by 12, amounts to 288,000.

(99) 1 Chron. xxvii. 1, & seq.

and with sending thick showers of arrows and stones upon their enemies front, in order <sup>a</sup> to inject a terror and confusion, and to stop the rushing in of their chariots upon them, by wounding both the horse and the driver. This is indeed probable enough, seeing that method was common to all the Asiatic nations. We read that David entertained a considerable number of these troops, who are said to have been ambidexter, exceeding fierce of aspect, and swift of foot <sup>b</sup>. But what they add seems more peculiar to their nation, namely, that they placed behind the ranks some of the stoutest subalterns, armed with sithes and axes, to cut in pieces those that offered to give ground. We are still to seek how they disposed of their cavalry, after it became in use among them: Probably after the manner of the Egyptians, from whom they had it; that is, in large squadrons of six or eight hundred horse, placed <sup>b</sup> on the two wings <sup>1</sup>. One thing is certain, that whether they had any of their own or not, they never dreaded it in an enemy, but endeavoured at once to open themselves a swift passage through it, as the surest way to gain the victory: And this is the reason why we find them so seldom discomfited, and so often victorious over their enemies, tho' superior to them in this and many other respects.

THE method of attacking the enemy in separate bodies was as ancient, we find, as Abraham, who divided his little army of 318 domesticks, and discomfited that of the four confederate kings <sup>a</sup>. It was afterwards followed by Abimelech against the Shechemites <sup>1</sup>, and by Saul against the besiegers of Jabesh-gilead <sup>m</sup>, with good success. We shall pass by some other warlike customs which they had in common with <sup>c</sup> other nations, such as the use of the trumpets in their marches and engagements, their usual harangues before they entered into action, and some others which have been hinted at already, under some former heads.

Wars.

THEIR wars were of two kinds, either such as God had obliged them to, as those against the Amalekites, and the seven nations of Canaan, or such as they undertook by their chiefs and princes, upon any other occasion, whether offensive or defensive. The Mosaic law had left these to their discretion; so that they were at liberty to engage in them upon any just grounds. We have already taken notice of their manner of entering upon an offensive war, by offering certain articles of peace, the refusal of which was interpreted as a declaration of war <sup>a</sup>; <sup>d</sup> when it was resolved upon for the recovery of any lost territories, they generally made a demand of them, and, when they were attacked by enemies, they likewise sent to expostulate with them <sup>e</sup>. However, this was not always the case, and a war was sometimes resolved upon, without any visible ground, and the charnel sent in these few words, Let us look one another in the face, and returned in terms equivalent <sup>e</sup>. The challenge of the king of Affyria to that of Judab was still more haughty; Thy silver and thy gold, thy wives and children, and all thou hast are mine <sup>e</sup>. The text observes in both cases, that these proud messages proved fatal to the senders. It was the constant custom of the Hebrew kings to command their armies in person, if they were able; and the people were so used to it, that, when Ahab <sup>e</sup> was mortally wounded by the Syrians, some of his servants were forced to stay him up in his chariot, to prevent his army being routed by the news of his death; and as soon as it was discovered by the bloodiness of his chariot, there went immediately a proclamation through his host, to dismiss every man to his city or country; tho' Jehoshaphat king of Judab, his confederate in that war, did likewise command there in person <sup>e</sup>. In the beginning of the Jewish monarchy, their kings used to fight on foot, as the judges had done before them; at least, we do not read of any horses or chariots used by them till a long time after; and it is very probable, that they took their rise from those alliances which the kings both of Israel and Judab were often forced to make with the Egyptians, Syrians, and other na- <sup>f</sup> tions, and which put them under a necessity of appearing at the head of their army, with a grandeur answerable to that of their allies. The officers of war under them were, 1. The head or general of the army (B); 2. The princes, or generals of

Alliances.

<sup>a</sup> 2 Chron. xii. 1, & seq. <sup>1</sup> Vide FOLARD. ubi sup. <sup>b</sup> Gen. xiv. 13, & seq. <sup>1</sup> Judg. ix. 34. <sup>m</sup> 1 Sam. xi. 11. <sup>a</sup> Deut. xx. 10, & seq. Vide sup. p. 531. (P). <sup>e</sup> Judg. xi. 12. & seq. <sup>e</sup> 2 Kings xiv. 8. <sup>f</sup> 1 Kings xx. 2, & seq. <sup>1</sup> 1 Kings xxii. 34, & seq.

(B) This officer was called שַׂר צָבָה, Sar izaba, Saul (100), Joab under David (1), and Benajab or prince of the host, such as Abner was under Solomon (2).

(100) 2 Sam. ii. 8. (1) Ibid. xxiv. 2. (2) 1 Kings ii. 35.

- a each tribe. 3. The commanders of thousands. 4. Of hundreds. 5. Of fifties. 6. Of tens. 7. Of threes (C). 8. Their scribes or muster-masters, who kept Officers. exact rolls of all that bore arms under their districts. 9. Lastly, Their Soterim, or inspectors, or, as others think, a kind of provosts or ministers to inflict punishments on all delinquents.

THE Mosaic law was certainly the best calculated to make a people happy, by making every man live by his labour, without luxury or ambition, and at once free from the danger of being totally ruined, and from the temptation of becoming excessively rich by those two vices, or from too great desire after change and novelty. Every man cultivated his own vine, field, orchard, and Agriculture.

- b could indifferently handle the plough and flail, or the sword and bow, as occasion required, but preferred still a quiet life under his vine and fig-tree. This is that their lawgiver enforced, not only by the example of the old patriarchs, but much more by the blessings which were promised to their obedience; these were to be neither gold, silver, nor precious stones, stately houses, or sumptuous furniture, but the former and latter rain, regular seasons, plenty of corn, wine, and oil, increase of cattle, multitude of children, with a quiet peaceful enjoyment of them, and victory over their enemies; all which, joined to the natural fertility of their soil, proved such powerful encouragements to agriculture, that there is scarce any known people that gave itself more entirely and universally to it than the Jews.
c Accordingly, from the most opulent families of the tribe of Judah, to the most indigent of that of Benjamin, from the oldest to the youngest, we find them either plowing or sowing, or reaping, at the threshing-floor, or feeding their numerous herds (D); at least till Solomon introduced commerce and luxury, and with it a multitude of manufactures and trades from other nations (E).

- THUS then every one was bound to cultivate that portion of land which the lot had assigned to his ancestors at its first distribution, and to maintain himself and family out of the product of it. It was his patrimony, which he could not change for another, or alienate without injury to his children and disgrace to himself. The judges, and the very kings themselves, did both practise it themselves, and d encourage it in others; all the difference there was between them and private men was, that they had more lands and more numerous herds. Thus David, tho' he heaped immense quantities of gold and silver, yet, in the list of his riches, mention is made of his arable and pasture grounds, of his store-houses for corn, wine, and oil, of his plantations of fig, olive, and other fruit-trees, of his numerous herds of oxen, camels, sheep, and asses. * His son Solomon not only multiplied them in proportion to the great consumption which the vast number of his wives, concubines, and servants required; but tells us likewise what pains he took to outdo all that had gone before him, in the number and elegance of them *; where it is to be observed, that his fine gardens and orchards were chiefly stored with such fruit-trees, plants, and herbs, as were more for use than shew. How he commends the e diligence of the husband-man, and exposes the stupidity of the slothful, every * 1 Chron. xxvii. 25, & seq. * Ecclef. ii. 5, & seq.

(C) These are called שַׁלִּישִׁים, Shalishim, and mentioned after the decurions, from which it is concluded that they were inferior to them; but what their office was, is not easy to guess.

(D) Thus we find Gideon threshing, when he received his commission, and Boaz at his harvest, when Ruth came thither to glean. Saul, tho' anointed king, was at his plough when he received news of the distressed Gileadites, and David returned to feed his flocks after Samuel had anointed him king; and when he was come to the height of his grandeur, his sons used to feast one another at their sheep-shearing (3). We omit many more examples of the like nature, with which the sacred history abounds.

(E) Whoever considers how many curious manufactures were employed in the fabricature of the tabernacle, and all its sumptuous utensils, and that those arts were rather subservient to luxury than to the necessities of life, such as were the casting of metals, engraving and cutting of precious stones, weaving of tapestry, embroidery, and many more, will be apt to conclude, that other more useful trades and manufactures were already in much greater perfection among the Israelites, and consequently, that they could not chuse but bring and cultivate them in the land of Canaan; but whether they, especially their master-artificers, had learned all those fine arts in Egypt, or were miraculously endowed with them, as the text doth rather intimate, yet it doth not appear that any of them were afterwards used among them till Solomon's time; and even he was forced to send for his artificers from abroad; probably, because the Philistines in Saul's time had deprived them of their workmen in iron (4), without which few trades could be carried on.

(3) 2 Sam. xiii. 23, & seq.

(4) 1 Sam. xiii. 19, & seq.

chapter almost of his proverbs is a witness †, however, he came afterwards to depart from his own maxims, which were built upon the most solid reason and truest policy.

For whoever considers the small extent of Canaan, and the numerousness of its inhabitants, will be rather apt to wonder how it could be able to maintain such incredible multitudes, though cultivated with all the care and industry they were capable of (F), especially considering that it was to rest every seventh year; and yet it is plain that it had more than sufficed them, seeing they exported great quantities of corn, oil, honey, and other provisions to the city of Tyre, both for the service of the king †, and for the merchants who came thither for it from other parts ‡. Besides these, they had great quantities of rie, barley, and other grains, variety of herbs and roots, and especially of fruits fit for food; such were their olives, dates, figs, pomegranates, and many more. Their very vines, which were very numerous, and of whose extraordinary fertility the spies brought such a noble specimen ¶, did afford them food as well as drink. For, as wine was not drank in such plenty, as it has been since, their dried grapes were not only in great plenty, but were justly esteemed an excellent food. To all these we may add, the multitude of cattle, which they not only bred themselves, but which they had from other neighbouring countries. For we have seen before, that Mesha, king of Moab, paid a yearly tribute to Abah king of Israel, of a hundred thousand lambs, and as many rams with their wool *. Jehoshaphat drew likewise a constant supply of small cattle from the Arabians †; from which we may conclude, that all those nations, that were tributary to the Jews, paid their tribute in such commodities as their country abounded most with, whether for food or raiment. It must be likewise remembered, that the country had no woods, parks, or any waste grounds. The ancient Canaanites were already too populous and streightened to leave any part of the land uncultivated. Their houses were not more spacious than their families required, and their gardens and orchards did equally afford them nourishment with their fields and vineyards; so that though the Jews had doubtless lost, in a great measure, their skill in agriculture, as well in Egypt, where they were otherwise employed, and where the lands were manured in a manner peculiar to itself, as during their abode in the wilderness; yet, coming into a country so well and so thoroughly cultivated, necessity alone would have obliged them to imitate the diligence and industry of its old inhabitants (G).

AFTER

† Vide int. al. c. vi. 6, & seq. † 1 Kings v. 11. * Ezek. xxvii. 17. † Num. xiii. 13, & seq. † 2 Kings iii. 4. vid. sup. p. 290. d. † 2 Chron. xvii. 11.

(F) The reader may easily form a judgment of their numerousness, by the computation we made of those that came out of Egypt, whom we shewed to have amounted to near three millions †; and by that which David caused to be made a little before his death, the sum of which was thirteen hundred thousand fighting men, which being above double the number of those who came out of Egypt, we must consequently allow, with the same proportion of young and old men, wives, servants, and slaves, to have been at least six millions; a prodigious number seemingly, to be all fed out of the product of so small a country, tho' far enough from impossible, if we consider it, not as it is now, laid waste and depopulated by the Turk, but as it was at that time, fertile, populous, cultivated, and improved *.

(G) There will be nothing surprising in all this, if we remember what has been observed concerning the populousness of Egypt, especially the upper one, called Thebais, and of its metropolis, which could send out 10000 men and 200 chariots out at each of its gates at one and the same time **; and of what Tacitus tells us of that province, that it furnished 700,000 fighting men (5), tho' the soldiery were here scarce a fourth part of its men, where there were so many trades and manufactures which excluded them by the laws from bearing arms;

whereas, in Judea, the soldiery made near one half of its male inhabitants. Livy tells us, that Rome, 188 years after its foundation, had 800,000 citizens fit to bear arms (6); and yet, as a judicious author observes (7), they could only subsist from the territories that were about it, which are now altogether barren and uncultivated, and extended at most but about half a degree, or 30 miles. We may add, that, when it was at the best, it was not half so fertile as Palestine, whose extent was five degrees, that is, ten times as much every way, as is plain by the geography we have given of it; so that, even allowing them to be both equally fertile, populous, and cultivated, the latter must produce 99 times as much provision as the former, and consequently be able to maintain 99 times the number of people. Supposing then these Roman citizens to have made up one third part of the inhabitants, which is the most that can be supposed, the whole will amount to 240,000, which being multiplied by 99, the sum of those of Judea will be 23,760,000 souls, which is above three times as many as we need suppose to have been in Israel, from the largest account that the holy writ gives us of them. However, lest this should not satisfy every reader, unless it can be proved that the land was capable of maintaining such a number, the author above quoted has taken the † Vid. sup. p. 473. a. b. & p. 506. not. P. * Ibid. p. 581. ** Sup. p. 175. 200. f. pass. & alib. (5) Annal. lib. 2. (6) Lib. 2. c. 24. (7) FLEURY Mœurs des Israélites. c. 7.

- a AFTER what has been observed here, and in a former note, we must not expect <sup>Trades and</sup> to find any trades or manufactures among them before David or Solomon's time, ex-<sup>Manufactures.</sup> cept such as were absolutely necessary; and even these were carried on in a different way from other great nations: They built their own houses, their wives and servants spun, wove, and made their cloaths, baked their bread, dressed their meat, and, in a word, supplied the business of cloth-workers, taylors, shoe-makers, cooks, bakers, confectioners, and many more. The plainness of their food, their cloathing and household-furniture, some few utensils excepted, rendered those trades unnecessary, till a more luxurious way of living got footing among them. We have already spoken of all the other particulars, except their cloathing, and this was plain and
- b artless enough, both in its materials and make, to be done within doors. It must not, however, be expected here, that we should give an exact description of their dress, because we have no paintings or statues of them, as we have of the Greeks and Romans; but, from what we find in the sacred books, it appears that they had a long loose tunick and drawers, made of linnen, next to their body, and a loose garment somewhat like a cloak, of light woollen cloth, which they threw over their bodies when they went abroad (H). The beauty of them consisted either in <sup>Dress.</sup> the fineness of the cloth, or the richness of the dye, such as purple, scarlet, blue, and yellow; but the plainest and the most commonly worn was the white, because it was the natural colour of the linnen and wool, and could be more easily washed;
- c upon which account it is much recommended by Solomon<sup>2</sup>, it being highly necessary in hot countries to shift frequently. Accordingly, we find it was usual among them to make presents of changes of raiment<sup>3</sup>; though probably some of them might be richer than others, both as to the stuff, the dye, and other ornaments; and these might be reserved to be worn on their solemn festivals and other publick occasions. As to the youth of both sexes, it is probable they did wear their stuffs striped or flowered with various colours, such as was that of Joseph, such as we find was also that of Tamar, and of all David's other unmarried daughters<sup>4</sup>. We do not read of any other ornaments to the mens dress, except the pains to compute what portion of land will maintain one man, and from the extent of the whole country, to make an estimate of the number of people that might conveniently subsist in it. We shall follow our author, or the subject no farther: Every reader, that understands figures, may easily convince himself, by comparing the number of acres which a country five degrees square may be reasonably supposed to contain, with the largest number of its inhabitants, that we find upon record at any time.

<sup>2</sup> Gen. xxxvii. 3.    <sup>3</sup> Gen. xlv. 22.    <sup>4</sup> 2 Kings v. 5, 23.    <sup>5</sup> 2 Sam. xiii. 18.

(H) The scripture, at least, mentions only these two, the one under the name of כְּתוֹנֶת, Ketoneth, or coat, and the other under that of מְעִיל, Me'il, or upper garment. The former, being next to the skin, is reasonably supposed to have been made of linnen, as the properest wear for hot countries, and for a people inured to labour. It was long and loose, but, when they went about any business, they tied it about, whence that expression of girding oneself is synonymous to getting oneself in readiness. The latter was only a large piece of cloth cut off the whole piece, without shaping or seam: As for the breeches, they were indeed ordered to be worn by the priests, but are probably enough supposed to have been worn by the rest for decency sake; tho' if we were allowed to guess at the reason of their wearing of fringes at the bottom of their garments, abstracted from that given in the text, we should be apt to think that they were designed to keep the garment close to the legs by their weight, to prevent the wind, or any violent motion, throwing them up. As to the coat of many colours spoken of immediately after, we have followed our own and the generality of interpreters, tho' it is much disputed whether the original word פְּסִיסִים, Psisim, doth really signify any such thing. Some think it was a robe with a long train; but tho' that might have fitted young princesses, yet it is scarce credible, that Jacob would have sent his son Joseph on such a journey with such a cumbersome garb. Others think the word to signify a wide kind of sleeve, narrow towards the shoulder, and widening towards the wrist, such as the Arabians used to wear. There is no being certain which of these three versions is right, only ours is confirmed by the Targum, the septuagint and vulgate, which may easily outweigh all that is urged on the other side, were the subject of more moment than it is.

What we have advanced of the Israelites being able to supply their own wants without the help of artificers, during so many centuries, will not appear a matter of wonder to those, who are acquainted with Homer's writings, and remember that he makes Ulysses make his own shoes, and build himself stately cots for his numerous herds (8), and Ulysses to build his own fine house and ship, whilst his wife's loom supplied the house with hangings and carpets, and the family with cloaths (9). So that the Hebrews were not the only people who affected this simple way of living, and thought it an instance of great wisdom to be able to supply their own wants, without the help of other hands. Neither need we go to Plato's common-wealth for parallels of this patriarchal life, since there is scarce a polite nation in antiquity, which did not live up to it as much as the Jews; witness the Egyptians, Chaldeans, Phenicians, Persians, Greeks, Romans, Carthaginians, Sicilians, &c. witness also Homer, Magen, Cato, Virgil, Cicero, and other authors, who have either writ upon, or in commendation of it.

(8) Odys. xiv. & xxiii.

(9) Odys. v.

except that of the fringes, which were fastened to a blue ribbon, and sewed round the border of their garments; and even these, if we except the conjectures offered in the last note, were ordained only as a memorandum that their happiness depended upon their obedience<sup>c</sup>. Some covering they wore upon their head, but the fashion is not to be guessed at; they wore likewise shoes abroad, and perhaps a kind of stockings, but how and what they were made of, we are equally to seek; only their shoes, or rather sandals, seem to have been a sole, whether of wood, skin, or some other material, tyed to the top of the foot, without any other covering; which made the washing of the feet so frequent among them. All these might be easily made without artificers.

THE dress of the women, especially of the rich ones, was indeed more curious, because they bestowed more ornament upon it, chiefly of needle-work, which was still within their own province. They wore jewels of gold and silver, but a great deal of that finery was brought at first from Egypt, and more might be easily added unto it, as they enlarged their conquest, without entertaining any artists to supply them with it, because their fashions did not alter as ours do. However, it is not improbable that they had some of these, as well as several other rich stuffs and linnen from Tyre, in exchange for their corn, balm, and other commodities; especially after Solomon's time, when pride and luxury grew to such a height, that Isaiah spent almost a whole chapter in enumerating the costly ornaments with which that sex used to deck itself in his time<sup>d</sup>; but concerning which it were impossible to frame any tolerable idea, because the terms there used are unknown to us. One thing may be observed from it, that they were very curious in adorning their heads, arms, and feet, and that they wore some kind of tinkling ornament about their legs, which gave a musical cadence to their steps. Judith's sandals are particularly taken notice of to have ravished Holofernes<sup>e</sup>, and the richness and elegancy of her other ornaments might give us a clear notion of a compleat Jewess's dress, were we sure that they had not by that time mixed some of the Babylonish fashion with it. However, we have a more authentick description of the female garb in the prophet Ezekiel<sup>f</sup>, where the Jewish nation is compared to a poor, naked, and helpless woman, whom God, out of pity, and husband-like kindness, cloathed and girded with silk and fine linnen, attired her head with a crown, or rather mitre, such as that of Judith, and put a jewel upon her forehead, a costly chain about her neck, bracelets upon her wrists, ear-rings in her ears, and sandals upon her feet. To all these we may add the veil, which is often mentioned in scripture, and was very necessary in those countries, both to preserve the complexion and the character of women, it being esteemed highly immodest for them to appear without it; but whether they were made of some such transparent stuffs as our gauzes, so as that they might see their way through them, and at the same time give some glimpse both of their beauty and rich ornaments, or otherwise, we cannot determine.

It doth not appear, however, that they fell into this excess of finery, 'till about the latter end of David's life; till then a wonderful oeconomy seems to have reigned in every family under the wives at home, and the husbands abroad. The laborious life of the men doth account for that valour, strength, swiftness, and surprising exploits, for which the scripture doth so highly extol them, especially David's worthies<sup>g</sup> and excellent troops<sup>h</sup>. But the immense treasures which that monarch had heaped up, having inspired him with a desire of consecrating some part of it to God, by building a sumptuous temple to him, soon introduced a number of artificers (I), such as carvers, masons, carpenters, joyners, gold and silver-smiths, founders, and all manner of workmen in metals, wood, and stone; and these brought on a number of others, without which they could not subsist. His son Solomon built himself some stately palaces, as well as the temple,

<sup>c</sup> Num. xv. 37. <sup>d</sup> Ch. iii. 16, & seq. <sup>e</sup> Judith xvi. 9. <sup>f</sup> Ch. xvi. 10, & seq. <sup>g</sup> 2 Sam. xxiii. 8. ad fin. <sup>h</sup> Ibid. xvii. 8, & seq. & alib. pass.

(I) It is said in two places, that Solomon sent to king Hiram for some of his best artists in metals, stone, and wood, because he had none so skilful among his own subjects (10), and presently after that he raised a levy of thirty thousand men out of all Israel to carry on the work (11); from which we may reasonably conclude, that the former were only designed by that politic prince to instruct the latter in that great variety of arts, which were necessary to execute his noble designs, as the most curious part was actually done upon the plain of Jordan (12).

(10) 2 Chron. ii. 3, & seq. 1 Kings v. 6. (11) Ibid. ver. 13, & seq. (12) 2 Chron. iv. 17.

a temple; and this probably gave his subjects such a relish of his more elegant way of building, that the number of workmen multiplied still more. The division of the two kingdoms increased the mischief. Jerusalem and many other places must be fortified; chariots and engines of war, and a much greater quantity of arms of all sorts became necessary, which required a suitable number of artificers; inso-much that we read in the Chronicles of a valley belonging to the tribe of Judah, called by the name of the valley of Cbarashim, or artificers, because it was inhabited only by such<sup>1</sup>. In a word, one may guess at the increase of them by the number which Nebuchadnezzar carried away captive out of the bare city of Jerusalem<sup>2</sup>, though it is plain at the same time, that the Jews did never neglect the cultivation of their lands for the sake of these. On the contrary, it is only the product of this last, that is said to have been exported<sup>3</sup>, whereas that of their other manufactures seem to have been all consumed within themselves. Solomon himself, who opened so wide a door to commerce and luxury, was so far from thinking it beneath his care, that he not only cultivated it himself, as was hinted before, but did also earnestly recommend it to his people, as the best means of growing rich, preserving health, prolonging their days, and leading a quiet and happy life; inso-much that there is scarce a chapter in his proverbs, wherein he doth not enforce it from one or other of these advantages. We may even affirm, that he made trade and navigation, though in all appearance his most favourite projects, subservient to the promotion of agriculture. But as those did in a manner rise and set with him, we shall suspend all further account of them, till we come to speak of his reign; the peacefulness of which may also, in all probability, be the reason, why we read of so few Jewish worthies and brave generals in his days, in comparison of those, which his warlike father had had during his whole life (K).

POETRY is perhaps the only art in which the Hebrews, at least since Moses's time, Poetry: have excelled all other nations, we had almost said, that have been ever since. It has, indeed, this great advantage, above all others, that the authors of it, being divinely inspired, seem to have consecrated it wholly to the honour of God, and adapted it to the service of the temple. No wonder then, if not only their great law-giver, but their monarchs, judges, priests, and prophets, men and women, have endeavoured to eternize their memories by some excellent performance in this kind: Witness, the two inimitable songs of Moses mentioned elsewhere, those of Deborah and Hannah, the whole book of Psalms, the Canticles, the thanksgiving of Hezekias, the book of Job, a great part of the prophet Isaiab, and the Lamentations; not to mention some other prophets, who are likewise supposed, by the loftiness of their stile, to have writ, at least, part of their prophecies in verse;

<sup>1</sup> 1 Chron. iv. 14. <sup>2</sup> 2 Kings xxiv. 16. <sup>3</sup> Ezek. xxvii. 17.

(K) The valiant men of Judah are most beautifully described in the 87th Psalms, under the figure of Sion, which is commonly used to signify that tribe<sup>a</sup>; but it has happened in this as in many other Psalms and poetical pieces of the sacred books, that not only the beauties and energy, but even the sense has been entirely lost, and another substituted, which scarce will bear that name. We shall therefore beg leave to subjoin a new and even more literal, or at least idiomatical version of this Psalms, that our readers may see a specimen both of the beauty and elegance of it, and how far it has been wronged by all the versions we have hitherto met with. The elegance, which they have overlooked here, is in the opposition between the pronoun היא Zeh, which is commonly used to express an inconsiderable person; and the word איש ish, which signifies a considerable one, in opposition to אדם, which is used to express those of inferior rank; according to which the sense will run thus:

She [Zion] or the tribe of Judah is founded upon the holy mountains.

The Lord has more love for her gates (or places of resort) than for all the dwellings of Jacob.

Glorious things shall be spoken of thee, O city of God.

In mentioning, among my acquaintance, either Rahab (Egypt) or Babylon, or here Philistia, Tyrs, and Ethiopia, (the phrase is) Zeh, this inconsiderable person was born there, or it has given birth to such a one.

But of Sion it is, or shall be said, ish we ish, this or that great person owes his birth to it, seeing he, who is the most high, is to establish her; and so on.

We shall not go about to justify this new version; those, who are masters of the Hebrew, will easily see that it is not only more natural and agreeable to the original, but also freer from these expletives which are forced in, to make it speak sense; and criticisms of this nature would be needless to those who are unacquainted with it. This Psalms we take to be parallel with the 48th, which abounds with sublime expressions in praise of Sion, but such as can hardly be reached by any translation.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. int. al. Pf. lxxviii. 68.

concerning which it is universally agreed, that nothing can be conceived more a majestick or more surprisingly sublime ; whether we consider the variety of action, the greatness of the sentiments, the richness of the figures, and imagery, or the strength and beauty of the expressions. To all these we may add, that a strain of the most seraphick piety, and of the most excellent morality, runs through the whole ; which conveys into the reader's mind the most important truths, the noblest precepts and instructions, that can possibly frame and fit it for all stages and conditions of life ; whilst the expressions and figures, strong and lofty as they be, are no less adapted to the reach and understanding of the young and illiterate, than they are to raise the deepest attention and admiration in those who are the ablest masters of it (L). And yet it is certain that, like all ancient works b of that kind, it frequently alludes to things, customs, and sayings, to which we are utter strangers at this distance of time, tho' they were then perfectly known ; and that it abounds with words and idioms, whose true meaning we are left to guess at, for want of such parallels as might determine it to us. From these, and the imperfection of modern tongues, one may easily guess how short all translation must come of the beauty and energy of the original ; so that we may be really said to guess at it, as much from the thicknes of the medium through which we behold it, as from the amazing lustre, it is still able to cast through it. This is evident, from the character which Mr. Gildon, after many others, has given of it : That there is nothing so sweet, so tender and pathetic ; and at the same c time nothing so grand, so majestick, so terrible, and so harmonious, as the poetick part of the Bible, to which all the beaten verse is low and flat. We may add, that nothing can be juster than this character, tho' both he, and the far greatest part of those who have so highly extolled it, have rather judged of it from the versions they had read, than from any great acquaintance they had with the original.

BUT tho' there be nothing more universally agreed on, than the excellency of this ancient Hebrew poetry, above all others, in all the above-mentioned respects, yet there is scarce a point more debated, or less possible to be determined, than the nature, metre, cadence, and rules of it. Several modern authors have pretended indeed to very signal discoveries in this intricate province, but they have either d had

(L) Such are these expressions of Moses, The heavens, and the heaven of heavens, are the Lord's thy God (13). I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as brass. Ye shall be terrified at the sound of a shaken leaf. You shall flee when none pursueth (14). One shall chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight, &c. Such are likewise these of Isaiah : To whom will ye liken the Lord, who measures the waters in the hollow of his hand, and the heavens with a span ; who weighs the mountains in the balance ? All the nations of the earth are as a drop of water that sticks to the bucket, and as the small dust that remains in the scales (15). Or those of the psalmist : The earth trembled, and the heavens dropped at the presence of God. The mountains skipped like rams, and the vallies like young sheep (16). Who stretcheth out the heavens like a curtain, telleth the number of the stars, and calls them by their names (17). He bowed the heavens and came down ; darkness was under his feet. He rode upon the wings of cherubims (18). He maketh the clouds his chariot, and walketh upon the wings of the wind (19). We shall go no further with instances which are innumerable ; but observe here, that some of them have such a complicated beauty, that the best part of it may be easily lost to any but an attentive reader, who is likewise a good judge of poetry. Of this kind is the last expression we instanced in, of walking upon the wings of the wind ; for as a modern author justly observes (20), wind is generally used to express the velocity of any thing ; and here the wings of the wind carry with them an idea of the utmost fierceness of that velocity ; so that we cannot imagine the serene and deliberate walking of the Deity upon a creature of the most unconceivable swiftness, without being filled with the deepest wonder and abasement. And yet this inimitable beauty has passed unobserved by many, otherwise learned, translators and commentators, who have chosen to render it, who rideth upon the wings of the wind ; as if riding upon the wind, which is common to feathers, straw, dust, &c. conveyed a more natural or sublimer idea of the Godhead, than the literal one of walking upon it.

This is one of the reasons why the Psalms, the book of Job, and some other poetick pieces of holy writ, lose so much of their beauty and energy in all versions (21). However, there is this difference between these two books, that the latter cannot bear a literal translation ; whereas those of the former, which have followed the original closest, have succeeded best ; such are, in particular, the Latin ones of Castalis, Buchanan, and Jenson. This last is, indeed, the most literal, and wonderfully displays the elegance of the Hebrew. It has but one fault, namely, its running all along in exámetros and pentámetros, which takes off a great deal of its majesty ; whereas, had it been all in exámetros, there would not have been a better, as there is not indeed a more exact one in all other respects extant, that we know of.

(13) Dent. x. 14. (14) Levit. xxvi. pass. Dent. xxxii. 30. (15) Isai. xl. 12, & seq. (16) Pf. lxxviii. 8. cxiv. 4. (17) civ. 2. cxlviii. 4. (18) Pf. xviii. 7, & seq. (19) civ. 3. (20) AAR. HILL Not. in Gideon. (21) Vid. PINEDA DIEG. DE STUNIC. & al. in Job ; BUGHENAC, BUCER, BUCHAN. & al. in Psal.

- a had the modesty to conceal them from the world<sup>a</sup>, or those who have ventured to publish them, have only provoked some learned antagonists to expose their weakness and vanity<sup>a</sup>. The truth is, that those who have made any attempts in this way have been forced to shift, alter, and overturn the order, the words, and punctuation, and sometimes the very sense, in order to bring the text to their rules. This is what a learned modern has done almost in every verse, in a dissertation writ on purpose to prove that Hebrew poetry was writ in rhyme, like that of the French and other modern nations<sup>a</sup>. In order to this, he takes the liberty to lengthen or shorten the verses and syllables, as he thinks fit, without observing any other rule or proportion in them than the jingle of the last words; inso-
- b much that there is not, we will not say with Calmet<sup>a</sup> any of Tully's orations, but we may venture to affirm, any chapter in the old testament, which may not, by the same method, be reduced into rhyming verse. He had more need have said, that the rhyme, in those poetical works, was not only altogether accidental, but almost unavoidable, unless the authors had made a resolution against it, and taken more than ordinary pains to alter their words, and cramp their diction, in order to shun it. Those that are ever so little acquainted with the Hebrew grammar know, that the terminations of verbs, and even of nouns in the plural, and the junction of the possessive pronouns to both of them, are so alike and uniform, that it would be vastly more difficult to write a poem in blank verse in that
- c tongue, than to have it all in rhyme. And yet it must be owned, that he has displayed a great deal of learning in it, and that several eminent men have embraced his opinion<sup>a</sup>, tho' there is one objection against it which seems almost insurmountable; which is, that there is no rhyme but what is plainly accidental in all the acrostick or alphabetick pieces we have left, such as several Psalms<sup>a</sup>, the Lamentations, and some few others, where the length of the verse is determined by the first letter of it, and where consequently the liberty of transposing and altering the measure is quite taken off. Our author doth indeed tell us, that these were not designed for rhyme but blank verse; but this is said gratis: and what is more, some of them have a greater number of hemistichs rhyming to one
- d another, than those which are pretended to be written designedly so; as the reader may see by the specimen in the margin (M).

<sup>a</sup> F. VATABL. ap. MERCER in Job iii. MEIBOM. vid. Journal des Sçavans, 1699. & al. <sup>a</sup> FR. GOMAN Lyra David. TH. HERBERT. Vid. CAPEL cont. Goman. BEDFORD cont. Le Clerc. <sup>a</sup> Biblioth. Univerf. May, 1688. <sup>a</sup> Comment. in Exod. xv. & alib. <sup>a</sup> BERN. LAMI. CAROFALO & al. <sup>a</sup> Pf. xxv, xxxiv, xxxvii, cxi, cxii, cxiii, cxix, & cxlv.

(M) We shall instance only in the 34th Psalm, and omit all the blank verses in it; and here the reader will see by the interlineal version of them, how accidental, and as it were inevitable, the rhyme is in those that chance to have it.

Loveth days
Obeſ yamim to ſee good.
liroth tof.

Ver. I fought the Lord, and he heard me:

4. Daraſhti eth Adonai uebanani:
And from all my troubles he delivered me.
Umiccol megurothai izillani.

5. They looked unto him and were inlightened:
Hibittu elaw venabaru:
And their faces were not confounded.
Upnehem al jechpharu.

9. Fear ye the Lord, ye ſaints of his:
Ireu eth Adonai kedſhau:
For no lack (is) to them that fear him.
Ki aen machſor liroaw.

10. Little lions lack and hunger:
Kephirim raſhu verabau:
They that ſeek the Lord ſhall not lack Vedoreſhe Adonai la jachſeru any good.
col tof.

12. What man deſireth life:
Mi haiſh hacbaphetz chajim:

13. Keep thy tongue from evil:
Netzor leſhorcha merab:
And thy lips from ſpeaking guiſe.
Upbatacha midabber mirmah.

These are in the very order we find them in all Hebrew Pfalters, without any tranſpoſition or change. But, did the alphabetical order permit it, it is plain, that one might reduce every acroſtic psalm and poem into rhyme by Mr. Le Clerc's method.

We hope there is no neceſſity to acquaint our readers, that an alphabetic psalm begins with each of the letters of the alphabet ſucceſſively, either in every verſe, as in the 25th, 34th, and 145th; or every other verſe, as in the 37th; or in every hemiſtick or half verſe, as in the 111th, 112th, and 113th. The 119th doth ſtill differ from all theſe, becauſe every verſe of a ſtanza begins with the ſame letter of the alphabet; ſo that it has 22 ſanzas, anſwering to the 22 letters of it. Thoſe, who deſire to ſee a more ſuccinct conſutation of this notion, may read our learned Mr. Bedford's treatiſe concerning the temple muſick, where he will find a ſhort, but full conſutation of Le Clerc's.

THE truth is, our ignorance of the true pronunciation of that ancient tongue, which, for aught appears, has been lost ever since the captivity, makes it morally impossible to determine any thing about it with any tolerable probability; because, without it, we never can be sensible of the length or shortness of the syllables, or of the harmony of words and verses, in which a great part of the poetick beauty consists. Had we indeed the same helps in this, as we have in the Greek and Latin tongues, we might perhaps have attained an equal knowledge of its quantity and metre, and of the construction and cadence of its verse; and tho' it is probable we might not have found it so elaborate and regular as that of the other two, yet should not we have fallen into that strange notion of so many learned moderns, that it was written without measure, form, or regularity. Surely one would think that Scaliger had never heard of any modern Hebrew poetry, how common soever it is, when he adds, that neither that tongue, nor the Syriack, nor the Arabick, were capable of such a constraint; for it is plain, even from those specimens which Buxtorf has given us out of some of the poetical rabbies, that it is as regular as any we have, either in Greek or Latin; and consequently, that the Hebrew is as capable of the strictest poetick rules as they, if we be once agreed in fixing the quantity of the syllables. We may add, that they have been so far from thinking metre and quantity too great a clog, that they have joined that of rhyme to it; which, whether it be an ornament or not, is nevertheless a confinement, tho' not so great in the Hebrew as it is in other tongues, for the reasons alledged a little before. Besides, it appears further, that the ancient Hebrew poetry was confined to some certain rules and restraints, tho' unknown to us, because, in many of those works, we find some letters retrenched, and others superadded, in order to lengthen or shorten the verses or the syllables, or to give a sweeter cadence to them.

ON the other hand, to hear some ancient authors, both Jews and Christians, such as Josephus and Philo, Origen, Eusebius, and St. Jerom, expatiate on this subject, one would be apt to think, that both the genuine pronunciation of the Hebrew, and all the rules of that poetry, had been preserved to their time, they give us so succinct an account of every poetical piece of the old testament. Thus, according to them, the two songs of Moses were written in heroick verse: the Psalms were of a mixt sort, trimeters, pentameters, and others exameters. St. Jerom has ventured to be still more particular, and to tell us that the songs of Moses, the books of Isaiah, Job, and some others, were exameters and pentameters; that the Psalms were sapphick, iambick, and alcaick, after the manner of Horace and Pindar; that the Lamentations were of the sapphick kind; and, in his preface to the book of Job, he says, that, from the third verse of the third chapter, the verse is mostly exameter and pentameter, consisting of dactyls and spondees; tho' he adds, that it is here and there intermixed with some other foot or feet; and that some verses, tho' still more irregular, do yet preserve such a cadence and harmony as never fails of pleasing those who are judges of the rules of poetry. However, with respect to Moses's song in Deuteronomy, he seems either to have forgot, or to correct himself in another place, and says, that it was wrote in iambick verse of four feet. The same he says also of the 119th, and some other psalms; concerning which we own ourselves wholly in the dark. All therefore that we can say of him and of these learned ancients is, that they give us their bare word for what they say, for none of them has ventured so far as to give us any proof or example of it; so that the reader is at liberty to take it or not. But upon the whole, the greatest part of them, even those two solemn ones of Moses, were certainly of the lyrick kind, composed and set to musick, sung in an alternate manner, and accompanied with the sound of divers instruments, and with dances suitable to the musick, as we shall shew under the next head.

IN the mean time, tho' we willingly excuse ourselves from entering into the merit of the cause, whether or not the Hebrews were the first inventors of poetry; because * Vid. SCALIG. Animadv. in chron. Euseb. p. 7. EGUBIN. L. CAPEL MAR. MARTIN. VASMUTH. PFEIFER. GROT. in LUC. i. 46. CALM. Dissert. & al.    † Thesaur. ling. Sanc. ad fin.    ‡ Joseph. Ant. i. ii. c. ult. i. iv. c. ult. i. vii. c. 10. Phil. in vit. Mos. & lib. de vit. contemplat. ad fin. Orig. ap. c. xxx. præpar. i. xi. c. 2.    * Epist. ad Paulin. & præf. in chron. Euseb. vid. & comment. Ezech. Euseb.    † Vid. Epist. 135. ad Paul. Urbic.

- a because we cannot tell how much they might have brought of it out of Ægypt; yet we cannot forbear taking notice of the vanity of the Greeks, who attribute the lyric kind to Orpheus; whereas it is plain, that it was in its perfection among the Jews at the time of the Exod, from that excellent piece which Moses composed immediately after their passage through the Red Sea, which was upwards of 200 Years before Orpheus, since he is said to have gone a stripling to the Argonautick war; that is, at soonest, about Gideon's time<sup>r</sup>. We shall willingly allow them the invention of dramatick poetry; which consisting only in imitation, and being calculated to make instruction go down, for the sake of the diversion that it is interlarded with, suited their rough and unpolished genius, such as it
- b was at that time and since, much better than that of the Hebrews, who, for aught appears to the contrary, never admitted it among them. For though the author of Job and Solomon, in his Canticles, introduce divers speakers, yet it is plain, their design is rather to express their sentiments in a more lively and pathetick manner, than to represent any action such as commonly come into a dramatick piece. Whereas the lyric, which consists of musical hymns and odes, and is adapted to promote the glory and worship of God, was the most proper to inspire that people with a more than ordinary delight in it, was chiefly calculated for that end by its first Hebrew authors, and has continued in the greatest vogue and admiration amongst them ever since, inasmuch that it seems
- c to have been in some manner peculiar to them. Again, if Homer and Virgil are so justly admired for their judicious choice of such words and phrases, as carried a strong idea of the action in their very sound, those who have but the least knowledge of the Hebrew, and will but make some attention to this particular beauty, will easily feel it in almost every line (N); and yet without that air of affectation

<sup>r</sup> See USHER's Annals. SIR IS. NEWT. BEDFORD's Chronol. & al.

(N) We should be glad to give such of our readers, as are unacquainted with the Hebrew, some faint idea of this; but, unless they can forget for a moment their less masculine pronunciation, 'tis to be feared our labour will be lost. However, in hopes that it may excite a curiosity in those that do, to examine it more nearly in this view, we shall venture to subjoin the few instances following out of the Psalms.

Let the sea roar, and the fulness of it.

Jirham baion umelo-e. Pf. xcvi. 7.

Let the floods clap their hands.

Neharoth jimbhan caph. ib. ver. 8.

The Lord also thundered from heaven, and the most high gave his voice.

Vejarghem basamajim Elobim, uvelion giten col. xviii. 13.

The waters saw thee, O God, the waters saw thee; they trembled, and the depths quaked.

Rauka mayim Elobim, rauka mayim; jakbilu, apb yirghazu tebomoth. lxxvii. 16.

Mountains skipped like rams, vallies like young sheep.

Hebarim rakkedcu ke-elim, gebagboth kibne zan. cxiv. 4.

For God is high, and looks on the humble, the proud afar off he beholdeth.

Ki ram Elobim, shapbal yre geboagb mimerkbak yiedagb. cxxxviii. 6.

All the horns of the wicked will I break.

Col carne reshaghim agadeagb. lxxv. ult.

And now her carvings, at once, with axes and hammers do they break.

Vegbatta pettukhiab jakbad bacashill ukelapboth gabalomun. lxxiv. 6.

Chariot and horse are cast into a deep sleep.

Nirdam varrekeb vassus. lxxvi. 7.

And in my God I will knock down an ox.

Ubelohai adaleg shoer. xviii. 29.

The reader will easily judge of the rest by these few, the three last of which are well worth, at least, that so much admired one of Virgil, Procumbit bumi bos; or any other of that poet, or of Homer.

But not to dwell longer on this elegance, it will suffice to say upon the whole, that whoever makes any tolerable attention to the beautiful choice of words, where-ever the subject is of the same nature with the instances given above, he will find them fall with a suitable force and rapidity, like the cataracts of the Nile; and where the subject is of a contrary nature, he will discover in them the most surprizing smoothness and harmony that can be imagined. But of this last it will be still more difficult to give our English readers any tolerable idea; because an unknown language, tho' it were the Italian, will always carry a distastful harshness to the ear, which nothing can overcome but a knowledge of at least the meaning of the words. We shall therefore content ourselves with giving them the two or three following instances:

Hearken my people to my law; incline their ears to the words of my mouth.

Haazina bami shorati battu ofnekem leimre phi.

a affectation and study, which visibly appears in those two poets, especially in the latter. We may here add, that if the most beautiful figures, and the strongest metaphors and allegories, be a sign of a poetick tongue, the Hebrew exceeds both the Greek, and all others that we know of, in this particular also.

Musick.

WHAT their musick was, with which they used to accompany and enliven their poetick performances, we know little of but from conjecture. We have indeed nothing left of it that can assure us that it was equal to their poetry; and yet if we judge of the excellency of the one, from that of the other, and if the most elegant and harmonious words and phrases, composed upon the sublimest subjects, could inspire a musical person with a suitable melody, it will be absurd to suppose their musick to have been otherwise than sweet, elegant, and beautifully varied, tho' attended with a noble gravity answerable to the grandeur of the subject and occasion. Musick and poetry are justly observed to be twin-sisters; they both spring from the same liberal faculty. To imagine therefore any such an inequality between them would be to suppose, that it requires greater talents to form a good musician than a good poet; which is a palpable absurdity. However, were we to judge of the latter by what some learned commentators have conjectured, concerning both it and the musical instruments of the Jews, one would rather think them antipodes. Indeed nothing can be more opposite, than the supposition of their having so exquisite an ear for poetry, and so dull a one for musick. For such we must suppose theirs to have been if we can persuade ourselves, that they admitted such dull and insipid instruments into their concerts (O); instruments which were only fit to grate the ear, and spread the harshest discord through the best compositions. b c

* See LE CLERC'S ESS. RHEINFELD, CALMET & AL.

O that my people hearkened to me; that Israel would walk in my ways!

Lu hami shomagh ly, Israel bidrakai hallaku.

But my people would not hear my voice; Israel would not acquiesce in me:

Velo shamagh hami le coli, Israel le abba li.

How amiable are thy tabernacles, O God of Hosts!

Mah yaddidoh miskenotheka, Elohe nebanth.

My beloved is mine, and I am his; he feedeth among the lillies.

Doddi li vaani lo, barogheb bashofanim.

His eyes are like doves by the rivers of water:

Henaru heyonim bal apphike mayim.

These will suffice, to shew the vast disparity of sounds in those two subjects, which is all that we could pretend to. Those who understand the original will easily feel it in almost every line of the sacred poets; as for those who are unacquainted with it, even the Canticles of Solomon, the softest and most harmonious piece, for aught we know, extant in any language, would lose the greatest part of the last beauty we have been speaking of.

(O) Thus Le Clerc has taken some pains to prove, that the תלצל talzele, which our version after the septuagint renders cymbals, were only a couple of hollow demi-globes of brass or some other tinkling metal, and about six inches in diameter, which they used to shake one against another, like a pair of castanets †; because we find some such instruments to have been in use among the ancients, and because the root talzal doth often signify to tinkle. Etymologies are at best very uncertain, and very often ridiculous. Might we not justly laugh at a foreigner, who should pretend to give such an awkward description of a bas-viol, as he found them under those two words in his lexicon? We own that such tinkling instruments were used among the ancients; but the distinction which the psalmist makes of talzele shamagh and talzele terugbah (22), and the other instruments which he joins with them, do at least imply something more musical, warlike, and masculine, if not more melodious, than two such demi-globes.

The same may be said of the בגב bagab, which we translate the organ, and which is thought by our moderns to have been no more than a row of six or eight pipes, of different lengths and notes, and which was played by passing them successively under the upper lip (23). According to this description it must have been incapable of any regular harmony; tho' in its etymon it signify a lovely instrument, from בגב bagab, to love, or delight in, to doat upon. But not to insist upon the name, it is plain this instrument was known before the flood (24), and it is scarcely credible it should have received so small an improvement in all that long interval, and in a nation where poetry and musick had been so highly cultivated.

The שליש shalishim, one of the instruments with which the women came to meet Saul (25), and which the septuagint translate cymbals, St. Jerome, fifra, and our version, instruments of musick; is supposed to have been of a triangular figure, like the  $\Delta$ , through which were strung a parcel of rings, so that the instrument being struck with a stick, or shaken by the hand, made the rings strike both against it and one another, and caused a most inharmonious jarring. But if it must needs be supposed to have been triangular, because the word שליש implies the number three (tho' it might as reasonably be supposed to mean an instrument of three strings, and a very musical one too) we see no reason why its triangular form might not be designed

† See his Essay on Heb. poetry in Bibliot. Univers. Tom. ix. ad fin. & alib. (22) Psal. cl. 5. (23) Ib. ver. 4. (24) Gen. iv. 21. (25) 1 Sam. xviii. 6.

- a positions. It appears, on the contrary, that those instruments which were most in vogue amongst them were really musical and harmonious. We read of eight and ten-stringed instruments; of the nebel and kinor, which we conjecture to be like the lute and harp, and from which the Greeks had their naba and cinyra. They had likewise several kinds of wind instruments, such as the trumpet, flute, and what several ancient and modern versions call the organ, whatever resemblance it might have to ours. To these they joined the drum; and perhaps the kettle-drums (which we take to be the instrument spoken of in the last note) especially when their musick was accompanied with dances, as it generally was; and these, if artfully touch'd, could not but give a wonderful cadence to them.
- b BUT if we may judge of the excellence of the Hebrew musick from its wonderful effects, such as we find it had upon Saul in his most melancholy and distracted moods<sup>a</sup>, and in calming the souls of the prophets, and fitting them for divine inspiration<sup>b</sup>, which is no more than the Greeks tell us of their own, and which can hardly be denied without giving the lye to a cloud of ancient authors; we shall be forced to own, that it was vastly more moving than any thing we have now. And indeed what wonder is it that it should have attained to such perfection, if we consider the great distance of time between its first author Jubal<sup>c</sup>, and Moses? and that, from the latter's time downwards, it was in constant use, both in their worship, in their religious and civil festivals, in their publick and private rejoycings, and even in their mournings; witness that which David composed on the death of Saul and Jonathab<sup>d</sup>, and the lamentations of Jeremy at the death of king Josiah. But what improvement it may have received from David's time may be easily guessed, if we consider the great encouragement which that monarch gave it: he was a good musician, as well as an excellent poet; and how much a prince's inclination contributes to the advancement of any art, is obvious to every one. What progress then may we not suppose was made to it, by those 4000 Levites, whom he wholly devoted to that province, under the tuition of 288 excellent masters, with Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun at their head<sup>e</sup>? The law had already provided for their maintenance another way; and the addition which
- c their merit could procure, joined to the natural desire of excelling, was spur sufficient for men who have nothing to take them off from it, to bestow their whole time and application upon so delightful and so profitable an art. Besides these, who assisted constantly by turns at the altar of burnt-offering, but in much greater number at all solemn festivals; we read likewise of women who applied themselves to musick both vocal and instrumental: such were Heman's three daughters<sup>f</sup>, and those which are mentioned by the psalmist<sup>g</sup>. Their kings had also their own musicians of both sexes<sup>h</sup>. Some of the Psalms, especially the 20th, 21st, and 72d, are supposed to have been composed, in order to be sung on the day of designed to contain a sett of strings one longer than another, in order to be played upon, either with sticks, as our old dulcimers, or with the fingers, like the harp. As for the account which the Jewish writers give of these, and several other musical instruments mentioned in holy writ, it is still more pitiful. But this is not so much to be wondered at; their musical, as well as their poetick genius, has left them long ago; but if those, who are judges of either, can suppose such a vast disparity between them to be possible, and that the dulcist and most musical instruments were used to enliven the harmony of the most sublime poetry, we freely own we cannot join with them; and that tho' it be never so impossible to come at any notion of the nature and symmetry of those instruments, yet we cannot forbear thinking, that they must have been vastly more suitable to it, than any of those which our most diligent searchers have yet been able to discover.

<sup>a</sup> 1 Sam. xvi. 23. vid. & xix. 23. & seq. <sup>b</sup> 2 Kings iii. 15. <sup>c</sup> Gen. iv. 21. <sup>d</sup> 2 Sam. i. 17. & seq. <sup>e</sup> 1 Chron. xxiii. 5. xxv. 7. & seq. <sup>f</sup> Ibid. ver. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> Ps. lxxviii. 25. <sup>h</sup> 1 Chron. xxv. 2. 2 Sam. xix. 35. Eccles. ii. 8.

It would be lost labour to go about giving a further account of all the various kinds of musical instruments mentioned in holy writ, which the Jewish rabbies reckon to the number of 34, by taking the titles of several psalms, such as Mizmor, Sigaiou, Scheminitb, &c. for particular instruments on which these psalms were to be played. But, setting even these aside, there will be still at least twenty different sorts left, which we shall, however, forbear mentioning, because we know so little of them, and have so little reason to be satisfied with the conjectures of commentators about them. All that we shall say further is, that they were of three kinds, namely, 1. wind-instruments, such as the several sorts of flutes, trumpets, and the organ; 2. stringed instruments, of this kind were the harp, lute, instruments of three, eight, or ten strings; and 3. such as were beat either by the hand, or with a stick, as the tabor, drum, kettle-drums, and such like. To go further, upon the subject, would be venturing in the dark. The reader may, if he pleases, see a fuller account of them in Calmer's dissertation, quoted in the next page.

of their inauguration. The 45th, and the Canticles, are reckoned a kind of epithalamium proper for a wedding-day. We have seen likewise that they had proper psalms and hymns, not only at the temple, for every great festival, and other publick occasions, but also at their private feasts, such as weddings, circumcisions, and the like. In a word, no nation seems to have been sonder of musick than the Jews; insomuch, that tho' the Babylonish captivity had made them hang their harps on the willows; yet at their return we find they brought back a troop of 200 musicians of both sexes<sup>1</sup>.

From all this the reader may easily judge, whether it be credible, that an art of so long standing, so much admired, encouraged, so universally practised, and capable to cause such wonderful effects, could be so rude and plain, as to consist only in the variety of voices and instruments, playing all to the same notes, without any combination of even bass and treble, much less of the other parts, which make up the soul of musick<sup>2</sup>; and that chance, at least, should not have led them to observe the harmony of some, as well as the harshness of other compound notes, so as to point out this improvement to them, in so long a time, and among such variety of voices and instruments. For our part, we think it as difficult to imagine, as it is to account for the surprising effects we read of it, from bare simple tunes, how fine and melodious soever. One thing seems more than probable from the style of several of the psalms, and the frequent transition from the first to the third person; that it was performed alternately, one part of the chorus answering to the other at proper itanzas and divisions, not unlike the choirs of our cathedrals<sup>3</sup>. What other improvements they might have made to this art, which we are wholly ignorant of, is not so easy to guess at, as how and when they might be lost.

It is indeed generally objected, that the roughness of the Hebrew, its abounding with consonants, gutturals, and monosyllables, makes it so unfit for musick, that it would be even madness to attempt it. Were this indeed really fact, it would at once explode all that we have said on the other side; but we hope we have already sufficiently shewn the contrary, in those few instances we have given in the former note. We may even venture to affirm, that some pieces of Hebrew, which we have set to suitable musick, would easily convince any impartial judge, that this objection is wholly imaginary, and springs partly from the want of due attention on that neglected tongue, and partly from our present unaccountable fondness for the modern Italick taste; rather than from any inharmonious roughness in the Hebrew numbers. It is even certain, from the excellent compositions which have been made in our own native English, tho' in most respects (gutturals excepted, which, by the way, are far from unmusical) the most like the Hebrew of any modern language, that the perfection of musick doth not consist in that smooth sinking softness we are now so taken with. We are well satisfied, on the contrary, that many of us, who fondly imagine that our age hath raised musick to its zenith, would be strangely surprised to find, by comparing its most admired performances with those of two, three, or more centuries past, some of its noblest beauties and excellencies quite lost, not to be recovered again to the world, till it has recovered its genuine taste, that is, perhaps, not till we have a new heaven and a new earth (P).

THIS is certainly true, at least with respect to divine musick, (how much soever it may be thought to have been improved by art). And it were as absurd to expect that a master should set to proper musick a piece that is calculated to inspire us with mirth or seriousness, whilst himself is in a quite opposite mood, as that he should compose, for instance, a Te Deum which shall inspire its hearers with the highest sense of gratitude to the divine goodness, unless he be in the same temper as the royal musician, when he said, My heart is ready, O God, I will sing and give praise<sup>4</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Ezr. iii. 65. <sup>2</sup> See CALMET Dissert. de Music. Heb. <sup>3</sup> BEDFORD'S Discourse on the same. <sup>4</sup> Ps. cxviii. 1.

(P) This reflection is not designed to affront the present age, but partly to excite some able judges to recover, if possible, vast numbers of inestimable pieces of this kind, and to revive the memory of their worthy authors, who now lie shamefully buried in oblivion; and partly to prevent the dangerous effects of the taste now in vogue: For if it be undeniable, that musick is capable either of softening the roughest tempers, or of inspiring the soft and debonnaire with more heroick and noble sentiments, according as it is skilfully managed by a good master; we need not say which of the two this age stands most in need of; and experience shews, that the hardest metals, as well as rough tempers, may be softened so long, and so much, as to become quite useless.

WHAT

a WHAT has been said of the Hebrew musick may be also supposed of their dances, namely, that those, that were of a religious nature, were generally more grave, solemn, and suitable both to the musick and words, and to the occasion than their other sorts; but whether confined to any rules as ours are, or rather directed only by custom and imitation; whether circular, as is generally supposed, or of any other form, we can only guess by those of other antient nations. But even this being all conjecture, and the subject not worth a further enquiry, we shall now pass to another, which is somewhat better known to us. As to the Hebrew poetry, musick, and dances, the reader may, if he pleases, consult the authors quoted in the margin.

b

Of the language, writing, and learning of the Jews.

THEIR tongue was the Hebrew, such as we have it in the writings of Moses Hebrew and other sacred authors. We have elsewhere given the most probable etymology of that name †, so that we are far from thinking that it was called so from Heber, in whose family alone it had been preserved in its purity, as the parent of all the rest, as some authors have imagined. What we have said formerly, both about the confusion of languages in general, and of the uncertainty of the Hebrew being the mother, much less the original tongue, doth sufficiently expose the fondness of such a notion. We shall not therefore repeat what has been said already *, but confine ourselves to what was there promised; namely, to give some further account of the genius, and of those particular excellencies of the Hebrew tongue, for which it is so generally supposed to have been the mother of all others. But, without engaging ourselves too far into the merit of the cause, we do willingly give up the conceit of some antient fathers † who, from the words of the psalmist ‡, when he (Israel) came out of Egypt and heard a language which he knew not, have imagined that to the many favours, which God shewed to that people at their deliverance out of Egypt, he added this one, of inspiring them with an immediate knowledge of the sacred tongue. As to what is farther urged in favour of it by some criticks, that we find in it the greatest number of the aptest etymologies and roots, both of men and things, the same has been also urged in favour of the Chaldee and Syriac, Arabic, Æthiopic, Armenian, and almost of every eastern tongue; yea, and we need not wonder much at it, since a modern author has even found this mother tongue in the Fleming (Q). But tho' we do allow the preference to the Hebrew in this respect, yet we have already proved etymologies to be too uncertain a foundation to build upon; if therefore this last has any advantage over the rest, with respect to its being the mother rather than a daughter to any of them, it must be upon the account of its simplicity, its pureness, energy, fecundity of meanings and expressions, notwithstanding its natural barrenness of words; over and above its great affinity to all these tongues, which it seems to excel in all these particulars. To this may also be added the significancy of the names both of men and brutes, the latter of which are generally allowed to express their nature and properties in this, more than in any other known tongue; not to insist on the antiquity and venerableness of its writings above all others; all which seem to speak much more in its favour than of any other. From all this we may reasonably conclude, that, if we could know it as well and as fully as it was in Moses's time, we might find still greater arguments on its side (R).

BUT as far as we understand, and are able to judge of it at this great distance, and from those few books we have left of it, this will be hardly contested, that its

* Vide MERCER. SKIKARD, MEIBOM, GOMAR, LE CLERC, CALMET, & al. † Vide sup. p. 421. (A). ‡ Vide Auct. sup. citat. sub lit. f. g. p. 152. * Vide sup. p. 149, & seq. P ORIGEN lib. 3. cont. Cels. GREGOR. NYSSEN. Orat. 12. cont. Eunom. Theodoret quest. 61. in Gen. & al. † Psal. lxxxii. 5.

(Q) This is what a Flemish antiquary has endeavoured to do (26) from a considerable number of etymologies of primitive names, as of Adam from Haas-dam, Eve from Ew-wat, Abel from Haas-belg, Cain from Quaat-ende, and many others, which are so forced and unapposite, that one would have rather took it as a burlesque upon etymologists, than for a serious piece, had he not taken such pains to tell his readers that he was in very good earnest.

(R) It must be owned, however, that several learned criticks have observed several defects in it, as we have it now in the sacred books, which plainly genius is pure, primitive, natural, and exactly conformable to the native simplicity of the Hebrew patriarchs; its words are concise yet expressive, derived from a small number of roots, yet without the studied composition of the Greek and Roman. It has the happiest and richest fecundity in its verbs of any tongue, either antient or modern, which arises from the variety and significancy of its conjugations, some of which do even imply a whole phrase, and cannot be well expressed in any other without paraphrasing. Thus, for instance, to love, to be loved, to love vehemently, to be loved vehemently, to be made to love, or to be loved, and to love oneself, are expressed by the same verb with a small variation, in some, only of the points, and in others, of one or at most two letters. Thus again, the change of conjugation doth make a verb express a contrary sense or action, as to bless and b curse, honour and dishonour, to root in, or cause to take root, and to root out utterly (S). Pronouns and prepositions are only single letters, put the former at the end, and the latter at the beginning of a word. The grammar is simple, easy, and natural. There is no difference in their nouns, but what is absolutely necessary to express gender and number, and their cases are distinguished by articles, which are only single letters at the beginning of the word. The same simplicity runs through all the moods and tenses of their verbs, and indeed throughout their syntax and concordance. Their words follow one another in an easy and natural order, without intricacy or transposition, without suspending or clogging the sense by long-winded periods, so that their style could not but be extremely free and clear whilst c it continued a living tongue; and, if in some cases it appears otherwise to us at this great distance, it is owing either to its frequent allusions to customs and things then universally understood, and since lost, or to our being in the dark about the true meaning of a great number of words and proper idioms, which we are forced to seek for in the Chaldee and Arabic, tho' often without success, and seldom with any tolerable certainty of having found the right one. Some of their manners of speaking there are likewise, which seem to us flat and uncouth, which will, upon due examination, appear not only the most natural and exact, but argue perhaps a clearer and more solid judgment in those that used them. Of this nature is their introducing persons, in their narrations, speaking their own words instead of d affecting to repeat them in their name; it is, for instance, the common style of the divine writers to express themselves thus, And God said to Abraham, I am thy shield and thy exceeding great reward, instead of God told Abraham that he was his shield. And Abraham said, O that Ishmael might live! instead of he entreated God for Ishmael's life. This, every one knows, is the constant language of all the writers of the old testament; but, whether or no it will be allowed to be the most natural and exact way of writing, it cannot be denied to be a certain mark of the plainly shew that, if it was the original tongue and the parent of the rest, it must have suffered many changes, such as the losing of a great number of its primitive roots and idioms, and adopting those of strange nations (27). Of this number are generally allowed all roots that have above three letters, besides very many scriptural words, whose roots are intirely lost. However, this is plain from the books we have still extant, that from Moses's time to the Babylonish captivity it has continued the same, without any visible improvement, or indeed without any change, either for the better or for the worse.

(26) GOROP. BECAN. Origin. Antwerp. lib. 5. pass.

(S) This excellency, so peculiar to this tongue above all others, is further displayed by Bellarmino, in his Hebrew grammar, to the following effect: Every verb (says he) doth imply either an action or passion, or neither, or both; the active verbs signify the action of a man either upon himself or upon another, and if the latter, it is caused either by himself, or by the means of a third. Here then the action of a man upon himself is found in the conjugation Hithpabel, which therefore admits of no passive to answer it; because, in this case, the same person is agent and patient. Pibel expresses the action of one thing upon another, to which answers the passive Pabal; if the action be caused by means of a third, you will find it in the conjugation Hipbal, to which answers the passive Hopbal. The neuter verbs are to be found in the conjugation Kal, which containing also sometimes verbs of active signification, that of Nipbal answers to them in a passive sense. Lastly, the common verbs are to be found in the conjugation Pobel.

Thus by these eight conjugations, or flexions of one and the same root, performed by the addition or change of a few points, or of a letter or two, is expressed all the variety of significations, into which it is possible for a verb to be branched out, and which can hardly be done even in any of its derivatives, much less in the Greek, Roman, &c. without circumlocution. To this we might add the simplicity of its primitive roots, consisting at most of three letters; of its composition, whether with respect to the pronouns joined with them, with their adverbs, prepositions, &c. and many other particulars; but all these are so well known to the learned, and so hard to be understood by the rest, that we shall bestow no more time about them.

(27) Vid. GROT. de verit. Rel. chr. not. 16, & seq. & 10 nm. in Gen. ix. HUET. demonstr. Evang. GENÈR. CLUVER. HORN. CAPEL. & al. mult.

- a the most antient simplicity, which we cannot say doth run with the like constancy and pureness through the Chaldee, much less in the Syriac, Arabick, and other antient tongues, so that upon all these accounts the Hebrew seems to bid fairest for being the parent of the rest. The Chaldee bears a great affinity to it, but seems to have been so emasculated, that we cannot but look upon it rather as a daughter than a mother to it. However, as nothing can be positively decided on either side, we shall only observe further, with respect to the Hebrew, that it is of all others the most concise, masculine, pathetick, and freest from lightness and bombast; upon which accounts a judicious author says of it, that it comes nearest to the language of spirits, who stand in no need of words to convey their minds to one another <sup>1</sup>.
- b It is indeed far otherwise with their way of writing, tho' we should allow it Character. equally easy and natural to write from the right to the left as they did, or from the left to the right as the Greeks, Romans, and Moderns do; for whether we take it to have been the same with the present character in which we have the sacred books, which yet is universally allowed now to have been the old Assyrian, and introduced only since the Babylonish captivity, or whether we take it to have been the old Samaritan, which has been preserved only in some few medals, and in the Samaritan pentateuch, which is now the most received opinion; sure it is that the former seems rather to have been contrived for beauty than expedition, whilst the last is the farthest from either, and is perhaps the most uncouth and unnatural, the most puzzling and unsightly that ever was invented; infomuch that it is scarcely credible that so judicious a person, as Moses was, would ever have made use of it, if he had known of any better being extant at that time. This the reader will best judge of by the alphabet following, by which he will see sufficient reason to justify Ezrab, and those who changed them for the more elegant and commodious Assyrian, if they did really so, and the Samaritan was really the old one.
- c

The HEBREW ALPHABET.

Samaritan.	Chaldee.	Names.	Power.	Numbers.	Final.
א	א	1 Aleph	Aspiration	1
ב	ב	2 Beth	B	2
ג	ג	3 Gimel	G	3
ד	ד	4 Daleth	D	4
ה	ה	5 He	H	5
ו	ו	6 Vau	V	6
ז	ז	7 Zain	Z	7
ח	ח	8 Cheth	Ch	8
ט	ט	9 Teth	Teth	9
י	י	10 Iod	I y	10
כ	כ	11 Capb	K	20	ך 500
ל	ל	12 Lamed	L	30
מ	מ	13 Mem	M	40	ם 600
נ	נ	14 Nun	N	50	ן 700
ס	ס	15 Samek	S	60
ע	ע	16 Ain	H gh ngb	70
פ	פ	17 Peb	P pb	80	ף 800
צ	צ	18 Tzade	T tz	90	ץ 900
ק	ק	19 Coph	K	100	ק 1000
ר	ר	20 Resb	R	200
ש	ש	21 Sbin	Sb f	300
ת	ת	22 Tau	T th	400

THAT this is the exact number and order of their letters is demonstrable from those acrostic pieces, both in the psalms and elsewhere, whose every half or whole verse, or every other verse, begins with one of these letters successively, as we mentioned it under the last article. It is likewise universally agreed, that the Samaritan letters are either the same, or very near so, with the old Phenician. This we have hinted already †, and it is far from improbable that the old Egyptian <sup>a</sup> was also very like it †, so that Moses, who was learned in all the wisdom of Egypt, might write his laws in that character. Sir Isaac Newton indeed thinks that he had it from the Midianites †; and we have, in more places than one of this history, concluded it highly probable, that not only they, but all their trading neighbours had the art of writing very early *, tho' it be not possible to determine whether each nation had a peculiar one of their own, or the same in common to them all, much less to ascribe the invention of it to its true author (T).

WE

<sup>1</sup> Fleury Mœurs des Israelites, ch. 20.

HOWEVER, tho' it be now the most received opinion that the Samaritan was the antient Hebrew character, yet it has been strenuously opposed by several learned men †. The Talmudists not only suppose the contrary all along, but have declared <sup>b</sup> themselves for the Chaldee characters even in that place, where they have been quoted for the opposite opinion † (V), and there seems to have ran an universal consent to them through all their successors ever since (W). Among those of the Christians, † Vid. sup. p. 404. c. mult. Chronol. p. 210. POSTEL. BUXTORF jun. & al.

* Vid. PLUTARCH lib. de dæmon. SOCRAT. KIRCHER. VOSS. CAPEL. & al. Vid. sup. p. 300. b. 325. a. & alib. HOTTING. cont. MORIN. Traët. Sanhedr. ap. Walt. prolegom.

(T) Were the Sabeans to be relied upon, we should not be long to seek for the first inventor of writing and letters, since they produce a book which they pretend to have been written by Adam, the character of which, tho' different from all others (28), might have given the hint to those alphabets that have since been used. But as their authority weighs but little in this point, others have attributed it to Seeth, upon the authority of Josephus, who tells us, that he caused his astronomical discoveries to be engraven upon two pillars, designed to continue proof, one against the flood, and the other against the conflagration (29). Others to Enoch, because St. Jude quotes a prophecy of his (30), which they think must have been handed down in writing, tho' much more probably by tradition. Others again to Noah and to Abraham †, but the far greatest part of both Jews and Christians, ancient and modern, to Moses, whom very many think to be the same with the Egyptian Thoth or Hermes, mentioned in the history of that nation (31). Among these last, some believe that the first writing was that upon the two tables, and that consequently, God did first shew it unto Moses, who taught it to Aaron, Joshua, and the 70 elders. Most of the Jews are of the same opinion, and some of them add, that there was an alphabet engraven also upon the tables, along the margin, in order to teach him and his people the way of reading the decalogue. But the reverse of all this seems implied in the account which that law-giver gives us of his receiving those tables; he says, indeed, that they were written by the finger, or, as we formerly shewed †, by the order and direction of God; but he hints nothing like his being taught to read them, or his instructing others in it, much less that such a way of writing was taught him by God himself, and till then unknown to the world; which circumstance he can hardly be supposed to have omitted, had that been the case. But we have elsewhere shewed, that this art was, in all probability, of much older date among the Phœnician, and other trading nations, than the decalogue, so that we can by no means fall in with this notion; tho' we know of nothing recorded of greater antiquity than that.

(V) We have had occasion to hint this formerly (32), and the miraculous power by which they affirm the middle of the Q and Q to have been supported, doth plainly shew that they did not mean the Samaritan, but Chaldee; because, in the former, the Mem hath nothing in its figure that required such a supernatural support. As to the passage quoted out of the Talmud by Walton, and those that have followed him, in favour of the Samaritan against the Chaldee, or, as that place calls it, the Affyrian letters, if those authors had but had the patience to have read a little further, they would have found several answers to it, which, tho' neither definitive nor satisfactory, yet plainly shew that the compilers were of a quite contrary opinion. We shall not trouble the reader with the whole passage, but only subjoin the most material things they answer in favour of the Chaldee; the first of which is to this purpose, We have still our columns and our vau, intimating thereby the likeness of the Y to a column with its chapter, such as its name implies in the Hebrew, whereas the Samaritan vau has nothing in its figure that bears the least resemblance to it. The next answer is, that it is said in the book of Ezra (33), that Mordecai wrote unto all the nations, according to their writing and language, and to the Jews also, according to their language and writing; which last, it is there urged, would have been needless, if the present Hebrew had been the old Affyrian character, and the Jews had already adopted it, instead of the old Samaritan, or any other. To this is subjoined a further question, or objection, Why then are those characters called אֲשֵׁרִים Ashrim? to which the answer given is; From the Ashrim or Beatitudes contained in it, meaning, in the sacred books written in that character.

We beg leave to observe here, that we are not vindicating the answers of the Talmudists, which must stand or fall according to their worth; but only shew how lightly they have been quoted on that side the question, which they have most plainly declared themselves against.

(W) They even tell us at the very threshold of their grammar, that the names of several of the letters, which, they would have us believe, are of almost equal antiquity with them, were given them from their figure, as that of others from their sound. Thus Q the second letter, was called Betb, from its far off resemblance to a house, and the Q Gimel, from a much nearer one to a camel, the Y Daleth to a door, the Y Vau to a column, S Lamed to a spit,

(28) HERBELOT. Bibliot. Orient. p. 726. (29) Ant. l. 1. c. 3. (30) Epist. Jud. corr. 14. † Vide sup. p. 435. (Q). (31) Ita Rabbin. fer om. ARTAPHAN. EUPOLEM. Vide sup. p. 222. c. vid. Et ARTAPH. Et EUPOLEM. ap EUSEB. præp. lib ix. c. 17, 18. Rabbin. fer om. LUD. VIVES comm. in St. August. de civit. Dei. lib. 18. c. 29. GROT. not. in verit. Rel. Chr. HUET. demonst. Evang. GALL. Court of the Gentil. p. 36. & al. innumer. * Vide sup. p. 519. (A) sub fin. (32) Ibid. (33) Ezra. viii. 9.

- a Christians, who have declared themselves on that side, there has been one * who has taken an unspeakable deal of pains, to prove the Chaldee character to be the genuine alphabet of nature, because no letter can be rightly founded, without disposing the organs of speech into an uniform position, with the figure of that letter X. This he has endeavoured to display in 33 copper plates, 22 of which shew the pronunciation of the letters, and the rest that of the point vowels; from which he infers at the same time, that the Samaritan, bearing no kind of similitude to such a position of the organs, could not be the ancient Hebrew.

- THE misfortune is, that all his fine reasoning, and what ever else is urged by others on that side of the question, is entirely overthrown by one fact produced b for the other side, namely, that of the old Jewish shekel here annexed, which is

- inscribed on the one side, THE SHEKEL OF ISRAEL; and on the reverse, JERUSALEM THE HOLY; not only in this Samaritan character, but, as there is some reason to suppose, in the Jerusalaimic dialect. We shall refer the further particulars of this coin and its inscriptions to the next note; and only observe here, that, by the name of Israel in the first, could not be meant the ten revolted tribes, because they had nothing to do with Jerusalem the holy, which is on the reverse. There are also some pregnant proofs that it could not belong to the Samaritans after the captivity; one of which among the rest is, that their hatred against the Jews was grown to such a height by that time, that they would have suffered any thing, rather than be forced to stamp such an inscription spit, and so on; whereas no such resemblance is to be found in the Samaritan alphabet; but they are wanting in the main proof, namely, the antiquity of those names, for want of which their conclusion falls to the ground. For the same argument might as well be urged in favour of the points Pattab, Kamets, Zere, Kibbuts, &c. which are now universally allowed to be of modern invention, as we shall see anon; for tho' these names bear no resemblance to the figure of those points, yet they were invented, in all likelihood, to express the manner in which they ought to be pronounced; as for instance, the Pattab, or A, with an open mouth, and the Kibbuts, or U, with the lips closely gathered. In like manner, it is probable, they made choice at first of such names as could best imprint the shape of the letter on the memory, by the likeness it did bear to the thing by which they were called, as the Gimel to a Camel, by reason of the bunch on its back, the Yin to an Eye, the Shin to a Tooth; and this might as probably have been done, when they began to teach this Chaldee character to those who had been used to the old Samaritan, for their easier attainment of it; but, where the letter bore no likeness to any thing that carried the sound of it, they gave it a name that did, as Mem, Nun, &c.

* F. M. B. Van HELMONT Alphabet. Natur.

upon their coins. The reader may see the whole argument at length, in the authors <sup>a</sup> quoted in the margin *; from which the Samaritan character is proved to have been the antient Hebrew, and not that which has been, and is still used by the Jews and Christians under that name (X).

THESE characters, notwithstanding their great affinity to the old Phœnician, if they be not indeed the same with them, and the vast progress of this latter all over the world, would have been entirely lost, had it not been preserved to us in the Samaritan pentateuch; by the help of which, we have been able to decypher both the inscription of these shekels, which have given so great a light to this controversy, and of some other Phœnician medals, of no less use in other parts of antient history. But tho' we have had no copies of that book till within these 200 years (Y), and <sup>b</sup> consequently no knowledge of those shekels till some time after, we must not think the Samaritan pentateuch had been unknown till then, or that the Chaldees had passed till then for the original Hebrew character. On the contrary, we find the former often mentioned by some of the fathers and other antient authors', the greatest part of whom (especially of the fathers) were of opinion, that the Jews exchanged their * MORIN, SIMON, CALMET, WHISTON, & al. † Vid. ORIG. Hexapl. HEBRON. in Ezek. & alib. EUSEB. CÆSAR. TARSEN. CYRIL. ALEX. PROCOF. SYNCHELL. & al.

(X) Some of these shekels were in the possession of Maimonides and Rabbi Azarias among the Jews, and of Marinus, Montanus, Villalpandus, and others, among the Christians. The mark on the one side is suppos'd to have been Aaron's miraculous rod budding forth almonds, and on the other, the pot of manna. The letters over this last, not being plain enough, are variously conjectured to stand for the name of God, of Israel, David, Jerusalem, and the like; as for the inscriptions round those two sides, bating a small variation of the character and spelling between those extant coins, they plainly answer to these in the modern Hebrew, on the one side שְׁקֶל יִשְׂרָאֵל Shekel Israel; and on the reverse יְרוּשָׁלַם הַקְּדוֹשָׁה or Jerusalaim Hakadoshab Jerusalem the Holy *.

Thus then the argument in favour of the Samaritan characters seems to amount to a demonstration. We can see but two things that can be objected against it with any colour of reason; the first is, that considering the notorious cheats which have been imposed upon the world, with respect to coins and medals, we should be well assured of the genuineness of these, before we venture to decide in so weighty a point. The next is, that allowing them to be genuine, and to have been coined before the revolt of the ten tribes, which is more than probable from what we observed above of one side's being inscribed the Shekel of Israel, yet they may as likely have been the tribute money which either the Samaritans or some of the Canaanitish nations paid either to David, Solomon, or to some of his successors. What gives this latter a greater face of probability is, the difference of character and spelling between those coins, and which cannot be so well accounted for, if we suppose them to have belonged to a single people, especially that of Israel. But if the several nations of Canaan, for instance, were obliged to stamp these inscriptions on their tribute money, in token of their subjection to the Hebrews, we shall not be to seek for the reason of this difference. Now such an exaction is so far from improbable, that we find it has been practised afterwards by several conquerors upon the people they subdued; and we shall shew, in the sequel of this work, that some nations have even chosen to sacrifice their lives, rather than to comply with this one single mark of subjection. We pretend not to determine on either side, but if we may be permitted to speak our thoughts concerning the Samaritan and Phœnician characters; it is plain that as they were never calculated for ease and expedition, such as one might reasonably expect among those trading nations, but rather to conceal learning from the vulgar, as the Egyptians affected to do †; so if Moses chose to write his laws in them, preferably to any other, that might then be in use, one can scarce suppose any other reason for it, than that of preserving an awful regard to them.

This might be the reason of his ordaining the lecture of them to be made by the priests to the people, and of his commanding the parents to transmit the main ones to their children by word of mouth; and lastly, this may be the reason why the learned among the antient Jews are called סופרים Sopherim, that is, Scribes, according to the generality of versions, or, according to the more literal sense of the word, men that could read or write books.

(Y) Archbishop Usher is the first person, to whom we are beholden for the first copies that ever were brought into Europe; the frequent mention, which he met with of it in the last quoted author, would not suffer him to be at rest, as he expresses himself (34), till he had procured five or six of them from Syria and Palestine, and had carefully examined them. What his observations, and those of other learned men are concerning that book, is foreign to our purpose, the reader may consult the authors quoted in the margin about it (35). With respect to the character itself, we shall not pretend to decide whether the Phœnicians had it from the Hebrews, or these from them; sure it is, indeed, that Moses is the oldest writer we know of, but whoever considers the vast interval between the creation of the world, and the time in which he wrote; the great increase of mankind, their early commerce, arts, sciences, and the like, will hardly think the knowledge of letters to be so recent as that law-giver's writings. It will be more reasonable to divide the honour of that invention and its gradual improvements, among more nations, and perhaps more ages than one; for without all peradventure, had he known it to have been the invention of one man, especially of one of the patriarchs, he would not have failed recording him as well as the inventors of mulick, forging, and such like.

* Vid. int. al. WALTON. Supplem. in prolegom. de ponder. p. 36. & 38. † Vid. sup. p. 222. l. (34) Epist. ad Lud. Capel. (35) MORIN. dissert. HOTTING. cons. MORIN. F. SIMON Hist. Critic. u. t. Sentiments de quelq; Theolog. de Holland. Prideaux Connex. T. 2. l. 6.

- a their old Samaritan for that more beautiful Chaldee which is now in use with them, after their return from the Babylonish captivity, whilst the Samaritan chose to preserve the antient one. This opinion was likewise embraced by many modern critics, even before these Samaritan copies were brought into Europe, tho' by a far greater number since these additional testimonies have been brought to light. There has been however a third class, who have endeavoured to reconcile the difference, by affirming that the antient Jews had two sorts of characters, the sacred and the vulgar; the first of which they pretend was the Chaldee now in use, and the latter the Samaritan <sup>2</sup>: but, as they have given no reasonable proof for such a distinction, it has been justly rejected as chimerical; tho', if they had really had two such sorts
- b of characters, one would rather have supposed the Samaritan to have been the sacred, for the reasons mentioned in a former note.

- It has likewise been a famous dispute among the learned, whether the Hebrews used any vowel-letters, or whether the points, which are now called by that name, <sup>Their points or vowels.</sup> were substituted instead of them, and if the latter, whether they are as old as Moses, or invented by Ezra, or by the Masoretes. It is not our design to enter into that spacious field of controversy, which has exercised the wits of the most learned critics of the two last centuries, and is far from being, as yet, adjusted by those of the present. It will be sufficient, we hope, to acquaint our readers with the most received opinions upon those two heads, and to refer them, for further satisfaction, to those authors who have treated on those subjects ex professo. As to the first, it is now the general opinion that the Aleph, He, Vau, Iod, and Ain did serve instead of vowels, tho' they were sometimes omitted, or, as the grammarians term it, understood in their declensions and conjugations, and often varied in their sound, and had sometimes the power of consonants as our J and V; but for this we refer our readers to the grammars of that tongue. Sure it is that the Samaritans never admitted of any others, tho' they readily read their Hebrew pentateuch by the help of their Samaritan character. The same may be said of the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic, which last did not begin to use points till several centuries after Christ: nay, the Jews themselves never admitted them in their synagogues, no not even to this day. So that it is plain, notwithstanding the many objections that have been raised against it, that it may be, and is easily read without those points, which seem only invented for the greater ease of learners, and to preserve the true pronunciation of that tongue. All that needs be added, with respect to their letters, is, that in the sacred books, as we have them now, some words have one letter bigger than the rest, others less, some at the beginning, some in the middle, and some at the end of a word; some are suspended, or stand higher in the line, and others are turned upside down (Z). An unwary reader might be easily led to think that these differences happened since the invention of printing, because such mistakes are apt to happen frequently in printed books; but it is plain they have been taken
- c notice of, a great many centuries before that art was thought upon, and have been religiously conveyed down to us in the same form, both in the written volumes, such as they have always used in their synagogues, and in their printed books since the

<sup>2</sup> RR AZARIAH AB. de BARTENOR. POSTEL, BUXTORF, CONTING. SCHAMBAT, & al. quid.

(Z) There are thirty one places in the old testament, in which some one or other of the letters of the alphabet are of a larger size than the rest, as the א in אדם Adam, 1 Chron. i. 1. the ב in בראשית Bereishith, Gen. i. 1. the ו in וחתול vehith galab, he shall shave himself, Levit. xiii. 33. the ד in אדור Achad, Deut. vi. 4. and so of the rest. The minuscule, or letters of a lesser size, happen in thirty three places, as the א in ויקרא vajicra, Levit. i. 1. the ב in הב hab, give, Prov. xxx. 15. the כ in the word לבכתב libkotbab, Gen. xxiii. 2. where Abram is said to have come to weep for her (Sarab); and where they say the smallness of that letter is designed to express the moderation of his mourning, she being an old woman. Most of their reasons for the rest of those minuscule are much of the same stamp. The נ Nun is the only inverted letter, or turned upside down; it is observed to be so nine times, but the Jews, instead of inverting it in their printed books, do only note it in the margin, thus נ: הפוכה that is Nun inverted, which they think signifies some perversity, or retroaction, implied in the word, wherein it happeneth to be so. The same letter is suspended once in the word מנשה Menasseh, Judg. xviii. 30. where, in some printed books it is only marked in the margin נ תלויה Nun suspended. The י Ain is suspended three times, once in Pf. lxxx. 13. in the word יער jabar, forest, and twice in Jab.

We hope it will suffice to have just hinted these Masoretic observations, which are not worth dwelling longer upon, unless we could be satisfied both about the antiquity and design of these variations; which, for aught we know, may be owing to change; and, if they were done with a design, yet would puzzle an OEdipus to find it out.

the discovery of that art, as having been designedly so written by their inspired a pen-men, either to convey some extraordinary mystery, or to imply some excellence or commendation, if the letter be of the larger, or, if of the smaller kind, some diminution and contempt of the thing signified by the word in which they are placed, or at least to raise either a greater degree of attention to the subject, of which we have had occasion to give an instance under a former head †.

As to the numbers which we have set over against each letter, it must be observed, that they are those which the Jews have made use of time out of mind; but, as to the divine penmen, they never made any use of them for numerical letters, but always wrote the numbers in words at length; which we the more willingly take notice of, because some chronologers, in imitation of the cabbablistical Jews, have pretended to find out and settle dates, and rectify epochas; as the latter pretend to find out the weight and measure of things, by the help of these numerical letters *; and both Jews and some cabbalistical Christians, to find out mysteries in them. Thus it is pretended that the letter מ, which signifies either 1, or 1000, occurs six times in the first verse of Genesis, to denote that the world shall last just 6000 years in the condition it is now in, after which it is to be renewed. But all this is said without the least proof that they were used to any such purpose, either by the inspired writers, or even by the ancient Jews.

THE antiquity and authority of the points is the next thing in dispute; e Jews and Christians have been much divided, one part attributing them to Moses, and making them equally authentick with the text; and the other to Ezra, and the men of the great synagogue; till the famous Elias Levita, a learned German Jew, who flourished at Rome about the middle of the sixteenth century, did make it appear, that they had never been in use till after the finishing of the Talmud, that is, according to him, about 500 years after Christ. His book soon raised him a cloud of adversaries, both of his own nation and of Christians against him. Among the latter were the two Buxtorfs, who produced some cabbalistical books of great antiquity, at least boasted as such by the Jews, in which there was express mention of points (A). These were answered by Capellus and other criticks, till Morinus, having examined all that had been urged on both sides, wrote his learned dissertation on that subject, against which there has nothing been replied of any consequence; whereas his opinion has been universally applauded and confirmed by those that have come after. So that it plainly appears, that neither Origen, nor St. Jerom, nor even the compilers of the Talmud, which according to him was not finished till the seventh century, knew any thing of them; no, nor even any of the Jewish rabbies, that wrote during the eighth and ninth century. He adds, that the first footsteps he met with of them were in the writings of the rabbies, Aaron Ben-Alpher, chief of the western, and of Moses Ben-Naphtali, chief of the eastern school; that is, e about

† See before, p. 598. (H).
T. 6. l. 19. c. 8. 20. & seq.

* Ibid. 521. sub. fin. (C). Vid. & BASNAG. Hist. des Juifs, * ELI. LEVIT. præfat. 3. in Masorath Hammafor.

(A) These books are; the בהיר Babir, צוהר Zabar, and the כוזרי Kozri. The first of these is pretended to have been written a little before our Saviour's time; and the second, which quotes and refers to it, not much above a century after. As for the Kozri, the Jews, will have it to be about 1900 years old, and to have been an account of a conference between a learned Jew and the king of Chebreets, in which the latter was converted to Judaism †.

In these three books mention is made of points more than once or twice, and the latter has this expression about them; that they are the same to the letters, that cloaths are to modest woman, who dare not be seen without them. Were the boasted antiquity of these books unquestionable, there would be an end at once of the argument; but the Jews fidelity in such things is too well known to be relied upon. However, what shews the imposture of them is, that there are things in them which must have been written about 1000 years after their supposed date, and that none of those books have been quoted or mentioned during that time by any author. Other objections, urged by the Buxtorfs and others against the recentness of the points, the reader will find fully answered by Morinus, and the authors quoted after him above.

† De his vid. lib. Juchasin, p. 42. & seq. R. AZARIA, c. 19. BUXTORF, CAPEL, MORIN. BASNAG. & al.

- a about the middle of the tenth century. So that they can hardly be supposed older than the beginning of it <sup>b</sup> (B).

At the same time, these doctors set about inventing and fixing the grammatical points, the comma and full stop, to divide the periods and verses, which till that time had lain confused and undistinguished, not only in the sacred, but in all the other Hebrew books (C). This has been also a very useful work to the world, tho' few Christian interpreters have thought it necessary to confine themselves to their divisions. On the contrary, there is scarce a modern version that doth not very reasonably depart from them, when a clearer sense, a parallel place, or the analogy of faith can bear them out in it. And it is to be believed, that, if a

- b new version was now to be made of the Old Testament, it would alter the punctuation of the Massorites in a much greater number of places than the former have done (D). Notwithstanding which, it must be owned, that their labour in these two

<sup>b</sup> Vid. MORIN. Differt. Biblic. CAPEL. Arcan. Punctat. & Diatrib. VALTON. prolegom. DUPIN, VOSS. WASMUTH & al. mult.

(B) We shall venture, however, to subjoin a short specimen of those points for the sake of our English readers. They are reckoned fourteen in number ;

all of them, one or two excepted, placed under the letter, as follows :

Long points.		Semibriefs.		Quite brief.
Ⲛ Kamets	a	Ⲛ Pattach	a	Ⲛ Shewa	e
Ⲛ Tzere	e	Ⲛ Segol	e	Ⲛ Chateph-pattab	ā
Ⲛ Chirick	i gadol	Ⲛ Chirick	} i	Ⲛ Chateph-segol	e ī
Ⲛ Cholem	o	Ⲛ Caton		Ⲛ Chateph-cometz	ō
Ⲛ Shureek	u	Ⲛ Holem	o
		Ⲛ Kibbutz

It would be needless to dwell longer upon these, or to mention some differences among grammarians about them ; for tho' the Jews, even those who believe them to be the invention of the Massorites, look upon them to be of such authority, that nothing can be altered in them ; yet the generality of Christians reject such a superstitious fear, and make no difficulty of departing from them, whenever a better sense may be obtained by a change of them ; because it is plain, that their reading doth not exactly agree either with the septuagint version, nor with that of St. Jerom, nor with their targums, nor with the Chaldee paraphrase, the most ancient of all, nor with the interpretation of the ancient rabbies ; for which reason their punctuation has been as much suspected by some, as it has been cried up by others : So that, if we could suppose the points to have been as old as those ancient versions, we must likewise suppose, that their books were differently pointed from those of the Massorites. All that can therefore be said for these last is, that they have succeeded better in their punctuation than Christians could have done, because they had retained the true reading, at least for the most part, by constant tradition, which we should have had to seek for, by the bare help of those ancient versions and paraphrases, not without an immense deal of trouble. It is even plain, that they could not so much as agree among themselves about every particular word, tho' they did it in the main ; hence arose that difference of lection or punctuation, known by the critics by the names of Keri and Ketib.

This bring into our minds a story out of the Talmud, which, tho' not of any authority, serves to shew, that their reading was not fixed at that time. There David is introduced reproving his general for not utterly destroying the Amalikes, according to the command of God. Joab answers, that he had punctually done it, and rooted out the זכר Zakar, or the males, and David tells him, that he ought to have rooted out the זכר Zeker, the memory of Amalek : To which Joab replies, that he had been always taught to read it Zakar, and not Zeker. The reader must not, however, imagine, that these differences are considerable, or that they leave the sense of the scripture too undetermined. This is indeed objected by those who contend for the authenticity of the points ; but is fully answered by the authors on the opposite side. This is certain, that tho' the points are a vast help both to the learners of Hebrew, and for a more ready way of reading it, yet, when men have made any considerable progress in that tongue, they not only can read it with ease without them, but even chuse to do so (36).

(C) An eminent critick assures us (37), that he had examined above 2000 Hebrew manuscripts of all sorts, and that he never met with any pointed that were above 600 years old ; or, at least, if the books themselves were of older date, yet the points were manifestly added to them afterwards ; and this he affirms, equally of the grammatical and vowel points. And he was so sure that he had made all the necessary enquiry after them, that he defies all the advocates for the points, to produce one that could disprove his assertion ; which has never been done to this day, that we know of.

(D) This is not at all to be wondered at ; the Jews were too tenacious of their old traditions, and had too wrong a bias in every thing that related to the religion and reign of the Messiah, to have succeeded thoroughly in such an undertaking, if their intentions had been never so upright. But it is to be questioned, whether their fear of giving the Chr- istians

(36) Vid. Method of learning Hebrew without points. (37) Is. Voss. de LXXVII. interpret. translat. c. 30.

two respects, have proved very serviceable to the learned, and that they have made <sup>a</sup> the knowledge of the sacred books much easier and expeditious than it could have been without it. Their other productions, tho' equally laborious, are of a more trifling nature; they excogitated a great variety of other points, some rhetorical, some musical, and others critical; the former of which were designed to keep up the right cadence and chant of the Hebrew, and the latter to fix the sense of ambiguous places in their own way; all which grew as various, numerous, and intricate, as they were indeed useless, and in some cases ridiculous. From these they set themselves about numbering the verses, and even letters, and middle verses of every book; and to set down how often every letter of the alphabet occurs in each book (E). And as the design of all this labour was to prevent any <sup>b</sup> mistakes, additions, omissions, or alterations creeping into the text; so it plainly intimates, that they were conscious of its having done so before; and that, notwithstanding all their pretended care and scrupulous exactness in transcribing them, they had not been able altogether to avoid some such mischances.

THE materials they wrote upon, as well as the instrument they wrote with, may in some measure be gathered from some places of scripture. As to the former it is plain, that their first writing, namely the Decalogue, was upon tables of stone. But it is likely, that Moses made use of a less heavy and cumbersome material to write the rest of his laws upon, such as the Skittim, or some other hard wood.

This

stians any advantage, has not cramped them more than all the rest, and made them sit down satisfied with a pointing, which left the text dark and intricate, rather than to give a better, which might be afterwards used against them.

To give one instance for all: It is plain, that by making but two periods of the 2d, 3d, and 4th verses of the 110th psalm, which is confessed on all hands to be prophetic of the Messiah's reign, they have so far murdered the sense of it, that no version has been able to translate it, without some needless and unwarrantable suppletives; whereas, had they divided it into three verses, and placed the full stops where they ought to be, the sense would have been clear, easy, and exactly agreeable to the prophecy contained in it. But perhaps that is what they carefully avoided. The reason of it will appear by what follows. And, as no version has as yet rectified it, we shall take the liberty to subjoin the literal version of those three verses, according to their and our punctuation, that our readers may see which ought to be preferred.

According to the Massoretick.

2 The Lord shall send the rod of thy power out of Sion; be thou ruler in the midst of thine enemies.

3 Thy free-will people, in the day of thy power, in the beauty of holiness; from the womb of the morning is the dew of thy birth.

According to our punctuation.

2 The Lord shall send the rod of thy power out of Sion.

3 Rule thou, in the midst of thy enemies; thy free-will people in the day of thy power, in the beauty of holiness.

4 From the womb of the morning is the dew of thy birth.

In the first of these, the reader will see, that the placing the full point, after enemies, strikes off the next words, thy free-will people, from being either the accusative of the verb רדב redab, rule thou, going before, or from having any connexion with what comes after. So that those words stand so ungrammatically there by themselves, that, to make sense of the verse, most versions have been forced to make it the nominative of a verb which they have substituted to it of their own. Thus one of our versions, that, in our Common-Prayer-Book, words it thus; In the day of thy power shall the people offer free-will offerings, where the words shall offer are added to make up the sense, and the order inverted, by placing the words, in the day of thy power, before them, contrary to the Hebrew. That in our Bible is still wider from the original, tho' it substitutes less, as the reader may see by comparing it with ours here, which is exactly literal and plain. According, therefore, to this pointing, the verses in question may be fairly commented as follows.

2 The Lord shall send the rod, or scepter, of thy power out of Sion, that is, out of the tribe of Judah. Compare Gen. xlix. 10. and Pf. lxxviii. 68. 3 Rule thou over thy free-will people (for none but such are fit to be Christ's subjects; see Matth. xi. 29.) In the midst of thy enemies (Jews and Heathens, or, in a spiritual sense, the world, the flesh, and the devil.) In the day of thy power (that is, when all power shall be given him, both in heaven and earth, Matth. xxviii. 18.) In the beauties of holiness (which is the peculiar characteristic of Christ's reign, and of his religion.)

(E) Thus they observe, for instance, that Genesis contains 1534 verses, the middle of which is the 40th of the 27th chapter; and that the letter א Aleph occurs in that book 42,377 times; the ב Beth 38,218; and so of the rest of the letters, and of every canonical book. The number of all the letters in the whole stands thus, according to them:

Final letters, standing at the end of words 51,520

In the middle of words 160,734

Medial letters apart ——— 763,160

Total of medial and final ——— 975,414

Whether these niceties were an improvement upon the Mohammedans, who likewise compute the number of verses at the end of each section of their Koran, and sum up the total at the end of it; or whether these did it in imitation of the Jews, we will not affirm; the former, however, seems the more likely of the two, from what Morinus and others have observed (38), that the first Jewish grammars

(38) Morin. ub. sup. & al. quoq.

- <sup>a</sup> This way of writing upon tables was still in use, not only in Isaiab's days <sup>c</sup> (F), but even continued so till our Saviour's time <sup>d</sup>. But, besides these, we find frequent mention made in Job, the Psalms, and in the prophets, of their writing upon rolls <sup>e</sup>, which are reasonably supposed to have been made of skins, or of some pliable matter, fit to roll up or round, for so the original word imports (G). And we have the testimonies of Herodotus <sup>f</sup>, and Diodorus Siculus <sup>g</sup>, that the Ionians and Persians used the skins of sheep and goats to write upon, long enough before king Pergamus's time, who is rather therefore to be looked upon as an improver than the inventor of parchment <sup>h</sup>. These rolls differed in the size, according to the subject they contained, and the character in which it was written; so that some
- <sup>b</sup> of them had several skins sewed to one another lengthwise. The Jews retain them to this day in their synagogues. The lines were not continued through the whole length of the skin, much less of the roll, but were conveniently divided into columns. This is what is meant by what our version renders leaves, in that place of Jeremiab <sup>i</sup>, where the king cut the roll in pieces, after they had read three or four pages of it (H). Of this sort, we suppose, was also the book of the law, which the high-priest found in Josiah's time <sup>j</sup>.

Hence we conclude they used two sorts of instruments; the first of steel, or some hard metal, for engraving upon stone and wood; one side of which was sharp-pointed, and the other blunt and smooth, and served either to smooth or erase what had been written. Hence the Latin proverb, Invertere stylum. This kind of instrument we find mentioned in some places of scripture <sup>k</sup>, tho' not described, but guessed at, from those which were used by other nations. The other sort was for writing upon the skins of beasts; but how it was made, whether like our pens, pencils, or some other way, we cannot conjecture; only we read of a pen-knife, or, as the original has it, a scribe or writer's knife, with which king Jeboiakim cut the roll which was sent him by Jeremiab.

We do not find that they had any schools, or colleges, for the instruction of <sup>Education and Learning.</sup> their youth, if we except those of the prophets, which were of a different nature, as we shall shew by-and-by. They have not so much as a word to grammarians were Arabians, and wrote their grammars in that tongue, some time after the points had been added to it; from which he concludes it probable, that they took both their points and rules of grammar from the Arabians; and, if so, they might as well take their method of numbering the verses, and improve it by extending it to the letters, and those others niceties above-mentioned.

<sup>d</sup> express it (I): and, if we consider their manner of education and life, we shall

<sup>c</sup> Isai. xxx. 8. <sup>d</sup> Luke i. 63. <sup>e</sup> Job xxxi. 35, 36. Pf. xl. 7. Isai. viii. 1. Jerem. xxvi. 4. Ezek. ii. 9. iii. 1. & seq. Zechar. v. 2. <sup>f</sup> Lib. 5. <sup>g</sup> Lib. 2. <sup>h</sup> See Voss. orig. & lib. de gramm. cap. xxxviii. <sup>i</sup> Jerem. xxxvi. 23. <sup>j</sup> 2 Kings xxii. 8. <sup>k</sup> Job xix. 24. Pf. xlv. 2. & alib.

(F) The septuagint render this place, write it upon a box-table; which makes it probable, that that wood had been in use before their time. And the Talmud tells us, that the lots of the two goats, which were ordered to be brought to the high priest on the day of expiation (39), were at first written upon two small box-tables †.

(G) Meqilab comes from גלל Gallal, which signifies to roll up, as volumen from volvo; answerable to which, the evangelist (40) makes use of the words ᾠστῆς and ἀναρτυῆς, for the opening and shutting of the book.

(H) The word דלתות Daltot, which properly signifies doors; and here pages or columns, from their likeness to a door. A leaf of a book doth, indeed, bear the same resemblance, but cannot properly belong to such roll as we are speaking of.

(I) The Jews, however, to wipe off this imputation, have coined two names for their schools, of which there is no mention in the sacred books, namely, the בית מוסר Beth-Musar, which signifies the house of instruction, or an inferior school for reading and writing; and the בית מדרש Beth-Midrash, or house of enquiry or expounding, whither they went to be instructed in the weightier matters of religion, or rather in the rabbinick subtilties. But tho' it be visible, that these are of more recent date, namely, after the Babylonish captivity, yet they affirm the former to have been kept by the tribe of Simcon, and the latter by that of Levi; which they infer from Jacob's prophecy of the dispersion of those two tribes in Israel (41). So that, having no inheritance, they were obliged to keep school for a livelihood (42). Agreeably to this absurd notion, for it is plain that Simcon had a portion with the rest (43), they interpret the words of the psalmist, passing through the valley of Bacca, use it for a well; and the rain filleth the pool (44); of these wells of learning; and it was a common phrase with them, Master, we come to drink waters from thy well; instead of, We come to be thy scholars or disciples (45). And thus also the words in the next verse, they go from strength to strength; they understood, of raising from one class to the other. These are, according to them, the מועדי אל Moade El, houses of God; or, as our version more truly renders it, shall find no great use for them. They bred up their sons to bodily exercises, such as would best fit them either for war or husbandry; and their daughters to household occupations, without troubling themselves much about cultivating their minds, farther than to instruct them in the knowledge of their religion and laws; and this was the province of the parents, chiefly on the sabbath. They had rather an aversion, than curiosity for foreign languages; and he that could speak and write his own well, or at least as well as his neighbours, thought himself sufficiently learned; and, for these, custom served them instead of grammar. History, further than they found it in their sacred books, they thought beneath their care, because they found, in these, all that they esteemed worth knowing. The creation of the world, the flood, the origin and dispersion of nations, and, what concerned them most, their own history and descent from Abraham, their affinity to other branches of his posterity, the Egyptian bondage and deliverance, and, in a word, all that wonderful series of transactions which had happened to their nation; in all which God had shewed such peculiar regard to them, that it is no wonder if we find them so full of themselves, and so prone to despise all the rest of the world. Besides the Pentateuch, and the histories of Joshua, of their judges and kings, which they thought themselves obliged to be versed in, they had also several others which have been lost since; such as the book of the wars of the Lord, that of Jasher, and especially the book of the Kings, and the Chronicles of the kings of Judah and Israel, to which those we have extant continually refer (K): But these last were not perhaps so universally studied, but fell only to the lot of princes and politicians.

(39) Levit. xvi. 8. † Vide sup. p. 619. (V). (40) Luke iv. 17, 20. (41) Gen. xlix. 7. (42) Targ. Hierosol. Rab. RASCH. SAL. JARCH. Et al. in Gen. xlix. 7. (43) Vide Job. xix. 1. & sup. p. 462. (F). (44) Pf. lxxxiv. 6, 7. (45) Vide Gemar. tr. חגיגה fol. 3. & Midrash in Pf. lxxxiv. 8.

it, the synagogues, which the psalmist said were destroyed by the king of Babylon (46). So that, upon the whole, we have not any grounds from scripture for any such schools.

Much less for those antediluvian academies, of which some Christian moderns do make Adam the first founder, and which they pretend to have been continued by Seth, Enoch, Noah, Shem, Melchisedech, Abraham, and Jacob (47); the last of which, where it is said that he was a plain man, and dwelt in tents, the Chaldee paraphrast, and after him other Hebrew commentators, have rendered it, that he was a perfect man, and master of the Beth Mussar, or in plain English, an excellent school-master. Of Abraham we have seen heretofore, that he is affirmed by Josephus and others to have taught astronomy in Egypt*; and Melchisedech is likewise supposed, by the same authors, to have kept a famous school at Hebron, called from thence Kiriath-sepher, which may be properly rendered, the city of books or learning; and Debir, oracle. Some others think, that it flourished about 1456 years before Christ, that is, about Joshua's time; and that it had been founded by the Canaanites, and was the most ancient academy in the world; after whose model that famous one of the Edomites called Theman, and that of Tekoa, had been formed. Some add, that it had a publick library, in which were preserved the records, and history of the world, continued from the flood downwards†. All which is built, at the best, upon very uncertain conjectures.

(K) It cannot be reasonably supposed, that the Chronicles and the book of Kings do refer to one another, whenever we meet with these words at the end of every reign: The rest of the acts of — and so on, are they not written in the book of, &c. seeing the same facts are repeated all the way in both, with little or no variation or addition, and very often in the same words. The Greek version has indeed given the book of Chronicles the name of παράλειποντες, or things omitted, but with relation to historical facts, the reader will find but a small number in this, that are not in that of the Kings: It seems therefore to have been called so from its having given a full chronology of the scripture from Adam, and carried it beyond that of the Kings, as St. Jerom justly observes (48). To which may be added, that it sets forth the order of the genealogies, tribes, and families, the offices and courses of the priests and Levites, and many other particularities, which give a great light to the rest of the sacred writings, and without which it would be ridiculous for a man to pretend to understand them, as the same father elsewhere expresses it (49).

The books therefore, referred to in these, seem to be, either the records out of which they were taken by their compilers, or, which is indeed more probable, the annals and archives of every king's reign, to which the readers were sent for a farther account, whilst these, being written by inspired pen-men, were designed to contain only such transactions, as had an immediate relation to religion.

If it be asked who were the authors of those books, it is plain that the former were written by the historians or recorders of every reign, who were appointed to that office by the kings themselves. But who were the writers of the latter is not so easily agreed: For as on the one hand the historians mentioning every transaction, as done in their time, has induced many of the learned to suppose, that they were written at several times, and by several inspired pen-men cotemporary with them, such as Samuel, Gad, Nathan, Isaiab, Jeremias, and others; so, on the other side, the seeming uniformity of style, through all those books, makes that notion seem very improbable, and several expressions interspersed in them, impossible. Thus it is said, in the beginning of the book of Samuel, that the word of God was precious, or scarce, in those days (50); and that it was then the custom, to call a prophet a seer, and to inquire for

(46) Pf. lxxiv. 8. vid. middr. in loc.

*BASNAG. Es. al. * Vid. sup. p. 435. (Q).*

St. PHILIP. Monarch. Hebr. sub Orbanet.

(50) 1 Sam. iii. 1.

(47) Vid. BOULDUC. Eccles. ant. leg. SANDERS vindic. Bibl.

† MILDENDORF, DRIEDO, AR. MONTAN, MASIVS op.

(48) Epist. ad Damian.

(49) Id. ad Paulin.

- a ALL, that related to religion and morality, was contained in the Mosaic books, and interspersed in the others; but besides these they had the Psalms, the Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, besides many other writings of Solomon, a great part of which are likewise lost; to say nothing of Job and the Prophets. All these they were to be instructed in, even from their infancy, they heard them expounded on the sabbath, and other festivals, by the Prophets and Levites, and in them they found such a dreadful account of the theology of other nations, that we cannot suppose them to have had the least curiosity to know more of it. And indeed their law-giver knew but too well, how dangerous such knowledge would have been to a people so easy to be corrupted, and therefore wisely ordained, that their children should be
- b instructed only in such truths, as were proper to inspire them with an awful regard to God and his laws, and with the love of virtue; whilst he forbade them, almost upon all occasions, to be inquisitive after the religion and learning of other nations.

- THIS was most probably also the foundation of that extraordinary disregard they shewed for those useful arts and sciences, in which their neighbours had so long excelled. Arithmetick, being so necessary for the trading part, might indeed find some encouragement amongst them, and even this we offer more as a probable conjecture than from any testimony; but as for navigation, astronomy, and such like, we find nothing in their history, but what assures us of their unskilfulness in them. The maritime tribes contented themselves with receiving foreign merchants into their harbours, without endeavouring to carry on their commerce abroad; inasmuch that, when Solomon resolved to send some ships into foreign countries, he was forced to have them manned with foreign sailors. And as for astronomy, we need but call to mind what has been said under another head, of the poor shifts they were drove to, to find out their new moons *, to convince us of their profound ignorance of it. We shall only add, that they were so far from knowing any thing of eclipses, that they have not so much as one upon record, or indeed a name for it. They probably looked upon them as miraculous, and as tokens of the divine anger, and so never dived farther into the nature of them.
- d Perhaps also they were led into this notion, by that figurative expression in Job <sup>1</sup>, he covers the light with his hands, and sets, as it were, an interposer over it; for that is the literal sense of the original, and of the version of the septuagint: agreeable to which is that awful description of the day of the Lord in Joel <sup>2</sup>, and of the downfall of Egypt, and other nations, which we meet with in the Prophets.

- THE changing of the solar into the lunar year, and the compleat month of 30 days into the irregular moons of 29 and 30 days, mentioned under other heads; the distinguishing of the days of the week (not by the seven planets, of which they do not seem to have had any knowledge, or so much as names for; but to have ranked them, the two great luminaries excepted, among the fixed stars; but) by 1st, 2<sup>d</sup>, 3<sup>d</sup> day, or 1st and 2<sup>d</sup> from the sabbath; the division of the day and night not into 12 equal parts, as the Egyptians are thought to have done long before, but the day into four parts, and the night into four watches. These divisions of time, so very opposite to that more perfect one of the Egyptians and other neighbouring nations, seem entirely calculated by their law-giver, to prevent their applying themselves to the study of astronomy, and thence falling insensibly into that of

* Vid. p. 610. (H).

<sup>1</sup> Job xxxvi. 32.<sup>2</sup> Ch. ii. 10 & 31. iii. 15.

for him by that name (51). These, and several others in the same style, seem, at least, to intimate that it was otherwise when the books were written. Thus it is also said in another place of the same book, that, in the author's time, the name of Betbel, or house of God, was turned into that of Bethaven, or the house of wickedness; which did not happen till after Jeroboam's revolt (52). These, and many more which we omit, make it very probable that they were not written by cotemporary authors.

To reconcile these, it is generally believed that the original authors of them were those inspired persons above-mentioned, who committed them to writing as they happened; but that all those pieces were afterwards collected into a regular history either by Esra, Haggai, or some of these prophets, who return'd from the captivity; and who, being alike inspired, might make such further additions as they thought proper to illustrate their history: such as the change of names, customs, and the like, without derogating from their authority. Accordingly we find, that they have been still constantly acknowledged, by the Jews, to be of divine authority, and have been appealed to, as such, by the writers of the gospel (53).

(51) Ibid. ix. 9. (52) Ibid. xiii. 2, 5. (53) Vid. Matth. xii. 3. & al. Luke iv. 25. & seq. & alib. pass.

astrology; and being thereby insinuated into the worship of those heavenly bodies after the example of other nations (L). What instruments they had to reckon the time by, whether the Egyptian Clepsydra, or water-glasses, or sun-dials, or any other; we cannot affirm, except that we read of the sun-dial, or, as the original signifies, the stair-case, or flight of steps of Abaz *; but, allowing it to have been a real and regular sun-dial, it may easily be supposed to have been rather the work of some foreign astronomer, than a common thing among them; that prince's character sufficiently shews, that he was not over scrupulous of introducing new things of a much more dangerous nature, witness his new altar from Damascus †. Besides, as they divided the day into four parts, the two first of which were from the sun-rising to its meridian, and the two last from noon to its setting, it was not difficult for them to make out the other division by such observations, either on his career, or on the shadow of any trees, houses, or even of their own bodies, as every ploughman with us is able to do to a much greater justness. The same might be done in the division of the four night-watches from the motion of the stars. To seek for other sciences, or for schools or universities among them, were like seeking them among the Goths and Vandals; they not only had an equal contempt for them and for those nations that cultivated them, but looked upon them as dangerous and unlawful. Their zeal, or rather hatred against them, was so far from abating, after their return from Babylon, where they had seen them flourish, that it rather grew into a kind of fury, insomuch that their large chronick, intituled Juchasin, hath recorded a sentence of anathema, which passed in the time of Hircanus and Aristobulus, against such as should suffer their children to be instructed in any part of the Greek learning. Solomon indeed, we are told, was an excellent naturalist, and wrote a great deal upon that subject; but he was so far from recommending that study to others, that he calls his researches of that kind vanity and vexation of spirit; or, as the original imports, a feeding upon the wind ‡: which is probably the reason why, instead of following his example, they suffered all those excellent writings to be lost. Whilst they were thus averse to the learning of other nations, they were no less scrupulous of concealing their own from them, especially their sacred books; witness the grief they expressed when Ptolemy obtained a version of them into Greek, in memory of which they have kept a strict, even a double fast on the 8th and 9th days of the month Thevet, or December.

Synagogues.

ON the other hand, they were no less careful to cultivate the knowledge of them among themselves: we cannot indeed be sure that they had any synagogues before the captivity, tho' it be far from improbable, considering the great distance at which some of them lived from the temple, and that at best they were obliged to * 2 Kings xx. 9, & seq.

† Ibid. xvi. 10, & seq.

‡ Eccles. i. & seq. pass.

(L.) It is no difficult matter to conceive how those ancient nations came to worship the planets and heavenly bodies, after they had once imbibed the belief of their having so considerable a share in the government of all sublunary things, and had ascribed to every one their several influences, good or bad, and the particular periods in which they ruled by turns. But how this notion came first into their head, is not so easy to imagine; and yet that it must have began very early, and was universally received by all the heathen world, will plainly appear, if we consider how ancient the division of the day and night into 24 hours is; and that the consecrating every day of the week to one of the seven planets, not in the regular order in which they stand in their system, ♄, ♀, ☿, ☽, ☿, ☿, ☿, but by skipping two of them every new day, could not be owing to any thing but an opinion that every planet ruled alternately the several hours of each day.

Thus, on Saturday, Saturn, the planet of that day being supposed to govern the 1, 8, 15, and 22 hours, whilst Jupiter, the next in order, governed the 2, 9, 16, and 23. ♄ the 3, 10, 17, and 24, the Sun must of course govern the first hour of the next day, upon which account he became the planet of that day, and having ruled the 1, 8, 15, and 22, and Venus and Mercury the two remaining ones, brought in the Moon to be lady of the next, or of the Mondays; and so of the rest, according to the following diagram.

Thus then it is plain, that this planetary division of the week was of astrological extraction; and that that of the days into 24 parts was so likewise, tho' not equally demonstrable, can hardly be questioned, if we consider the great connection which these two have a to resort thither but thrice in a year; but other places they had for prayer and instruction, namely, the schools of the prophets, to which they might repair on Schools the sabbaths, new moons, and other festivals<sup>a</sup>. By prophets we mean not those strictly so called, men endowed with the spirit of prophecy (M), but their disciples, or, as the Hebrew idiom words it, the sons of the prophets. The former were generally consulted by the kings, priests, and elders of the people upon all extraordinary occasions, whether about religion or state affairs<sup>b</sup>; and the latter were brought up under them, and fitted for instructing the people in the way of virtue and the worship of God.

THESE had their habitations chiefly in the country, they lived in a kind of society Prophets. among themselves, and had generally one or more of the prophets to be heads over them, and to whom they gave the title of father<sup>c</sup>. Their houses were but mean, and of their own building<sup>d</sup>. Their food was chiefly pottage made of herbs<sup>e</sup>; unless when the people sent some better fare to them, such as bread, parched corn, honey, dried fruits, and the like<sup>f</sup>. Their dress was plain and coarse, and tied about with a leathern girdle<sup>g</sup>; their wants, being so few, were easily supplied by their own hands, and as their views reached no further, so they limited their labour to that, that they might bestow the more time in prayer, study, and retirement. Riches were no temptation to them in such a state, and therefore Elijah not only refused Naaman's presents, but punished Gehazi in a severe manner, for having clandestinely obtained a small portion of them<sup>h</sup>. This laborious, reclusive, and abstemious course of life, joined to the meanness of dress, gave them such a strange air, especially among the courtiers, that they looked upon them as no better than madmen<sup>i</sup>. Their extraordinary freedom, in reproving even princes for their wicked deeds, did likewise expose them frequently to persecutions, imprisonments, and sometimes to death; especially in the reigns of some wicked princes, such as were Abab and Manasseh; but, in the main, they were always respected by the better and wiser sort, even of the highest rank, and used with the utmost reverence and regard both in language and behaviour<sup>j</sup>.

THIS is all that we know, concerning those religious communities and their manner of life: those who have ventured to give us a further account of it, such as their living in perpetual celibacy, poverty, obedience, and the like, have spun it out of their own brain<sup>k</sup>. It is true that we do not read of any women living amongst have one to another, and that the reputed author of this last, the Egyptian Hermes, surnamed Trismegistus, and cotemporary with Moses, if not the same person with him, was a great astrologer, as it appears by some of his writings on that subject still extant under his name.

<sup>a</sup> Vide 2 Kings iv. 23. <sup>b</sup> Vide 1 Kings xxii. 5, 7. 2 Kings xix. 2, 20, & seq. Jerem. xxxvii. 3, & seq. Ezek. xiv. 1, & seq. & alib. <sup>c</sup> 1 Sam. ix. 5. 2 Kings vi. 1, & seq. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. ver. 2, 3, & 4. <sup>e</sup> Ibid. iv. 38, & seq. <sup>f</sup> 1 Kings xiv. 3, & seq. 2 Kings iv. 42, & alib. <sup>g</sup> Vide Zach. xiii. 4. 2 Kings i. 8. <sup>h</sup> 2 Kings v. pass. <sup>i</sup> Ibid. ii. 23. ix. 10. <sup>j</sup> 1 Kings xviii. 7, & seq. 2 Kings i. 13. xiii. 14, & alib. <sup>k</sup> Vid. int. al. BOULDUCE. Eccl. ant. leg. CALM. sub. voc. prophet.

Some authors do indeed tell us, that he took the hint of this division from the Egyptian Cunocephalus, which he observed, at the time of the equinox, to have puffed and howled 12 times from sun-rising to sun-set, and at equal distance, from which the Egyptians took also the hint of the Clepsydra, or water-hour-glasses, in memory of which, they used to place the image of that animal on the top of them (54). But as we cannot look upon the whole story to be authentick, so the most that can be made of it is, that that nation hath the fairest claim for being the inventors of this division; tho' whether they, or the Chaldeans were so, the Jews never admitted of it till after the captivity; for the first mention that we find of hours, properly so called, is in the apocryphal book of Judith; so that in all respects, their computation of time was different from the rest of the world. Even their very seasons are not called by the usual names of spring and autumn, but of seed-time and harvest, cold and heat, winter and summer (55).

(M) The word Prophet doth not always signify an inspired person, in the old testament, but often a preacher of righteousness, such as were all the patriarchs from Seth, or, in the sense of the gospel, such as believed and taught the coming of the Messiah (56); in which sense also, those that preached him and his doctrine, after his coming, are also called prophets, and their preaching prophecy (57). The same may be also said of those who sung the praises of God, or accompanied them with some musical instrument, as Miriam (58), the company of prophets that met Saul (59), and the sons of Asaph, of Heman and Jeduthun, who are said to have prophesied with harps, psalteries, and cymbals (60); tho' they were properly no other than musicians. The apostle gives the title of prophet even to the heathen poets (61); and hence comes that distinction in St. Austin, of Jewish, Christian, and Heathen prophets (62).

(54) TULL. ap. Victorin. cited by Macrob. lib. i. c. 21. Vide KERCH. Hieroglyph. & al. (55) Jud. Gen. viii. ver. ult. & alib. pass. vide & WHIST. Theory. (56) Luke i. 70. (57) Vide 1 Cor. xii. 4. xiv. 24, 29, & seq. & alib. (58) Exod. xv. 20. (59) 1 Sam. x. 5. (60) 1 Chron. xxv. 1. (61) Tit. i. 12. (62) Præfat. in lib. xix. cont. Faust.

amongst them, and that, when the Shunamite went to acquaint Elijab with the death of her son, he sent Gebasi to meet her, and that, when she would have fallen down at his master's feet, he offered to hinder her; but it is also certain, that several of the prophets were married, and had children, as Samuel, Isaiab, whose wife is called a prophetess<sup>d</sup>, Ezekiel<sup>e</sup>, and Hosea<sup>f</sup>, and it was the widow of one of the sons of the prophets, whose oyl Elijab did miraculously multiply, to save her sons from being sold to the creditors of the deceased<sup>g</sup>. The prophetesses were likewise married, Deborah was the wife of Lapidoth<sup>h</sup>, and Huldab, whom king Josiah sent to consult, was the wife of Shallum, and she is observed (in the text) to have lived in the college of Jerusalem<sup>i</sup>. These inspired persons, whilst they continued in Israel, which was till the return from Babylon, being the surest expounders of the Mosaic law, proved such a strong fence against schism and heresy (that political one of Jeroboam excepted, against which they waged a continual war) that it could never get footing amongst them (N); whereas prophecy no sooner ceased, than they split themselves into such a great variety of sects, and gave such a scope to their fertile fancies, that, the Talmudists own, Elias himself would be at a loss to solve the subtle difficulties which they have raised against each other<sup>k</sup>.

THESE prophets, the Talmudists reckon, from Abraham to Malacbi, to the number of forty-eight, and six prophetesses (O). Several of the former are known to

<sup>d</sup> Isai. viii. 3.    <sup>e</sup> Ezek. xxiv. 18.    <sup>f</sup> Hos. i. 2. & seq.    <sup>g</sup> 2 Kings iv. 1, & seq.    <sup>h</sup> Judg. iv. 4.    <sup>i</sup> 2 Kings xxii. 14, 15.    <sup>k</sup> Traß. Megillath.

(N) We must not, however, pass by a distinction which the ancient Jews have hammered out of the sacred writings, between the חסידים Hassidim, called by the Greek and Latin writers Assidei†, the צדיקים Tzadikim, and רשעים Reshabim. The words properly signify no more than merciful, just, and wicked men; and the assembly or company of the two former is often opposed to that of the latter, not as being different sects, but as persons of a different character. But the Talmudists have attributed some peculiar opinions to each of these, tho' they are not quite agreed, whether they related to speculation or practice. They give the preference to the Hassidim in both respects, as being the honestest interpreters and practisers of the law, and the Pharisees boast themselves sprung from them; tho' much more likely from the Tzadikim, which were an over strict and scrupulous sect, pretending much to works of supererogation, to whom it is thought the advice of Solomon was directed, be not righteous over much (63). These, however, are the tenets attributed to each of them, with respect to meum and tuum (64). The Hassidim said, what is mine is yours; the Reshabim, what is yours is mine; but the Tzadikim, what is mine is mine, and what is yours is yours. To this the apostle seems to allude, when he says (65), that scarcely for a righteous man will one die, yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die, whilst Christ vouchsafed to die, even for the worst of the three, even for the wicked; where the Saxator alludes to the Tzadik, or rigidly righteous, and צדיק to the Hassid, or merciful man, as the wicked to the Reshabim. Whether that distinction likewise of our Saviour (66), between the good and the bad, the just and unjust, hath not probably an eye to this threefold sort of men, we leave to the reader.

(O) The prophetesses are Miriam, Deborah, Hannah (Samuel's mother) Abigail, Huldab, and Esther; some add the two Egyptian midwives to that number. As for the prophets, they are Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Aaron, Josua, Phineas, Elha- nah and his son Samuel, Eli, Nathan, Gad, Ido, David, Solomon, Micahab the son of Imiab (67), Obadiab, Abijah the Shilonite (68), Jaba, the son of Hanani (69), Azariab the son of Obed (70), Abexiel the son of Mathaniah, Eliexer the son of Dodowab (71), Hosea, Amos, Micah, Amos II. supposed the father of Isaiab, Elijab, Elysa, Isaiab, Jonah, Nabum, Joel, Habakkuk, Zephaniab, Jeremiab, Uriab the son of Shemaiab (72), Ezekiel, Daniel, Baruch, Neria, Seraiah his son, Maasiah his father (73), Haggai, Zechariab, Malacbi, Mordecai, Shallum the husband of Huldab, and Hanameel, Jeremiab's kinsman, of whom he bought a field (74).

Some add, that, when the father of any prophet is mentioned, he is also a prophet (75); as where Jeremiab is said to be the son of Hilkiah, Hija the son of Beri (76), &c. and that, when the place of his nativity is not mentioned, he is supposed to have been of Jerusalem (77).

It is observable, with respect to Daniel, that tho' the Jews allow him a rank among the other prophets, yet they will not admit his writings amongst those of the other prophets, but only among the Hagiographa, which they look upon as of the least authority of all the canonical books. The reasons they give for it are, 1. That Daniel was a courtier, and spent his life in luxury and grandeur in the service of an uncircumcised king. 2. That the spirit of prophecy was confined to the land Canaan, out of which he lived all his life: to these some have added a third, namely, that he had been made an eunuch, according to Isaiab's prophecy to Hizkiah (78), and that such were excluded from entering into the congregation of the Lord (79). Some learned Jews have indeed vindicated him, from this last imputation (80); but their Gemarras doth cast still a much more injurious reflection upon him, namely, that he stole away privately into Egypt to buy hogs, whilst Nebuchadnezzar was setting up his golden image, and his three friends Shadrach, Mesback, and Abednego, were condemned to the flames for refusing to worship it (81). But it is plain

† Vide 1 Maccab. vii. 13.    (63) Ecclef. vii. 16.    (64) Vide D. KIMCHI in Pf. ciii. 17. BARTHE-
NOR. gloss. in pirke abb. c. ii. 8. v. 10. WAGENSCH. ad hb. פסוק c. ix. 15.    (65) Rom. v. 7, 8.
(66) Matth. v. 45.    (67) 1 Kings xxii. 8, & seq.    (68) Ibid. xi. 29.    (69) Ibid. xvi. 1    (70)
2 Chron. xv. 1.    (71) Ibid. xx. ult.    (72) Jerem. xxi. 20, & seq.    (73) Ibid. li. 59.    (74)
Ibid. xxii. 7, & seq. de his prophet. ult. Sedar. otam. minor.    (75) Vide KIMCHI in Hof. i.    (76)
Jer. & Hof. i. 1.    (77) KIMCHI. ibid.    (78) 2 Kings xx. 18.    (79) Deut. xxiii. 1.    (80)
Vide ABNEZZ. in Dan.    (81) Traßlat. Sanhedr.

- a to us by nothing but their names ; as for the rest of them, we shall refer the farther account of their actions, writings, and character, till we come to the history of those kings in whose reigns they lived, and with which they have an immediate relation. The ways by which God revealed himself to them were various ; to some he appeared and spoke, either in a human, or some other visible form, as he did to Abraham and Moses ; to others by voice only, as to Samuel, Jeremiah, Hosea, and others<sup>1</sup> ; sometimes by visions, as he did to Isaiab, Ezekiel, Daniel, and others<sup>m</sup> : At other times by dreams<sup>a</sup> ; but the most usual and general way was, by the sole operation of the Spirit of God, acting on the mind of the prophet. In this last manner, the book of Psalms is generally thought to have been dictated by the Holy-b Ghost to the author, or rather the authors of it, Moses, David, Solomon, the three sons of Chore, Asaph, and the rest<sup>o</sup>.

S E C T. V.

The JEWISH CHRONOLOGY, from Abraham's vocation, to the Babylonish Captivity.

- c WE have shewn, in a former section, that the time, which elapsed from Abraham's first entrance into Canaan, to Jacob's descent into Egypt, was 215 years †, and that his posterity continued in the latter another 215 years *, in all, 430. From their coming out of that bondage, to Solomon's laying the foundation of the temple, the text tells us, was 480 years<sup>a</sup> ; from thence to the destruction of it by Nebuchadnezzar, when Judah was carried into captivity, are reckoned 422 years<sup>b</sup> : So that the whole time of this epoch, from the vocation of Abraham, to the Babylonish captivity, amounts to 1334. As to the kingdom of Israel, it lasted only 254 years from its defection from that of Judah, in the 37th year after the building of the temple, to their being carried away captive by Shalmaneser ; which happened 134 years before the Babylonish captivity.
d THUS far then the larger divisions of this æra are fixed upon a solid ground, the authority of the sacred writers ; but lest our readers should think it equally easy to adjust the smaller periods, especially those which relate to the several reigns of their judges and kings ; or should think it impossible to err in them, because the length of each is transmitted to us by inspired writers, from whom it would be impious to dissent ; we beg leave to remind them, before we give a list of those monarchs, of what has been observed in the preamble, prefixed to the first number of this work, concerning the vast and almost irreconcilable difference there is between the Hebrew and Samaritan chronology, as well as between these two and that of the septuagint : To say nothing of Josephus and other Jewish writers. We did also give e our reasons there, for preferring the Samaritan, as far as it went, to all the rest, even to the Hebrew, which last is justly supposed to have been corrupted by the Jews, and mutilated by the carelessness of copyists. We have given a pregnant proof of the latter in another section *†*, and shall soon have occasion to say something further of the former.

BUT these are not the only causes of the difficulty one finds in settling the Jewish chronology, we beg leave to add a few others equally considerable ; and these are, 1. That the sacred writers affected to use round numbers in their large plain, that all this rancour springs from the great use, which the Christians have since made of his writings against them, in spite of the noble character which Ezekiel gives him, when he mentions him with Noah and Job (82). Even Josephus, though he allows him to have been a compleat politician, is so far from denying him the title of prophet, that he doth even give him the preference to the rest, in several respects (83). But the rest of the Jews have thrown his prophecies into the ספר כתיבִים Sepher Ketubim, among those of Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, &c. (84).

<sup>1</sup> 1 Sam. iii. 4, & seq. Jerem. i. 4, & seq. & alib. Hof. i. 2. <sup>m</sup> Isai. vi. 1, & seq. Ezek. i. 4, & seq. Dan. vii. 1, & seq. <sup>n</sup> Dan. ii. 19. Mat. i. 20. & al. Acts xvi. 9. <sup>o</sup> Vid. Hieron. præfat. in psalm. † Comp. the years in the margin, in p. 422. & 559. See also p. 422, 423. <sup>a</sup> Ibid. p. 425. note K. <sup>b</sup> 1 Kings vi. 1. <sup>c</sup> See the marginal chronol. of our Bibles, and Usher's ann. p. 31. <sup>d</sup> *†* Before p. 422. note B.

(82) Ezek. xiv. & pass. (83) Ant. l. x. c. 12. (84) Vid. Hieron. præfat. in Isai. Maim. More Nevoch. pt. 2. Grot. præfat. in Isai. Munster. Bund. & al.

computations, without minding too scrupulously the odd years that fell over or under them. 2. The same they did in their lesser reckonings; those, for instance, of their kings reigns, which they computed by compleat years, and overlooked the odd months, which the first and last happened to fall short of; by which it often happened, that a whole year was gained within the compass of two or three reigns, or of forty or fifty years. 3. The book of Judges, whoever was the author of it (P), compared with Josephus's history of them, seems only a short account of so many persons, and of their government, without regard to the inter-regnums and anarchies, which happened between any of them. It seems, indeed, as if they were designedly passed by, as dead epochas not worth recording. But, lastly, and to mention no more, after the division of the two kingdoms, the length of every king's reign seems, indeed, exactly set down, and the synchronisms between those of Judab and Israel exactly observed; and yet there often happens such jarring and disagreement between them, as cannot be reconciled by any other way, than by supposing that some of those monarchs, in either kingdom, were taken into copartnership with their predecessors, and that the beginning of their reigns was dated from that time, and not from that of their father's death. The necessity of this supposition cannot but be obvious to those who are conversant with chronologick works, especially those of the learned Usher. How far the Jewish computation by lunar years, their ignorance of astronomy, and want of exact tables, of which we have lately had occasion to speak under another head, may have increased these difficulties, we need not say. But these, and many more, we willingly omit, have induced a great number of learned chronologers, ancient and modern, such as St. Jerom, Scaliger, Vossius, Genebrard, and others, to think it next to impossible to adjust the Jewish chronology by those few books we have extant, and which are but epitomes of more full and comprehensive histories, long since lost.

We need not tell our readers, that the histories of several kings are said in the text to have been written by cotemporary prophets, of whom we have nothing extant but their names; and that the books of Kings and Chronicles conclude every king's reign in words to this effect: Now the rest of the acts of such a king, his valour and conquest, and the like, are they not written in the book of the Kings (or Chronicles) of the kings of Judab (or Israel). Now it were absurd to suppose, that those we have extant, under the name of Kings and Chronicles, do refer to one another, seeing, some few inconsiderable particulars excepted, they all

(P) It is plain, that it was not begun and continued by several hands, under the government of each judge, as some have imagined; not only from the uniformity of style throughout, but also because the author of it, whoever he was, gives a kind of epitome of the whole book at the beginning (85); and the expression which often occurs in it, that in those days there was no king in Israel (86), shews it to have been written after the beginning of their monarchy. On the other hand, those who date it after their captivity; because it is said there (87), that Jonathan and his sons continued to be priests until the day of the captivity of the land, which they think must at least be that of Tiglath-pileser (88); seem to post-date it prodigiously, not considering that by what the author says at the beginning (89), that the children of Benjamin dwell with the Jebusites in Jerusalem, unto this day, he must have lived before these were driven out of it by David. It is therefore more probable, as the Jews think, that the captivity, here spoken of, was the battle which the Israelites lost against the Philistines, when the ark was taken by them; at which time, one may reasonably suppose a great number of the people were also taken captive.

What makes this conjecture still more probable is, that, in the very next verse to that where the captivity is mentioned, the author adds, that the Danites set up Micah's ephod all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh, which was only till they fetched the ark from thence, to carry it against the Philistines; and this was about the beginning of Samuel's time; for, after his return, it was not carried back to Shiloh, but to Kirjath-jearim (90). If the ephod then continued no longer in Dan, there was no farther need of keeping any priests to sacrifice unto it. Neither, indeed, is it credible, that such a notorious piece of idolatry could have continued under Samuel's government, when it is expressly said, that he made the children of Israel put away their strange gods to serve the Lord alone (91).

It seems, therefore, very probable to us, that a mistake has been committed in the last word of that 30th verse, from the likeness of the final letters; and that instead of גלות הארץ, the captivity of the land, it was originally written גלות הארון, the taking of the ark. From all which it will follow, that Samuel lived at the time of this book being written; and consequently, that he is most likely to have been the author of it. Neither will the supposition of a much later captivity destroy this conjecture, if we suppose that Exra, or any of the inspired writers, that returned from that of Babylon, might add this circumstance, as, we have made it probable already, they did many others to the historical books, by way of illustration.

(85) Ch. ii. 10. Et seq. (86) Ch. xviii. 6. xviii. 1. xix. 1. Et alib. (87) Judg. xviii. 30. (88) See 2 Kings xv. 30. (89) Ch. i. ver. 21. (90) Conf. 1 Sam. iv. 4. Et viii. 1. 2. (91) 2d. ver. 3. 4.

a all mention the same things, and almost word for word ; and are alike regardless of all the other particulars of those reigns. It is therefore more reasonable to suppose, that they referred the readers to more exact and voluminous annals or histories, written by proper persons in every reign, and which either perished during the captivity, or since. But whether we ascribe the difficulties of the Jewish chronology to the loss of these books, to the Jews corrupting of the text, or to the carelessness of transcribers ; any, or all of these, will sufficiently account for the different ways by which almost every chronologer has endeavoured to fix the various eras before the birth of Christ ; concerning which we shall refer our readers to our preface above mentioned, and to the tables thereto annexed.

b THE Jews indeed, whether ancient or modern, do not differ so widely from one another in this respect, as the Christians do ; but then it is plain, from the tables above mentioned, that they have shortened, one and all, the space between the creation of the world, and the birth of Christ, by 240 years, little more or less, of the vulgar era. Whether therefore this was wilfully done, and with design to explode the completion of the prophecies concerning the time of the Messiah's coming, which is but too likely, seeing their chronology, from that time to this, doth exactly agree with ours, this being their 5495th year from the creation ; or whether it happened through the inadvertency of copyists, which yet was hardly ever granted by any true Jew ; their chronology can no more be reconciled to ours, than to that of the Egyptians, or of any other nation.

c THE truth is, that all their records, the sacred books excepted, are not only of recenter date than their Talmud, but seem wholly directed by it. So that whatever small difference is to be met with between them, in point of chronology, is rather owing to a different reading or understanding of that book, than a deviation from it ; and, of what authority both this and the others ought to be to us, we need not tell the reader. However, for the satisfaction of those who are not acquainted with these chronological works, we shall subjoin some few of the most considerable, together with their authors, as far as they are known, and the time in which they were compiled.

d AND here we shall pass by their fictitious Josephus Ben Gorion, whom they have obtruded upon the world instead of the real one, so well known to the Christians, and so often mentioned in this history. The reader may see an account of these two, and the reasons for the former being trumped up by the Jews, in opposition to the latter, in Prideaux's Connexion*, where he will find also a fuller account of the following chronological works ; which we shall, for that reason, content ourselves with the bare mention of, and only observe here, that they follow the Hebrew text as far as it goes ; the rest is mostly supplied by the Talmud to the time of its being compiled, and then by authors of a recenter date.

e THE first is the Sedar Holam Rabbah, or large Chronicle ; which contains a short history from the creation, and is generally attributed to one rabbi Jose Ben Chalephta, who flourished, if we may believe the generality of the Jews, about 130 years after Christ, and is said to have been master to the famous Jebudah Hakodesh, the compiler of the Mishna† ; but what shews him to be of more modern date is, that his work is continued down to the time of the emperor Adrian‡. And Prideaux observes, that the book is stuffed with rabbinick fables, which certainly appear to have been taken out of the Babylonish Talmud ; from which he concludes that it was written after it§. To this we may add what a learned Jew tells us¶, that he had seen a copy of it, in which it was said, that the author lived 760 years after the destruction of the temple.

f 2. THE Shealoth and Teshuboth, or questions and answers, dialoguewise, of rabbi Sherira, surnamed Gaon, or the sublime. This is a chronological epitome, the author of which flourished from the year 967 downward¶.

3. THE Sedar Holam Zutta, or the lesser Chronicle, another epitome of history, from the creation to the year of Christ 552 ; but whose unknown author lived, as the book itself says, about the year 1123¹.

* Preface to the 3d vol. p. 18. & seq.    † Vid. WOLF. Bibliot. Rabbin. num. 848. p. 462. & seq.
 ‡ See MORIN. BARTOLC. BUXT. & al.    § PRID. ub. sup.    ¶ R. AZAR. Meor henaim. pt. 3.    ¹ Vid. WOLF. & PRID. ub. sup.    † Vid. Sepher Yuchasin, Shalsheleth Et Temach David ap. WOLF. ub. sup.

4. Sepher Cabbala Rabbi Abraham Levita Ben Dior ; this book pretends to give a continual and uninterrupted succession of all the patriarchs, prophets, elders, and wise men, through whose hands the oral tradition passed, from Adam to Moses, and so on to the compilers of the Talmud, and from thence to the year of Christ 1141. This author doth often abridge the fictitious Josephus Ben Gorion, and is supposed to be the first, who brought that spurious author and his book into credit among the Jews.

5. The Sepher Yuchasin, or book of genealogies, from the creation to the year of Christ 1500. This is a much larger work than any of the former.

6. The Shalsheleth, or chain of the cabbala, of the same kind with the Yuchasin.

7. The Tzemach David, or sprout of David, treats on the same subject with the two last. These three are still more modern, and less worth our notice <sup>b</sup>. Besides these, we find an apocryphal book, intituled, Dibre bajamim, or chronicle of Moses ; but which is universally rejected by the Jews as well as Christians. As for the Samaritan chronicle published by Bernard <sup>1</sup> and Basnage <sup>m</sup>, it is so short, obscure, and incorrect, that it could yield us but little help in this particular, were it of greater authority than it is. These, especially the first seven, are the books which the Jews urge against our chronology, and from which they pretend to demonstrate, that Christ appeared earlier in the world by about 240 years, than we say he did : But as their authority is altogether founded upon that of the Talmud, we shall spend no more time in confuting either <sup>a</sup>.

We pass by also the Jewish Targums, or Chaldee paraphrases, because we have none upon the book of the Judges or of the Kings. But upon the whole, whatever small differences there may be between those chronological works, they all agree in the series and succession of their kings and judges, in the same order of time as we find them in those two sacred books, and that of the Chronicles. It is true, that this last doth sometimes jar with those of Samuel and Kings in point of numbers, whether of years or other things mentioned in both. But such differences are scarce worth the pains which some criticks have taken to reconcile them †. We shall have occasion, in the sequel of their history, to hint at some of the latter sort ; and as to the first, the only instance, we are going to give, will easily convince the reader, that, in these cases, some errors have manifestly crept into the text, whether through the likeness of the numerical Hebrew letters, or the negligence of copyists, whatever the Jews may pretend to the contrary. The place we mean is, where the book of Chronicles says that Abaziah was 42 years of age when he began to reign ‡, contrary to that of Kings, which makes him but 22 years old §. It will be no hard matter to find where the mistake lies, since, according to the former author, that monarch must have been two years older than his father, who is affirmed to have died in the 40th year of his age ¶. It were ridiculous to follow the forced and unnatural solution of two or three authors, who have in vain endeavoured to solve the difficulty ‡, against the far greater majority, who have plainly owned, that it could not be removed by any other way, than by owning the bigger number to be an error of the transcriber ¶. The following is the list of the judges and kings of Judah and Israel. As for their chronology and synchronisms, we shall refer them, as we have done hitherto, the former to their history, and the latter to the chronological table at the end of this work.

<sup>a</sup> Id. & PRID. ub. sup. <sup>1</sup> Ap. CALMET sub voc. croniq. <sup>m</sup> Histoire des Juifs. T. 6. lib. 8. c. 6.
<sup>b</sup> Vid. PRID. Conn. ub. sup. & pt. 1. lib. 5. † Vid. int. al. WHISTON'S Chronology, and CAP-
 ZOVIVUS'S learned answer to it. ‡ 2 Chron. xxii. 2. § 2 Kings viii. 26. ¶ 2 Chr. xxi. ver.
 ult. ‡ USSER. AN. BROUGHTON. JUN. in loc. ¶ JEROM. KINCH. ABARBAN. L. DE DIEU.
 PISCAT. CAJET. SCALIG. GROT. CAPEL & al. mult. Vid. & NORT. KNATCHBUL Animadv. in N.
 T. in Act. iv. LE SCER. Essay on a N. Verf. pt. 2. ch. vi. § 8. & al. mult.

A Table of the ISRAELITISH JUDGES.

- |   |                            |
|---|----------------------------|
| 1. Othniel, son-in-law to Joshua (A).                                       | 8. Jair.                   |
| 2. Ebud.  | 9. Jephthab the Gileadite. |
| 3. Shamgar.   | 10. Ibzan.                 |
| 4. Deborah the prophetess, and wife of Lapidoth (B), and Barac her general. | 11. Elon.                  |
| b 5. Gideon, or Jerubbaal.  | 12. Abdon.                 |
| 6. Abimelech his son.   | 13. Eli the high-priest.   |
| 7. Tolab.   | 14. Samson.                |
|   | 15. Samuel.                |

The JEWISH KINGS before Jeroboam's Revolt.

Saul. Ishbosheth. David. Solomon.

KINGS of JUDAH and ISRAEL after the Division of the two kingdoms.

- |   |  |                                       |
|---|--|---------------------------------------|
| c | JUDAH.   | ISRAEL.                               |
|   | Rehoboam.  | Jeroboam.                             |
|   | Abijam.  | Nadab.                                |
|   | Aza.   | Baasha.                               |
|   |  | Elah.                                 |
|   |  | Zimri.                                |
|   |  | Omri.                                 |
|   |  | Abah.                                 |
|   |  | Abaziah.                              |
| d | Jehoshaphat.                                       |                                       |
|   | Jehoram.   | Jehoram.                              |
|   | Abaziah.   | Jehu.                                 |
|   | Atthaliah.   |                                       |
|   | Jehoash.   | Jehoabaz.                             |
|   | Amaziah.   | Jehoash.                              |
|   | Uzziah or Azariah.                                 | Jeroboam II.                          |
|   |  | An inter-regnum of 11 and half years. |
|   |  | Zachariah.                            |
|   |  | Shallum.                              |
|   |  | Menabem.                              |
| e | Jotham.  | Pekabiah.                             |
|   | Abaz.  | Pekab.                                |
|   | Hezekiah.  | Hoshea.                               |
|   | Manasseh.  |                                       |
|   | Amon.  |                                       |
|   | Josiah.  |                                       |
|   | Shallum or Jehoabaz.                               |                                       |
|   | Eliakim or Jehoiakim.                              |                                       |
|   | Jechoniah or Coniah, called also Jeho-boiakim. |                                       |
| f | Mattaniah, called also Zedekiah.                   |                                       |

(A) Josephus makes Kenaz, the father of Othniel, to have been the first judge in Israel (1); and takes no notice of his son, either as his co-partner or successor; but the text is entirely against him, which gives that dignity to the latter, and attributes the signal victory to him; for which he was chosen and continued in it forty years (2).

(B) Some read אִשְׁתִּי-לָפִידוֹת, Esbeth-Lapidoth, a woman of Lapidoth, supposing that to be the name of the place of her abode; and others, because Lapidoth properly signifies lamps, will have her called by that name, because she spun the cotton for the lamps that burnt in the holy place. But all this is said without foundation, and Deborah is not the only prophetess that had a husband. Witness Huldah, the wife of Shallum, mentioned in a former note. It doth not appear what tribe Deborah was of; the place of her abode was upon the frontiers of Benjamin and Ephraim (3), and these were indifferently inhabited by either tribe.

(1) Ant. lib. V. c. 4. (2) See Judg. iii. 8. & seq. (3) Ibid. iv. 5.

S E C T. VI.

The History of the JUDGES that governed Israel, from the death of Joshua to Saul their first king.

JOSHUA had attained to the 110th year of his age, by that time he had finished his arduous task, of settling the tribes each in their proper lot, dismissing the two tribes and half to their own, on the other side Jordan, and appointing the cities of the Levites, and of Refuge, as we have seen in a former section. Finding, therefore, that he was drawing to his end, he called to him all the heads of Israel at Shechem; and, after the example of Moses, reminded them of all the wonderful and signal favours which God had shewed to them, from their fore-father Abraham, unto that time; and how much they were bound by interest, as well as duty, to continue stedfast in their obedience to him, and by no means to suffer themselves to be insnared into idolatry, or into a conformity with the ways of the Canaanites; which could not but prove fatal to them, as it had been to their ancestors. He added, that, as for them, they were at their choice, whether they would serve the Lord, or the gods of Canaan; but himself and his house were fully resolved to continue stedfast in the worship of the true God. This pathetick exhortation of their venerable general, whom they now saw for the last time, extorted from them an universal promise, that they would all follow his example, and cleave unto God. Joshua took care to see it recorded, and caused a monument to be erected in memory of this new covenant, under the oak that grew in the precinct of the tabernacle. He died soon after, and was buried at Timnath-serath, in mount Ephraim, which was his own inheritance. His death was soon followed by that of Eleazar the son of Aaron, who was succeeded by his son Phineas in the high-priesthood. By degrees, the rest of the seventy elders, who had out-lived Joshua, died also; and with them, one would have thought, not only the remembrance of Joshua, and of their late covenant, so solemnly sworn to by all the tribes, but even all sense of religion, and fear of God, or regard to his laws; insomuch, that Joshua had been scarce dead twenty years, before we find them sunk over head and ears into confusion and idolatry.

Joshua's death.

Year of the
Flood, 1556.
Year before
CHRIST,
1443.

Judah's war.

A GREAT part of Canaan remained still unconquered when that general died, so that they could not, without pursuing their conquest, secure the possession of what they had. Judah was appointed by the oracle to begin the war; Caleb, the son of Jephuneh, famous for his bravery and faithfulness, in the report he made of the land of Canaan, was head of that tribe, and engaged that of Simeon, with which his own was interwoven, to join forces with him against the king of Bezek. We have seen, elsewhere, the just fate of that insolent petty prince †. As for Caleb, he set himself immediately about the conquest of Jerusalem, which had been re-taken by the Jebusites from the tribe of Benjamin, and soon after took and burnt it to the ground; the besieged retiring into the fortrefs of Zion. After this, he turned his forces towards the south, against the cities of Hebron, or Kirjath-Arba, and Debir, called also Kirjath-Sepher, which were then inhabited by the gigantick sons of Anak. These had been formerly promised to him by Moses, as a reward of his faithfulness, and yielded to him accordingly by Joshua, a little before his death. Caleb, however, who was then above fourscore and five years of age, though still strong and vigorous, thought it prudent not to exhaust his strength too far in the siege of those strong places, and therefore proposed his daughter Achsab as a reward to the man that took Kirjath-Sepher; and it was not long before it was gained by Othniel, a man of valour, and of his own family (A), whose conduct and bravery, upon this occasion, did raise him soon after to the dignity of judge.

† Josh. xxiii. & xxiv. p. tot.    <sup>b</sup> Vid. Numb. xiii. 6. & 30. xiv. 6. & alib.    <sup>c</sup> Judg. i. 4. & seq.
† Vid. sup. p. 333. d.    <sup>d</sup> Judg. i. 8.    <sup>e</sup> Ibid. ver. 9. & seq. vid. Josh. xiv. 9. & seq.

(A) The text calls him the son of Kenan, brother whether he, or his father, was Caleb's brother. to Caleb (1); so that it is not easy to determine. The septuagint and vulgate have taken it in the first sense;

(1) Josh. xv. 17. Judg. i. 13.

- a WHILEST Caleb and his new son-in-law were employed in enlarging their inheritance, the other tribes were doing the same in their several lots. But whether out of compassion to the poor Canaanites, doomed to destruction; or out of an ambitious desire of having vassals under them, they wholly neglected the express order of their law-giver, and, instead of extirpating them, contented themselves with laying them under tribute; this proved the source of all their misfortunes, and of those many slaveries that ensued; for the oppressed Canaanites did, at least in appearance, so patiently submit to their yoke, that they became less cautious of them; they grew by degrees more intimate with them, and by that means were so far ensnared with the beauty of their women, as to contract
- b affinities with them. These unhappy intermarriages soon debauched them into all their idolatries, and reconciled them to the worship of Baal, Astarte, and other gods of Canaan, all which did often provoke God to forsake them, and gave their enemies frequent opportunities of regaining their liberties, and of oppressing them in their turns.

It was during this time of apostacy and confusion, that Micah, a wealthy man, of the tribe of Ephraim, is supposed to have erected that idol in his house, which was soon after taken from him by the Dannites, and set up at Dan. The story of it is indeed related at the end of the book of the Judges, from whence some have concluded, that it happened after Sampson's death<sup>f</sup>; whilst others place it c about the latter end of Joshua's life<sup>g</sup>; but the far greater part, between Caleb's death, and Othniel's being chosen judge<sup>h</sup>. Till that time, the idolatrous Israelites seem to have contented themselves with the idols of the Canaanites, without setting up any of their own. Micah was the first, we read of, that took it into his head to outdo them, not only by erecting this, but by consecrating an apartment of his house to it, and procuring a wandering Levite to officiate to it. The story giving us a lively idea of the monstrous absurdities of the religion of those times, and of the degeneracy of the Israelites, who could so soon give into them, cannot well be omitted.

- Micah* felt a remorse for having wronged a covetous and superstitious mother
- d of 1100 pieces of silver, which amounted to somewhat above that number of <sup>The story of</sup> Micah. shillings of our money, and for which she had bestowed some severe curses upon him. She conceived such joy at his restoring them to her, that she resolved to consecrate the greatest part of it, to what she thought a religious use, such as might prove an equivalent blessing to him, for the curses he had extorted from her. Accordingly, with part of that silver, she and her son purchased two idols, one molten, and the other carved; and with the rest they built a chapel to set them up in, together with some teraphim, which they had, in all likelihood, already in the house; they being a kind of little statues or household gods, which the corrupted Israelites had in common with other nations*. To this they added
- e an ephod, or priestly garment, with which Micah installed his son to the priestly office of his new gods. Soon after this, a young indigent Levite, wandering by that way, was hired, as a more proper person for that office than his own son.

Year of the
Flood, 1586.
Year before
CHRIST,
1413.

<sup>f</sup> Vid. Seder Holam. SERAR. & al. in loc. * MASIUS. DE LYR. RIBER. & al. <sup>h</sup> Vid. CORN. LAPID. GROT. USSER. MUNST. CALMET. & al. <sup>g</sup> Vid. sup. p. 443. (B).

sense; but it is plain he was not his brother by the father's side, because the one is called the son of Jephuneh, and the other the son of Kenaz; neither can they be supposed to be uterine brothers, because, in such a case, the law of Moses would not have permitted the one to have given his daughter to the other. The disparity of age is another proof of it: Caleb was then above 85 years of age; Othniel therefore must be supposed much younger, to have married his daughter, who was an heiress. Neither could he have married her, if his father Kenaz had been Caleb's brother; because the marriage of an aunt is likewise forbidden by the Mosaic law. It is therefore more reasonable to suppose, that Caleb and Kenaz were first cousins, which the original doth often call brothers; in which case Othniel and Akshab might lawfully marry. St. Austin, and after him Vatablus, affirm Othniel to have been, not only a great warrior, but also a learned doctor of that law (2), and so doubly eager for the conquest of a place which was the seat of learning at that time†. The Jews tell us wonders of the beauty of Caleb's daughter. However, her husband was not so well satisfied with her and her portion, but he prevailed upon her to sue for an addition to it; which she accordingly did; and upon her complaining of the drought and barrenness of the south high lands, which her father had given her, she obtained those of the valleys beneath, which were better watered, and consequently more fertile. This happened in Joshua's time (3).

(2) Vid. VATAB. in loc. † Vid. sup. 728. sub fin. (I). (3) Vid. Josh. & Jud. ubi sup. Micah

Micab thought himself then highly blessed ; and having his chapel so well <sup>a</sup> furnished with idols, and with a priest to administer to them, began to think that nothing could hinder him from the favour of God ; when the Dannites, who found themselves too streightened in their own tribe, sent out some spies to seek for a new habitation. These chanced to come by that way, and having consulted the Levite about the success of their journey, and received a favourable answer, went directly to Laiſh, a considerable town, whose rich inhabitants, like those of Zidon, lived in a careless security, without magistrates, soldiery, or strength. They returned, and acquainted their tribe with the joyful news ; upon which, the Dannites of Zorab and Eſhtaal armed 600 of their men ; and these, with their five spies at their head, marched immediately toward Laiſh. In their <sup>b</sup> way, the spies acquainted them with what they had seen at Micab's chapel, and in particular with his having a young Levite there, named Jonathan, the son of Gerſhom, from whose mouth they had received a promise of success in this expedition. The text rightly observes, that there was at that time no king in Israel, and that every one did what was right in his own eyes <sup>c</sup>. The Dannites, therefore, instead of reproving Micab for his apostacy, and destroying his idolatrous chapel, entered it by main force, took away the idols, teraphim and ephod, and forced the young priest to go along with them to Laiſh. Micab pursued after them, and made loud complaints, that they had robbed him of all that was valuable in life ; all the answer they gave him was, that his outcries might cost him his life, and that it was his safest way to go home quietly. They soon arrived at Laiſh, took <sup>c</sup> and destroyed it, with its inhabitants ; and having built a new city, and called it Dan, after the name of their progenitor, they set up their idols there, and retained young Jonathan and his sons to be their priests. The septuagint, vulgate, and some Jewish rabbies, call him the grandson of Moses, but the original, the grandson of Manasseh <sup>m</sup>. As for the idol, the text says, that it continued there till the captivity of the land ; and what that means, we have shewed in a former note †.

A bloody war against Benjamin.

Year of the
Flood, 1593.
Year before
CHRIST,
1406.

<sup>d</sup> DURING these years of anarchy, the inhabitants of Gibeath in the tribe of Benjamin were guilty of so horrid a breach of hospitality towards a wandering Levite, as proved the cause of much bloodshed, and was like to have occasioned the ruin of that whole tribe. The Levite was bringing his eloped concubine home, and was come to that place towards sun-set. After he had waited some time in vain for some body to lodge him that night, an old man coming from his work, who was a sojourner there, being of the tribe of Ephraim, came at last and invited him to his house. They had scarce made an end of refreshing themselves, when a band of profligate young fellows surrounded the house, and, in a tumultuous manner, demanded the stranger to be sacrificed to their brutish lust, which they made no difficulty to express in the plainest terms. This gives one reason to believe, that it was no unusual thing among them. The Levite found <sup>e</sup> no other way of saving himself, but by delivering his concubine to them ; and on the next morning he found her dead at the threshold of the door, whether of shame and regret, or of the grievous abuse she had suffered that night. It was in vain to complain of this cruelty in such an abandoned place ; he took therefore the dead body with him, and brought it to his own house, where he divided it into twelve pieces, and sent one of them to each tribe, with an account of the occasion of it. The surprized tribes assembled themselves from all parts of Israel to Mizpeh, to the number of 400,000 fighting men, and there the Levite gave them a farther account of the injury, which had been done to his concubine, but cunningly concealed his own weakness and cowardice, in sacrificing her to his own safety <sup>n</sup>. The whole people had scarce heard his story out, when they rose up as one man, and resolved not to return to their respective homes, till they had punished the authors of that unheard-of action with the utmost severity. Whilst therefore they deputed every tenth man to their respective tribes, to fetch them arms and provision for the war, they sent deputies to the heads of the tribe of Benjamin, to demand the delivery of the profligate Gibeathites. But that haughty tribe, instead of complying with their request, armed 25000 of their best warriors, <sup>f</sup> besides

† Judg. xvii. pass. vid. ver. ult.

<sup>m</sup> Ibid. ver. 6.

<sup>n</sup> Ibid. xviii. 14.

† Ibid. ver. 30.

† Pag. 734. in fin. (P).

† lb. c. xx. 5. & seq.

- a besides 700 of the inhabitants of Gibeath, to go out against them. This unexpected stubbornness did only exasperate the eleven tribes the more, and made them vow to take a fuller revenge on that of Benjamin. However, they thought proper, before all things, to consult the Lord, not whether they should undertake the war against their brethren, for that they took for granted was both lawful and incumbent upon them; but which of the tribes should go out first against Benjamin; and the Lord answered by the mouth of Phineas, the then high-priest, that Judab should go first. They gave them battle accordingly on the next morning, not doubting of a complete victory; but it proved quite otherwise, and Judab was repulsed with the loss of 22,000 men. This unexpected defeat filled them with surprise, and made them apply themselves again to God, to know whether they should pursue the war against their brethren of Benjamin; who answered them by the high-priest, that they should engage them a second time, though without promising them the victory; and, upon their coming up against Gibeath, they were again repulsed, with the loss of 18,000 men, by a vigorous sally which the inhabitants made upon them. This second disappointment did almost drive them to despair; at length they resolved to return to Shiloh, and to lie prostrate before the ark all that night, and by sacrifices, fasting, and prayers, to intreat the Lord, either to grant them a victory, or to declare his displeasure against the war which they had engaged in. This humble behaviour of theirs obtained at length a favourable answer, and the high-priest promised
- c them, that the Lord would, on the next onset, deliver the Benjamites into their hands. This answer inspired them with fresh courage; but yet they thought it advisable to add policy to their strength. To this end, a stratagem was put in execution, which had its desired effect. They divided themselves into three bodies, one of which should lie in ambush, and be ready to enter in and set fire to the city, as soon as the men were sallied out. Another body was to make a sham assault, on purpose to draw them out of the place in pursuit of them; whilst the third and main body lay concealed in the neighbourhood of Baaltamar, and ready to fall upon them. The children of Benjamin did easily give into the snare; and, finding themselves unwarily surprised in their pursuit by the main body, were thinking to retreat into the town; when, upon turning themselves about, they saw it all in flames, and were so disheartened at the sight, that they were all cut off, to the number of 25,000. About 600 saved themselves by flight, and went and fortified themselves upon the tops of the rocks of Rimon, and there abode four months, that is, till they were called down by the other tribes in an amicable manner.
- d

In the mean time, this victory did only whet the fury of the other tribes, which did not so much as cool, till they had burnt down all their cities and villages, and killed all the inhabitants, without distinction of age or sex, even to their very cattle; and made, as they thought, an utter end of that unfortunate tribe. It was then, indeed, that they began to reflect, with some remorse, upon what they had done, and to bewail the loss of one of their tribes. They went up to Shiloh again, and there expostulated with God, for having suffered such an universal destruction, without stopping their hand. They erected a large altar, probably because that of the tabernacle was not capacious enough for the multitude of their victims, and having been informed that the six hundred, which were escaped from the slaughter, were still upon the rocks of Rimon, they intreated God to direct them how to recall them peaceably, to restore the lost tribe by their means. There was, however, one main impediment to it, namely a rash oath they had made at Mispeb, when they vowed the war against Benjamin, that none of them would give their daughters to any of that tribe. The oath, being unlawful in itself, might have been e dissolved by the high-priest, who was there present; but whether their conscience was more tender in this respect, than it generally was in all others, they bethought themselves of another expedient, which would answer their end, without the danger of being perjured, tho' it was scarcely so justifiable as the breach of such an oath would have been, even tho' they had had no Phineas to have absolved them from it. They caused a strict search to be made in their muster-rolls, whether any of the tribes had failed to come to the camp at Mispeb, and, upon enquiry, it was found that the inhabitants of Jabesh Gilead, belonging to the half tribe of Manasseb, on the other side Jordan, had not come to the general assembly. One would expect, therefore, that, as they had had no share in the oath with the other tribes, they would only have obliged them to furnish those six hundred men with wives ; a but they went a more cruel way to work, and sent twelve thousand armed men, with orders to destroy all the inhabitants of the place, except the virgins. These soon went and executed this bloody command, and brought four hundred virgins captive, which were given to as many of the remaining men of Benjamin. There were still two hundred unprovided for, and no more towns to be condemned to the fate of Jabesh ; however, rather than break their oaths for their sakes, they be- thought themselves of a way of evading it, by giving them leave to take that by force, which they thought not lawful to give them of their own accord. The men took their advice, and lay perdue in the vineyards about Shiloh, and when the young damsels came out of it with tabrets and dances, from some solemn feast, b as is supposed, every man seized upon one of them, and took them home, whilst the rest of the tribes returned also every man to his habitation *. These six hundred men soon rebuilt their cities, and the tribe of Benjamin, thus restored by degrees to its former valour and strength, did cleave ever after to that of Judab, and gave the second judge and first king unto Israel.

By these two instances, the reader may judge into what degree of degeneracy the whole nation was fallen, in that little interval between the death of Caleb, and that of his son in law's being chosen judge. What is still more surprising is, that the presence of one good man in authority should be able to put a stop to such a vehement propensity to idolatry, which, immediately after his death, could not c be contained within any bounds, but broke out like a torrent with double force. Yet this was the case of the Israelites, during all the time of their judges ; the same, that delivered them from thralldom, freed them also from idolatry, and he was no sooner dead, than their innocence and obedience were at an end, tho' their peace and happiness were sure to end with it : thus every epoch is only an alternate succession of sinning and repentance, of servitude and deliverance. What those nations were which they suffered to live amongst them, and by whom they were so often corrupted, enslaved, and delivered from by turns, we have already seen in the history of Canaan †, to which we shall refer the reader once for all, to avoid, as much as the series of this history will permit, all unnecessary repetitions. d first judge.

Othniel the
Year of the
Flood, 1597.
Year before
CHRIST,
1402.

THE first slavery, which their defection brought upon them, was under Cushan-rishataim, king of Mesopotamia, who held them in subjection about eight years ; at the end of which, the warlike Othniel found means to raise an army against him, with which he gained a signal victory, and freed Israel from the yoke of that potent prince. The text gives us no further account of that war, which could not but be much to the Hebrew general's honour, considering the strength of his enemy. All that it adds is, that his success obtained him a peace which lasted forty years ; that is, till the death of their judge and deliverer *. This victory happened about 38 years after Joshua's death ; as for that of Othniel, it is not easy to fix it †.

Ehud, second judge.
Year of the
Flood, 1663.
Year before
CHRIST,
1336.

SOON after it, they fell again under servitude to the Moabites, and, at the end e of eighteen years, Ehud their second judge, who was of the tribe of Benjamin, being deputed to carry the yearly tribute to Eglon their king, freed them by the death of that prince, whom he privately stabbed, whilst he was delivering a pretended message from God to him ; and, having escaped undiscovered, blew the trumpet, and raised a sufficient army, with which he shook the Moabish yoke, and procured his people another forty years peace †.

Shamgar,
third judge.

Shamgar, their third judge, delivered them from some small oppression which they suffered from the Philistines. The text gives us no further particulars about him, than that he slew six hundred of them with an ox-goad, or, as the Latin and Greek versions render it, with a plough-share † (B). How long he judged Israel f is not to be guessed at : he was succeeded by * Judg. xix. & xx. per tot. † Vid. sup. p. 332, & seq. ‡ Judg. iii. 8, & seq. § Vide UssER. Annal. p. 28. ¶ Judg. iii. 12, & seq. See before, p. 289. d. † Judg. iii. ver. ult. See before, p. 348. a. & (S). ibid.

THE

(B) The word is מלמד הבקר Malmad babakar, broke to labour. We have taken notice, under another head, that the Philistines were more careful than

- a THE prophets Deborah, soon after the smart of a fourth servitude, worse and longer than any of the three former, had brought them to a sense of their sins and ingratitude. Israel was for every market, and as ready as they were to sell themselves to some new crimes, so was providence to sell them to new lords. The text takes notice, that, after the death of their judge, they fell into new crimes, and God, to punish them for it, raised up a more powerful adversary against them, Jabin king of Canaan, whose strength, besides a numerous army and a valiant general, consisted in an incredible number of iron chariots<sup>1</sup>; whereby he held them in severe subjection twenty years; yet when their cries and repentance had obtained <sup>Deborah</sup> a promise of a speedy deliverance, lest they should arrogate to themselves any share in the glory of their future victory, two women are chosen to be the main instruments of it, and Jael compleats what Deborah had concerted, and Barak, at the head of ten thousand men, discomfited Sisera and his numerous army, tho' strengthened with nine hundred chariots of iron<sup>2</sup>; and the land of Israel, from a dismal solitude<sup>3</sup>, began to resume its former fertility and splendor. We have given an account of this famous action in a former chapter<sup>4</sup>, which gave occasion to that noble song of deliverance, which Deborah composed immediately after it, and which procured them a respite of forty years<sup>5</sup>.

- c THE ungrateful Israelites, having by that time forgot that signal deliverance, were plagued with a fresh bondage, which, compared with that under Jabin, might be called freedom. Under the last, Deborah was allowed to judge Israel in the face of the sun, but now they are not only without judge, but even without habitation, except what they are forced to seek for amongst the clefts and caverns of the rocks; and, if they find time and convenience to sow, their enemies pour in upon them, and, reap the fruit of their labours<sup>6</sup>. Under this miserable tyranny they were groaning when God did first send a prophet, to convince them how justly they suffered this hard Midianitish bondage<sup>7</sup>; after which he made choice of a proper person to undertake their deliverance. Gideon was privately thrashing his corn, to save it from becoming a prey either to Midian or Amalek; when the angel of the Lord saluted him with the title of the valiant saviour of his people; and d convinced him by repeated miracles, that Israel, whom he now looked upon as forsaken by God, should be speedily and miraculously restored to their wished-for freedom, by his means. Gideon, on the one hand, was too well experienced <sup>Gideon.</sup> a warrior, and too well acquainted with the dejected condition of his nation, to <sup>Year of the</sup> think that such a deliverance could be wrought by an arm of flesh; and on the <sup>Flood, 1725.</sup> other, he was so far from expecting such a supernatural assistance, that he seemed <sup>Year before</sup> even to doubt of the truth of all those wonders which God had wrought in favour <sup>CHRIST,</sup> of them<sup>8</sup>. At length, to confirm his wavering faith, he obtained leave of the heavenly messenger to go and fetch a sacrifice, and to offer it at his feet; which he had no sooner done, but, upon the angel's touching it with the end of his staff, a e miraculous fire arose out of the rock on which it was laid, and consumed the whole sacrifice; immediately after which, the angel vanished out of his sight. Gideon was filled with surprise and dread, at the thoughts of the divine presence which he had beheld, but God was pleased to dissipate his fears; in memory of which, he reared an altar on the place, and called it Jehovah Shalom<sup>9</sup>.

ON that very night, the Lord commanded him to begin his heaven-appointed task with the destruction of the altar and grove of Baal, the fatal source of Israel's defection and punishment; and to expiate their crime by the sacrifice of a bullock of seven years, in the place where they had served that Midianitish deity. Gideon was not only eager to obey, but knowing the hazard of such an enterprize, should he than any other nation, to strip the Jerus of all their weapons of war, whenever they had them in subjection†; and if this was the case at present, it is likely that expression means only such rustical instruments as he and his men could lay their hands on. But as the text mentions nothing of any previous servitude, it is probable that the deliverance, here spoken of, was only from some incursion of the Philistines, perhaps in plowing-time, when they thought they might be more easily surprised, but in which they were repulsed with loss, by the vigilance and bravery of their then judge.

<sup>1</sup> Judg. iv. 1. v. 8.    <sup>2</sup> Ibid. ver. 18, & seq.    <sup>3</sup> Vid. Ch. v. ver. 6, & 7.    <sup>4</sup> See before, p. 336. a. & (1).    <sup>5</sup> Judg. v. ver. ult.    <sup>6</sup> Ibid. vi. 3, & seq.    <sup>7</sup> Ibid. ver. 11, & seq.    <sup>8</sup> Ver. 13.    <sup>9</sup> Ver. 32.

† Vid. sup. p. 700.

he set about it in the day-time, resolved to finish it that very night, which he accordingly did by the help of ten of his servants, whom he called to the work. This unexpected devastation was no sooner perceived on the next morning, than the whole city came to Joash's house, and, in an insolent manner, demanded that he should deliver up his son to be put to death, for his sacrilege against Baal; but the grave old man soon made them sensible of their absurd zeal for an impotent deity, which could not defend his altar and honour against his son. It is probable he used some other topics to repress their fury; and, that this is only mentioned, because his son got the surname of Jerubaal by it, that is, Let Baal look to himself.

In the mean time the Midianites and their confederates, whether from the jealousy which this action of Gideon might inspire them with, or any other tendency they might observe in the Israelites to revolt, began to cover the spacious plain of Jezreel with their troops. Gideon, on the other hand, had summoned the tribes of Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali, to appear in arms; but whether the sight of so numerous an host, as was preparing against him, had weakened his faith, or that of his troops, he begged for a farther miraculous proof of the divine assistance, which was, that the fleece of wool, which he spread that night on the threshing-floor, might be found on the next morning covered with the dew of heaven, whilst all the ground round about it remained dry. He had no sooner obtained this miracle, and wrung a bowl full of water out of the fleece, but he begged that for a further confirmation of the miracle, and of their faith, the fleece might be the only thing that received no moisture, whilst all the ground round about it was wet. This was also granted at his request; and Gideon, thus assured of a compleat victory, led his small army against the enemy, and encamped over-against them. It consisted but of 32,000 men, which were but a poor handful, compared to those confederate forces of Midian, Amalek, and of the Arabians; but God, who designed to take away all occasion, both from the ungrateful Jews and their enemies, to attribute the success to their number or valour, commanded Gideon to make a proclamation through his army, and to disband all that were faint-hearted; upon which 22,000 of his dastardly troops were immediately dismissed. Gideon by this time thought probably that his army was sufficiently reduced; when he was again commanded to lead it to the water side, and there separate those who went down upon their knees to drink, from those who lapped the water out of the hollow of their hand. There were found but 300 of the latter, and God promised him the victory by them (C), and ordered the rest to be sent away. For a further confirmation, Gideon was commanded to go into the Midianitish camp, attended only by a servant, and there he would be informed what notion his enemies had of him: Upon his coming, he heard one soldier telling a dream to another, of a barley cake tumbling into their camp, and overturning a tent down to the ground, and the other interpreting it of Gideon's sword discomfiting the confederate host. Gideon delayed not to verify the omen: He returned to his 300 men, commanded them to take every man a horn in one hand, and a pitcher with a light concealed in it in the other, and led them into the enemies camp about the dead of night. Here he divided them into three bands, and sent them to give the alarm at three several quarters, by sounding their horns, breaking their pitchers, and discovering their glaring lights at the signal given, which was crying out, The sword of the Lord and Gideon, and which was to be answered by all the rest. The consequence of this stratagem was the total defeat of the confederate

* Ver. 36, & seq.      † See Ch. vii. 12.

(C) It is not easy to guess, from this different manner of their quenching their thirst, whether the 300 were chosen for any particular virtue which this action did indicate, or for the reverse. Some authors think that the 9700, who kneeled down, gave a token of their courage, in that they were not afraid of the nearness of their enemy, but chose to drink at their ease; whilst the others betrayed their cowardice, by being contented with taking a handful of water running, and that God made choice of them, to make the victory appear more miraculous (4). Others, on the contrary, think that those that were weak and disheartened, those kneeled down, and the courageous and strong took the water up with their hand (5). It is hard to decide which is in the right; but the Jews have gone further for a reason why these 300 were preferred; namely, that there was a statue of Baal on the other side the water, so that they scrupled to kneel down to drink, lest they should be thought to pay any worship to the idol; whilst the others, more concerned for their ease than for the honour of God, were set aside, as unworthy to have a share in so signal a victory (6). But the reader may chuse whether he will take their word for there being really any such idol in the way.

(4) See JOSEPH. Ant. lib. vi. c. 8. Rabbin. aliq. TOSTAT. & al.
A LAR. & al. (6) Vid. MUNST. in loc. & sup. p. 598, (F).

(5) DE LYR. MONTAN. CORN.

a confederate army †, and Israel gaining, with their freedom, an immense quantity of the richest spoil.

Gideon, resolving to make the best advantage of this victory, summoned several tribes to pursue after the enemy, and to secure the fords of Belb-bara and Jordan; and the cowardly 22,000, who dared not look the enemy in the face, began now to take courage, when they saw them flying, and to pursue them one way, whilst himself and his 300 men went after another flying party another way. These last went over Jordan, and, by that time Gideon and his men were come to Succoth, they found themselves so faint and tired, that he was forced to send to demand some refreshment for them out of that city, that he might continue his pursuit after the b princes of Midian, Zebab, and Zalmunab; but he had the mortification to be denied by the inhabitants, who sent him word, that it would be time enough for him to exact such a supply of provision, when he brought those two princes prisoners with him. Gideon contented himself, for the present, with threatening to punish the insolent Succothites in the severest manner, and continued his journey with his men, faint as they were, till he came to Penuel, where he again sent the same message, and received the same repulse that he had done at Succoth. Whether the desire of revenge, or his hearing that the two princes, he was in pursuit of, were in the neighbourhood of Korkor with 15,000 men, the poor remains of an army of 120,000, inspired him with fresh vigour, he stopped not his pace till he was come upon them c unawares, and had secured the two princes, and routed the rest of their men.

In the mean time the Ephraimites had overtaken and slain Oreb and Zeeb, two other princes of Midian, and brought their heads to Gideon, as he was returning from Korkor with his two royal prisoners; and whether their success had made them arrogant, or whether they envied their judge's glory, they accosted him with an insolent demand, Why he had not summoned their tribe to the war against Midian? Gideon, instead of repressing their ill-timed arrogance, contented himself at present with extolling their achievement above his own, telling them, that the gleanings of Ephraim's laurels did vastly outweigh the vintage of his own tribe*; and, having pacified them with this soothing answer, went to discharge his resentment against d those who had more richly deserved it, the cities of Succoth and Penuel. Considering the fatigue which he had undergone all that day, and the night before, one would expect that he would have allowed himself some respite, before he went upon so severe an enterprise; but the remembrance of the cruel usage he had received from those two places, and of what he and his men had suffered for want of their assistance, would not allow him to let the sun go down (D), before he had made them suffer the punishment which he had vowed against them. In his way to Succoth, he met with a youth of that place, who gave him the names of seventy seven of its chief magistrates and elders; and when he was entered into the city, after having reproved the inhabitants for their brutish insolence, he caused those seventy-seven men to une dergo a severe correction, as a determent to the rest (E), and at the same time he commanded those of Penuel to be all put to the sword, and their tower to be demolished to the ground†. He then examined his two prisoners, Zebab and Zalmunab, concerning some men whom they had slain at mount Tabor, and understanding, by the description they gave of them, that they were his own brethren, he set aside all thoughts of mercy towards them, and put them to death on the spot‡.

† See before, p. 304. * Judg. viii. 1, & seq. † Ver. 13. ad 17. ‡ 18, & seq. See before, p. 304. c.

(D) The text is somewhat obscure in this place, so that it is not easy to determine, whether the words, before the sun (7), mean, before its going down on that day, or its rising on the next morning. Our version understands it in the latter sense, but the Jews, and the generality of Christian interpreters, in the first. And indeed it is scarce credible, that Gideon and his men could continue a whole day and two nights in action; and if we remember that it was about mid-night when he put the enemies camp to the rout, he had time enough the next day to perform all the rest.

(E) What this punishment was, doth not clearly appear from the text. The literal sense in the place where he threatens it is, I will thrash your flesh with thorns of the wilderness; and where he executes it, it says that he made them feel the thorns. The ancient Jews think that he caused their naked bodies to be flung among thorny bushes, and to be trampled to death (8). Others think that he caused them to be whipt to death, or to have their flesh torn with thorns. Others, that they were only chastised or scourged with thorns; but this last is scarce probable, if we consider that those of Penuel, who were in the same offence, were all put to death.

(7) Judg. viii. 13. (8) Vid. Targ. JONATH. & MUNK. in loc.

THE Israelites being thus delivered from their cruel slavery, and loaden with the spoils of their enemies, began to think they could not shew their gratitude to their brave deliverer, nor secure their new-gotten freedom more effectually, than by offering to settle the supreme authority upon him and his posterity; and Gideon, who had threescore and ten sons by several wives, might easily have been tempted to accept it, had he not been so lately convinced, that their greatest security did chiefly depend upon their obedience to their divine protector; he therefore advised them not to put their confidence in their own strength, or in their general's valour, but in God; and to make sure of his protection, by a stricter obedience to his laws. One would hardly think, that a speech so full of modesty, piety, and disinterestedness, should be the prelude to an action, which sullied both it and all his other glories; and yet he had no sooner modestly refused their offer, but he desired them, as an acknowledgment of his late services, to present him with what golden earrings they had gotten from their enemies. His request was readily complied with, and a garment, being spread upon the ground, was presently covered with those ornaments, amounting to 1700 shekels, or 850 ounces of gold, besides collars, chains, and other ornaments of the same metal (F), and some purple and other costly garments, of which they stripped the confederate princes. With these the Jewish general caused an ephod (G) to be made, which he set up in his own city Opbrab; and the text adds, that it proved a snare both to him, and to his house, because it became the occasion of a new kind of idolatry to the Israelites. As for Gideon, he returned to his own inheritance, and judged Israel forty years; during which, none of their enemies dared to molest them; and as to the Midianites, they received so total an overthrow from him, that they never made any attempt against Israel from that time. Gideon died in a good old age, and was buried with his ancestors (H). As for the Israelites, whom he left in a peaceful and flourishing condition, they forgot both God and him in a very little time. They adopted Baalim,

Year of the
Flood, 1763.
Year before
CHRIST,
1236.

(F) We need not wonder at this great quantity of golden plunder, if we remember that all those eastern nations were fond of such ornaments, and that the Midianites, in particular, not only wore them themselves, but decked the necks of their camels with them, of which they brought vast droves into the field (9).

(G) We have already taken notice of two priestly garments, called by that name from the Hebrew אֶפְרָד Aphad, to tie, because they were tied about with a girdle: The one was a plain linnen vest, such as not only the priests, but even young Samuel wore, when he ministered at the altar (10), and David, when he marched before the ark (11); the other, which was a much richer one, was peculiar to the high-priest. Some learned men have, indeed, affirmed, though without any foundation, that the Jewish kings were allowed to wear them, when they consulted the Lord by Urim (12); but this we have confuted elsewhere †, so that there can be no ground for supposing that Gideon had this made for the same end, as being head of Israel; neither, indeed, could such a garment, how rich soever, have taken up so great a quantity of gold. Some authors, therefore, think it to have been an idol (13); others, only a kind of trophy in memory of that signal victory (14). Some ancient fathers (15), followed by many moderns, believe it to have been some such trophy or monument; and add, that it was made in imitation of the compleat habit of the high-priest, by which he only designed to perpetuate the memory of their miraculous deliverance, without dreaming that the Israelites would go a whoring after it; so that, according to them, he was only the innocent cause of their idolatry, as Moses was, when he made the brazen serpent, which came afterwards to be worshipped. We need not observe the disparity between these two, and that Gideon did that of his own accord, which Moses was commanded to do, and upon a different account: We shall only observe, that the words, and it became a מִקְשָׁא Mokesh, a snare or stumbling-block to Gideon and his family, seems to imply something worse than a monumental trophy, whatever he meant here by the word Ephod; concerning which we can have nothing certain. This may be one reason, tho' not the only one, why Josephus has carefully omitted it, as well as that judge's severity against the men of Succoth and Penuel (16).

(H) Gideon, being also surnamed Jerubaal, is supposed to be the Jerombal whom Sanctioniathon makes priest of the god Jao: But that author's work is now so universally cried down, as a piece of forgery under his name, and as written on purpose to discredit the sacred books of the Jews, that we shall lay no other stress upon this conjecture, than that it proves that the author, whoever he was, had got some knowledge of the Jewish writings, and did intermix their history with the antiquities and fables of the Phenicians (17).

Jerubaal is by David called Jerubesheth (18), because, by that time, Baal's name was had in horror by the Jews, so that, in all the names that ended with it, they substituted that of Besheth, which signifies shame; as Ish-besheth for Ish-baal, and the like.

(9) Vid. Judg. vii. 12, & sup. p. 305. 2. (10) 1 Sam. ii. 18. (11) 2 Sam. vi. 14. (12) SPENCER tr. de Urim & Thum. CUMÆ. Rep. Hebr. l. i. c. 14. † Sup. p. 532. (C). (13) PROCOPI. & al. ap. TOSTAT. (14) CAJETAN. N. DELYR. JUN. MUNST. (15) AUGUST. THEODORET. & al. (16) Vid. Antiq. lib. v. c. 8. (17) De Sanction. vid. ANT. VANDAL. DUPIN. Bibliot. Ext. DODWELL Dissertat. FABRIC. Bibl. Græ. CUMBERLAND, & Journal de Trevoux, Jan. 1714. & al. (18) 2 Sam. xii. 21.

- a Baalim, and Baal-berith (1), and other new gods, and repayed Gideon's services with the blackest ingratitude. He had left, besides his other children by his wives, a natural son, whom he had by a concubine<sup>b</sup>; and he it was who succeeded his father by the most horrid treachery, even by the destruction of his father's whole race.

- His name was Abimelech: He seems to have been a man of a base and intriguing genius, full of ambition and cruelty. The first step he took, after his father's death, was to go to Shechem, where his mother and her kindred dwelt, and to prevail upon them, by their cunning insinuations, to inspire the Shechemites with some terrible jealousies against the sons of Gideon. He was indeed so far from being able to bribe them with gifts, that he wanted to be assisted by them with money; but he made use of other motives equally prevalent, though, it is likely, promises were not wanting to draw them to his party. What he mostly insisted upon was, whether it were better for Israel to have one master or seventy, and whether it were more for the interest of the Shechemites to have their city, or that of Ophrah, to be the seat of the supreme judge? By these and such like insinuations, he obtained from them a sum of seventy shekels of gold, out of the treasury of Baal-berith, with which he hired a number of profligate fellows, capable of the wickedest enterprise, and led them directly to Ophrah, where having surprised his brethren, the seventy sons of Gideon, he murdered them all, except the youngest, upon the spot. This unnatural parricide, which ought to have made him abhorred by all men, but especially by those who had the least grateful remembrance of Gideon, did immediately bring all the Shechemites, and those of Millo, into his interest, who went and proclaimed him king, in some conspicuous part of the plain of Shechem (K), in hopes that all the rest of the nation would follow their example.

- In the interim Jotham, the only surviving son of Gideon, took that time to get upon mount Gerizzim, which was near the place of this tumultuous assembly, and being within their hearing, and out of their reach, made use of the following pathetic apologue, to dissuade them from their rash and unjust enterprise<sup>c</sup>: The trees, once upon a time, assembled to make choice of a king: they offered that dignity to the olive-tree, which answered, that it could by no means divest itself of its oil and fatness, so acceptable to God and men, to reign over them; they then invited the fig-tree, which did also refuse them, on account of its sweetness; the vine, being applied to, preferred her juice, which affords gladness to gods and men, to the empire over them. At length, the

<sup>b</sup> Judg. viii. ad fin.

<sup>c</sup> Judg. ix. ver. 7. ad 21.

(1) We have already mentioned this deity out of bishop Cumberland from Sanctoniaton, in some other parts of this work (19); but it will not be amiss to subjoin to what we have observed in the last note, concerning that supposed author, that this place is the only one in scripture, in which the name of Baal-berith occurs, which signifies the Lord of the covenant, and that the septuagint, vulgate, and some of the Jewish interpreters, render the words not as ours do; they made Baal-berith their god, but bound themselves to the service of Baal by covenant, or by an oath. It is true, we find, in the very next chapter, mention made of the house or temple of Baal-berith, which was in Shechem (20), but as every Baal had a kind of surname, as Baal-peor, Baal-zebub, &c. to distinguish the one from the other, or rather, perhaps, the Baal of one place from that of another, might not the Shechemites surname theirs from the Berith, or covenant by which they had bound themselves? And might not the pretended Sanctoniaton from thence make him the Baal-berytos, to make it appear of Phœnician extraction?

For our part, we think the most natural etymology the best; and that Baal-berith might signify the god that presided over contracts, covenants, and oaths, and punished the breakers of them. It is certain, that the binding the former by the latter was not only a very ancient custom, but also the greatest security that could be insisted upon by the parties, which could only be owing to the received notion that the deity, which was so solemnly called as a witness to them, was bound in justice to punish the breach of them. Hence came the Jupiter the Witness, or the faithful of the Greeks and Romans.

(K) The original has אלון מוצב אשר בשכם, Alon Mutzab Asher be Shechem, the oak of the statue, or pillar that is in the territory of Shechem. The Hebrews, however, translate Alon a plain, instead of an oak, and affirm, that there was some statue or pillar erected in it (20); and we find that there was both an oak and a statue, or monument, and that the latter was erected by Jotham, a little before his death, in memory of the new covenant which the Israelites had made with God at that place (21); so that it seems to be thus circumstantially recorded, to aggravate the crime of the Shechemites, in chusing so remarkable and sacred a spot of ground, to be the scene of their tumultuous assembly, and unlawful election.

As for the house of Millo, which joined with the Shechemites, it is supposed to have been all the kindred of Abimelech's mother, whom Josephus calls Druma (22), and Millo himself is supposed to have been her father. The septuagint and vulgate do render it the city of Millo, but we do not read of any city of that name in all the land of Palestine.

(19) Vid. sup. p. 134 (H). 397. b. U alib.
(22) Ant. l. 5. c. 9.

(20) Vid. MunsT. in loc.

(21) Josh. xxiv. 20.

bramble being invited to accept of that dignity, answered, that, if they really meant to make him king over them, they should come and shelter themselves under its shadow; if not, let fire come out of the bramble and devour the cedars of Lebanon.

HIS design was plainly to insinuate, that the happiness of a private life was so far preferable to the cares that attend on the supreme authority, that the person, who exchanged the one for the other, must either do it from a generous desire of serving his country, or from a base one to enslave it. Some interpreters suppose, that by the olive, the fig-tree, and the vine, he alluded to Othniel, Deborah, and Gideon, who were with difficulty prevailed upon to accept of the dignity of judge, and refused to have it intailed on their posterity<sup>a</sup>; but whether it be so or not, it is plain from his own application, that the bramble alluded to the traitor Abimelech, who was so far from being able to protect the Shechemites, that he must unavoidably prove the occasion of a bloody war, which, like a consuming fire, would end in their utter ruin: For, added he, I appeal to you, whether your choice of Abimelech, preferably to any of the sons of Gideon, your late benefactor and deliverer, be either grateful or just; or rather, indeed, whether the murdering of all his children, for the sake of the son of a slave, be not an instance of the blackest cruelty and ingratitude? if you think it is not, I wish you joy of your new king, and him of his new dignity; but if it is, may he prove a curse to Shechem and Millo, and you to him (L).

AFTER

<sup>a</sup> N. DELYR. & al.

(L) We cannot forbear observing here, that this is the first instance we have of this way of speaking by parables. We do not, indeed, take upon us to attribute the invention of it to the Hebrews, because we do not know how far they might have learnt it elsewhere; though, if that were the case, one may justly wonder that Moses, who was so well versed in all the learning of his time, and had so much occasion for this excellent way of instructing and reproving his stubborn and rebellious nation, should yet never make use of it in all the forty years of his being their leader. Not that it was not in use by other nations in his time, since he mentions those who record the overthrow of Sihon, and of his metropolis, in Proverbs, and Balaam uttering his prophecies in some such proverbial speeches*. But if we may judge of them at this distance, by the short specimen he has given us of them, they were, if not crude and uncouth, at least vastly inferior in elegance and energy to this of Jothan, and others, which were used by the Jews, so that these may be justly said at least to have been the improvers, or rather perfecters of this parabolick way. But be that as it will, nothing is more palpable than the vanity of the Greeks, who boast themselves the authors of it, when it was in a greater perfection among the Jews, before they were civilized from the lowest degree of ignorance and barbarity, than ever they raised it to, after they had arrived to the greatest pitch of polite learning; an evident proof of which we have not only in this speech of Jothan, but in that excellent one, by which the prophet Nathan made David pronounce a severe sentence of condemnation against himself, for a crime, which it would have been dangerous so much as to have mentioned in any other way (23). We find it also frequently used, not by prophets only, but by courtiers, politicians, and soldiers (24) in the old testament, and by our Saviour in the new.

And here we beg leave to vindicate our divine Master from a most unnatural and unjust expression, which not only ours, but most versions make him frequently use, that he spake to the people in parables, that seeing they might not perceive, and hearing they might not understand, lest they should be converted and be saved—according to that saying of the prophet †, He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their hearts, lest they should see—and understand and be converted, and I should heal them (25). The momentousness of the subject will, we hope, atone for the length of the note, since such expressions can hardly be read without horror, or at least without conceiving some very unworthy ideas, both of the Godhead, and of that compassionate Redeemer, who so often bewailed, even with tears, their stupidity and hardness of heart: What part must he be supposed to have acted, who could express so much concern at their unbelief, if his design were to confirm them in it? To what purpose was his three years preaching to them, and his reproving them for their slowness of belief, if his unintelligible way of speaking made it unavoidable to them?

We need not observe here, how contrary this was likewise to the nature and design of parables, which is to reach down to the meanest capacities, by borrowing such examples and expressions, as are best understood by them; at least it is certain, that all those, which our Saviour used, were of this kind, whatever those of the Egyptians, Pythagoreans, and other philosophers might be. So that it is absurd to suppose that he would have made choice of such a plain and simple way of teaching, if his design had been to have confirmed them in their ignorance; neither need we say how opposite it is to his professed design, of coming into the world to save sinners, that none might perish, but have eternal life, nor of his working so many miracles, to give the greater sanction to his doctrine.

We have already observed, that the writers of the New Testament did constantly quote the septuagint version (26), which had translated that passage of Isaiab, and many others of the like nature, in an active sense, which, in the original, implied only a bare permission; and it plainly appears, that both our Saviour and his apostles never understood them in any other sense, from that petition, lead us not into temptation (27), and that exposition of St. James, Let no man say that he is tempted of God, for God tempted no man (28). We may further observe, that whatever language they spoke, they still intermixed the Hebrew or Syriac phrase with it, so that the Greek of the New Testament is best explained either by itself, or by the Syriac idiom. Now

* Vid. Num. xxi. 27, & seq. xxiii. 7, & seq. (23) 2 Sam. xii. 1, & seq. (24) Ibid. xiv. 1, & seq. 1 Kings xx. 38, & seq. xxii. 19, & alib. † Isai. vi. 9, & alib. (25) Matth. xiii. 13, & seq. Mark iv. 11, & alib. (26) Vid. sup. p. 494. (D). & 515. sub fin. (X). (27) Matt. vi. 10. (28) Jam. i. 13.

- a AFTER so bold and severe a speech, Jothan did not think it adviseable to expose himself to Abimelech's resentment, but fled to Beer, a city in the tribe of Judah not far from Jebus, or Jerusalem, where he continued all the time of his reign, which, according to his prediction, proved both thorny and short-lived; for besides his mortification, in not being acknowledged by any of the tribes, the text says, that God sent an evil spirit, that is, caused a spirit of jealousy to be sown between the Shechemites and him, which ended in a full resolution to expiate their folly by his death. But God suffered him to escape for the present, that he might shortly become the instrument of a more severe chastisement against them. Gaal, informed of the hatred which they had conceived against their new made king, came to Shechem, with a full design to blow it into an open rupture, but Zebul, whom Abimelech had intrusted with the government of that city, a fit servant for such a master, failed not to acquaint him with it, whilst, in outward appearance, he sided with Gaal and his party. At length, after several pickerings on both sides, Gaal perceived Abimelech marching towards the town, and went out with his men to oppose him, but was repulsed; and, when he would have re-entered into Shechem, Zebul drove him back. What became of him and his party, the text doth not say, but, upon Abimelech's entering the town, the frightened inhabitants retired into the temple of Baal-berith, as into a sanctuary, where they were soon made sensible, to their cost, what a god they had preferred to that of Israel. Abimelech commanded a party of men to follow his steps into the next wood, where every one, after his example, cut down a bough of a tree, and having piled them round the temple and set fire to them, they were all smothered to death, being about a thousand men and women. He then caused the city and tower to be razed to the ground, and to be strewed with salt; and thus was the first part of Jothan's prophecy fulfilled, and the fire from the bramble burnt up the cedars of Lebanon.

- THE next part followed soon after, and Abimelech, flushed with his success, marched against Thebez, a city of Judah, which had also taken up arms against him, and there met with an ignominious death, where he expected a new conquest. The citizens, repulsed by his victorious troops, retired into a tower, where he thought to have burnt them alive, when a woman flung down a stone, which lighted upon his head, and delivered her people from his fury. Abimelech finding death approaching, and being more ashamed of the hand that gave it, than of his own parricides and tyranny, chose rather to die a second death, than to fall by the hands of a woman, and commanded his servant Zebul to dispatch him, which he immediately

Now if we seek, from either of these, for the true meaning of the text in question, that seeing they might not see, &c. we shall find that the particle which some of the evangelists render by iva, and we by to the end that, is not only capable of several other senses less opposite to the nature of parables, and the design of the gospel, such as though, so as, wherefore, and the like (29), but even of such a one as is exactly agreeable to it, and that it may and ought properly to be rendered, because seeing they do not see, and hearing they do not understand; so that their gross and carnal understanding required the plainest preaching. And if this were the case, we hope any impartial reader will rather think that they used it in this sense, than in that absurd one which the versions give it. The only two particles which both the Hebrew and its derivatives have to express iva, or to the end that, is either כי, Ki, or למאן, Lemah; and both do equally signify because, wherefore, and the like, and nothing but the analogy of the text can fix it; but the translators have often fallen upon the wrong. As to the first, they have rendered it because, where it plainly signifies though, or wherefore, as where it is said that Eli's sons did not hearken to him, because [instead of wherefore] it pleased the Lord to slay them (30), for it were blasphemy to suppose that God did force them to disobedience, that he might destroy them for it. As for the second, it is plain to all that have any knowledge of those tongues, that it signifies as often because, as to the end that; and here we need not quote the authority of lexicons or parallels, since St. Matthew translates it here ὅτι, because, where the others render it iva, that. To his disciples therefore, whose heart had already been prepared for the more sublime truths of the gospel, Christ says, it was given to understand the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; but to the rest, whose hearts were still gross, carnal, and incapable of them, he spake in parables, that is, as our Dr. Sam Clarke observes (31), in such a way as best suited their capacity, was most taking with, and profitable to them, because, as he elsewhere has it (32), parables are examples, or comparisons taken from things known and familiar, and are here put in opposition to mysteries, or truths of a superior nature. The reader may see this point more fully demonstrated by the authors above quoted, and many more (33).

(29) Vid. LE SCENE. Essay on a new vers. p. ii. ch. 5. (30) 1 Sam. ii. 25. Vid. de part. Kt. Buxtorf. Lexic. Hebr. NOLD. Concord. part Hebr. WORST. ALSTAD. AMAM. & al. (31) in Mark iv. 33. (32) in Mark iii. (33) Vid. LE SCENE. & Essay ub. sup. WHITEY, PELLING.

immediately did<sup>1</sup>. This was the exemplary end of Abimelech, whose ambition made him aspire to a dignity, which has justly branded his memory, and sullied the list of the judges; he being the only one that usurped and abused that dignity. It lasted about three years, after which God made choice of a more worthy one to succeed him.

Tholab, sixth judge.

Tholab, the son of Pbuab, the son of Dodo (M), of the tribe of Issachar. The text mentions nothing particularly of him, except that he dwelt at Shamir upon mount Ephraim, where he was buried, after he had judged Israel twenty-three years<sup>m</sup>.

Year of the Flood, 1793.
Year before CHRIST, 1206.

He was succeeded by Jair, a wealthy man, of that part of the tribe of Manasseh which dwelt on the other side Jordan, and possessed a vast territory in the land of Gilead, in which were thirty cities, which he gave to his thirty sons; whence they were called Havoth, or hamlets of Jair<sup>n</sup>. He judged Israel twenty-two years, and was buried in the city of Camon in the same land. The text adds, as a then mark of their wealth and greatness, that they all rode upon asses colts; which is likewise observed of several others in the same book<sup>o</sup>.

THE ungrateful Israelites returned, soon after, to their idolatry, and even multiplied the number of their gods, which brought a fifth thralldom upon them of eighteen years under the Philistines and Ammonites. Here they had recourse again to prayer, and professions of repentance; but they were bid to go and cry to those deities they had adopted, for deliverance. This answer, and the pressing danger they were in from the Ammonites, who had already passed the Jordan, and were going to fall upon Judab and Benjamin<sup>p</sup>, brought them to such a sense of their folly, that they put away all their strange gods, and began to serve the Lord in earnest; upon which God was pleased to give them a promise that they should be speedily delivered. They assembled themselves at Mizpeh, to stop the career of the children of Ammon; but as God had not now nominated a judge or general, as at other times, they found themselves at a loss for an experienced leader; and not finding one among them, either that would take that charge upon him, or whom they dared to intrust with the command of their army, they were forced to send an invitation to the valiant Jephthab to accept of it, and, with it, of the place of judge or general during his life.

Jephthab.

Jephthab was the son of Gilead, but by a concubine, for which reason he was thrust out by his brethren, whom his father had by a lawful wife, and forced to retire into the land of Tob (N), where he became chief of a band of fugitives and idle persons, and signalized himself more by his valour than by his honesty; he therefore received their message with some mistrust, and did not accept of their offered dignity till it was confirmed to him by an oath<sup>q</sup>. As soon as he had put himself at their head, he sent an expostulatory message to the Ammonites<sup>r</sup>; but finding them stiffly bent upon conquest, rather than parly, he ran over the land of Gilead and Manasseh; and, having got a sufficient army, marched directly against them. Before he ventured to engage them, either his fear or superstition put a strange expedient into his head, to make sure of the divine assistance: he made a vow, that, if God would but bless him with an entire victory, he would sacrifice to him the first living creature that came out of his house to meet him at his return; and this inconsiderate promise robbed him at once of the glory, and pleasure, of the ensuing action. The Ammonites were indeed totally defeated, and

Year of the Flood, 1856.
Year before CHRIST, 1143.

His rash vow.

<sup>1</sup> Judg. ix. per tot.    <sup>m</sup> Ibid. x. 1, 2.    <sup>n</sup> Judg. x. 3. vid. & Num. xxxii. 41. Deut. iii. 14.
<sup>o</sup> Vid. Judg. v. 12.    <sup>p</sup> Ibid. x. 9.    <sup>q</sup> Ibid. xi. 10.    <sup>r</sup> Vid. sup. p. 295. b.

(M) The Greek and Latin versions take the word Dodo, not as a proper name, but in a grammatical sense, and from דוד Dod, uncle, with the t affixed, and render it his uncle, meaning Abimelech's, mentioned in the beginning of the verse, whence they suppose Tholab's father to have been Gideon's brother. The Hebrew, indeed, will bear them out in it; but there is one difficulty against them, namely, that Gideon was of the tribe of Manasseh, and Pbuab of that of Issachar; so that they could at the best be but uterine brothers, nor even so, without supposing that their mother had married first in one tribe, and then in the other.

(N) This land is on the most northern part of Manasseh's lot, on the other side Jordan. It is called Toby, and its inhabitants Tobinians, or Tubinians, in the first and second books of the Maccabees (34). As for Jephthab's brethren driving him out of the inheritance, he could not justly complain of it, because it had passed into a constant law ever since Abraham's time, and was founded on the command which God gave him, to cast out the son of the concubine (35).

- a and the Israelites laden with their spoil, as we have seen above ; but his daughter, a virgin, and his only child, and, if we may credit the Jews, a person of exquisite beauty and virtue, proved the unhappy victim of his rash vow. The welcome news of her father's success had brought her out, at the head of a company of maidens, to congratulate him, with timbrels, and dances, and other expressions of filial joy ; so that she proved the unhappy object upon which he cast his eyes, and which he had vowed to destruction. As soon as he saw her, he rent his cloaths, and disclosed the secret to her with most lively expressions of grief. She heard it with a constancy, which one would hardly have expected in a person of her tender years, and only begged for a respite of two months, during which she would retire with b some of her companions into the mountains, to bewail her virginity, it being esteemed a great misfortune for a daughter of Israel to die unmarried. Her request being granted, she absented herself during that short space, and, at the end of it, returned to her father, who did to her according to his vow ; that is, according to the generality of Jewish and Christian interpreters<sup>1</sup>, he offered her up for a burnt-offering : from which came that custom mentioned in the text, for the daughters of Israel to go yearly to lament Jephthab's daughter four days in a year<sup>2</sup> ; or, according to others, he consecrated her to God, and condemned her to perpetual virginity ; so that those yearly visits were payed to her, as compliments of condolence for it, as she was the daughter of an Israelitish judge<sup>3</sup> (O).

THIS

<sup>1</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. v. ch. 9. RABBIN. ser. omn. Chald. paraph. JONATH. in loc. JUST. MART. AMBROS. de off. l. iii. c. 12. HIERON. cont. Jovinian, lib. i. & alib. AUGUST. quæst. in judic. 49. CHRYS. homil. 14. ad pop. Antioch. THEODORET. quæst. in judic. 20. SERAR. SALIAN. GENEBRARD. CAJET. & al. mult. vid. & LUD. CAPEL. & D. CALMET. dissertat. de vot. Jeph. <sup>2</sup> Judic. xi. ver. ult. <sup>3</sup> PACHIN. ARR. MONTAN. TREMEL. MUNST. DRUS. GROT. N. DE LYR. & al. in loc. LE SCEN, Essay on a new vers. ch. vii.

(O) It will be scarcely doubted, that the fable of the sacrifice of Iphigenia had its birth from this ; especially if we remember, that the taking of Troy happened soon after the time of Jephthab. There is indeed this difference, that some of the wiser heathen authors, who relate it, have introduced the goddess Diana interposing herself, to prevent so horrid a sacrifice being offered to her ; whilst the far greater part of the Jews, even Josephus, Philo, and the Chaldeæ paraphrast acknowledge Jephthab to have been suffered by God, by the high-priest, and the whole people, to offer the fruit of his own body, an innocent young virgin, an only child, and a dear and dutiful one, the only object of his present comfort and future hopes, in a burnt-offering unto the Lord, who had so often declared his utter abhorrence against all such abominations, and rejected the Canaanites upon that very account. Some even add, that her life was sacrificed rather to a punctilio of honour, her father thinking it beneath him to go to the high-priest, to be absolved from his unlawful vow ; and the latter being above doing it, unless he were applied to by him. It seems indeed wonderful, that so many of the ancient fathers should have so implicitly followed the Jews, in believing that she was really sacrificed, notwithstanding the apostle to the Hebrews ranking Jephthab among the faithful Jewish worthies. But here it must be remembered, that they had no means of being set right, for want of being acquainted with the original, and consequently of knowing that the text was capable of two different senses, and that the Jews had chosen the least reasonable of the two. But what is most surprising of all is, that so many learned interpreters should still adhere to it, since a better understanding of that tongue has opened the way to the other sense, which is most agreeable both to reason and to the tenor of scripture. However, as what has been urged, on both sides of the question, is too copious, and would swell this note too much, to give our readers even a short abstract of it ; we chuse to refer them to those learned moderns who have wrote on that subject (36), while we content ourselves with justifying the latter sense, as far as the original will bear us out in it. For we doubt not but if we make it appear to be capable of it, our readers will readily absolve the Hebrew judge from so horrid and unnatural a sacrifice, under pretence of religion, though contrary to, and plainly forbidden by it, even when the text expressly says, that the spirit of God came upon him about the time when he made this vow (37) ; rather than to fancy, with some of the fathers (38), that God suffered him to offer up his daughter in the strictest sense, to deter men for the future from making any such rash vows. What has misled all the ancient fathers is, that the Septuagint and the Vulgate render the words of Jephthab, whatsoever cometh forth to meet me, in the masculine, as if he had said, whosoever, or what person soever, cometh forth ; whereas the original is here undeterminate. Again, they did not know that the particle vau may be properly enough taken in the disjunctive sense, or, instead of the conjunctive, and. This is what some judicious criticks, both Jews and Christians, have since clearly shewn to be the right signification, both here and elsewhere (39). So that Jephthab's words should be rendered shall surely be the Lord's, or (not and), I will offer it up for a burnt-offering ; that is, if it be a human creature, he or she, shall be consecrated to the service of God, as some sort of Nazarenes were<sup>4</sup> ; or if a beast, it shall be offered up for a burnt-offering, if it be fit for it, or if not, be exchanged for another that

(36) Vid PACHIN. MONTAN. MUNST. VATABL. DRUS. GROT. CLERIC. DE LYR. MARIAN. CAPEL. MARSHAM. Canon Egypt. sæc ix. § 3. SAUBERT. de sacrific. c. 21. SOBED. de diis German. lib. 2. & al. mult. (37) Judic. xi. 29. (38) Vid. ins. al. CHRYSOST. Homil. ad pop. Antioch. xiv. JUSTIN MART. THEODORET. qu. xx. in Judic. (39) Vide JOS. & DAV. KIMCHI, R. LEVI. BEN. GERM. SOLOM. BEN. MELECH. & au3. Christ. sup. citat. <sup>4</sup> Vide sup. p. 631, 632.

THIS dear-bought victory was like to have proved fatal to him from another a quarter, which he had no reason to expect it from. He was scarce returned to his own house, when the turbulent Epbraimites surrounded it, and in a tumultuous manner threatened to set it on fire, and to burn him and all he had, for having dared to engage the Ammonites, without summoning them to arms. Jephthab, who was not of so gentle a disposition as his predecessor Gideon, did not think is so. What confirms this sense of the vow is, 1. That there were but three sorts of creatures that could be fit for a burnt-offering, according to the Mosaic law; whereas any other creature might as well chance to come out of his doors, as any of these three. 2. It might chance to be an unclean one, such as a dog, an ass, or a hog; which could not be in any way offered to the Lord, but must be exchanged or redeemed. 3. That human sacrifices of any kind, except what was vowed to extermination of the nations condemned by God to it †, (and these could not be said to be offered up in burnt-offerings) were expressly forbidden (40). And, 4. That there was an express redemption for vows relating to human creatures, and the price of it appointed by God (41). It were therefore absurd to suppose, either that Jephthab would have vowed to offer the first creature indifferently that came out of his house, a burnt-offering unto God, without distinction of clean and unclean, fit and unfit; or if he had, that the priest would have suffered him to put it in execution, when the victim vowed proved an unlawful and redeemable one, and would have been an abomination to God, as well as a scandal to all the world. For these plain reasons, we think, with those learned men above quoted, that the words ought rather to have been rendered thus: *Then the spirit of God came upon Jephthab—and he vowed a vow unto the Lord, and said, If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into my hands, it shall be, that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house, to meet me when I return in peace,—shall surely be the Lord's, or I will offer it up for a burnt-offering.—And Jephthab came to Mizpeh to his house, and his daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and dances, and she was his only child.—And when he saw her, he rent his cloaths, and said, Alas, my daughter, thou hast brought me very low, thou art one of those that trouble me; for I have opened my mouth unto the Lord, and I cannot go back.—And she said unto him, If thou hast opened thy mouth to the Lord, do to me according to thy word—only, let this thing be done for me; let me—bemoan my virginity two months.—And it came to pass at the end of two months, that she returned to her father, who did with her according to his vow, and she never knew man; that is, she continued a virgin. And it became a statute or custom in Israel that the daughters of Israel came four days in the year לִתְנוּת, Lethanoth, to condole or converse with the daughter of Jephthab.—*

Here then Jephthab's vow is taken in the first sense, shall be the Lord's; that is, the vowed thing, proving to be his only daughter, he consecrated her to the service of God. For this reason it is added, וְהָיָה לַיהוָה לֵאמֹר Vehi lo yadkab ish, and, so, she did not know man; that is, from that time to her death. For it would have been superfluous to have added that circumstance, if he had sacrificed her as soon as she came from bemoaning her virginity. As for the verb תָּנָה Thanab, which so many versions render to bemoan, were it capable of no other signification, yet would it not imply the bewailing of her death, but her being condemned to perpetual virginity, which was reckoned one of the greatest misfortunes that could happen to an Israelitish maid. But it is plain that it signifies also to condole, to converse with, to declare, or extol. In this last sense, the reader will find it used in the same book, chap. v. ver. 11. where it is said, that they יִשְׁתְּחוּ Jistahu shall rehearse or extol the righteous acts of the Lord. So that here the Israelitish maids might go, either to condole her for being secluded from man, or to extol her piety and constancy in ratifying her father's vow.

There are but two things objected against this sense of the text; the first is, that the Mosaic law did not allow parents a power to oblige their children to a single life. But, besides that the argument is much stronger against their power of sacrificing them to the flames, we find, that the children, when of age, might consent to the vow; and this seems to be the reason why the text adds, that she readily ratified it (42). But it is plain, moreover, that parents had a very great power, to impose severe and grating laws, not only on their children, but also on their posterity; as when the son of Rehob forbid all his descendants the drinking of wine, dwelling in houses, and the like (43). Though were it not so, one could only say, that Jephthab, as a judge, stretched his power beyond what he might do as a father, though without such a degree of barbarity, as if he had offered her up in the other sense.

The next thing that is objected is, that the grief, which Jephthab expressed at the sight of his daughter, seems to imply some heavier fate, than a bare doom to perpetual virginity. But it ought to be remembered, that he thereby deprived an only child, and a dear one, of the greatest happiness of life; for such was marriage, especially when blessed with children, esteemed in Israel; and himself of all hopes of any posterity. Where is then the wonder that he should use such expressions of grief, when his only child was condemned to such a reproachful and uncomfortable life, and himself excluded thereby from the prospect of having the Messiah to come of his seed (44)?

Since then the original is capable of so much fairer, and more natural a sense, it were absurd to prefer the other, which is both contrary to reason, nature, the Mosaic law, and the analogy of faith; and has been the source of endless disputes and superfluous inquiries, how far this inhuman sacrifice was, or was not, justifiable, commendable, and pleasing to God; and how far Jephthab's barbarous faith entitled him to be ranked among the Hebrew worthies (45). Concerning all which, the reader may consult those ancient fathers above quoted, and several others (46); for whom there is only this to be said, that they had no version, but the Greek and Latin to steer by, backed with the testimony of the ancient Jews. A late commentator (47) however has since endeavoured to vindicate the notion of Jephthab's

† Vid. sup. p. 630. & seq. (40) Deut. xii. 31. & alib. (41) Levit. xxvii. 1. & seq. (42) Judg. xi. 36. vid. & Num. xxx. pass. (43) Vide Jerem. xxxv. 6. & seq. (44) Vide LA SCENE. & Essay on a new vers. ch. viii. § 9. (45) Heb. xi. 32. (46) Vide AUGUST. quest. 49. in Judic. HIERON. lib. i. cont. Jovinian. & epist. ad Julian. AMBROS. lib. iii. de offic. c. 12. TH. AQUIN. secund. § 2. qu. 88. (47) CALMET. Dissert. de vot. JEPH. comm. in Judic. & Diss. sub voc. Jephth.

- a think it worth the while to sooth their pride with a flattering speech ; on the contrary, he upbraided them with their baseness, in not answering his summons, and leaving him to bear the brunt of the enemy. These reproaches stung them so to the quick, that they scrupled not, in the height of their resentment, to call the Gileadites a pack of spurious fugitives, a kind of mongrels, between Ephraim and Manasseh. There wanted nothing more to exasperate the Gileadites, who were of that half tribe of Manasseh, which was seated on the other side of Jordan. A bloody fight ensued, in which those of Ephraim were discomfited with a great loss, and the Gileadites, having seized the fords of Jordan, suffered none of those who had escaped from the slaughter to live. Their method was, to examine all
- b that offered to cross that river, whether they were Ephraimites ; which was easily done, by making them pronounce the word SHIBBOLETH, which signifies an ear of corn, and which those of that tribe were known to pronounce SIBBOLETH ; so that as many, as were caught by that snare, were immediately knocked on the head ; and this unhappy contention occasioned the loss of 42,000 Ephraimites. As for Jephthah, we read no more of him, except that he judged Israel six years ; by which is only meant, that part of it which was on the other side of Jordan ; and that he was buried in ( one of ) the cities of Gilead *. This has given birth to two Jewish fables, very opposite to one another ; the first is, that he was smitten with a sore disease, as a punishment for his impious vow, which rotted all his limbs one after another ; so that there was hardly one city in the land of Gilead in which he did not drop one of them. The other is, that the Gileadites, in memory of the great deliverance they obtained by him, dissected his body, that every city might have some part, to keep as a monument of it *.

Year of the
Flood, 1862.
Year before
CHRIST,
1137.

- Jephthah* was succeeded by Ibzan, whom the Jewish rabbies will have to be the same with Boaz, who married Ruth the Moabitess *, but without any foundation. This was their 10th judge, a native of Bethlehem ; but whether that which belonged to the tribe of Zebulun †, or that which belonged to that of Judab, is not certain. He is only recorded for his numerous posterity, namely, thirty sons and as many daughters, whom he lived to see all married ; so that he had 120 sons and daughters, and sons and daughters in law, besides grand-children. This was looked upon as a great blessing in Israel. He judged seven years ‡, and was succeeded by

Elon, of the tribe of Zebulun, who judged Israel ten years §. He was buried in Elon Ajalon, in his own tribe, and succeeded by Abdon, who was the son of Hillel, of the tribe of Ephraim, and native of Pirathon in the mount of the Amalekites in the same tribe, where he was buried, after having judged Israel eight years. He is recorded for his numerous issue, having left behind him forty sons and thirty grandsons, who rode on as many asses colts, after the manner of the great men in Israel ¶.

* Judg. xii. 7.
Judg. xii. 8.

† Vid. MunsT. in loc.

‡ Judg. xii. 8. & seq.

§ Ruth iv. 8. & seq. Matth. i. 5. vid. MunsT. in ¶ Ibid. ver. 11. Ibid. ver. 13, 14.

thab's daughter being really sacrificed according to the latter, and the opinion of the fathers ; though without pretending to justify either the vow, or the execution of it. In order to which, he insists strenuously, 1. that he did not vow the first thing, but the first person that came out of his house. But we have already proved the contrary above ; and it is a wonder, that he, who seems well versed in the Hebrew, should not have been sensible of it. He next insists upon an express text in the law concerning vows (48), that whatsoever is vowed unto the Lord of men shall not be redeemed, but shall surely be put to death. But, if this be the purport of that command, there is at once an end of all enquiry, concerning the lawfulness both of Jephthah's vow, and of all other human sacrifices. Had our author consulted the learned Selden (49), he would have found it fully proved, not only against Capellus and others, that the parents had no such power over their children, but even against the Jews, that masters had it not over their slaves ; and that the question in this law is not about things, or men, vowed for burnt offerings, which was absolutely forbidden, but about such as were devoted by חֵרֶם Cherem Anathema, to utter extermination, of which kind were the inhabitants, and all the plunder of Jericho (41), of the Amalekites, of the king of Arad and his people, of the inhabitants of Jabesh Gilead (42), and of the seven nations of Canaan. But of this Cherem we have had occasion to speak already, and shall dwell no longer upon it †. It is plain, therefore, that these two places are nothing to our author's purpose, and that the whole tenor of the scriptures is against it ; so that we see no reason to depart from the contrary opinion.

(48) Levit. xxviii. 29. (49) De Jur. Nat. & Gent. sec. discipl. Hæb. c. 4. & seq. (41) Jeph. vi. pass. & alib. (42) Num. xxi. 2. Judg. xxi. 9, 10. † Vide sup. p. 630. vide & SELD. ub. sup.

PATRIC. GROT. LE CLERC. & al. in Levit. xxviii. 28, 29.

WE read of no slavery, war, or defection, during the life of these three last a judges; whether it were that the swords of Gideon and Jephthab had too far weakened their enemies, or that their own valour did both intimidate them, and kept the Israelites from running into those idolatries, which were attended with the loss of peace and liberty. The latter seems indeed the most probable, because we find, that, after the death of the last of these, they relapsed, and suffered a heavy yoke of forty years under the Philistines c.

Eli.

THIS sixth slavery began about the seventh month after Eli joined, in his own person, the dignity of judge to that of high-priest d. He was of the family of Ithamar, the younger branch of Aaron's house; and the high-priesthood had been translated into it from the elder one of Eleazar (P). It is indeed surprising, that the people should have continued so long free from defection during the lives of their lay judges, and fall into idolatry under the government of an high-priest. But Eli is particularly recorded for his indolence and remissness, especially towards his two sons, whom he suffered to run into the greatest excesses of debauchery and irreligion, to the great scandal of all Israel e. However, he was the only ruler the Israelites had during this long thralldom; and seems to have been chosen by God, as the properest judge for them at that time; for, as he was known to be incapable of undertaking any thing for their deliverance, he was the fittest to withdraw their usual confidence in an arm of flesh, and to make them look up to heaven for relief. Accordingly, when the severity of their thralldom had brought them to a better sense, God sent them a deliverer, who was altogether wonderful from his conception to his death.

Samson.

Year of the
Flood, 1838
Year before
CHRIST,
1161.

HE was the miraculous son of old age and barrenness. His birth and prowess had been foretold by an angel, first to his mother, then to Manoah his father, a native of Zorab in the tribe of Dan, with a strict charge to the mother, that she should abstain both from wine and strong drink, and from all unclean meats, during her pregnancy; and that no razor should come on the child's head all his life, because he was to be a Nazarite from his birth. Samson, for that was the name which his parents gave him (Q), began to give some early marks of extraordinary courage and strength; and the text says, that the spirit of the Lord began to move him at times in the camp of the Dannites, between Zorab and Eshthol f, the place of his abode.

How he plagued the Philistines during his twenty years government, and was at length betrayed into their hands by a treacherous harlot, shorn and bereaved of his strength and eyes, become the object of their scorn and revenge, and how, after near a year's miserable servitude, he buried, with himself, all the Philistine nobles, under the ruins of a magnificent structure; we have seen in the history e Judg. xiii. 1. d Vid UssER. Ann. sub A. M. 2848. and the chronolog. index at the end of our Bibles. Year before Christ 1256. e 1 Sam. ii. 12. & seq. f Judg. xiii. pass.

(P) This thralldom is computed by the chronologers cited above, not to have ended till seven months after Eli's death, when the ark was brought back from the land of the Philistines.

We have already spoken in another place † of this translation of the high-priesthood, from the elder to the younger branch of Aaron's family. We need only take notice here, that though we find no mention of any other high-priest of the elder branch from Joshua to Samson, that is, during 300 years, except Phineas the son of Eleazar; yet the book of the Chronicles mentions (43) three others, namely, Abishua, Bukki, and Uzzi; called by Josephus (44), Abiezer, Boccejas, and Ozier. It is uncertain how long any of them lived; but by the dignity being transferred to Eli, about the year before CHRIST 1156, it is reasonably supposed to have passed from Uzzi to him, rather than from his son Merajoth.

(Q) It is not easy to dive into the etymon of this name; that which comes nearest to it is still somewhat forced, being derived from שמש Shemesh the Sun, and the feminine Syriac pronoun ʾan their, their Sun, which, as some pretend, prognosticated the rising of the Hebrews, and setting of the Philistines (45). Others derive it from the Chaldees שמש Shamsh in piel, which signifies to minister or serve, as the sun doth, to all the world. Josephus says, that Samson signifies robust (46); by which it is plain, he knew nothing of Hebrew, or its derivatives. However, we have observed more than once, that there is little credit to be given to etymologies, especially when they are so far fetched as this is, that it is not worth a further enquiry.

Our archbishop Usher places Samson's birth in the second year of their thralldom, and gives this substantial reason for it, that he is said to have avenged the Israelites twenty years (47), and that he can scarcely be supposed to have entered into this office before the 18th year of his age (48).

† See before, p. 634. a, b. & not. (S). (43) 1 Chron. vi. 4, 5. & 50. (44) Ant. lib. 5. c. ult. (45) Vid. vocabul. Hebr. & St. PHILIP. in vit. Samson. (46) ANT. lib. 5. c. 10. (47) Judg. xv. ver. ult. (48) Vid. UssER. sub A. M. 2849.

- a history of that nation †. The text adds, that he destroyed a greater number of his enemies by his death, than he had done in his life-time; and that his friends and relations, hearing of it, came and fetched his body away, and buried it in the sepulchre of his ancestors * (R).

- THOUGH this extraordinary slaughter of the Philistine nobility did not put an end to their slavery, yet it inspired the Israelites with fresh courage to attempt the regaining their liberty. But their horrid wickedness proved an invincible obstacle to their success. Eli, their judge, was almost an hundred years old <sup>a</sup>; and his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, who acted under him, took the advantage of his extreme weakness, to commit the greatest abominations. The scripture brands them with <sup>Hophni and Phinehas.</sup> some of the vilest characters; such as, that they were sons of Belial; that they knew not the Lord; that they committed such infamous irregularities in the service of the <sup>Year of the Flood, 1834.</sup> tabernacle, as caused the people to abhor the offering of the Lord; that they debauched <sup>Year before CHRIST, 1165.</sup> the women that assembled at the door of the tabernacle, and that their crimes were very great <sup>1</sup>: by all which one may easily guess to what excess of wickedness a people, so natural prone to it, must have run, under such profligate governors. Eli was not ignorant of all this; and yet, instead of inflicting some exemplary punishment upon his sons, or at least of discarding them from their office, and bestowing it upon persons of more zeal and integrity, he contented himself with giving them a gentle reproof; so gentle, indeed, that he seems not to have had the courage to tell them that their actions were vile and abominable, but only that they were not good <sup>b</sup>. No wonder then if such an expostulation made so little impression on those two profligate young men (S).

THIS remissness, in a high-priest and a judge, was so displeasing to God, that he sent a prophet to upbraid him with his ingratitude, and to assure him, that the high-priesthood should be taken from his house; that his two sons should be cut off in one day; and that the survivors of his family should pine away with utmost poverty and misery <sup>1</sup>. This heavy sentence was again confirmed by God to young Samuel in a vision, and by him related unto Eli.

- Samuel* was the child of age and barrenness, obtained by the prayers of his mother, dedicated to God by a solemn vow, and entered into his service at the age of three years <sup>a</sup>. As he grew up, he was appointed to minister to Eli in the holy functions, girded with a linnen ephod, and to open and shut the doors of the tabernacle. One morning, before break of day, as he lay in his bed near unto Eli's chamber, he heard himself called, and ran to him, supposing it had been he that had called him. Eli bad him return to his bed this time, and the next; but, upon his coming the third time, he began to think that there was something extraordinary in that voice, and directed young Samuel what answer to make, if he should be called again, as he was accordingly soon after. It was then

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 348. & seq.    <sup>b</sup> Judg. xvi. 30, 31.    <sup>c</sup> 1 Sam. iv. 15.    <sup>d</sup> Ibid. ii. 12 & seq.
<sup>e</sup> Ibid. ver. 24.    <sup>f</sup> Ibid. ver. 27 ad fin.    <sup>g</sup> 1 Sam. i, ii, & iii. pass.

(R) Josephus places the history of Ruth after the death of Samson (49), contrary to the greater part of the Jerus (50), who think Boaz to have been the same with Ibzan the 10th judge of Israel, as we hinted above, because he was of Bethlehem, and that there is some conformity in their names. But they are both palpably out of all chronology. Some of our chronologers place it in the time of Deborah (51); others, under Gideon; but the most probable opinion is, that which places it in the time of Samgar, the 3d judge, about 120 years after Josua (52).

As for the book itself, it is plain, it was not written before David's time, because he is named in the genealogy of Boaz (53), though the story appears to have happened in the time of some one of the judges, by the very first verse of it.

(S) Were we to follow the sense of our own and some other versions, we should be apt to attribute their incorrigibleness to what is said in the 25th verse of the 2d chapter, that they hearkened not to the voice of their father, because the Lord would slay them. Would not any one be apt to conclude from thence, that it was with design to destroy them, that God thrust them headlong into this disobedience? We therefore beg leave here to remind our readers, that the conjunction כי Ki, which is rendered because, doth often signify, and ought, both here and in several other places (54.) to have been translated wherefore, or though; so that the sense will be, they did not hearken to their father, wherefore it pleased the Lord to slay them; or, they hearkened not—though the Lord threatened to slay them for their disobedience (55).

(49) Ant. lib. 5.    (50) Targ. in Ruth. Talm. Hieros. RR. SALL. KIMCHI. LEVI. Ben David. ABR. ZACCUT. & al.    (51) TOSTAT. TREMEL. DE LYR. GENEBR. & al.    (52) USSER.    (53) Ruth, ch. ult. ver. ult.    (54) Int. al. Gen. viii. 21. Jerem. vii. 10. Ps. lxxviii. 19.    (55) Vid. BUXTORF. Lexic. Hebr. NOLD. concord. part Hebr. AMAM. Grammat. Hebr. ALSTED. VORST. LE SCAM. & al.

Year of the
Flood, 1858.
Year before
CHRIST,
1141.

then that God revealed to him the heavy judgments he had denounced against Eli's house. Samuel was fearful of disclosing the dreadful purport of the vision, till strictly charged and adjured to it by him, after which he became known from the one end of the kingdom to the other, to be a prophet of the Lord, and to be established judge in Israel in Eli's stead * (T).

NOT long after this, the Israelites, being repulsed in an attempt against the Philistines, with the loss of 4000 men, took it into their heads to bring the ark of God into their camp, in hopes, at least, that it would strike a terror into their enemies, and inspire the people with more than ordinary courage; but the consequence of this wild project was, that they lost both the battle and the ark †, and the two sons of Eli that bare it, their lives all in one day. The old priest, who waited with impatience to hear of the success of the battle, had seated himself on a bench in the high-way to Shiloh, being under the greatest concern for the ark of God; and, as soon as he heard the news of its being taken by the enemy, he fainted away, and, falling backward from his seat, broke his neck and died. His daughter in law likewise, Phinehas's wife, being then near her time, fell in travel upon receiving all these dreadful news, and testified the excess of her grief by calling the child she was delivered of I-chabod, to signify that the glory of Israel was departed, and expired immediately after °. Phinehas left another son named Abitub, who is supposed to have succeeded his grand-father Eli in the high-priest's office, because we find his son Abiath in that dignity in Saul's time †; from whom it passed to Abimelech his brother, who was killed by that jealous prince ‡, and from him to his son Abiathar, who was the last of Eli's race that enjoyed it. But as to the government, it was given by God to Samuel, a man of uncommon zeal and courage, and fit to reduce the Israelites from their abominable defection and idolatry. This was, indeed, what he applied himself to with good success, being feared and revered by all Israel, who knew him to be the chosen prophet of God, and that none of his words fell to the ground.

WHAT betided the ark of the covenant, and those that kept it captive; and its being sent back, we have already seen *. Its wonderful and unexpected return to Bethshemesh caused an universal joy in all the people, who came crowding from all the adjacent parts to feast their eyes with the sight of it, it being then the time of harvest. The field where it stopped had in it a large stone, upon which the priests and levites offered up the two milch-kine, that brought it, for a burnt-offering. This was accompanied with several others, which the inhabitants of the * 1 Sam. iii. 1. & seq.

† Ibid. xxii. 16, & seq.

† See before, p. 350. b. c.
* Before, p. 351, 352.

* 1 Sam. 12. to the end.

† Ibid. xiv. 3.

(T) Samuel was of the tribe of Levi, of the branch of Kobath; but because he exercised several priestly functions, such as anointing of Saul and David, offering up sacrifices even out of the tabernacle, his wearing a linnen ephod, and being named by the Psalms, with Moses and Aaron, the priests of the Lord (56); some ancient fathers have thought him to have been of the race of Aaron, and to have performed the function of high-priest after the death of Eli and his two sons (57). Josephus seems to hint something like it, when he says, that Saul knew him to be Samuel, when he appeared to the witch of Endor in a priestly vest (58), though he calls his father a plain Levite, where he speaks of his birth (59); but it appears from the Chronicles, that he was of the branch of Kobath, the second son of Levi (60), and as for his wearing an ephod, David did the same (61), and Gideon, Manoah, Saul, Elijah, and others, who were neither priests nor levites, have sacrificed upon particular occasions; and some prophets, and even their disciples, have anointed kings (62). As to the passage in the Psalms, he is only mentioned there among them that call upon the Lord; by which may be meant, either the Levites in general, whose office it was; or else, as is more likely, from the next verse, among them that called to God effectually, so as to be heard by him, as Moses and Aaron did; but who did officiate in the high-priest's function after Eli's death, is neither easy nor of moment to guess, but more probably one of the Aaronic race than a Levite.

One expression, however, in the threatening message of the prophet to Eli, would make one think that some person of the elder branch was chosen to the high-priesthood, even in his life-time, either by reason of his inability, being grown almost blind with age, or for his remissness, or both. The words are, and thou shalt see an enemy in my habitation, in all that wealth God shall give Israel (63); where it is to be observed, that the word 73 Yzar, which we render an enemy, doth signify a rival; and is used in that sense in the very beginning of this book (64). Now it is plain, that this rival could be no other than some head of the elder branch of Eleazar, from whom the priesthood had been transferred to him; but we will not affirm any thing further about it.

(56) Pf. xcix. 6. (57) AUGUST. in Pf. xcvi. cont. Faust. & alib. CHRYSOST. AMBR. & al. vid. MENDEZ. in 1 Reg. ii. (58) Ant. lib. vi. c. 15. (59) Ibid. lib. vi. c. 11. (60) 1 Chron. vi. 22, & seq. (61) 2 Sam. vi. 14. (62) Vid. int. al. 2 Kings ix. 1, & seq. (63) 1 Sam. iii. 32. (64) Ibid. i. 6.

- a the place sacrificed there ; after which, the ark and trespass-offering were deposited upon the same stone. But their joy was soon after unhappily turned into mourning, through the irreverence of the Bethshemeshites, whom an imprudent curiosity inticed to look into the sacred symbol of the divine presence, and for which fifty thousand and seventy men were punished with immediate death (V). This terrible slaughter struck such terror into them, that they sent to the inhabitants of Kirjath-jearim, a city in the neighbourhood of Bethshemesh, and in the tribe of Judab, desiring that they would fetch the ark away from them ; which they accordingly did, and placed it in the house of one Abinadab, which stood on the highest part of the city, where it continued till David's time, that is, about seventy years, and consecrated
- b his son Eleazar to be the keeper of it (W).

It may indeed be justly wondered why the ark was not either sent back to Shiloh, where the tabernacle and its sacred utensils stood, or that these were not at least brought to Kirjath-jearim. But whatever be the reason of this irregularity, Samuel, who acted by this time both as prophet and judge, took occasion from the people's assembling in great multitudes before the ark, to lament their not yet recovered liberty ; to persuade them to put away Astharoth and the other strange deities from among them, and to serve the Lord alone ; upon which condition only, he could promise them a speedy deliverance from the Philistine yoke. The people readily complied, and afterwards assembled themselves at Mizpeh according to his appointment, where they fasted and prayed, and expressed all the tokens of a lively repentance. This unusual meeting gave an umbrage to the Philistines, who immediately took up arms, and came up against them ; but Samuel, having offered up a sucking lamb for a burnt-offering, did by his prayers obtain such a storm of thunder and lightning, as quite discomfited their enemies, whom the Israelites pursued with a great slaughter unto Beth-car. In memory of this signal victory, Samuel caused a great stone to be erected between Mizpeh and Sen, which he called Eben-ezer, or the stone of help ; and, from that time to Samuel's death, the Philistines were so far from making any further attempt against Israel, that they suffered them to recover all the cities and fortresses which had been taken from them, from Ekron even unto Gath, and the territories about them †. At the same time the Israelites were at peace with the Amorites, so that the land enjoyed a profound peace all the time of Samuel's government ; whilst he, to make it easier to the people, left Ramah, his usual residence and the place of his nativity, once a year to take a circuit round Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpeh, to administer judgment ; and then returned to his own city, where he had built an altar unto God, and whither the people might resort unto him at all other times * (X).

Year of the Flood, 1120.
Year before CHRIST, 1879.

* 1 Sam. vi. p. tot.

† Sup. ibid.

* 1 Sam. vii. to the end.

(V) This is what ours, and most other versions, make the original to say ; for which reason we have not dared to depart from it, though we own, with the learned Bocbart, that we can neither conceive how there could be such a multitude of people in a village on the borders of Judra, nor how it could be consistent with the goodness of God, to make such a slaughter of those men, who came with joy to receive the ark, supposing such a number could really have all looked into it.

But we beg leave to observe here, that the original is capable of a two-fold sense, besides this in our version, both which do greatly lessen that number, and remove the difficulty. The first is that of Bocbart, above-mentioned (65), who shews, that it ought to have been rendered fifty men of a thousand, instead of fifty thousand, that is, in all, seventy ; because, as he observes rightly after St. Jerom (66), it is not usual in the Hebrew to make the thousands go before the inferior numbers when they make up a total sum, but they constantly begin with the lesser number, and end with the greater. Josephus has took it in the same sense (67), and reckons but seventy slain.

The other sense is, that there were slain seventy men בָּעָם, Babam, of the common people, and חֲמִישִׁים אֶלֶף, Chamishim aleph ib, fifty of the heads, or captains of the people ; for the word אלף signifies also a leader, or captain. This seems to have been the opinion of Junius, though he has retracted it since, or Tremellius for him, to adhere to the vulgar one, though without giving any reason for his so doing (68). In memory of the mourning which their death caused among the people, the stone, or rock, upon which the ark rested, when they looked into it, was called אֶבֶן אֵבֶל Eben Abel, the stone of mourning.

(W) Some have fancied that this Abinadab was of the race of Aaron, or at least a Levite, though without any visible grounds, or indeed, any necessity ; since he was to be but a bare keeper of the ark, and that, perhaps, no longer than till some proper priests and Levites were sent for from Shiloh to minister before it.

(X) It appears from thence, that Samuel left Shiloh soon after the death of Eli, and the taking of the ark, and that he never returned thither, at least to dwell. It is indeed probable, that the ark being

(65) Phaleg. sub Bethshemesh, vid. & Lx Scen. Essay on a new vers. part 2. ch. 6. § 4.

(66) in

Hebdom. Dan. (67) Ant. l. vi. c. 2. (68) Vide Trem. in loc.

By that time Samuel had judged Israel twenty years, with great integrity and <sup>a</sup> applause, he had the mortification to hear that his two sons, Joel and Abiah, whom he had, in his latter days, made judges at Beersheba (Y), did not follow their father's steps, but suffered themselves to be bribed to pervert judgment; upon which account, he saw himself surrounded by the elders of Israel, who desired him, that he would appoint to them a king, who might be a judge over them, and that they might be like other nations, since his sons were not worthy to succeed him in his office. Such a proposal could not but be highly displeasing to him, who plainly foresaw the danger of such horrid ingratitude, and that, by casting off the government of God over them, they would make themselves unworthy of his protection. He expostulated with them, he upbraided them with their ingratitude, <sup>b</sup> and forewarned them of their danger, and, among other dissuaves, he laid before them all the mischiefs and grievances they were likely to suffer from a king, in the most lively terms. In a word, he omitted nothing that could possibly divert them from their design; but all to no purpose, till God commanded him to hearken to them, and to set such a king over them, as he should direct. Whereupon Samuel, having promised to comply with their demand, dismissed them for the present; and Saul was soon after appointed by God to be the first king of Israel.

S E C T. VII.

The History of the Jews, under their Monarchical Government.

<sup>c</sup> SAUL was the son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin; he was a very comely youth, well-shaped, and taller by the head and shoulders than the common size. He had been sent with a servant, about the time of the Israelites defection, to seek after some strayed asses; and, after three days useless search, his man advised him to go to Ramah, near unto which they were then come, and enquire of the prophet Samuel, what he should do next. Samuel, who knew him to be the person appointed by God to the regal dignity, and was then going to bless <sup>d</sup> a sacrifice which was held in that city, took that opportunity to introduce him to the feast, where he set him in the highest place, and distinguished him from all the other guests, by a particular dish of meat set before him above the rest. He detained him all that night, and, on the morrow early, he called him up to receive his directions, and accompanied him some part of the way; and having commanded his servant to go on before <sup>e</sup>, he poured the oyl upon his head, and saluted him king of Israel. Saul behaved, during all this ceremony, with extraordinary modesty, alledging the smallness of his tribe and family, as an argument of his being unfit for so high a dignity; but the prophet assured him, that he should find himself endowed with such a superior portion of God's spirit, as would give him a new heart, and quite new disposition, so that he would shortly feel himself quite another man. He then gave him some further directions relating to the occasion of his journey, and his return home, and, taking his leave of him for that time, left him to overtake his servant. Among other things that Samuel told him should befall him in his way home, one was, that he would be met by a company of prophets, and that he would then receive the spirit of prophecy, and prophesy with them. This, as well as the rest, came to pass accordingly, and the surprise with which those of his acquaintance beheld it, occasioned that saying, which pass afterwards

Saul, first king of Israel.

Year of the Flood, 1904.
Year before CHRIST, 1095.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. ch. viii. 1, & seq.    <sup>b</sup> Ch. ix. p. tot.

being removed from thence, all kind of religious ceremonies had ceased there; for which reason it is said, that he built an altar at Ramah, the place of his residence, that the people might resort to him, either for judgment, or to offer sacrifices to God. This thing, however, was far from being according to the Mosaic law; but it seemed a case of necessity, because the ark being at one place, and the tabernacle in another, neither of them could be properly resorted to for sacrificing, or any other part of public worship.

(Y) This Samuel had probably done, either to try how they would behave themselves in that important post, or perhaps for the convenience of those who lived at too great a distance from Ramah; Beersheba being at one extremity of Israel, as Dan was on the other. Josephus adds, that he appointed the eldest to keep his residence at Bethel, and the other at Beersheba, and ordered them to take a yearly circuit at proper places, so as that each should have one half of Israel to his share (69); but the text says nothing of it.

(69) Ant. l. vii. c. 3.

a afterwards into a proverb, Is Saul also among the prophets * ! Soon after this Samuel called all the heads of Israel to Mizpeb, and caused them to present themselves by their tribes before the Lord ; and as they passed in their order, that of Benjamin was taken ; then were the families of it called, and that of Matri was taken, and next to that the son of Kish †.

WHILST this was a doing, Saul, who knew where the lot would fall, had hid himself so well among some household lumber, that they could not find him, till they were directed to him by the Lord ; and as soon as he was brought out, Samuel presented him to the people as the person whom God had chosen to be their head, and immediately the air rang with the people's shouts, Long live the king. Here

b Samuel, who, at their first tumultuous meeting, had forewarned them of all that a king might do in the plenitude of his power, and what they had to fear from him, did now think it necessary to inform him, before the assembly, of what he ought to do, and what to avoid. He therefore read to them the laws which had been prescribed before, by God himself to Moses : laws which were equally levelled against tyranny and anarchy ; and to which he perhaps added some others, as he was a prophet ; because it is added, that he caused them to be written, and deposited by the ark ‡, where those, we read in Deuteronomy concerning the duty of a king, had been before laid up by Moses. Saul being thus proclaimed and anointed king of Israel, Samuel dismissed the assembly, and the new king returned to his house in Gibeab, whither a number of brave honest men of Israel followed him ; whilst another company of loose fellows, who despised his youth and comeliness, and thought him unfit for such a government, refused to acknowledge him, or to bring him any presents, as the rest did. Samuel's speech to the people.

But it was not long before he had an occasion to give them an earnest of his courage, and to let them see how well he could use his new authority. The inhabitants of Jabesh Gilead were straitly besieged by the Ammonites, and upon the brink of losing not only their liberty, but their right eye, as a lasting reproach to the whole nation ; when, having obtained a respite of seven days from the Ammonitish king, they sent an account of their dismal state to the elders of Israel. Saul was

d then in the fields with his cattle, when these heavy tidings came, and, at his return, found the people all in tears, and being informed of the occasion of it, he immediately took a yoke of oxen, and caused them to be hewed in pieces, and dispatched with utmost speed through all the tribes, with this threatening message, that whosoever refused to follow him to the relief of their brethren of Jabesh Gilead, his cattle should undergo the same fate. The people, alarmed with these news, did immediately repair to Bezek, to the number of three hundred thousand, besides thirty thousand of the tribe of Judah ; and Saul having sent the besieged word, that he would come to their rescue by the next morning, marched all that night ; and, as soon as he came near the enemy, he divided his army into three bodies, and fell upon them by break of day with such fury, that they were forced to raise the siege, and fly with the utmost precipitation, and a very considerable loss *. The people, elevated with this signal victory, were for putting to death all that had refused to acknowledge Saul for their king ; but he generously withstood it, alledging that it was not fit to stain the beginning of his reign with the slaughter of their brethren, after God had wrought so great a salvation in Israel. This moderate answer pleased the people still more, and Samuel, who had accompanied him to the battle, invited now the people to Gilgal, there to confirm the kingdom unto Saul by an universal consent, since he had shewed himself so worthy of it. This was accordingly done, and the ceremony was accompanied with joy and acclamations, and with peace-offerings, Saul's first exploit.

f which were there offered unto the Lord †.

BEFORE Samuel dismissed this numerous assembly, he took that opportunity to justify his conduct, during the whole time of his administration, as judge. This was indeed a proper time, because his authority being devolved upon Saul, who was then present, could be no longer a check to any of them from exhibiting their complaint, if any such they had against him. He therefore challenged them, as he was now old, and ready to leave the world, to accuse him openly before their new king, if he had committed any fraud, injustice, or oppression against any of them, that he might now make them restitution before he died ; and he had the satisfaction satisfaction of being answered, by the general voice, that he had neither wronged <sup>a</sup> nor oppressed them in any case. He was not content with this ample testimony, but made them take God to witness that they spoke from their heart, which they readily did. Samuel seems to have had a double design in this expostulation, besides that of clearing his own character; the first was to shew young Saul a pattern to copy after, and the other, to make the people sensible of their ingratitude to God, in desiring to be governed in a different way than he had hitherto appointed, and that, unless they proved more obedient for the future, their new form of government would be of little benefit to them, since neither that, nor any other, could preserve them from their enemies, without the divine blessing, which, if they forfeited by their obstinate wickedness, would bring infallible ruin upon their king <sup>b</sup> and themselves. To convince them of this, he recapitulated to them all the grievous thraldoms which their idolatry and disobedience had drawn upon them, since their being seated in that land; and the many signal deliverances which God had wrought for them upon their repentance, without the help of a king; and to add a still greater weight to his words, and to assure them that they did not proceed from any resentment for their having been so pressing for a king, even in his life-time; but because God was highly displeased at it; he reminded them that it was then the time of harvest, when the air is generally serene, and free from clouds and stormy rains (Z); but he told them that he would by his prayers obtain such an extraordinary storm of thunder and rain, as should convince them <sup>c</sup> that God had been highly provoked by their ungrateful demand. He did so accordingly, and the people were frightened into a confession of their wickedness, and of this particular aggravation of it, their asking him for a king. They desired him that he would use his prayers to avert the impending storm and danger; which he readily complied with, and then assured them that he would continue his good offices to them as long as he lived, and that if they and their king did but continue steadfast in their obedience to God, instead of confiding in their vain and deceitful idols, every thing would go well with them; but that, if they relapsed, both he and they must expect to feel the effects of the divine displeasure <sup>d</sup>.

* x. 11.    † Ver. 21.    ‡ Ver 25.    § Vid. sup. p. 295. d.    ¶ Ch. xi. p. tot.

Jonathan surprises the garrison of Geba.

ALL these things were transacted in the first year of Saul's reign; on the next <sup>d</sup> he dismissed his numerous army, thinking perhaps, that his late victory had sufficiently secured him from any attempt against Israel; and reserved to himself only three thousand men, two thousand of whom he put into the garrisons of Michmash and Bethel, and the other thousand he left at Gibeab of Benjamin, under his son Jonathan. But this young prince, willing perhaps to achieve something worthy the son and successor of Saul, went and smote a Philistine garrison at Geba; the news of which, having alarmed that nation, obliged his father to blow the trumpet, and to let Israel know that the Philistines were coming against them with a numerous host. They had indeed 30,000 chariots (A), and 6000 horsemen, besides an innumerable multitude of foot, with which they came and encamped against <sup>e</sup> Michmash, eastward of Beth-Aven. The sight of so vast an army injected an universal terror in Israel, inasmuch that, forgetting their late victory, and the valour which their new-made king had shewn upon that occasion, a great part of that dastardly people hid themselves in caves, dens, saw-pits, or any lurking holes; whilst another part fled to the other side Jordan for safety, leaving their country open to their enemies frequent and destructive incursions, and their king to make the best of the pusillanimous remains of the people that stuck close unto him. One misfortune however attended them, which may, in some measure, excuse

<sup>b</sup> 1 Sam. xii. p. tot.

(Z) This Samuel justly calls the great thing which the Lord would do before their eyes (70); and the people could not but esteem it such, because that country was observed to be entirely free from such stormy weather all the time of harvest, and to have the former and latter rain before and after it; but whether this was really miraculous, or whether the prophet, by some way or other, foresaw it gathering, it answered his purpose, and wrought the desired effect upon that incredulous and headstrong people, and prevented their applauding their choice of a kingly government, or attributing their late or any future victory to that extraordinary piece of politicks.

(A) Concerning this prodigious number of chariots, we have already given our opinion in the history of that people, to which we refer the reader, where he will also see an account of the whole success of this war, with the reflection of a late learned critick upon it †.

(70) 1 Sam. xii. 16:

† Vide sup. p. 352. (I).

- a excuse their defection, which was, that the Philistines had taken care to strip them of all kinds of weapons, and even of the instruments with which they used to sharpen their rural tools, lest they should use them instead of arms. They had neither smith nor forge, and so naked were they at this time, that there was neither sword nor spear, but those which Saul and his son had<sup>a</sup>; when he came to muster his little army (B). Saul, however, continued with them at Gilgal, expecting Samuel's coming according to his appointment; but after he had waited seven whole days, and found that Samuel neither came nor sent, and that his little army was almost dwindled away to a small handful, resolved, nevertheless, to make a brave resistance, in case he should be attacked by the enemy; and afraid lest he should be surprized
- b by them, before he had implored the protection of God in the usual way of sacrifices; he ventured, on the seventh day, to offer up some peace-offerings and a burnt-offering. He had scarce made an end of sacrificing, when Samuel came, and blamed him highly for what he had done (C). Saul excused himself upon the pressing necessity he was in; but whether the prophet took it as a presage of his future disobedience and want of faith, and designed only to intimidate and forewarn him, or whether his rejection had been already revealed to him; he told him, that he had Saul reprov'd done a very foolish action, and that his disobedience to God's command would by Samuel cause the kingdom to be transferred from him to a more worthy and faithful person. As soon as Samuel was departed from him, to go to Gibeon, or valley of Benjamin,
- c Saul and his son followed him thither, with his little army, consisting only of six hundred unarmed men. There they beheld, with sorrow, the Philistines, who were still encamped in Michmasb, making a three-fold incursion in Israel, and committing great depredations; one detachment towards Opbrab, another towards Beth-boron, and the third towards the valley of Zeboim<sup>d</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Ch. xiii. 19, & seq.<sup>d</sup> Ibid. p. tot.

(B) The rest of this small body were armed, as one may reasonably suppose, with such weapons as they could make without the smith's help, such as slings, flails, clubs, staves, wooden prongs, staves hardened in the fire, and other rural tools; the first of these, the slings, in which they were very expert, they might all use at the first onset, and the others, when they came to closer engagement.

(C) It is not easy to divine what Saul's crime was, which drew upon him such a severe sentence from the prophet. The Jews, indeed, accuse him, 1. Of not having waited the full time for him, and 2. Of having presumed to infringe upon the priestly office, by offering up sacrifices to God with his unhallowed hands (71). Josephus seems to say much the same thing, though not in plain terms; but he adds, that Saul had sent for Samuel to advise with him, who sent him word back, that he should continue where he was, and get sacrifices in readiness against he came to him; which would be at the end of seven days, when he would come and offer them up unto God.—Saul, adds he, waited out his time, but most unhappily failed in another article of his commission, for the prophet, he found, delayed his coming, and his men perpetually deserting him, so that he offered up the sacrifice without waiting any longer for Samuel (72). As for the first of these, his not waiting the whole time, it appears of too small a nature, considering the strait he was in through the constant desertion of his army, to have deserved a total rejection; and as to the last, it is scarcely probable, because he had the high-priest Abiath with him to perform that office for him, or to have hindered him from doing it, if he had gone about it. Some authors think (73), therefore, that there is a transposition of chapters, and that the crime, for which he was rejected, was his not destroying the king of Amalek, and all his plunder, according to God's command, the story of which we have in the next chapter, wherein Samuel reproves him in the most severe terms, for his disobedience, and tells him plainly, that the Lord had rejected him from being king (74); but it is more likely, that, in the former of these places, the prophet only threatens him with what he must expect, unless he took more heed of what God commanded him. For it is plain, that Saul was so far from being absolutely rejected, that he not only was blessed with a great and almost miraculous victory, immediately after Samuel had left him, but that he was likewise very successful against several other nations, and, above all, received that fresh command from the same prophet, to fight and destroy the Amalekites, with a promise of victory. As for what is said, that the Lord hath sought him a man after his own heart, and—shall command him to be head over his people (75); those, who are acquainted with the genius of the original, know that it may as well be taken in the future tense, the Lord shall seek, and so on; however, as to the words of the prophet, the Lord would have established thy kingdom upon Israel for ever; it is plain they cannot be understood in a literal sense, because the scepter was promised to the tribe of Judah, and to no other (76), and accordingly was soon after given to David, who was of that tribe.

Upon the whole, therefore, we think that Saul was only threatened here by the prophet, for having acted foolishly; but, in the chapter following, he is absolutely rejected for his disobedience, in sparing Agag, and the best of the plunder, contrary to God's express command; for which reason, Samuel charges him not with bare folly, but with downright rebellion, which he there compares to idolatry and witchcraft (77).

(71) Vide MUNS. in loc. (72) Ast. l. vi. c. 7. (73) Vide TREMEL. in loc. (74) 1 Sam. xv. 16, & seq. (75) Ibid. ch. viii. 14. (76) Gen. xlix. 10. (77) 1 Sam. xv. 23.

THEY were in this dismal situation, when Jonathán, moved by some divine impulse, ventured, unknown to his father or to any one but his armour-bearer, who accompanied him, to climb up on his hands and feet through a couple of cragged rocks, and to fall upon one of the enemy's out-guards, where he killed twenty of their men, and put the rest to flight, who ran into the camp and spread such a pannic terror through the host, that it was easily perceived by Saul and his men; who, finding that Jonathán was missing, easily guessed him to be the author of it. Saul had with him the ark of God, and Abiath the high-priest, the great grandson of Eli, and was going to desire him to enquire of the Lord whether he should fall on the enemy, when the noise and confusion increased so far, as to assure him that they were put to the rout. He bid then Abiath to hold his hand, and with his few men fell on the flying Philistines, his army still increasing, as well from a number of Hebrew captives, who took that opportunity to turn tail to their oppressors, as from a greater number of those, who, observing from their lurking-holes, the success of their brethren, came and joined themselves to their king.

Defeats the Philistines

THIS victory, great as it was *, might have been more compleat, had not Saul unadvisedly adjured his army not to stop their pursuit to take some convenient refreshment. This rash curse was like to have had several fatal consequences, for besides that it hindered his weary soldiers, from making so great a slaughter of the enemy, as they might have done, and put too speedy an end to their pursuit; by that time it came to be evening, they were so famished, that they fell greedily upon the spoil, and would have eaten some of the cattle with the blood, had not the king timely prevented it. But what was like to have proved worse than all the rest was, that Jonathán, knowing nothing of his father's imprecation, and being quite spent with that day's toil, had refreshed himself with a little honey which he met in his way, so that, when his transgression came to be found out by Urim, Saul would infallibly have condemned him to die, had not the whole army opposed it with one consent, and sworn that not a hair of his head should be hurt, in consideration of the signal deliverance, which he had been the chief cause of. After this, Saul returned home, and put himself in a condition of pursuing his conquest, not only against the Philistines, but also against the Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites, and the kings of Zobab and Amalek. His head general was Abner, the son of his uncle Ner; he had also two sons besides the brave Jonathán, and, next to that of his army, his care was to have a guard about him, made up of the valiantest and stoutest men he could find in his dominions †.

and Amale-
kites.

THE sacred history gives us no particular account of any of these wars, that against Amalek excepted, of which we have spoken in its proper place ‡; neither is it easy to guess at what periods of Saul's reign any of them happened. All that we can know is, that he reigned forty years §; that he was a valiant and successful prince, continually at war with some neighbouring state or other; and that he very much curbed the strength of all his enemies round about. So that, had he not been unmindful of God's command with respect to the king of Amalek, and the plunder of his subjects, he might, in all likelihood, have reigned all his life without a rival ¶. But here he acted very unlike himself, not only in disregarding the divine anathema which had been pronounced against that nation ever since their coming out of Egypt **, and the prophet's charge in pursuance of it †, but likewise in that poor pretence he made to Samuel, that he had fulfilled his command, when every thing about him shewed him, that he had acted quite contrary to it ‡; and next to this, in meanly excusing his fault, by throwing one part of it upon the people's zeal to sacrifice the best of the cattle to the Lord †, and part, upon his own fear of restraining them from it ‡. No wonder then if Samuel could not, without some indignation, hear a king of Israel betray so much meanness of soul, to palliate an unjustifiable action; nor at the severity with which he reproves him for it, when he was authorised by God to denounce unto him the loss of his kingdom.

THIS

* See, before p. 353. b.    † 1 Sam. xiv. pass.    ‡ See, before p. 320. d.    § Acts xiii. 21.    ¶ See what has been said in the last note.    ** Exod. xvii. 14.    † 1 Sam. xv. 1, & seq.    ‡ Ibid. ver. 15. 14. & 20.    ‡ Ver. 15.    ‡ Ver. 24. 30, & seq. to the end.

- a THIS sentence, in which his crime was painted in the deepest colours, made a deep impression upon Saul: he owned the charge, and begged of him, for decency sake, and to prevent a defection of the people, that he would still shew some regard to him, and accompany him, whilst he went and paid his adoration to God; which the prophet complied with; and afterwards, having caused the proud Amalekitish king to be put to death (D), whose destroying sword had bereaved so many mothers of their children, he returned to Ramah, the place of his abode; and, from that time, he never came more to Saul, but continued mourning for him * till he was reprov'd for it by God, and commanded to go to Bethlehem, and anoint one of the sons of Jesse in his room.
- b Samuel was forced to colour his journey with the pretence of offering up a David a-sacrifice there; and accordingly took a young heifer with him, both to avoid <sup>anointed king.</sup> giving any suspicion to the jealous king, and to disperse the fears of the elders of Bethlehem at his unexpected arrival. As soon as he came to Jesse's house, he ordered all his sons to pass before him in order, and when he beheld the eldest of them, whom the history shews to have been a man of valour, he presently supposed him to be the person chosen to be Saul's successor; but God did soon let him see that he judged quite otherwise, by rejecting him, as he did also the other six in their turns. Samuel, being surpris'd at it, asked their father, whether these were all the sons he had? who answered, that he had one more, a stripling,
- c who was then keeping his sheep, and was the youngest of all. He was bid to send for him; and, as soon as David came in, Samuel was ordered to anoint him in the presence of his brethren; and from that minute the spirit of the Lord came upon him (E). Samuel then made a feast to Jesse's family, and to the elders of the city, and returned to Ramah, and David to his flocks.
- NOT long after this, the spirit of the Lord having forsaken Saul, he began to feel himself tormented by an evil one, or by a deep melancholy; to dispel which, he was advis'd to get young David to play on the harp before him, who by this time had gained the reputation, not only of an expert musician, but of a <sup>relieves Saul's</sup> sober, discreet, and valiant youth. He was sent for accordingly, and the ruddiness <sup>melancholy.</sup> of his complexion, and comeliness of his person, joined with the sweetness of his musick, won Saul's heart so far, that he made him his armour-bearer, and obtained of his father that he might still continue near his person. Whenever, therefore, Saul's distemper came upon him, David was ordered to divert him with his musick, which never failed to give him ease †; after which he returned home, and went about his usual occupation. At least it appears by the sequel ‡, that he stay'd at Bethlehem during Saul's lucid intervals, one of which seems to have been so long, that, when he came back to court, neither Saul, nor Abner his general, could tell who he was, as we read in the very next chapter § (F).

Saul

* Ch. xvi. pass.

† Ibid.

• Ib. xvii. 15.

‡ Ib. ver. 55. to the end.

(D) The text says, that Samuel himself put him to death (78); but the Hebrew idiom imports no more than his commanding it to be done. And, indeed, besides that, Samuel is not recorded to have been a sword's man, he was then too old to perform such an execution. An ancient author (79) tells us, that Agag having been reprieved, at his desire, till the next morning, his wife, who came to see him that night, conceived by him that very Amalekite, who did afterwards kill Saul, as a just punishment for his sparing that monarch's life; but it is plain that Saul was not so much as wounded, till he fell upon his own sword and killed himself, as we shall see in its proper place; and that the young Amalekite, who brought the news of his death to David, did only pretend that he had killed him, in hopes to ingratiate himself to him, though it fell out otherwise.

(E) It is hardly to be supposed, that Samuel did then explain the whole mystery of his anointing of David; which might have had some fatal consequence, had it come to Saul's ears: But as it was usual to anoint men to the office of prophet, as well as to the regal dignity, it is more likely, that he left them to suppose the former; which they might naturally enough do, both because David was but a stripling, not much above fifteen years of age, and too smug and tender to be taken for a promising warrior; and because the spirit of the Lord is said to have come upon him, as it used to do upon the prophets, after they were anointed. Josephus says, that Samuel only whisper'd the secret into David's and his father's ear, and conceal'd it from the rest. And, indeed, had his brethren known, or even suspected, that he had been anointed to the regal dignity, though we dare not say how far their envy might have induced some of them to have betrayed the secret to Saul, it is scarce credible they would have us'd him with such roughness and ill manners as they did, when their father sent him to them to Saul's camp (80).

(F) This circumstance has given interpreters some difficulty to reconcile: Some have thought this interval to have been so long, that David was quite (78) Ibid. ver. 33. (79) PHIL. BIEL. vid. St. Phil. Monard. Hebr. in vit. Saul. (80) Sam. xvii. 28.

Defeat of Goliath.

Year of the Flood, 1936.
Year before CHRIST, 1063.

Jonathan's friendship to David.

Saul and his army were then incamped by the valley of Elab, in order to make a head against the Philistines, who had by this time recovered themselves from their defeat, and had perhaps also taken fresh courage at the news of Saul's distemper. They had pitched their camp at Ephex-dammim over-against them, which place was between Shoboth and Azekab in the tribe of Judab. A valley parted the two armies, which had contented themselves with looking upon one another, without striking a blow, during the space of forty days, saving the daily challenges of the vapouring Goliath. But that, which had chilled the hearts of all the Israelites, did work a contrary effect upon young David, who was just arrived into the camp, being sent thither by old Jesse with provisions for his three eldest brothers, who were then in Saul's army. As soon as he heard the news of this gigantick champion's having defied the army of the God of Israel, he drew a sure omen from it, that God would deliver him into his hands; and though Saul's promising his daughter, as a reward to the man that should slay him, had not been able to induce one Israelite to engage him, during that whole time, yet was not this young shepherd at all discouraged from offering himself to the combat. At his first presenting himself to the king, all that beheld him did indeed judge him altogether unequal to such an exploit; but he gave them such proofs both of his valour and conduct, but especially of his faith in God, that Saul ordered him to be armed cap-a-pe with his own armour. But David was soon forced to put it off, not being able to stir himself under the weight of it; and, with no other weapon than a sling and a few pebble stones in his shepherd's pouch, sallied forth against this mighty enemy; and, in few minutes after, brought his head and sword, and laid it at the feet of Saul, who had by that time so far forgot him, that he was forced to inform him afresh that he was David, the youngest son of Jesse.

WHAT effect this victory had over the amazed Philistines, we need not repeat here †. But David's behaviour wrought so much on the generous Jonathan, Saul's eldest son, that it gave birth to the most intimate friendship between them, inso-much that the text says, their souls were knit together*; and David elsewhere tells us, that it exceeded by far the love of women*. But it soon after made a much different impression upon Saul, though at first he seemed charmed with his conduct, and gave him a considerable post in his army. What inspired that prince with the first sentiments of jealousy against him, was the indiscretion of a company of women, who came to meet them at their return from the battle, with vocal and instrumental musick, and in their songs compared David to him, and said, that Saul had killed his thousands, and David his ten thousands; which made him complain that they would give him the kingdom next. From that time he looked upon him as a dangerous enemy, and himself unsafe till he had cut him off

* Sam. xvii. p. tot.

† See before, p. 353. & seq.

* Ibid. xviii. 1.

* Ibid. p. tot.

quite altered, his beard grown, features and shape become more manly, so that he might not be easily known again (81). Some think that Saul, not having seen him, but when he was in his melancholy moods, and as it were out of his senses, could retain no idea of him (82). But this is by no means probable, because Saul is said to have loved him exceedingly, when he was recovered from his paroxysms. Some others, and among them Junius, think, that there is here also a transposition of chapters, and that David had killed Goliath some time before he was sent for to play before Saul, because he is recommended to him as a man of valour, as well as a musician (83). But we can by no means come into that notion upon such slight grounds. David might have acquired the character of a valiant youth upon some other account, particularly, for rescuing some of his flock out of the jaws of wild beasts (84). And as to his being forgot at court, it may be easily accounted for, if to the growth of his shape, beard, &c. mentioned under the first head, we add, that, when he played before Saul, he appeared in a dress suitable, and that he was now in his plain shepherd's habit, and just come from a journey; so that the king and his court, who had seen such variety of faces since his departure, might not easily call him to mind.

As for the wonderful effects which his musick had upon Saul, we need not have recourse to miracles to account for it, as some commentators have done (85), who think that he joined some psalms or prayers with the melody of his harp, which were a kind of exorcism against the evil spirit that troubled him. Every one may be sensible of the power of good musick upon a melancholy person; which we take to be Saul's case. And as for its being called an evil spirit sent from the Lord, we take it to mean no more, than that God suffered him to fall into that dismal distemper, as a punishment for his disobedience. And this is so far from being our particular opinion, that it is at present the most received, and, as we think, the most agreeable to the genius of the original (86).

(81) TORNEL. CAJET. & al. (82) THEODORET. PROCOF. in loc. (83) Vid. JUN. & TREMEL. in loc. (84) 1 Sam. xvii. 34. & seq. (85) DE LYR. TOSTAT. FERRAR. CORNEL. A LAPID & al. (86) Vid. GROT. CAJETAN. GENEER. LE CLERC. & al. mult.

a off. His disease increased his fear of him, or rather seemed to be wholly turned into jealousy, of which David became the sole object, and often narrowly escaped becoming the victim of it: for even on the very day after this noble exploit, whilst David was endeavouring to ease his present fit, he threw a javelin at him with such force, that it stuck against the wall. He attempted the same a second time, but David escaped them both. David hated by Saul.

At length, Saul observing how well David behaved, and was beloved by all the people, though he dreaded him the more for it, he saw himself under a necessity of acting more closely against him, by raising him to a higher post, and exposing him to fresh dangers, in hopes to see him fall by the hand of the enemy. Narrowly escapes his fury.

b He promised him, at the same time, his eldest daughter, as a reward of his next victory; but David had the mortification to see her given to another presently after. The next trap Saul laid for him was, to get some of his servants to tell him, that the king, who designed in earnest to give him his second daughter, would accept of 100 Philistines forekins instead of a dowry. But here David came off again victorious, and brought him double that number; so that Saul, having no pretence left to excuse himself from his promise, gave him Michal in marriage, whose sincere affection, joined to that of her brother Jonathan, proved afterwards very serviceable to him, by defeating their father's bloody attempts against his life, even at the hazard of their own. David had again gained a signal victory over the Philistines, and was scarce returned to court, before he was in danger of being stuck to the wall with another javelin. This made him retire to his own house, whither Saul pursued him, causing the house to be beset by some of his servants, where he would have been infallibly murdered by the next morning, had not his faithful wife contrived his escape, by conveying him privily out at a window, in the dead of night, resolved to give her husband time to go far enough before he was pursued, and at any rate to bear the brunt of her father's resentment, rather than be wanting in conjugal affection. When therefore the men came on the next morning to kill him, she sent them away, and told them, that he was very ill, and confined to his bed, shewing them at the same time the figure of a man, which she had conveyed into it, and covered up with bed-cloaths, to prevent discovery (G). As soon as Saul heard of his being sick, he sent back the men, with orders to bring him alive, in his bed, that he might have the pleasure of stabbing him with his own hand; and it was then that Michal's stratagem, being discovered, so exasperated her angry father, that she was forced to make him believe that it was to save her own life, that she had consented to it.

David, thus happily escaped, went to Ramah to acquaint Samuel with the Flee to Sam. unwelcome news; and both of them went down to Nejoth, which was not far from Ramah, and where was a school of prophets. It was not long before Saul heard of it, who sent immediately some messengers to fetch him. But they were no sooner come within sight of Samuel and the prophets, than they fell a prophesying likewise, and so returned without him. He sent others a second and a third time, with the same success, and at length resolved to go himself; and, when he came, he prophesied likewise, till he came to the place, and there he cast off his cloaths, and laid down uncovered (H) all that day and night, and gave thereby an opportunity to David to get off, and to have a private interview

<sup>1</sup> Ch. xix. pass.

(G) Josephus gives a more refined account of this stratagem, and carefully avoids the teraphim mentioned in the text: but we have already confuted that subtle evasion in another place (87), and we need no fresh proofs here of the author's partiality to his nation.

(H) The words in the original say, that he lay naked; but it were absurd to understand it in a literal sense, God having strictly forbidden all such indecencies (88), in opposition to the heathen priests, who were not ashamed to appear naked at some of their feasts (89). It is more than probable, therefore, that the words mean no more than the casting off that loose upper garment which they used to throw over them when they went abroad, and having nothing upon him but the tunic that was next the skin. Which manner of speaking, was also common to the Greeks and Latins (90).

(87) Vide sup. p. 443. (88) Exod. xx. ver. ult. & alib. (89) Vide TIT. LIV. & al. de Lupercal. &c. <sup>2</sup> Vide sup. p. 707. (H) Vide GIBERT. CUPER. Observat. lib. 1. cap. 7. ANT. BARREMAN. Dial. de poet. & proph. FULLER. Miscel. Theol. HEINS. GROT. HAMMOND, LE CLERC, LE SCENE. Essay on a new ver. pt. ii. c. 9. § 1.

with Jonatban, wherein they swore to each other a perpetual friendship. In this interview David obtained likewise a promise from him, that he would excuse him to his father, on the two following days, which were the feast of the new moon, and in which he was to have sat at the king's table, when he should be observed to be missing, and to let him know whether he resented his absence, or was satisfied with the excuse. Accordingly, Saul missed him on the very first day, but imputed it to some accidental pollution, which made him unfit to appear; but when he saw him not on the next day, and was told by Jonatban, that he had begged leave to go to a feast which was held in his family at Bethlehem, Saul was so enraged, that he upbraided him in the bitterest terms with pusillanimous treachery; alledging, that he must never expect to sit on his throne, whilst David lived, and therefore ordered him to be immediately fetched to him. Here Jonatban ventured to plead for him, but he also narrowly escaped being killed by his father. Seeing then that his friend's death was resolved, he went to the stone Ezel, a place appointed by them, and, at a signal given, David came out to him, and being fully informed how dangerous it was for him to stay any longer within the reach of his implacable enemy, they took a melancholy farewell of one another, and David hastened to the land of Nob, where Abimelech, the then high-priest, had his residence.

David flees to Abimelech.

David was forced to dispel the surprise the high-priest was in, at his unexpected arrival, with a pretence of being sent by the king, upon some private business of importance; but having observed there one Doeg an Edomite, and one of Saul's shepherds, by whom he foresaw he should certainly be betrayed, if he made any stay, he told Abimelech that his business was urgent, and begged that he would give him some refreshment for himself and the young men that were with him. There was then none but the shew-bread that came off the holy table, which the priests alone were allowed to eat; but David, being afraid to stay the baking of some of the common sort, prevailed upon him to overlook that scruple, assuring him, that both he and they were free from carnal defilement, and had been absent from their wives above three days. As soon as they had refreshed themselves, David asked him whether he could not furnish him with some swords, or spears; and was answered, that there was no weapon there but the sword which he took from Goliath, which he desired might be brought to him; and, having girt it on, he took his leave of the high-priest, and fled to Achish king of Gath. He made but a short stay with that prince; for his servants, who had not forgot what had been so lately sung by the Israelitish women, that Saul had slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands, did not fail to remind him of it; which when David understood, the fear he was in of Achish made him resolve, if possible, to change his hatred either into pity or contempt. His stratagem succeeded according to his wish, and he acted the madman so well, that Achish, thinking him to be really so, was glad to be rid of him; and David went and hid himself in the cave of Adullam.

Saul butchers all the priests and inhabitants of Nob.

In the mean time Saul, vexed at his heart to find that he was gone out of his reach, was storming at Jonatban, and at his own servants, as if they had all conspired with the son of Jesse against him; when Doeg, the Edomite, came and acquainted him with what had passed at Nob, and how Abimelech had furnished David with provisions and weapons, and had enquired of the Lord for him. This news put him into such a rage, that, without giving himself leave to consider how far that high-priest might be ignorant of this unhappy difference between David and him, as it is plain from the text he really was; he ordered him and all his kindred to be brought immediately to him; and after many bitter invectives against them, for having leagued themselves with his treacherous son-in-law, as he expressed it, he swore they should all be put to death. Abimelech strove in vain to convince him, that they were all really ignorant of David's having any sinister design, whose behaviour had always been so commendable and upright, that they really believed him to have been sent upon some important design by him. The exasperated king would give no credit to them, but ordered his servants that stood about him to cut them all in pieces; and, when he observed that they expressed an uncommon reluctance against staining their hands with the blood of so many helpless priests, he commanded Doeg to perform that cruel office, which he immediately

- a diately did. Saul, not contented to see fourscore and five innocent persons butchered at his feet, ordered a detachment to go and put the whole city of Nob to the sword, men, women, children, and cattle; and this was also executed with such barbarous speed, that none but Abiathar, one of Abimelech's sons, had the good fortune to escape. He went immediately to David, and acquainted him with the dismal news; which was no more, he told him, than he foresaw would happen, when he observed the Edomites Doeg there. He said all he could to comfort him, and desired him to share his fortune; promising, that, as soon as Abiathar escapes to David. he was in a condition, he would raise him to the high-priesthood; till when, he would be his safeguard, as long as he was able to defend his own life.
- b AMONG those, who followed David, were his father, mother, brethren, and other relations, with the prophet Gad, who were probably forced to fly to him for shelter from Saul's fury. Besides these, there joined themselves to him multitudes of debtors, and distressed and discontented persons, to the number of 400. But the prophet Gad having told him, that it was no longer safe for him to abide in that place, he took his parents into the land of Moab, and left them under the protection of the king, whilst his affairs continued in that desperate condition †; and himself and his men went into the forest of Hareth in the land of Judab. However, he stayed no longer there than he rescued the city of Keilah from the Philistines; for he heard soon after, that Saul, thinking himself sure of him there,
- c was coming against him with all speed; and being afraid lest the inhabitants of that place should deliver him into his hands, and having had his fears confirmed by the high-priest, he removed from thence into the wilderness of Ziph, with his own men, who were by this time increased to 600. Whilst he was lurking about the rocks and caves of this place, Jonathan heard of it, and came to see him there. The design of this dangerous interview was to make still surer of David's Jonathan's interview with David. friendship, and to obtain a promise from him, that when he had gained the kingdom from his father, which he frankly told him he was well assured he would, himself might be the next in dignity to him; and that, in case he died before that time, David should shew the same friendly regard to his children, as he had done to him. This covenant was ratified with a fresh oath on both sides,
- d and Jonathan returned to his own house.
- NOT long after this, Saul was informed by the Ziphites, that David lay concealed in their neighbourhood; and was so transported with joy at the news, that he could not forbear blessing them, as the only people that shewed any compassion for him. He desired that they would go and watch him as narrowly as they could; for he told them that he was a subtle enemy, and assured them, that himself would come, with sufficient force, to fetch him out of his lurking-holes. But David, having got some intelligence of it, was by that time removed to the wilderness of Maon, on the south of the plain of Jessimon. Saul was soon
- e told of it, and pursued him thither, and pitched over-against him, with a design to surround him; but, as he was about it, news was brought him, that the Philistines had made a fresh incursion into the land, so that he was forced to go back to put a stop to their progress *; leaving his enemy to recover himself of his fright, and to provide for his own safety. In memory of this deliverance, David called the rock where he then was, Sela Hammalekoth, or, the rock of divisions; and, presently after, removed with his little army to Engedi, and concealed himself among the strong holds of that place †. Here Saul, who had soon drove away the Philistines, found him out again, and came against him with 3000 men; but, whilst he was in search of him, an urgent occasion obliged him to retire, for decency
- f sake, into the cave where David lay concealed (1). David was immediately surrounded

† See before, p. 290. d.

* Ibid. p. 355. c.

† 1 Sam. xxiii. pass.

(1) עין גדי Hen gadi, signifies the fountain of wild goats, and the city of that name was so called, from the multitude of goats and sheep which were kept in the rocky parts that were in the neighbourhood of it. These abounded with sheep-cotts, and caverns, into which the cattle used to shelter themselves during the heat of the day. It was into one of them that providence seems to have conducted Saul, to give David an opportunity, both of clearing himself from any treacherous design against him, and to give an instance of the greatest generosity that is to be met with in history, though at the hazard of becoming the victim of his men's resentment, for refusing the only opportunity of riding himself of his enemy, and putting himself in a condition of rewarding their services; for which he had all the cause in the world to fear, either being forsaken, or, perhaps, even betrayed by them into Saul's hands.

David's gene-reality to Saul.

surrounded by his men, who told him that this was now the time in which God had promised to deliver his enemy into his hand, and that he had it now in his power to put a final end, with one blow, to this unnatural war, and to free himself and them from all their misery. David made as if he had listened to their advice, and, without telling them what he designed to do, rose up, and stole softly near Saul, and cut off the skirt of his robe (K), and gave him thereby an opportunity of escaping alive, whilst he appeased his men's resentment, with representing to them, how heinous a crime it was to stretch forth an hand against their lawful prince, and the Lord's anointed. He expressed even an uncommon remorse at that which he had done, esteeming it an indignity, or, at least, a want of respect to the regal dignity; though he meant no more by it, than to give his father an irrefragable proof of his innocency and filial duty<sup>7</sup>. As soon, therefore, as Saul was gone out of the cave, he called after him in the tenderest manner, begged of him not to entertain such unworthy suspicions of him, nor to listen to the whispers of flandering tongues, since he had now given him so signal a proof, how much his heart abhorred the crimes for which he was so unjustly persecuted. This humble and affecting speech, backed with the infallible testimony of the piece of his robe, melted Saul into tears of tenderness and sorrow: he acknowledged his son's superior virtue and merit in sparing his life, and, in the conclusion, owned that he alone was worthy to sit on the throne of Israel, which, he told him, he was now satisfied he would shortly do; and therefore, as a further proof of his unexampled generosity and filial affection, he desired him to swear to him, that he would not revenge the father's injuries upon any of his children, but that he would shew the same pity to the one, as he had now done to the other. David did readily give him that satisfaction, and, after mutual embraces, Saul returned to Gibeath, and David and his men to their strong hold<sup>8</sup> (L).

Samuel's
death.

Year of the
Flood, 1940.
Year before
CHRIST,
1059.

ABOUT this time the good old prophet Samuel died<sup>9</sup>, in the 97th or 98th year of his age, greatly lamented by all true Israelites, and was buried at Ramah in his own house, or rather perhaps in his garden. He had judged Israel twenty years, from Eli's death, and had lived about forty-eight more, from his anointing Saul to the regal dignity. As for David, whether he had any intelligence of Saul's relapse, or whether his own fear suggested it to him, he removed further from the neighbourhood of Engedi towards the wilderness of Paran, near to Maon or Carmel, which was also in the tribe of Judah. It seems that David kept his men under such strict discipline, that instead of plundering the neighbouring places, as was generally done by such fugitives, they were rather a safe-guard to them, so that it was usual for them to expect some refreshments from the inhabitants, as a gratification for their watchfulness and forbearance. Here then David, according to custom, sent a civil message to a wealthy Carmelite named Nabal, who was then making a feast to his sheep-shearers, and desired him to send him and his men some portion of his good cheer; but the man, who was rightly called Nabal, being naturally proud and brutish, sent them away with a churlish answer, that he had something else to do with his provision, than to send it to such a company of vagabonds. David, who could not but resent such ingratitude, was just upon the point of making some dreadful havock in Nabal's family, but, by good fortune, his prudent wife, hearing of it, made such haste to bring him an elegant supply of refreshment, that

<sup>7</sup> Ch. xxiv. ver. 5.

<sup>8</sup> Ibid. pass.

<sup>9</sup> Ch. xxv. 1, & seq.

(K) The text says, that David and his men harboured in the sides of the cave (91); or, as the original imports, in crags and holes of it, so that Saul, coming into it from the broad day-light, could not perceive them; whilst they, who had been there some time, might easily discover him, and know who he was, from his first entering into the place; so that it was easy for David to cut off a piece of his robe unperceived, especially if we suppose it to have been the skirt of his upper garment, which, it is likely, they used to throw by,
at a small distance, upon such occasions.

(L) It appears by this speech of Saul, that he had, by that time, some certain knowledge that

David was the person whom God had chosen to be king in his stead, and perhaps also of his having been anointed by Samuel. So then his crime was not the bare persecuting of an innocent person, or hunting after a flea, as David words it (92), but an impious desire of frustrating the design of providence by cutting him off, in order to secure the crown to his own posterity. It was therefore natural for him to intreat him for the safety of his own children, when he saw into what dangers his preposterous folly brought him, and that nothing but David's virtue could secure them from total excision.

(91) 1 Sam. xxiv. 3.

(92) Ibid. ver. 14.

- a that she prevented all further mischief, and David was so charmed with her prudent and modest behaviour, that he conceived a real affection for her. Abigail returned to her husband, and on the next day, when sleep had dissipated the fumes of his wine, acquainted him with the danger which his brutishness was like to have brought upon him; and, as he was of too base a nature to think David generous enough to forgive him, the dread which then seized him did, in few days, break his heart, which as soon as David heard of, he sent for her and married her. As for Michol, Saul's daughter, she had been given to another, during his exile<sup>b</sup>.
- b He was forced soon after to retire from Maon, into the desert of Ziph, and the Ziphites failed not to acquaint Saul with it; who, having by that time forgot all that passed at their last interview, came out against him with 3000 chosen men, and gave him a fresh opportunity of evidencing his innocence. The two armies were encamped, the one by the side of the hills of Hachilah, and the other, in the wilderness overagainst him. David therefore sent out some spies, to know whether Saul was come in person, and being informed that he was, he took Abishai with him, and came in the dead of the night into Saul's camp, where they found them all fast asleep; Saul in his tent, with his spear stuck into the ground by his bolster, and Abner his general, with the rest of his officers, encamped round his tent. Abishai began then to insist strenuously, that providence had brought his enemy once more into his hand as a victim to the slaughter, and that, if he missed so fair an opportunity of sticking him to the ground with his own spear, he might in vain bewail his folly; but David soon stopped his hand, and contented himself with carrying away his spear, and the pitcher of water that lay under his head, which he did unperceived of any of Saul's men, God having thrown them all, as the text expresses it, into a deep sleep<sup>c</sup>; and soon after reached his own camp. Early on the next morning, he got up on the top of a hill overagainst them, and, having called Saul's general to him, he rebuked him sharply for being so negligent of his master's person, as to suffer his spear and cruse to be taken away by those, who might with the same ease have taken away his life. Saul, who was soon apprised of it, came out, and, in the mildest terms, acknowledged himself indebted a second time for his life, to his generous, though much injured son-in-law. David had then a fair occasion to upbraid him with his injustice and cruelty, which he did; however, with expressions full of duty and humility: he represented unto him how much beneath a king of Israel it was, to hunt after a poor harmless flea or a partridge, who meant not the least harm against him, and begged of him to desist from persecuting a man to death, who was not only innocent, but who shewed such a tender regard for his life, when it was in his power. Saul could not resist so strong an evidence of his son's superior virtue, which he must have admired even in an enemy. But though he shewed, at that juncture, all the tokens of remorse, acknowledged his folly and injustice, and promised never to seek his life any more, yet David had so little reason to trust to such forced repentance, that, as soon as they were parted, though with seeming tokens of the sincerest love and friendship, he resolved to go far enough out of his reach<sup>d</sup>. He retired therefore once more to Achish king of Gath, designing to abide with him till providence should give a better turn to his affairs. The hospitable reception he met with from that prince has been seen before†; but here, though he found so generous a friend and protector, yet an unexpected misfortune befel him from another quarter, which was like to have proved as fatal to him, as if he had fallen into his enemy's hand.
- c A second instance of David's mercy to him.
- d Retires to Gath.

- f DURING his abode at Ziklag, the place which the Gathish king had allotted him, which was a year and four months, there repaired unto him some of Saul's kindred, and multitudes of valiant men and commanders out of the tribes of Benjamin and Judab, and some from that of Gad, which ventured to pass the Jordan to come to him, even at the time when it overflowed its banks (M), besides

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. p. tot.

<sup>c</sup> Ch. xxvii. 12;

<sup>d</sup> Ibid. p. tot.

† Vid. sup. 355. d.

(M) The book of Chronicles observes of these Gadites, that they could handle the shield and the buckler, that their faces were as stern as those of lions, and that they were as swift of foot as the wild roes (93). The same author takes notice, that, when David saw such numbers of the Benjaminites, (93) 1 Chron. xii. 8.

Ziklag plundered and burnt.

besides some of the tribe of Manasseh *. With these he used to make incursions <sup>a</sup> into the countries of the Geshurites, Gerzites, and Amalekites (N), unknown to the king *, who was made to believe that he made them into the land of Judab ; and this gained him such confidence, that he had taken him and his army to go with him against Saul † ; but, whilst they were gone, the Amalekites came and took Ziklag and burnt it, and carried away all their women, children, cattle, and all the plunder of the place. When therefore they were returned from the Philistine camp, from which they had been dismissed by the jealous princes of that nation, and found what a terrible destruction had been made of their city, they filled the air with their cries. Their destroying men, women, and children, in all their former incursions, gave them no room to doubt that their own had undergone the same <sup>b</sup> fate ; so that their grief and despair rose to such a height, that David was like to have become the victim of it. The men began to talk of stoning him, as the cause of this mischief ; when he, still confiding in God, called Abiathar to consult the Lord for him, whether he had best pursue after that troop ; and, upon his being answered that he should do it with success, he took 600 men with him, overtook and destroyed the Amalekitish band, and recovered all that had been taken from them, as we have seen elsewhere †.

Saul's wretched condition at this time.

AFTER this signal deliverance David's affairs began to take a better turn, and the death of Saul, which happened immediately after, not only rid him of an inveterate enemy, the cause of all these troubles, but opened a fair and easy way <sup>c</sup> to the crown, at least, over his own tribe. The particulars of this signal defeat, which cost Saul and his three sons their lives, and among them the brave and generous Jonathan, need not be repeated here **. One or two circumstances however preceded it, with relation to that unhappy monarch, which made his condition so deplorable and desperate, that we could not with justice omit them.

Consults the witch of Endor.

He saw himself on the eve of being attacked by a powerful army, whilst a great number of his own, especially the chiefs, were gone over to David, and perhaps, he had also intelligence of his being come with the Philistines against him : he had killed all the priests except Abiathar, who was also fled to David, so that he could not consult the Lord by Urim : Samuel was dead, and not a prophet left to advise <sup>d</sup> him. In this streight, he would gladly have sought for counsel from witches or wizards, but he had long ago banished them all out of his dominions. At length, with much enquiring, they found him out a woman at Endor, who had a familiar spirit, to whom he went disguised in the night ; and, having promised her secrecy, prevailed upon her to raise him up Samuel. She did so accordingly ; but when she saw him appear, either in a different manner than she had been used to (O), or * See 1 Chron. xii. 1. 15, & seq. b. & c.

* See before, p. 355.

† Ch. xxviii. 2.

† See before, p. 321.

ites, especially of Saul's kindred, come to him, he was apprehensive they came with a design to surprise and carry him off. It seems, even by what he said to them, that, in such a case, he was not able to oppose them with his six hundred men. For, says he, if you are come with a friendly design to succour me, my heart shall be knit with yours ; but, if your intent be to betray me to my enemies, I leave it to God to punish you for your treachery (94). But they soon dispelled his fears, by assuring him that they were intirely in his interest, and resolved to share his fortune, and to be under his command.

As to the time of David's abode at Ziklag, though we have followed our English version, and archbishop Usher, the original says only, that he continued there ימים וארבעה חדשים days and four months, which some think to imply some days above, rather than a year and, four months ; because David came thither after Samuel's death, and left it immediately after that of Saul, and they reckon but seven months between the death of those two persons (95).

(N) We beg leave to observe here against those who condemn David as guilty of a great breach of hospitality, that none of these three nations were Philistines. The two former were the remains of the old Canaanites (96) and the Amalekites, the descendants of Esau (97), and all the three under the divine anathema. Notwithstanding which, David might think it proper to tell the king, that he made his inroads into the land of Israel, that he might think himself the more sure of him ; and this is the very reason assigned in the text, for his using that pretence (98).

(O) It is not easy to say, whether her fright proceeded from the extraordinariness of the apparition, or from the fear she was in, that Saul had only set her to work that he might have occasion to punish her for it. The latter seems the most probable, by what she said to him in her fright ; and yet it is not impossible, that she was also surprised at the strangeness of the sight. The text does not say how she came to know the king by it ; and the notion of the Jews, that the spirit, which

(94) 1 Chron. xii. 17. (95) Vid. sup. p. 321. (I). 2 Sam. i. 1, & 7. & MUNT. in Sam. xxvii. sub. (6). (96) Vid. Josh. xii. 5. & xvi. 3. (97) Vid. sup. p. 317. (98) 1 Sam. xxvii. ult.

- a or in such a manner as gave her to understand, that it was Saul himself that had set her on work; she gave a shriek, and complained that she had been imposed upon. Saul bid her go on, assuring her she should be safe, and asked what she had seen; she answered, Gods, angels, or judges (for the word may signify any of these) ascending out of the earth. She described one, who was an old man covered with a mantle, whom Saul understood to be Samuel, and to whom he bowed himself to the ground. Here the apparition, or, as the text expresses it, Samuel, asked him the reason why he had disturbed and called him up; and Saul owned to him, that the distress he was in from the Philistine army, being destitute of counsel from God, had obliged him to take that way to obtain his advice
- b what he should do under those difficulties. But Samuel answered Why dost thou ask my advice, seeing thy disobedience to God's commands has alienated him from thee, and tears to him. that thy kingdom is given to David? And now, continued the vision, the Lord is going to give up the Israelites into the hands of their enemies, and thou and thy sons shall be with me to-morrow (P). At these last words the frightened king, who had eaten nothing which she raised by enchantment, used to rise out of the earth with their heels uppermost, and that Samuel came up upon his feet, by which she knew that it was Saul that wanted to consult him (99), is altogether ludicrous; but if it was the real apparition of that prophet that she saw, as we shall at least make it probable in the next note, that it was, she might easily suppose that he would not have appeared in that extraordinary manner to any but to the king of Israel. For as to the notion that it was all done by legerdemain and ventriloquy on the woman's part, and by strength of fancy and fear on Saul's, we cannot by any means come into it, and shall give our reasons for dissenting from it, in its proper place.

(P) There is hardly a passage in the Old Testament that has been more canvassed and tortured, by authors of all ages, than this we are upon; and, when a man has read them all, he will be forced to own, that there are difficulties in whatever sense he takes the history of Samuel's apparition. We have therefore taken that which seems the most natural and obvious, and shall now give our reasons for preferring it to the rest.

First then, as to the notion of its being performed by ventriloquy, juggle, or confederacy; besides that, it doth too great a violence to the text, and would be a kind of burlesque upon its author; it is not likely that a woman, cunning enough to carry on a trade of this nature, would have been so impolitic as to give Saul such a dreadful answer; though we should grant that she was so well acquainted with the bad circumstances of that prince, that she might foresee that it was likely to prove the case; such people are rather apt to flatter those that consult them, and the fear she was in, when she knew Saul, would no doubt have put her upon this, rather than upon the former. Add to this, that such a terrible denunciation would only have proved the most effectual means of putting Saul upon any expedient to avoid it, whether by flight, or by any other way, rather than by engaging the enemy.

This last argument is equally strong against those who think that the devil took the shape, and acted the part of Samuel, unless we could suppose him so well acquainted with futurity, that he was sure Saul would rush into his own destruction, notwithstanding he was so signally forewarned of it. Again, though we grant that he might foresee, that the enemy would be too strong for Saul and his army, yet he could neither be sure that he would engage them, especially after such a dreadful dissuasive, nor if he did, that he would certainly be killed, he and his three sons. The Israelites had won many a more unlikely victory, and, at the worst, they might have escaped by flight. We need not observe farther, how unnatural and absurd it is to suppose, that the inspired writer would have expressed himself as he doth, and have introduced the deceased prophet as raised from the dead, and speaking to Saul, if the devil had been the sole actor in his shape; neither do we think it at all probable that the devil, if it had been he that spoke to Saul, would have played the saint so far, as to reprove him for his wickedness and disobedience, but especially for making use of an art to raise him up, which he must have been too fond of, to discountenance in such a severe manner.

It is indeed urged here, that there were two falsities in this pretended prophecy, which none therefore but either the father of lyes, or a juggling old woman, could be the author of. The first is, that the vision says to Saul, Thou and thy sons shall be with me—Now say they, Saul died like a reprobate by his own hands, and could not be where Samuel was, in the mansions of the blessed. But who doth not see that it meant no more than thou shalt be dead, or in the other world as I now am. The other is, that the vision says to-morrow, whereas the battle was not fought on the next day, but a day or two after. But though this be granted it doth not follow that the word מחר Mahar doth positively imply here that very next day following; it doth often signify shortly, and sometimes hereafter, in process of time; as when Moses says, when thy children shall ask thee, Mahar, hereafter, what meaneth such a ceremony or festival, and so on—We shall for once dispense with mentioning the numerous authors of these two last opinions, to avoid filling up near a whole page with quotations.

Upon the whole then, we think, with the far greater number of authors, ancient and modern, that it was really Samuel that appeared to the woman, and foretold Saul's death, and Israel's defeat. This appears likewise to have been the opinion of the ancient Jews, from what we read in the book of Ecclesiasticus (100), where it is said, that after his death he [Samuel] prophesied, and shewed the king his end; that he lift up his voice from the earth in prophecy, to blot out the wickedness of the people. This, we have already observed, is the most obvious and natural sense of the text. We can see but two objections that can be made against it, and though we have premised at the beginning of this note, that every opinion hath its difficulties, yet we hope we shall lessen these so far, that they will appear inconsiderable, in comparison of those we have urged against the other two.

The first objection is, that it were absurd to suppose that the devil has so much power over the souls of the dead, especially of the saints, as to make them appear visibly, at the desire of a conjurer: to which it may be answered, that there is no

(99) Vid. MURST. in loc.(100) Ecclesiasticus. xlvii. ult.

Saul's defeat and death.

Year of the
Flood, 1944.
Year before
CHRIST,
1055.

David's mourning for Saul and Jonathan.

nothing all that day, fainted away and fell flat on the ground, and remained a speechless for some time. His men, at length, came and raised him up, and the old woman besought him, in the humblest terms, that he would take some sustenance before he went away, which after long importunity he consented to. She then went and dressed a fattened calf, and set it before them, and as soon as they had refreshed themselves they went their way, and reached their army before break of day<sup>a</sup>. A dreadful battle soon ensued, which fulfilled all that had been foretold to Saul, whose fear of being taken alive, and ill used by his enemies, rather than the wounds he received from them (Q), made him rush upon his own sword, to put an end to his unfortunate life. Here the victorious Philistines could not forbear venting their resentment on his dead body, and those of his sons; they mangled<sup>b</sup> and hung them up upon the walls of Bethshan; which, being near the field of battle, had been probably abandoned by the inhabitants, as many others were after this defeat. But the grateful Jabeshites, remembering how Saul had saved them formerly from losing their eyes and liberty, did soon after send some of their bravest men to rescue them; which was no sooner done, than they gave them an honourable burial, and kept a seven day's fast in memory of their deaths<sup>c</sup>.

David had been returned from the slaughter of the plunderers of Ziklag about two or three days, when he received the news of Saul's and Jonathan's death by an Amalekite, who also brought him Saul's crown and bracelets. How glad<sup>c</sup> soever David might be to hear of his enemy's death, yet that of his beloved Jonathan touched him to the heart, and the great defeat of the Israelites caused a general mourning and fasting in his whole army. As for the messenger, he, having unadvisedly pretended to have given Saul his last wound, at his desire, was ordered to immediate death, for having lifted up his hand against the Lord's anointed. David did greatly mourn the unhappy fate of the father and son, and their deaths inspired his poetic genius with one of the finest elegies that ever were penned, which he caused to be transmitted to future ages<sup>d</sup>.

As soon as they had done mourning for Saul, he consulted the Lord which way he should steer his course next; and, being commanded to remove to Hebron,<sup>d</sup> he no necessity for supposing here any such extraordinary power in the devil, but rather that God did cause Samuel to appear to Saul, to reprove him for his former, and for this last sin in particular, of seeking for help from wizards, contrary to his express commands; and to bring him thereby, if possible, to such a sense of his faults, as might prevent his making such a desperate exit; and that all this happened contrary to the woman's expectation, who could not be ignorant that it was above the power of her art to evocate the souls of the blessed, and wanted only to impose one of her familiar spirits upon him, and to supply the rest by policy. It is therefore no wonder that she was so terribly surprised, when, instead of one of her imps, she beheld the real apparition of that venerable prophet.

<sup>a</sup> 1 Sam. xxviii. pass.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. cap. ult. ver. 4. See before, p. 356.

<sup>c</sup> 2 Sam. i. p. tot.

But here it will be objected again, that it is very improbable that God, who had refused to answer Saul, either by Urim or by prophets, should now do it, at least seemingly, by the ministry of a wicked woman. But here it must be observed; 1. That the text doth not imply, that the Lord refused to answer him by Urim or by prophets, but that he had not the means of consulting by them; for how could he consult by Urim, when the high-priest was with David in the Philistine army? 2. Were it true that God had refused to answer him in the ordinary ways of Urim and the like, yet it doth not follow that he might not do it in an extraordinary one, in order to make the greater impression upon him, who had all along been but too regardless of God's commands, when communicated to him by the prophet. He might likewise be suffered to seek for counsel from a witch, to make him sensible what degree of impiety he had brought himself into; and God sending Samuel to reprove him for it, was a signal way of discountenancing such a wicked and forbidden practice.

However, we do not pretend to remove all difficulties that can be raised against this opinion, but only to shew, that it is attended with fewer, and less, than the other two. For this reason we shall carry our enquiry no farther; whether it were the real soul of Samuel, or an angel assuming his shape: whether Saul saw, or only heard him speak; and many others, concerning which, we should lose ourselves in a labyrinth almost as dark and intricate, as those do, who suppose that two such remarkable events, as the death of Saul and his two sons, and the total defeat of the Israelitish army, could be foretold so positively and exactly, either by a juggling woman, or by the devil, or indeed by any but an omniscient power.

(Q) Notwithstanding what has been said elsewhere †, of Saul's receiving several wounds before he fell upon his sword, for want of attending more to the original than to ours and other versions; we beg leave to observe here, that in this place and in the Chronicles, where the account of Saul's death is repeated, the root of the verb is חָלַל Challal, which signifies to be in dread, in pangs, and alludes to the travail of a woman, וַיָּחַל Uchall, and not חָלַל Challal, to wound. So that it doth not appear, that he was at all wounded, but only in the extremity of fear, when he saw himself so thick beset with enemies, that there was no way to escape (1).

† Sup. p. 356. c.

(1) Vid. Chald. paraphr. MUSET. & al. in loc.

a he brought thither his two wives, his relations, and army. Here he was again anointed king over Judab by those of that tribe, who came to him in multitudes; whilst Abner, Saul's general, took his son Ish-bosheth, who was then forty years old, and proclaimed him king of Israel at Mabanaim. Thus was the kingdom divided between these two, each enjoying his own share quietly, without molesting the other, during the space of two years (R), the tribe of Judab cleaving to David, and the rest, at least for the most part, to Ish-bosheth. The first popular thing Ish-bosheth David did after this, was to send a message of thanks to the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead, for the regard they had paid to the bodies of the deceased king and his sons. After which, he married Maakab, the daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur <sup>1</sup>, by whom he had afterwards Abshalom and Thamar <sup>2</sup>. But we cannot think, with our learned Usher, that he contracted an affinity with that prince to strengthen himself against his rival *; that being expressly forbid by the law of Moses. It is more probable, that he took her prisoner, in one of his excursions against that country, as we shall shew in a following note. At the end of two years, Abner, having repassed the Jordan with his army, came and incamped on one side of the pool of Gibeon; and Joab, the son of Zeruiah, David's general, came and incamped over-against him on the other side.

HITHERTO there had passed no hostilities, nor any war been declared between the two monarchs; so that, their subjects on both sides being all Israelites, there was a necessity of making some kind of hostile overture, which might bring on an engagement; the two generals, therefore, bethought themselves of the following strange one. They agreed to send twelve brave men out of each army, to meet in a proper place between them, under pretence of performing some warlike exercise; but they were no sooner come within reach of one another, than each man took his antagonist by the head, and sheathed his sword in his body; so that they were all killed upon the spot. In memory of this bloody feat, the place was called Helkath Hazzurim, the field of the strong men. There needed no more to set the two armies on fighting, and a dreadful battle immediately ensued, in which Abner's army was totally routed, and himself forced to fly for his life. Joab had two brave brothers with him, one of whom, named Azabel, was exceeding swift of foot, and he pursued after him with uncommon speed, with a design to take him prisoner. Abner was soon aware of it, and, in turning about, advised him once and again to desist from his pursuit, and to content himself with a prisoner of less note; but, Azabel still persisting, Abner was forced to run him through the body with the hinder part of his spear. The sight of his dead body caused such a general stop in the flying remains of his army, that he was forced to cause it to be removed out of the road, and covered with a garment, that his men might have time to shun Joab's victorious host, who were following close at their heels. The pursuit lasted till sun-set, by which time they were got as far as the hill of Ammah, within sight of Giath, along the wilderness of Gibeon. Here the Benjaminites rallied themselves again under Abner, and posted themselves on the rising of the hill, resolved to make a stout defence; but their general, who was weary of fighting, called to Joab, and desired him to put a stop to the slaughter of his brethren, whose destruction could not but cause bitterness in the end. Joab hearkened to him, and caused the trumpet to sound a retreat; after which, Abner and his men took the way of Mabanaim, and Joab returned to Hebron. There were but nineteen men killed on David's side, besides Azabel, but Benjamin lost 360. Azabel's body was carried to Bethlehem, and buried in the sepulchre of his ancestors <sup>3</sup>; and from that time David grew stronger every day, and Ish-bosheth weaker and weaker; but the war between those two did not end but with the death of the latter, which happened shortly after.

IN

<sup>a</sup> 2 Sam. iii. 3.<sup>1</sup> Ib. ch. xiii. 1.

* Annal. p. 35.

<sup>2</sup> 2 Sam. ii. pass.

(R) At least this seems to be the sense of those words, and Ish-bosheth reigned two years (2); for it is plain he reigned much longer, but not peaceably. Much the same was said of the beginning of Saul's reign (3). Abner also might think it proper to take him to Mabanaim, which was beyond Jordan, that, being free from the Philistines, he might have time to recruit his shattered army.

(2) 2 Sam. ii. 10.

(3) 1 Sam. xiii. 1. Usher, Ann. p. 35.

Ishboetheth deserved by Abner.

IN the mean time, Abner, who had used all his endeavours to strengthen his master's party, did set such value upon his own services, that he made no scruple to have a criminal intercourse with one of Saul's concubines, named Rizpah; and, when he was reprimanded for it by Ish-bosebeth (S), he resented it so highly, that he swore that he would from that minute become a friend to David, and bring all the tribes under his obedience. He delayed not to make his words good, by sending messengers privately, first to David, and then to the elders of Israel, to contrive a revolt; after which, he found out the following pretence for going to David unsuspected. That monarch had sent to Ish-bosebeth, to desire of him to send him his wife Michal, whom Saul, during his exile, had married to another; and Abner, having obtained an order from him to demand her of her husband, took upon him to convey her safe to David. Whether Ish-bosebeth had any suspicion of him, or not, yet his circumstances were so tottering, that he dared not refuse him any thing; so Abner went, accompanied with twenty men, and presented Michal to David, and was graciously received by him. But, as he was returning home, Joab, unknown to David, sent for him back to Hebron, under some friendly pretence, and killed him as soon as he was come to the gate of the city, under pretence indeed of revenging his brother Azabel's death; but much more likely, to rid himself of so powerful a rival. As soon as David heard of it, he protested his innocence of that bloody deed, and vented his resentment in imprecations against the author of it; after which, he caused Abner to be decently buried, and accompanied his corpse to the grave with all the tokens of sorrow and respect<sup>a</sup>. However, as he knew himself as yet too weak to disoblige Joab, whose power among the people might easily have turned the scale against him, he was forced to suppress his grief and resentment for the treacherous murder of so considerable a person.

*Murdered by Baana and Re-
chab.*

Ish-bosebeth did soon hear of his death; and, as he had been the main support of his kingdom, both he and his men began to fear, that David would soon be too strong for him. This inspired two of his captains, brethren, of the family of the Beerothites, Baana and Rechab, to conspire against his life, in hopes of recommending themselves to David by it. They took the opportunity of the heat of the day, when he was lain down on his bed, to come into his house, under pretence of fetching their allowance of corn; and to enter into his chamber, where they barbarously murdered him; and, having cut off his head, fled away with it, unperceived, to Hebron, and presented it to David, congratulating him upon the death of his competitor. It was hardly to be expected that David, who had punished the young Amalekite with death, for barely pretending to have killed Saul, could forbear expressing a much greater horror at this more inhuman regicide, and to inflict a suitable punishment upon the authors of it, whatever advantage his affairs might reap from it. Accordingly, he commanded them to be immediately put to death, and their hands and feet to be cut off, and hung up over the pool of Hebron. As for the head of Ish-bosebeth, he caused it to be buried in the sepulchre of Abner, which was also in the same city<sup>b</sup>.

David reigns over all the 12 tribes.

David by this time had reigned over Judah in Hebron about seven years and half; and, when the rest of the tribes heard of Ish-bosebeth's death, they assembled themselves, and came to anoint him king over all Israel, and to pay their homage to him. These are reckoned, in another place<sup>c</sup>, to have amounted to the number of 32,000 men and upwards, all ready armed, and expert warriors, out of all the twelve tribes, except part of that of Benjamin, which did still stick to the house of Saul. David received them with joy, and feasted them at Hebron during three days; all that time, not only his own and the neighbouring tribes, but even some of the more distant ones, pouring in plenty of provisions upon them<sup>d</sup>.

ON

<sup>a</sup> 2 Sam. iii. p. tot. See before, p. 698. b. <sup>c</sup> Ch. iv. pass. <sup>d</sup> Comp. 1 Chron. xii. 23, & seq. with xi. 1, 2, & seq. <sup>e</sup> Ibid. xii. ult.

(S) It appears, by the sequel of the Jewish history, that it was a very high crime, amounting to no less than treason, to marry a king's widow (4); much more must it have been so, to debauch her, as Abner did Rizpah. So that Ish-bosebeth, notwithstanding his obligations to that general, could not well avoid resenting such an affront being offered to the royal dignity, as came little short of an attempt upon his crown.

(4) Vide 1 Kings ii. 13, & seq.

a ON the next year, David went and besieged Jerusalem, a place of such strength, that it had stood out till that time against the united force of Judah and Simeon. Here Joab shewed so much bravery and conduct, that he was made head general of Israel: He beat the Jebusites that defended it, and carried the fortrefs of Sion, or Zion, by assault †, which David made his residence from that time. He enlarged and fortified it from Millo inward round about, and called it the city of David, whilst Joab rebuilt the rest of the city, surrounded it with a strong wall; and from that time it became the metropolis of Judea.

b BUT it was impossible for him to carry on such a work, without alarming the jealous Philistines, who could not be ignorant, either of the strength of his army, or of h's now reigning over all Israel without a competitor. They came, therefore, so suddenly upon him, that they took Betlehem, and put a garrison into it, before he could make any resistance, whilst he was forced to retire to the cave of Adullam for present safety. It was here, that, having expressed a longing desire for some of the water of the well of Betlehem, three of his chief worthies ventured through the enemy's host, which was encamped along the valley of Rephaim, and fetched him some water from thence. However, when they brought it to him, he chose rather to spill it upon the ground than to drink it, seeing, as he said, they had procured it at the hazard of their lives. He then enquired of the Lord, whether he should fall upon the Philistines; and, having received a favourable answer, he discomfited c them so effectually, both at this time, and upon a second attempt of theirs, that they were never more able to make head against him, or any of his successors. David finding himself thus strengthened, his army numerous and well disciplined, under the conduct of more than thirty worthies, who had all signalized themselves by some extraordinary exploits, and his enemies so thoroughly weakened, made a firm alliance with Hiram king of Tyre, by whom he was furnished with cedars and other woods, and with expert workmen, to build him a palace in his own city. He likewise increased the number of his wives and concubines, by whom he had a considerable number of children born at Jerusalem, besides those that were born to him in Hebron (T); all which did not a little contribute to his grandeur as well as d happiness.

SUCH a series of successes, and the universal peace which then reigned through the whole kingdom, inspired that pious prince with the highest sentiments of gratitude and religion, and with a desire of making his city the center, as it were, of God's worship, by transporting the sacred ark thither, which had continued almost fifty years at Kirjath-jearim (V), and placing it in one of the best apartments of his new palace. He consulted the elders and chiefs of Israel upon it, and, being answered with the universal approbation of the assembly, he dispatched messengers through

* 2 Sam. v. 8. † Chr. xi. 6. ‡ See before, p. 336. d. § Comp. 2 Sam. v. 9. & 1 Chron. xi. 7. & seq. ¶ Ibid. xiv. 9. & seq. ** Ibid. xi. 17. & seq. *** Ibid. xiv. 10. & seq. See before, p. 337. b.

(T) David is recorded to have had six wives in Hebron, besides Saul's daughter, who was then with another husband. He is said to have had a son by every one of the six former; by which is hardly meant, that he had but one by each, but that the text mentions only their first-born (5). As for Maachab, the daughter of the king of Geshur, the Jews affirm, that David had taken her captive, and forced her to embrace the Jewish religion; because it was forbid by the law of Moses to contract any affinity with the heathens. Either of these is far from improbable, because we read of his making some excursions against the Geshurites, during his abode at Ziklag (6); but nothing of his contracting such a forbidden affinity with their king. Neither, indeed, is it likely, that so zealous a man, as David was, would have married her before she had renounced her idolatry. But as to what they add, of his forcing her to turn Jew against her will, and that the ill hap of her two children, Absalom and Tamar, the former of whom turned rebel against his father, and the latter was ravished by David's eldest son, was inflicted on him as a punishment for that violence (7), we dare not warrant any thing about it.

How many wives and concubines he took, after he came from Hebron, the text doth not say, but mentions only that he had ten sons by them; by which the Talmudists gather, that he had sixteen in all, besides Michal, who, being barren, was to be excepted out of that number. Hence they have passed it into a law, that a king ought to have no more wives than eighteen (8); and they believe, that all Solomon's miscarriages were owing to his venturing to exceed that number †.

(V) Archbishop Usher reckons that it was on the first sabbatical year that it was brought from Gilgal to Shiloh, and that it was likewise upon such another year that it was removed from Kirjath-jearim, to the city of David; and that the 68th psalm was sung by the people who accompanied this solemn procession (9).

(5) 2 Sam. iii. 2. & seq. (6) 1 Sam. ii. 7, 8. (7) Vide MURRAY. 2 Sam. iii. sub not. 6. (8) Vide Præc. Negat. cccxii. † Vide sup. p. 667. (R). (9) An. p. 36.

through the whole kingdom to invite all the priests and levites, and as many of the people as were so disposed, to come to the solemnity. The ark was accordingly set upon a new cart, and brought from Aminadab's house to Jerusalem, accompanied by David and his court, by multitudes of priests and levites, who sang and played upon various instruments, and by a numerous concourse of people from all parts of the kingdom. But their joy was suspended by an accident, which filled the king and assembly with wonder and fear. The ark was come to Nachon's threshing-floor (W), when the oxen that drew it, starting at something, were like to have over-set the cart; to prevent which, Uzzab, one of Aminadab's sons, who drove it, clapped his hand upon the ark in a surprise, and was for his presumption smitten with immediate death (X). David could not forbear expressing a more than ordinary grief at this severity; he called the place Perez Uzzab, that is, the breach or punishment of Uzzab, and resolved to have the ark deposited in the house of Obededom, the son of Jeduthun*, surnamed the Gilbite, probably, because he was a native of Gath-rimmon, a city allotted to the tribe of Levi†, where it continued about three months. David finding, soon after, that God had blessed that Levite in an extraordinary manner, ever since the ark had been under his roof, and being desirous to procure a share of those divine blessings, caused it to be brought to his own house. However, he took care to have it performed in a more regular manner, by preparing a sumptuous tabernacle for it, by assembling the priests, and causing them to bear it according to God's command, by offering sacrifices at every six paces (Y), and by shewing an uncommon joy upon that solemn occasion. For he put on a linen ephod, and danced before the ark at the sound of a great number of instruments, infomuch that Michal, who saw the procession through a window, could not forbear despising and reflecting upon him, for acting, as she thought, so far beneath a king of Israel. As soon as the ark was deposited in the tabernacle, he offered a large quantity of burnt and peace-offerings; and, having feasted the great concourse of people who came to the city, he dismissed them to their own homes‡.

His zeal.

* 1 Chron. xvi.

† See Josh. xxi. 24, 25.

‡ 2 Sam. vi. p. tot.

(W) Though we have followed our version, it seems to us more probable, that the word נָחֹן Nachon, or Nakon, is rather a participle than a proper name, and signifies ready fitted, or proper, because we find that David stopped at proper distances to offer sacrifices; and this seems to be one of them; and perhaps also it might be either the killing of the victims, or something relating to those sacrifices, that made the oxen to start. There was, moreover, a very great irregularity in placing the ark upon a cart; which, according to the law of Moses, ought to have been carried by the priests upon their shoulders. This accident, therefore, made him so sensible of his error, that the author of the book of the Chronicles observes, that he acknowledged it to the priests at the next removal of the ark, and caused them to bear it upon their shoulders to his house (10).

(X) This sudden and severe punishment upon Uzzab for his indiscreet zeal, which David himself could not forbear being much surprised and displeased at (11), has given so much offence to some interpreters, that they have sought for a quite different sense of the words, in order to make his crime greater than is commonly apprehended. It is true, that the original runs literally thus, and Uzzab sent and seized the ark, for the cattle flock. From which they would conclude, that he rather offered some indignity to it, than endeavoured to prevent its falling. But, besides that this is contrary to all the ancient versions, and to the book of the Chronicles, where this fact is more clearly related, it is certain, that, if that had been the case, David would have expressed his resentment against him, and not against God for punishing him. Uzzab, being a Levite, ought to have remembered, that it was forbid, under pain of death (12), to any but to the priests, to touch the ark; and even these were only to touch the staves by which it was carried, which for that reason were never to be taken from it. It may also be, that Uzzab was the contriver of this new way of carrying the ark upon a cart, instead of the priests shoulders. However, if his punishment should still seem too severe, one may suppose, that God suffered it to be so, in order to inspire the people with a greater respect and awe for that sacred symbol of his presence, than they were naturally inclined to.

(Y) This we take to be the meaning of the text here (13), though it only says, that, when the bearers had proceeded six steps, he offered a bullock, &c. But some think that, Uzzab having been struck dead within six yards of his own house, David caused these sacrifices to be made at the first six steps of the priests, to intreat the Lord to be more favourable this time (14). But we find in the Chronicles*, that they repeated the same sacrifices when they came near David's house, in thankfulness that God had helped the Levites to bring the ark to the place appointed for it, without any accident.

It may be wondered at, that David chose to erect a new tabernacle for the ark, instead of leading for that which Moses had caused to be made in the wilderness. It may be indeed reasonably supposed, that the precincture of his palace was not capacious enough for the latter, and this probably is the reason why it continued still, with the altar and all its other sacred utensils, at Gibron, till Solomon, having built his temple, caused them to be brought and deposited in it, as we shall see in its proper place†.

(10) 1 Chron. xv. 11. & seq. (11) 2 Sam. 6. 2 Sam. vi. ver. 13. (14) Vide MURNET. in loc. hamikdash.

(12) Vide Num. iv. pass. & ver. 15. (13) * 1 Chron. xv. 26. † Vide Maimon. Hil.

- a THE ark being thus fixed in this new repository, the next care was to appoint the classes of priests and Levites to officiate before it, according to their several functions. He also chose a number of singers, and players upon musical instruments, to celebrate the praises of God in their turns, to set such psalms and hymns as he, or any other inspired person, composed, in order to have them sung upon festivals and other solemn occasions. The author of the Chronicles has preserved us one of them, in words at length, which that monarch composed as an eucharistical canticle, and delivered to the musicians, to be sung upon the removal of the ark to his house<sup>a</sup>; and which may be justly esteemed one of the sublimest pieces of poetry extant, whether for its elegance, or for the strain of piety and gratitude that runs through the whole.

- b Soon after this, he sent for the prophet Nathan, to consult with him about the building of a temple to the Lord, telling him, that he could not, with any ease, dwell in a sumptuous palace, whilst the ark was only under a tabernacle. The prophet applauded his pious design, not doubting but God would ratify and prosper it; but God, who appeared to him that night, directed him to go to the king, and to tell him, that, though his intentions were highly acceptable to him, yet, forasmuch as he had so often defiled his hands with blood, he did not think him a proper person for such a work, but that he would raise him up a son and successor (Z), whose reign he would bless with a profound peace, and him with extraordinary wisdom, affluence, and prosperity, and that he should build him a temple. He added, that it was upon him that he would settle the throne of Israel unto the end, and prosper him and his successors, in proportion to their obedience to him; and that even the most stubborn disobedience should not bring upon them a total dereliction, but only such fatherly chastisements as might bring them to a filial repentance. David, full of the sense of all these gracious promises, went and prostrated himself before the Lord, and, in the humblest and most pathetick terms, acknowledged his extreme unworthiness of all these promised mercies, and his reliance on his omnipotent goodness for the fulfilling of them in his own good time<sup>b</sup>.

- d FROM that time, he applied part of his care in making preparations for that sumptuous building, and in laying up for it immense quantities of gold, silver, copper, precious stones, wood, and other materials. For in those successful wars which he had against the Philistines<sup>c</sup>, Moabites<sup>d</sup>, Amalekites<sup>e</sup>, the kings of Zobab, Syria<sup>f</sup>, and Edom<sup>g</sup>; of which the best account has been given in their several histories that could be got out of the sacred records; he got such a prodigious quantity of the richest spoil, part of which he never failed to dedicate to this design, that the wealth which he left his son at his death is almost beyond belief. His œconomy was not inferior to his success; he found that the keeping of a numerous army would either exhaust his treasury too much, or cause too great a share of his subjects lands to lie uncultivated; to prevent which, he appointed twelve bands, each of 24,000 men, with proper officers over them, to serve each their respective months in the year; after which, they were dismissed to their own private affairs during the other eleven months. He likewise appointed twelve expert persons over his finances (A), under Ashmaveib and Adoram; and judges in

<sup>a</sup> 1 Chron. xvi. pass. <sup>b</sup> 2 Sam. vii. pass. 1 Chron. xvii. pass. & alib. <sup>c</sup> See before, p. 357.
<sup>d</sup> Ibid. p. 290. <sup>e</sup> Ibid. p. 321. <sup>f</sup> Ibid. p. 382. <sup>g</sup> Ibid. p. 314. See 2 Sam. viii. pass.

(Z) From the words in the text, the seed or son that shall proceed out of thy bowels (15), the Jews infer, that the crown could devolve neither to Amnon, Abshalom, Adonijah, nor to any of those sons that were born before this promise (16); but as the future is often used for the perfect tense, according to the genius of the original, the argument is no way conclusive, unless we throw into the scale the objection which is urged against the father, being equally strong against those sons, who, being all warriors, had, no doubt, embued their hands in blood; from which Solomon was to be altogether free. This exception is not indeed mentioned in the book of Kings, but we find it urged in the book of Chronicles, as an argument why God did not think David pure enough to erect so sacred an edifice to him (17).

(A) These are supposed to have been of two kinds, either such as were exacted from his subjects, or those that accrued from his own hereditary lands or conquered dominions. Each kind of tribute, whether paid in money, grain, or other produce, were collected by their particular officers (18).

(15) 2 Sam. vii. 12. (16) Vid. MURST. JUN. & al. in loc.

(17) 1 Chr. xxii. 8. xxviii. 3.

(18) Ibid. xxvii. 25, & seq. 2 Sam. xx. 24, & seq.

in every tribe, to administer justice to the people; besides those of his great a council, who had the affairs of the religion and state under their care; the former under the two high-priests, Zadok the son of Abitub, and Abimelech the son of Abiatbar (B); and the latter under proper officers, among which Joab was general of the army; Jehoshaphat was chief secretary, Serajab recorder, Benajab over the Cherethites and Peletbites (C); whilst some of the king's sons were set over all these officers b (D).

Gratitude to Jonathan's
son.

BUT neither the cares of state, nor his uncommon prosperity, could make him forget his affectionate engagements to his late generous friend Jonathan. He sought out his only son Mephibosheth, who was lame of his feet, and under the care of one of Saul's servants named Ziba; he sent for him to court, and, after he b had shewed him all possible tokens of friendship and tenderness, he caused all the lands of his royal grandfather to be restored to him, commanding Ziba to improve them to the best advantage for his master, and appointed him a table in his own palace, and among his own sons; which bound that young prince to his interest to the day of his death c.

HIS gratitude to the king of the Ammonites did not meet with the same returns: Nabash, from whom David had received some signal favours, being dead, he sent a congratulatory embassy to Hanun his son, with offers of renewing their ancient friendship; but that weak prince, unjustly suspecting the ambassadors were come upon some baser design, treated them in a most shameful manner, and sent them away †. This affront, however, turned to David's advantage;

b See 1 Chron. xxvii. pass.

c 2 Sam. ix. pass.

† See before, p. 296. a. b.

(B) We have already taken notice that these two were, the one, namely, Zadok, of the eldest, and Abimelech of the youngest branch of Aaron's family, and that the high-priesthood had often shifted from the one to the other †; but that one of each branch should exercise the pontifical function, at the same time, is what is not to be met with either before or since. It is probable that Saul, after he had killed all the priests in Nob, except Abiatbar who fled to David, might set up Zadok to officiate in that dignity in Israel, as Eleazar did in Judah, and that, when David came to be king of all the twelve tribes, he did not think fit to deprive either of their office, but suffered them both to continue in it; but whether alternately or subordinately, whether the one at Gibeon, where the tabernacle stood, and the other at Jerusalem, where the ark was; or lastly, whether the one in the tribe of Judah, and the other over the other tribes, we will not venture to determine. Certain it is, that they are still mentioned together upon several other occasions (19) till the beginning of Solomon's reign, when Zadok's competitor was divested of his dignity, for having gone over to the party of Adonijah (20).

(C) It is not easy to guess who these were. The Chaldee paraphrast renders these words by archers and slingers; and the Rabbies understand by them, absurdly enough, some the Urim and Thummim and others the grand Sanhedrin, deriving the first word from כרת Carth, to break short, as if they had been כרתים Carthim men that broke their sentences short, or spoke succinctly and with authority, and the other from פלא Phela, wonderful (21); and, if we have no better helps, we may remain in the dark long enough. But we have already observed elsewhere, that the Cherethites were Philistines *, and we shall now give some further proofs of it.

When the Amalekites had burnt Ziklag, and David, in pursuit of them, met with an Egyptian; that youth informed him that they had made an incursion into the south of the Cherethites, and so on (22); from which it is plain, that they must have been either Philistines, or some people that dwelt among them, as the Geshurites did; unless we will suppose with Tremellius, that they were a colony of Israelites that took possession of that country, after the Philistines had been driven out of it, which we see no grounds for admitting. For we find the prophet Ezekiel joining the Cherethites and Philistines together, either as synonymous, or at least cohabiters, in these words, Behold I will stretch out mine hand against the Philistines, and cut off the Cherethim, and destroy the remnant of the sea-coast (23). Another prophet expresses himself much after the same manner, Woe unto the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, the nation of the Cherethites, the Lord is against you, O Canaan the land of the Philistines (24). Thus far concerning the Cherethites.

As for the Peletbites, we meet with nothing concerning them, except their being joined with them in this place, and in some chapters after, where they are both mentioned as accompanying David when he fled from his son Abshalom (25). But whether these two people were captives of war, auxiliary troops, or a kind of life-guard, we will not venture to determine.

(D) The text says here, that they were כוהנים Cobanim, which properly signifies Priests, but which our version doth rightly render Chief Rulers and Princes, in the margin, according to a parallel text in the Chronicles, where they are said to have been המלך ליהויה The chief about the king. And it is plain that in several other places, particularly those quoted in the margin (26), the word is generally taken in that sense. Several learned Jews indeed, to extol the piety of David, understand by Cobanim here the disciples of the priests, from which they would infer, that that pious monarch caused his sons to be educated under them (27). If that were true, it is certain that some of them did not much credit their masters; but the text says nothing of it; on the contrary, the author of the first book of the Chronicles tells us, that Jonathan, David's uncle, a person of consummate wisdom, was the person who was intrusted with that important business (28).

† Vid. sup. p. 634. b. c. 5 (S). (19) Vid. int. al. 2 Sam. xv. 24, 29. xix. 11, 12. 2 Sam. alib. (20) 1 King. i. 7, 8. ii. 35, 2 Sam. alib. (21) Vid. MÜNST. in loc. * Vid. sup. p. 344. (1). (22) 1 Sam. xxx. 14. (23) Ch. xxv. 16. (24) Zeph. ii. 5. (25) 2 Sam. xv. 18. (26) Gen. xli. 45. xlvii. 22. Exod. ii. 16, iii. 1. Job xii. 19. 2 Sam. alib. (27) Vid. MÜNST. in loc. (28) Ch. xxvii. 32.

- a advantage; Joab was sent to revenge it at the head of a powerful army, and that victorious general gained a compleat victory against the Ammonites and their confederates, and returned to Jerusalem. The Syrians, however, one of those confederates, came again the next year with a fresh army: Shoback, general of Hadadazer, or Hadarezer, king of Syria Zobe, who was at their head, came and incamped at Helam; but David made such speed over Jordan with a powerful army, and gave him such an overthrow, that they were glad to clap up a peace with him, and to become his tributaries. The Ammonites were likewise so weakened by these defeats, that they would have been glad to have remained quiet; but David was too exasperated and too successful against them, not to pursue his victory to the utmost, by sending Joab to invade their country, which that general did with that valour and severity, as reduced them to the lowest ebb †.

- WHILST Joab was taken up with the siege of the Metropolis of the unfortunate children of Ammon, a place of such strength that it held out two years against him; David, wholly relying on his valour and conduct, was solacing himself at home, and became unfortunately enamoured with a beautiful woman, whom he had, from his terrace, observed washing herself one evening in her garden. Upon enquiring who she was, he was informed that she was the daughter and wife of two of his bravest captains, Eliam and Uriab (E), who were then with Joab at the siege; but his passion proved too violent to admit of any check from reason or religion, or even of a delay. The fruit of their unlawful commerce was her sudden pregnancy, and the danger she was in, of being put to death for it, according to the law of Moses. The king bethought himself of an expedient to prevent the latter, by sending for her husband from the siege, under pretence indeed of informing himself how it was carried on, but in reality, in hopes of his spending a night or two with her; but whether Uriab had any suspicion of the wrong done to him, or whether, indeed, he thought it beneath the bravery of a captain to go and solace himself at home, whilst his general and fellow-soldiers were exposed to the fatigues of a siege; he made this last his excuse for not going home to his wife, and contented himself with lying at the gate of the palace, with the rest of the king's guard. The king, thus disappointed, resolved to try him a second time; he made him eat at his table, and, at supper, plied him so well with wine, that he did not doubt but he would, in that merry humour, have gone home to his wife; but Uriab, drunk as he was, spent that night also with the guards; and the king, who by this time could not but suspect, that he had some more private reason for absenting himself from home, resolved to sacrifice his life to that of his faithless wife. Accordingly, on the next morning, he dispatched him with a letter to Joab, wherein he ordered that general, who was the fittest person for such a bloody deed, to expose that brave officer to some imminent danger, and to leave him to the fury of the besieged; This was accordingly done; and David, having received the news of his death, sent and acquainted Bath-Sheba with it, who put herself in mourning for him, and was soon after sheltered from danger, by being married to the king †. We have seen, elsewhere, the success of this long siege, and the hard fate of the conquered Ammonites *: all we need to add here is, that what is said there of their monarch's crown, that it weighed a talent of gold, that is, upwards of 113 pounds, is rather to be understood of its worth than its weight, that is, that the gold and precious stones, with which it was adorned, was equal in worth to a talent of gold (F) †.

IN

† 2 Sam. x. pass. See before, p. 296, & seq.
 † 2 Sam. xii. 30.

* 2 Sam. xi. pass. * See before, p. 297. b. c.

(E) At least, we find one Eliam in the number of David's worthies, who was the son of Ahitophel (29), and is supposed to have been her father. If so, it is no wonder that consanguine politician did so easily join in the son's conspiracy, to revenge the affront done to his family by the father †. As for her husband, he is surnamed the Hittite, probably, because he is of that nation, and a proselyte to the Jewish religion, tho' some will have it, that he is so called, only because he was either born or had dwelt amongst them, or upon some warlike exploit he had achieved against them (30). Josephus neither mentions this as a surname, or as that of his nation, but only says that he was Joab's armour-bearer (31).

(F) It were indeed absurd to understand it otherwise, for what man could bear such a weight, tho' we should even understand it of the common talent of 60 pounds, as Kimchi doth. Some Jews, and others, do indeed fancy, that it was only hung over the monarch's head, like the top of a canopy (32); but this is contrary to the plain meaning of the original, which did not want words to have expressed

(29) 2 Sam. xxii. 34. † 2 Sam. xv. 12, & seq. vid. & Hæbr. Comment. in loc. (30) Vide BERUYER.
 MUNST. JUN. & al. (31) Ant. l. 7. c. 7. (32) Vide MUNST. in loc.

Nathan's parabolical speech to David.

IN the interim God, highly provoked with David for two such heinous crimes, made choice of the prophet Nathan to go and denounce his severe judgments against him, at the time when that monarch, insensible of his guilt, was hugging in his arms the fruit of his adultery. The prophet, who knew his generous and upright heart, in any case wherein this new and criminal passion was not concerned, accosted him with a parable of a wealthy man who had spared his own numerous flocks, and seized upon an only favourite lamb of a poor neighbour, to feast an hungry guest. He dressed his story with such aggravating circumstances, that the king in anger pronounced sentence of death against the person who had been guilty of such an unnatural violence. The words were no sooner out of his mouth, than Nathan made him sensible that he had pronounced it against himself, by telling him, with a prophetic boldness, that he was the guilty person, and much more guilty than that in the parable, in that he had not only defiled the bed of a faithful captain, but had murdered him by an enemy's sword, that he might take the adulterers into his bosom. He then recapitulated to him all the aggravations of his double crime; particularly his ingratitude to his divine protector and benefactor, and the occasion he had given to his enemies to blaspheme (G). He concluded with denouncing the effects of the divine resentment against him, that Uriah's murder would prove an endless source of bloodshed in his own posterity, and that his adultery, how private soever, should be expiated by the open defilement of his own wives and concubines, by those of his own family, and in the face of the sun.

His repentance.

Solomon born.

THIS terrible sentence brought David to such a deep sense of his guilt, that his heart, too full of it, could only say I have sinned against the Lord; but the sincere remorse, with which it was uttered, obtained an immediate alleviation of the punishment. However, the unhappy son of Bath-sheba was doomed to death, and David tried in vain to obtain a reprieve for him, by prayers and tears, by fasting, sackcloth, lying on the ground, and other marks of repentance. As for the other part of the sentence, which related to his wives, it was soon after fulfilled by his unnatural son Abshalom, as we shall see anon. The child being dead, according to the saying of the prophet, David comforted his new wife for the loss of it, soon after which she found herself pregnant, and he called the son that she then bore to him Solomon, a name significative of his future peaceful reign, to which Nathan added that of Jedidiah, or beloved of the Lord<sup>a</sup>, such as he proved indeed, at least during the former part of his glorious and successful reign.

Ammon's incest.

BUT it proved far otherwise with the remainder of that of his father, who, what hopes soever he might have conceived, from the birth and promised glory of this new son, and from his victory over the Ammonites, that his repentance had happily disarmed the divine anger; never ceased feeling some of the severest and most sensible strokes of it, to the last periods of his life: not indeed from his enemies without, from whom it doth not appear that he received the least molestation, but from those of his own family, even from his own children. Ammon, his eldest son, was scarcely eighteen years of age, when he layed the foundation of all the domestic troubles of his too indulgent father, by an unnatural incest with one of his own sisters. David had had two children by Maacab, the princess of Gesbur, Abshalom, and Tamar<sup>a</sup>, whose beauty became the unhappy cause of this unlawful passion. Ammon was observed to pine away secretly, ashamed to discover the cause expressed that circumstance, had it been fact. But we shall have occasion in the next note, to shew that the word מִשְׁכָּל Miskal, doth often signify the value, though properly and generally the weight, of a thing (33).

<sup>a</sup> 2 Sam. xii. pass.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. ch. xiii. 3.

(G) This expression of the prophet inclines us to think, that David had not been able so to conceal his crime, but that it had taken wind among the neighbouring nations, who could not forbear reflecting upon the God of Israel, for favouring a monarch who could be guilty of such horrid crimes, as themselves, perhaps, were strangers to.

David, however, was so sensibly touched with his guilt, that he ceased not composing of psalms, full of the strongest expressions of humility and repentance. Some of them seem even to intimate, that God had smitten him with some very grievous and painful disease, as a punishment for his sin (34); but it is possible that they may be altogether allegorical and significative only of his excessive grief and remorse for it. Among his other penitential compositions, the 51st is supposed to have been writ immediately after Nathan's severe reproof.

(33) Vide BOCHART. HIEROZ. p. 1. LE SCENE & Essay on a new vers. pt. 2. Ch. ii. § 6. (34) Vide int. al. Ps. vi. 38. pass. lxxvii. 3, & seq. lxxxviii. pass. cii. 3, & seq. & alib. pass.

- a cause of his trouble, when a near relation, Jonadab, the son of Shimeah, David's brother, having pumped the fatal secret out, not only encouraged him, but furnished him with means to perpetrate the deed. According to his hellish advice, Ammon, pretending that his disease had now confined him to his bed, obtained an order from his father, that Tamar should come to him, and make him some kind of confectionary meat, to please his palled appetite; which that innocent princess readily complied with. She was scarcely entered with it into his bed-chamber before he, having previously sent all his attendants far enough, laid hold on her, and, in spite of all her prayers and remonstrances, ravished her. His lust thus satisfied, he conceived such a disgust against her, that, not being able to bear her presence any longer, and finding a just and modest reluctance in her to withdraw in that deplorable condition, his barbarity rose to such a height, that he violently caused her to be turned out of his house by some of his servants. Her grief and confusion were now become too great to suffer her to think how to avoid exposing herself; so that, forgetting every thing but her present misfortune, she only sought how to express her sense of it by the most lively tokens; by tearing her virgin robes, covering her head with dust, by walking with her arms over her head, and filling the air with her cries. In this manner she went to Abfalom's house, who being her brother, both by father and mother, was the properest person to procure her a redress, if any could be had. That prince, who was naturally haughty and revengeful, could not but feel the deepest resentment against so barbarous a violence; however, as the revenge he meditated against the ravisher was of too deep a nature to be presently executed, he contented himself with desiring his disconsolate sister to alleviate, or at least to conceal her grief, seeing it was a brother who was the cause of it; and to spend the remainder of her days in solitude with him; which she did accordingly; whilst he, young as he was, did so well conceal his resentment, that Ammon had not the least suspicion of it. When the news of this villainous action came to David's ears, he was exceedingly troubled at it, but that was all; Ammon was his eldest son, and he could not prevail upon himself to inflict any other punishment on him, than that of his displeasure.
- d THIS remissness did but add fuel to Abfalom's hatred; though he did not find a proper opportunity for his design till two years after; by which time Ammon's crime might be supposed to be forgot. The better to conceal his revenge, he invited his father and all his brothers to a sheep-shearing feast, which he was to make at Baal-bazar. He easily excused the king, who declined going, from a principle of œconomy, because he had only invited him out of formality, and to avoid suspicion; but he insisted, in particular, upon his brother Ammon's favouring him with his presence with the rest of his brethren, and easily obtained his consent. When they were come to the place, he received them with an air, which shewed nothing less than his murdering intention; but, as soon as he observed that wine
- e had raised their mirth to the desired pitch, he gave a signal to a number of his servants, whom he had appointed for the deed, and who immediately fell upon Ammon and stabbed him to death; whilst the rest of the king's sons expecting, perhaps, their turns would be next, made all possible haste to get to their mules, and rode away to Jerusalem. Before they could reach it, word had been brought to the king, that Abfalom had caused all his brethren to be assassinated. One may easily imagine how he received the dreadful news; he rent his cloaths, cast himself down upon the ground, and abandoned himself to the most violent expressions of grief. The servants that were about him endeavoured to bear a part in this tragic scene, and stood round him with their cloaths rent. Jonadab only, the infamous instrument of Ammon's incest, did rightly guess, that he alone had proved the victim of Abfalom's revenge. He acquainted the king with his thoughts, which were soon after confirmed by the arrival of the rest of the young princes, who, with tears in their eyes, told him all that had happened. It was a melancholy meeting on all hands; the king mourned for some time the loss of his eldest son, whilst his murderer, not expecting the same remissness from him, went and sheltered himself under the protection of his grandfather, the king of Geshur, where he continued three whole years.

Ammon murdered by Abfalom.

Joab's stratagem to have Absalom recalled.

By that time, Joab observing that the king expressed less grief for his dead son, than uneasiness for his absent one, did reasonably conclude, that, if he could work upon him to recal him by any stratagem that could but save his honour, it would be an acceptable service to them both. To compass this, he instructed a notable woman, whom he had sent for from Tekoab, a place not far from Jerusalem, to address herself to the king under the personage of a distressed widow, just on the brink of being bereaved of the only son she had left, who was in danger of being put to death for having killed his brother in a fray, by which there would be a signal end of her husband's name and family. The story bore indeed no parallel with that of Absalom; perhaps, the politick Joab had contrived it so, to prevent the king's suspecting it to be a designed thing. However, she told it with such pathetick expressions of grief, that David, moved with compassion, gave her his royal word, that her surviving son should be sheltered from all future prosecution. He had scarce bound it with an oath, when, according to her instructions, she took the liberty, though in the humblest terms, to represent to him the wrong he did himself, by suffering his son to continue longer in his banishment, seeing that could by no means recal the dead, whose life, once gone, was like water spilt upon the ground, which could not be gathered up again. The king, who by this time perceived the woman's drift, failed not to conclude, that Joab was at the bottom of it; he taxed the woman with it, and she, in the modestest terms, acknowledged it, adding, that the king was as an angel of God, from whom it was impossible to conceal any thing. Joab, who was present all this while, took this opportunity of falling prostrate before him, seemingly to beg pardon for his stratagem, but really to lay hold on his promise in favour of Absalom; and David, as willing to grant, as he was to ask, did immediately order him to be fetched from his banishment, but with this condition, that he should not approach the king's person, but retire to his own house; which was complied with accordingly, for he did not see the king for two whole years after his return (H). But being tired at length with living so long in disgrace, and having sent in vain for Joab, once and again, to come to him, he found no other way of bringing him, but causing some of his adjacent corn to be set on fire. Joab soon came to him at the news of this unexpected treatment; and, after some passionate expostulations on both sides, it was agreed, that the king should be applied to in favour of his son, which was soon after successfully done by that politic general.

Absalom reconciled to his father.

THIS reconciliation could not but convince Absalom of his father's extraordinary fondness for him; but that ungrateful prince sought only how to make the most unnatural advantage of it. He immediately procured a sumptuous equipage of chariots, horses, and running-footmen, to attract the eyes of the people; and by an affected popularity, and seeming compassion for those who came to the king for justice, and the difficulty of obtaining it from him, it was not long before he gained also their hearts, and persuaded them, that they would be much happier under

<sup>a</sup> Ch. xiv. p. tot.

(H) The text doth here take notice of his excessive and insinuating beauty, which did so captivate the hearts of the people to him, that it inspired him with the first sentiments of his unnatural rebellion.

One circumstance it mentions, relating to the yearly polling of his hair; which, taken in a literal sense, will appear incredible, it being said to have amounted to 200 shekels after the king's weight, that is, at least, to three pounds two ounces; but to double that weight, according to some, who make the king's shekel to have been equal to that of the sanctuary, that is, to half an ounce avertu-pois. Such a monstrous quantity of hair, were any head able to bear the weight of it, would rather disfigure, than be an ornament to it; we think it therefore more probable, that the word, שֵׁשֶׁל Shakal, is here to be understood of the value, and not of the weight of it; that is, that it was worth 200 shekels, whether half or quarters of ounces of silver. Not that we will suppose that Absalom sold them, though even that is not impossible (35), but that, whether he gave it to his servants, as a perquisite, or to some favourite woman, it was reckoned worth that sum. Some Jewish doctors do tell us, that his hair, being exceeding long and fair, was in great request among the great women in Jerusalem, to adorn their heads with (36).

There is another difficulty in this place (37), where mention is made of Absalom's three sons, and of one daughter, named Thamar; whereas it is said, in another place (38), that he reared up a pillar in the king's dale, to perpetuate his name, because he had no male issue. All that can be supposed is, that they died in that short interval, though no mention is made of their death.

[35] Vid. Le Scène. & Eff. on a new vers. pt. ii. ct. 2. § 7. xiv. 27. (36) Ibid. cb. xviii. 18.

[36] Id. ibid.

[37] 2 Sam.

- a under his government. This he continued doing some years (I), after which, <sup>And rebels</sup> finding himself strong enough to break out into an open rebellion, and being <sup>against him.</sup> perhaps afraid lest his artifices should at length give the king some suspicion of his perfidious design, he obtained leave of his too easy father, to go and perform a pretended vow in Hebron, where he had appointed the chief of his party to meet him; whilst others, who were dispersed through the tribes, were ordered to proclaim him king, as soon as they heard the signal given by the sound of the trumpet. He took, among others, 200 men from Jerusalem, who, being altogether ignorant of his design, served only to conceal it the more. At his coming to Hebron, he sent for Ahitophel (K) from Giloh, his native place; and the defection b of that great politician, who had been one of David's chief counsellors, did not contribute a little to increase the number of conspirators. David was then at Jerusalem, when news were brought to him of his son's rebellion; and being afraid either of being surprised in it, or of being the cause, perhaps, of its inhabitants being put to the sword, he left his palace to the care of ten of his concubines, and made what haste he could out of the city. As soon as he came to the next convenient place, he made a halt, to take, a melancholy view of the handful of men which followed him; and, having observed the Gherethites and Pelethites to be of that number, whom we before observed to have been strangers, he addressed himself to Ittai, who was probably their commander, and told him, that he did not expect c that they, who were so lately come into his service, should share in his adverse fortune, and advised him to return home with his men, since it was not in his power now to reward their fidelity. But that brave officer answered him with an oath, that he would never forsake him, whatever might be the success of his affairs, as long as he was able to draw a sword in his defence. The king, who could not but admire so faithful a zeal in a stranger, desired him to pass before him over the brook Kidron, whilst the rest of his followers, and the people that came to see this sorrowful sight, shed plenty of tears, to see the distress into which their monarch was driven by his unnatural son.

- Among those that followed the king, were the high-priests, Zadok and Abiathar, d at the head of a number of Levites, who had brought the ark of God with them. David, however, did not think fit that they should follow him, but commanded them to bear the ark back to Jerusalem, whence they might send him intelligence of all that passed there, by their two sons Abimas and Jonathan, and assist him with their counsel, as they were seers; that is, as they had the gift of prophecy; whilst he went and concealed himself in some of the plains of the wilderness, resolved to submit to whatever God should decree concerning him. As soon as the priests were departed, David received the melancholy news, that Ahitophel was gone over to his son; upon which, he prayed earnestly to God, to confound whatever counsel that old statesman should give to the conspirators; and went up e soon after, he and his small troop, the ascent of mount Olivet, accompanied by his wives and children, and some people that followed him from Jerusalem. The march was mournful beyond expression; the king, bathed in tears, went up with his head covered, and his feet bare (L), whilst his sorrowful retinue expressed their deep concern for him, by the liveliest expressions of real grief. When they were come to the top of it, and had offered up their prayers to God, providence sent him an old friend named Hushai, who came with his cloaths rent, and ashes upon his head, resolved to share in his misfortunes. David, though satisfied of his fidelity, did not think fit, however, to take him into his retinue, but rather begged of him to join himself to that of his rebellious son, where he might do him

(I) The text says forty years (39), but the learned Usher has shewed, that it can be only meant from David's being first anointed by Samuel, and not from his reconciliation to Abshalom; for this rebellion happened about four years after it (40). That prelate observes, that it was before or about Whitsuntide, by the new fruits and parched corn, which Barzillai brought to David in his flight (41).

We may likewise observe here, that Abshalom is the first who introduced the use of horses in Israel; till then the kings used to ride on mules, and the greatest nobles upon asses, as we have seen in the history of the judges.

(K) We have taken notice, in a late note, of the supposed reason of his defection, namely, his near relation to Bathsheba, and his resentment for the injury done to her by David, which he did not think sufficiently recompensed by his marrying her (42).

(L) This we have shewed elsewhere was a token of the deepest mourning, and in this guise they used to accompany their nearest relations to the grave (43).

(39) 2 Sam. xvi. 7. (40) Ann. p. 37. (41) Ch. xviii. 28. (42) See not. E. (43) Id. sup. p. 696.

Year of the
Flood, 1976.
Year before
CHRIST,
1023.

him much greater service, by thwarting the counsels of Ahitophel, and by informing him, by means of the two high-priests, of every thing that was resolved among the rebels. Hushai readily accepted the office, and acquitted himself of it with such faithful zeal, that he proved one main instrument of their overthrow <sup>a</sup>.

IN the mean time, whilst the sorrowful monarch was on his march, Ziba, the treacherous servant of Mephibosheth, brought him some necessary refreshments; and, being asked where his master was, told him, that he was then at Jerusalem, where he expected to be shortly restored to the throne of Israel. An accident, that followed upon the heels of this false report, helped to convince David of Mephibosheth's ingratitude. He was scarce come as far as Baburim, a village not very far distant from that metropolis, when he was met by one of Saul's family, named Shimei, who had the boldness to throw volleys of stones at him, accompanied with the bitterest curses and imprecations, for being the author of Saul's misfortunes, notwithstanding David was, at that time, surrounded by his guards and all his friends. This unexpected indignity did so enrage some of his captains, that they offered to go and smite off his head; but David restrained them, by putting them in mind of his more unnatural son, who fought a tender father's life, whilst this Benjaminite expressed no more than a natural concern for Saul's house; adding that if his curses came from God, as he knew not but they did, patience and resignation would more effectually avert them, than such a bloody resentment. However, the thoughts of his having a double enemy now to strive against, and that Mephibosheth had caused a new revolt against him; touched him so to the quick, that he gave all his lands away to his faithless servant, which was all that the wretch fought for by this false accusation.

His advice to Absalom.

BY this time Absalom and Ahitophel were come to Jerusalem, that city not daring to make any resistance to that hitherto successful prince; and here it was that Hushai came to congratulate and offer his services to him. Absalom, who knew him to have been a very faithful friend to his father, expressed some surprise at first, at this unexpected change; but was answered by that politic gentleman, that he thought it high time to abandon the father's interest, when providence had so openly declared for the son, who was, moreover, invited to the crown by the universal acclamations of the people; so that he had now no more to do but to serve him with the same fidelity, that he had done his father. Such a soothing speech could not but please the proud young prince, who admitted him in the number of his counsellors, without the least suspicion; and reposed such confidence in him, that he soon after preferred his advice to that of Ahitophel, and lost thereby the fairest opportunity of securing the victory and his father's crown to himself. As soon as they were well settled in the king's palace, a council was called, in which Ahitophel advised the prince to rear up a pavilion on the top of the house, and to go and lie with his father's concubines in the face of the sun. This, as we observed before, being esteemed the greatest indignity that could be offered to a crowned head, that hellish politician told him, was the most effectual means to make his men fight desperately for him, because they would then look upon the breach as irreconcilable. It could not be expected that Absalom, who had already been guilty of fratricide, and of rebellion against his own father, should scruple to add adultery and incest to his other crimes: he readily complied with the advice, and thereby fulfilled one part of Nathan's prophecy against his adulterous father <sup>r</sup>.

His next counsel defeated by Hushai.

THE next thing which Ahitophel proposed to the rebellious prince was, that he might be sent at the head of 12,000 chosen men, to fall upon David's little army, whilst they were still weary with their flight; assuring him, that as soon as the king was taken off, which himself engaged to do, all the people would gladly come over to him as one man, and a quick end be put to the war. This counsel was approved both by Absalom and all the elders of Israel; but, as it was given in Hushai's absence, the prince resolved to have his advice upon it, and Hushai being informed of it, and wisely foreseeing, that, if it were followed, David must be inevitably lost, omitted nothing to dissuade him from it. He told the council, that David and his officers were men of too great valour and experience, to suffer themselves to be thus surprised: that, for aught he knew, they had fortified themselves by that time in some caverns, or among the rocks, whence they a they would fall out, like a bear bereaved of her whelps, and fall upon them with such desperate fury, that it would be impossible for them to stand the shock: that if they should be unhappily beaten back in this first enterprise, the fame of David's value would quickly spread, and magnify his victory to such a degree, as would inject an universal terror into all their army, and give the exasperated king the fairest opportunity of quashing the conspiracy. For these reasons, he said, he thought it dangerous to undertake any thing against him, till Abisalom had wholly disheartened his men, by calling together all Israel from Dan to Beerseba, and pouring his troops so thick upon them, that neither means nor hopes might be left to escape. Thus, added he, if they be hid among the rocks, we shall easily b hunt or starve them out; and if they be retired into some strong city, our army will be able to pull it and them with ropes into the next river, till there is neither man nor stone left to oppose us. This swollen and affected speech could hardly have failed being suspected, had not providence suffered both the young prince and the council to be blinded with it. Abisalom was the only person who perceived the drift and consequence of it; so that, vexed at the heart to see Hushai's advice preferred to his own, and that David, by gaining so much time, would in all probability recover his kingdom, ordered his ass to be saddled, and rode away with all speed to his house, where, having settled his family affairs in the best manner he could, he went and hanged himself (M).

He goes and hangs himself.

c Hushai, in the mean time, failed not to inform the high-priests with what had past, and of the danger the king and his men would be in, if they did not cross the Jordan that very night. These immediately dispatched a maid-servant to their sons, Abimaz and Jonatban, who lay concealed for that purpose at En Rogel, with orders, that they should go immediately and inform David of it. At this time the avenues of Jerusalem were so narrowly watched that they were observed by a youth, who gave immediate notice of it to Abisalom. It was not long, before they were closely pursued, and forced to hide themselves at Baburim, where a kind woman concealed them in a well, by spreading a cloth over it with some pounded corn, as if she had been drying it in the sun. The messengers having lost scent d of them, returned to Jerusalem, whilst the two young priests hastened to David's camp, where they informed him of all that had been transacted at Abisalom's court. David lost no time, but crossed the Jordan, with his little army, in the dead of the night, and on the next morning, when he came to Mabanaïm, and had taken a review of them, he found that they were all safely got thither with him. As soon as the news of his arrival had reached that neighbourhood, several of his friends came thither to him, with a timely supply of provision for himself and his men, with tents, couches, and other necessary utensils. Among these were Sboba, the son of Nabab, an Ammonite; Macbir of Lodebar, with whom young Mephibosheth had been brought up*; and old Barzillai of Rogelim, a wealthy Gileadite (N).

e On the other hand, Abisalom hearing that his father was removed to this place, came against him with an army, under the command of Amasa, and incamped in the land of Gilead†.

David goes over Jordan.

David, having refreshed himself and his troops, and supplied the vacancy of those officers who were gone over to Abisalom, divided his army into three bodies, under the command of Joab and his two brothers, resolving to appear in person against his rebellious son; but the people strenuously opposed it, alledging, that his life was of too great a consequence, to be hazarded at a time, when his enemy would prefer his single death before the defeat of his whole army. The king acquiesced to them, and stayed at Mabanaïm with a small reinforcement; and whilst

* See Chap. ix. 4.

† xvii. per tot.

(M) The text adds, that he was buried in the sepulchre of his ancestors; for the only difference which the Jews made between those that died a natural or a violent death, was, that the latter, whether they died by their own hands, or by that of justice, were not buried till some time after sunset (44), and in a place a-part †.

(N) These provisions were wheat, barley, flour, parched corn, several sorts of pulse, honey, butter, cheese, with some small cattle. There might be also several other sorts, though not mentioned in the text, such as bread, wine, dried raisins, and figs, and some others, which, we read, were brought to David at other times, by Abigail and Ziba (45).

(44) Vid. JOSEPH. de Bell. Jud. l. iii. c. 14. & sup. p. 698. c.
(45) 1 Sam. xxv. 18. 2 Sam. xvi. 1.

† Vid. sup. p. 673, & seq.

whilst the rest of his men marched out before him, under their respective officers, <sup>a</sup> he failed not to give them a strict charge to be very tender of Abfalom's life. A fierce battle was soon after fought in the forest of Ephraim, wherein the rebel army was discomfited with the loss of 20,000 men, who were killed on the spot, besides a great number of others, who perished in the wood, and in their flight: Abfalom himself, mounted upon a mule, was forced to fly from a party of David's men towards the wood, where the bough of a thick oak, having taken hold of his bushy hair, the mule running with full speed, left him suspended between heaven and earth. Joab being informed of this accident, by a soldier, stayed only to reprove him for not having dispatched him, and went himself to the place, and run three darts through his body; after which, he caused the trumpet to <sup>b</sup> sound a retreat, to prevent a further effusion of blood. Abfalom's body was taken down, and flung into a large pit, and covered with a heap of stones; and the rest of the rebels were no sooner informed of his death, than they fled every man to his home. All this while the king stayed at the gate of Mahanaim, impatient to hear the success of the action; but in his heart, more solicitous for the life of his unnatural son, than for that of his friends, or even for his own; inasmuch, that when he received the news of his death, not able to suppress his tears, he was forced to withdraw himself to the apartment over the gate, to hide his extreme weakness, and give a full vent to his grief<sup>c</sup>.

Abfalom hung by his hair, and killed by Joab.

David's untimely grief for him

THIS untimely sorrow of the king did so damp the joy of his whole army, <sup>c</sup> that they retired into the city, more like cowardly runaways, than like victorious soldiers. Joab easily foresaw the consequence of it, and that it was like to cause a general defection; and as he was naturally bold and haughty, he made no difficulty to go up and upbraid him with his ingratitude to his faithful friends in such insolent terms, though covered with a shew of loyalty and concern, that the afflicted king was forced to suspend, or at least conceal his grief, and shew himself to the people with a seeming cheerful countenance. As soon as they heard of his appearing publicly at the gate of the city, not only his own men, but even those who had followed Abfalom, came in crowds, and strove who should shew the greatest affection to him. They now called to mind that he had often <sup>d</sup> delivered them from the oppression of their enemies: that Abfalom being dead, and David victorious, they had nothing now to do but to regain his favour by a timely submission. As soon, therefore, as the king perceived that all the tribes were ready to bring him back to Jerusalem, he sent word to the two high-priests, to hasten the elders of Judah to come and accompany him back to his palace, and to promise to Amasa, Abfalom's general, that if he would come over to him, he should be his chief general in the room of Joab (O). Among those that came over Jordan to meet the king, Shimei was one of the first; he came at the head of a thousand men of his own tribe, and falling prostrate at his feet, acknowledged his crime, begged that it might be forgiven, in consideration of <sup>e</sup> his being foremost of all the tribes, to congratulate him upon his late victory. David's generals did indeed think it a poor recompence for his late indignity to his prince, and were urgent to have him made an example to all Israel; but the king, willing to signalize, as it were, his new reign by an unparalleled clemency, did not only reprove their untimely zeal, but generously confirmed his pardon with an oath.

Shimei forgiven.

Mephibosheth came next, to express his joy at the king's return, and to justify himself from the base aspersions of his treacherous servant. He gave him indeed some evident proofs both of his steady gratitude and fidelity, and of Ziba's perfidy;

<sup>a</sup> Chap. xviii. per sec.

(O) It appears by this, that David had conceived an aversion for Joab; he had indeed done enough to deserve it, by his insupportable insolence, by his treacherous murder of Abner, but more particularly for having dared to kill Abfalom contrary to his express orders, whom he ought to have brought alive to his father, and left it to him to have punished his rebellion as he thought fit. On the other hand, Amasa was a considerable person, the son of David's sister (46), whom, either the fear of the king's resentment, or a desire of keeping up his post of general, might easily induce to raise some new troubles in favour of Saul's house. Upon these accounts, David thought it worth his while to bring him over to his interest by a generous pardon, and by giving him the command of his army, which would, at the same time, effectually suppress Joab's insolence. But this last, who stuck at no base action to rid himself of a rival, did soon after break all the king's measures, by the murder of his new-made general.

a fidy; so that the king seemed outwardly to be satisfied with them; but whether he was not really so, or that he cared not wholly to reverse the grant he had made to that traitor, he ordered the lands to be divided between his master and him. Whilst the king was getting ready to pass over Jordan, his old friend Barzillai came to accompany him over that river, and to take his last farewell of him. David would fain have persuaded him to have gone with him to Jerusalem, that he might have an opportunity of rewarding his services; but the good old man excused himself from it on account of his age, which had rendered him incapable of tasting the pleasures of a court; desiring him, that he would bestow his favours on his son Chimham, who was ready to accompany him thither; which b was readily granted.

HITHERTO there had appeared nothing but an universal emulation between the tribes, to wipe off the guilt of their late defection, by the plainest tokens of submission and zeal; but the partiality which David shewed for his own tribe, in inviting it to come foremost to receive him, raised such jealousy in the other ten, as seemed to threaten nothing less than a new revolt. The ten tribes, on the one hand, thinking themselves injured that that of Judab was preferred to theirs, in guarding the king homewards, complained in the bitterest terms, that they had stolen him from them, with a design to deprive the rest of their interest in him. Judab, on the other side, alledged, that their near relation to him intitled them c to that preference; which, however, they had made no other advantage of than that of being nearest to his person, without receiving, or, indeed, expecting any gratuity from him. To this the others answered, that David, as a king, being equally related to them all, their share in him bore a ten-fold proportion to theirs, for which reason they ought to have been the first invited, and the nearest to him*. The contest grew so fierce at last, through the obstinacy of the tribe of Judab, that Sheba, a factious fellow of the tribe of Benjamin, took that opportunity to blow the trumpet, and to gather all the malecontents to him, who immediately disclaimed all further interest in David, and bid open defiance to those that adhered to him; upon which, he saw himself at the head of all the ten tribes, that d alone of Judab, which had occasioned this defection, following their king from Jordan to Jerusalem. A new revolt against David.

As soon as David was come to his metropolis, he ordered his new general to set out, and gather what forces he could out of Judab, and to come to him within three days, whilst himself took that time to clear his palace of his polluted concubines, and assigned them a suitable maintenance and another house, where they might spend their days in a kind of widowhood. But Amasa, who met with greater difficulty than he expected, having outstayed his time, the king gave the command of his guards, and of those few troops he had about him, to Abishai, Joab's brother, another of his generals, who had commanded one third of his e army against Abshalom, and ordered him to pursue Sheba before he could get into some fenced city. It is plain by this, that Joab was then in high disgrace; but that did not hinder his going along with Abishai, though not as a commander, and by that time they were come to the great stone of Gibeon, Amasa joined them with his troops. Here the treacherous Joab came forth, seemingly to welcome him, and taking hold of his chin with one hand, as if he had intended to kiss him, ran his sword through his bowels with the other, and laid him dead at his feet. As soon as he had removed his body out of sight, which he found did cause a general stop of his army; he marched with them directly to Abel Beth Maachab, into which he heard the rebel had retired with some troops. He had f scarce began to besiege that place in form, when a prudent woman spake to him from the top of the wall, and desired him to listen to the advice of an inhabitress of a place, which he might remember had been always famed for council and wisdom*, and to forbear his hostilities against a mother-city of Israel; promising him, upon that condition, that the head of Sheba should be flung to him over the wall. Joab consented to the proposal, and as soon as he had received the arch-rebel's head, he raised the siege and returned to Jerusalem. This successful action, which quashed, as it were, a dangerous revolt in the birth, and restored an universal peace to the kingdom, failed not to raise the credit of the disgraced general among all the tribes; insomuch that though he had undertook it without order, yet Quelled by Joab.

* Chap. xix. per tot.

* Ibid. xx. ver. 18, 19.

A famine in the land.

Year of the
Flood, 1978.
Year before
Christ, 1021.

yet the king saw himself forced to express his approbation of it, by restoring him a to his former post, which he enjoyed till that monarch's death<sup>7</sup>.

Two years after this<sup>8</sup>, began a famine in the land, which lasted three years; at the end of which, David consulted the Lord concerning the cause of this heavy judgment, and the means of averting it. He was answered, that it was for the murder of the Gibeonites, whom Saul and his bloody house had unjustly caused to be slain (P); upon which, he sent to know what satisfaction they required for the wrong, that they might afterward intercede for Israel, and remove that judgment from it. The Gibeonites sent him word, that they desired neither gold, silver, nor any valuable consideration, but only that seven males of Saul's family might be sent to be put to death by them, as a retaliation for Saul's cruelty. The king b lost no time, but caused them to be sought out of that unfortunate house; but gave express orders, that Mephibosheth should be spared, out of gratitude to his father. The unhappy victims of the Gibeonites resentment were, two sons of one of Saul's concubines named Rizpah, who had been formerly debauched by Abner<sup>9</sup>, and five sons of Michal, Saul's daughter (Q); and as soon as they were put to death, the famine was stayed. Whilst their carcases were suffered to hang in the open air, which was almost a whole summer, Rizpah shewed so much concern for them, that she kept them night and day from being devoured by either fowls or wild beasts; which pious deed struck David with such remorse, that he caused them to be taken down, and buried with those of Saul and Jonathan in Zelab, the c burying-place of the house of Kish. After this, David had four successive battles with the Philistines, which the reader may see in the history of that nation †; in the first of these, he hazarded himself so far, that he was like to have been killed by one of their gigantic champions, but was timely succoured by one of his own worthies; for which reason, his officers swore, that he should never more expose his person to such dangers<sup>b</sup>. These victories gave birth to a most excellent eucharistical poem, which that monarch composed in memory of his late deliverance, and is now the xviiith psalm<sup>c</sup>.

David numbers the people.

David had not long enjoyed the fruit of his victories, before he brought a heavier punishment upon his kingdom, by taking it into his head to have the people d numbered. Joab indeed, wicked as he was, did in vain represent to him the danger of his displeasing God by it (R). The king would be obeyed; and he, with the rest of the commissioners, were forced to set about it. These travelled through the land on either side Jordan, and at the end of nine months and twenty days, brought him the sum of all the fighting men in the whole kingdom; namely,

<sup>7</sup> Chap. xxi. per tot. before, p. 357. b.

<sup>8</sup> USSER. Ann. sub ann. mund. 2983, & 2986.

<sup>9</sup> 2 Sam. iii. 7.

† See

<sup>b</sup> Ch. 21. per tot.

<sup>c</sup> Compare Ch. xxii. with Psal. xvii.

(P) It is not easy to say when this slaughter of the Gibeonites was committed; the Jews do, indeed, pretend, that Saul had took into his head, in one of his phrenetic fits of zeal, to cut them all off (47), but they give us no authority for it: It is therefore generally, and with great probability, believed to have happened when he slew all the priests and inhabitants of Nob. For the Gibeonites, as we have seen elsewhere †, were a kind of servants to them, employed in some of the lowest and most laborious offices.

(Q) Not that which had been given from David to Phaltiel, and was sent to him again by Ishbosheth; (for the text observes (49), that she was punished with barrenness) but another of the same name, married to one Ariel of Meholab; or rather, as the Jews affirm, and with greater probability, Merab, Saul's eldest daughter (50), who had indeed been given to that very Ariel (51); so that it is supposed that Michal is accidentally crept into the text, instead of Merab; tho' the Jews, unwilling to admit that, will have it, that Merab was their real mother, and Michal only by adoption (52).

(R) The text says, that the Israelites had provoked God's anger against them (which is no great wonder, that being generally the returns they made to him, whenever they were blessed with any interval of peace and prosperity); and that he suffered David to be tempted to this deed; or, as the author of the Chronicles (53) words it, suffered Satan to tempt him to it. Not that the thing itself was forbidden; on the contrary, they had an express permission from Moses for it, provided they paid half a shekel for every person so numbered (54). The reason, therefore, of God's being provoked with it, was, in all probability, because David did it from wrong motives, without any necessity, in time of profound peace, after so many miraculous deliverances, with a seeming confidence in his own strength, and contrary to his continual professions of trusting in God alone. As for that part of the punishment which fell so heavy upon so many thousands of the people, it is supposed to have been owing to their neglect of paying the above-mentioned ransom appointed by the Mosaic law (55).

(47) Vid. MUNT. in loc. sub not. a. † Vid. sup. p. 331. c. (49) 2 Sam. vi. ver. ult. (50) MUNT. ubi sup. (51) 1 Sam. xviii. 17, 19. (52) Chald. Paraph. Rabbin. mult. & al. (53) 1 Chron. xxi. 1. (54) Vid. Exod. xxx. 12, 13. (55) Ita Rabbin. vid. MUNT. NICKOL. & al. in loc. & in Exod. xxx.

a namely, of Israel 800,000, and of Judab 500,000 (S). But before this time, David having probably felt some evident tokens of the divine displeasure<sup>d</sup>, was so far from receiving any satisfaction at the vast number of his subjects, that he was struck with a lively sense of his folly, which broke out in expressions of the deepest remorse. On the next morning, the prophet Gad was sent to him, to chuse, as a punishment for his sin, either a seven years famine (T), or to be three months pursued by his enemies, or to suffer a three days pestilence. The humbled monarch owned it to be a hard choice; but, considering that war and famine seldom fall so heavy on the great, as on those of the lower rank, chose the three days pestilence, as the more equal punishment, and more immediately under the direction of heaven. No sooner had David made the dismal choice, than that dreadful distemper received the divine commission, and executed it with such amazing swiftness, that it had destroyed 70,000 men before its time was expired. It was now beginning to fall upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, when God was pleased to put a stop to it at David's prayer; who beholding the minister of divine vengeance (V) standing by the threshing-floor of Araunab, a prince of the Jebusites (W), humbly entreated the Lord, that he would spare the innocent people, and let his anger fall upon himself, and those of his court, who bore a share in his guilt. Whilst he was offering up this mournful supplication, the prophet came to him and commanded him to erect an altar on that spot of ground, where he had seen the destroying angel stand. David immediately hastened towards the threshing-floor, where Araunab came forward to give him a respectful meeting; and as soon as he understood that monarch's purpose of buying it of him, he made him a generous offer both of the floor, the threshing-oxen, carts, and all the wooden instruments that were upon it. David thanked him for the generous offer, but told him, that it did not become the king of Israel to offer sacrifices to God at other peoples cost; and desired him to set a price upon it. So Araunab sold him the floor, and all that was upon it, for fifty shekels of silver (X). David hastened which brings a pestilence upon

the land.

<sup>d</sup> See 1 Chron. xxvii. 24.

(S) It appears by the book of Chronicles (56), that Joab, though in no other case scrupulous, went about this work with such an unwilling mind, that he prolonged it as much as he could, in hopes the king would see his error, and put an end to it; which it seems he did; for Joab came back before he had numbered the tribes of Benjamin and Levi. The account which that general gave here, doth likewise differ, in some particulars, from that of the Chronicles. Hence some infer, with no small probability, that Joab was not over exact in his; and and that it was afterwards rectified under the reign of Jotham (57). Others think the latter to be less authentic of the two, and to have been corrupted rather than rectified; but it is better to say, that Joab, not having finished some of the tribes, because he found that God was displeased at it (58), the rest were afterwards added to it; which is the reason that the number of Israel in the Chronicles doth so far exceed that in the book of Samuel; as for the difference in that of the tribe of Judab, the former may also be the most exact, and the latter only a round number.

(T) The book of Chronicles says three years famine (59); so that it is likely the prophet means here seven years, including the three years which were sent upon the account of the Gibeonites; and the next year, which could not be very fruitful through scarceness of seed, the Philistine war, and, as Usher conjectures (60), because the fourth year being a jubilee, there was to be neither sowing, nor reaping, but for the poor.

(V) The text says expressly, that David saw the angel of the Lord that smote the people (61), and the book of Chronicles adds (62), that he saw him standing between heaven and earth, with his sword drawn, and that both he, and the elders of Israel who were with him, fell on their faces; and that Araunab, and his sons, who were threshing there, did likewise see him, and went and hid themselves (63); so that these two places compared together, will, by no means, admit of an allegorical sense.

(W) At least he is generally believed to have been such by Jews and Christians, from the words (64), All these did Araunah the king give unto the king; for that is the true sense of the original.

(X) The book of Chronicles seems again to clash strangely here with that of Samuel, in making the sum which David paid to the Jebusite prince, amount to 600 shekels of gold. Some rabbies have fancied, that every tribe paid fifty shekels, which made it amount to 600. But were that true, as it is not, because David resolved to be at all the charge himself, 600 shekels of silver would make but the 12th part of 600 shekels of gold, for that is pretty near the proportion those metals did bear to each other. Some learned men (65), observing that the words keseph, and shekel, do often signify money and value in general, think, that the first sum was sixty shekels of gold, and the second 600 shekels of silver, amounting in value to sixty shekels of gold; so that either sum answers to 547 pounds sterling (66). But we think that they remove the difficulty best, who suppose, that the sixty shekels of silver were paid only for the floor, oxen, and wooden instruments; and that the 600 shekels of gold were afterwards paid to him for the whole spot of ground which David had chosen to build the temple upon (67).

(56) 1 Chron. xxi. 6. (57) Conf. 2 Sam. xxix. 9. 1 Chron. v. 17. xxi. 5, 6. & xxvii. 24. (58) Ibid. (59) Ibid. ver. 12. Vid. MUNT. JUN. & al. in loc. (60) Ann. sub A. M. 2987. (61) 2 Sam. xxi. 17. (62) 1 Chron. xxi. 16. (63) Ibid. ver. 20. (64) 2 Sam. xxix. 23. (65) VIELALPAND. in Ezek. BOCHART. tom. i. lib. 1. c. 38. & al. (66) Vid. LE SCENE. & Essay on a new vers. pt. ii. c. 2. (67) MUNT. JUN. CALM. & al. in loc.

to rear an altar there upon the spot, and to offer burnt-offerings and peace-offerings upon it; and a miraculous fire, which descended from heaven, and consumed the victims, soon gave them a manifest proof, that God was again reconciled to the land<sup>a</sup>.

Adonijah's conspiracy.

By this time David, who was about seventy years of age, had so exhausted his strength and natural heat, by a continual series of wars, fatigues, and misfortunes, that no cloaths could keep him warm; so that his servants were forced to seek him a young beautiful virgin to wait upon and cherish him, and lie in his bosom. His declining state made Adonijah, who was now his eldest son, being next in birth to Abshalom, begin to look upon himself as already invested with the regal dignity. He got a sumptuous equipage of chariots, guards, and running-footmen; whilst David, out of a natural fondness for his children, beheld it without shewing any dislike. It plainly appears, that young prince had some suspicion that his father designed Solomon to be his successor; and it was to prevent it, that he made what haste he could to get himself proclaimed. For when first he leagued himself with Joab and Abiathar, and with them invited all his brothers, with a considerable number of his father's officers, and of the elders of Judab, to a sumptuous feast, which he had prepared at Zoeleth, in order to be proclaimed king of Israel there, Solomon was the only one of the royal family that was omitted.

Solomon proclaimed.

His design being, therefore, suspected by Nathan, Zadok, and some of David's worthies, who were in young Solomon's interest; the prophet went and advised Bathsheba to go and inform the king of it, and to put him in mind of his promise in favour of her son. Whilst she was still speaking, Nathan came, as it had been pre-agreed, and gave the king an account of Adonijah's feast, company, and of the design of it; desiring to know, whether it was done with his consent. The king, surprised with this report, ordered immediately Solomon to be set on his mule, and to be carried to Gibon, accompanied with his guards, with Zadok, Benajah, and some others of his chief officers, there to be anointed king; and then to be brought back, and seated upon the royal throne, and there proclaimed his successor by the sound of the trumpet.

THE king's commands were executed with such speed, that Adonijah and his company had not the least knowledge of it, till they were alarmed with the universal shouts of the people, who cried, Long live king Solomon. Jonathab, the son of Abiathar, came soon after to them, and gave them an account of the whole ceremony, assuring them, that it was all performed by the king's express order, who had testified an uncommon joy at seeing his favourite son seated upon his throne, before he left the world, whilst the air was filled with the acclamations of all the people. This unexpected news struck them with such amazement, that they all fled with the utmost speed; and Adonijah seeing himself forsaken, and exposed to the resentments of David and Solomon, went and took sanctuary at the horns of the altar. Solomon being informed of it, sent him word, that if he behaved himself for the future like an honest man, he would not hurt a hair of his head; but assured him, that his next disloyal attempt would certainly be punished with death. This message brought Adonijah upon his knees to the new king; after which, he was ordered to retire to his own house<sup>f</sup>.

David's speech to his officers.

David now finding himself near his end, assembled the heads of all the tribes, his generals, and chief officers, with the priests and Levites, and acquainted them with his former design to have built a magnificent repository for the ark of God, had not the prophet told him, that that work was reserved for Solomon's peaceable reign. Notwithstanding which, he told them, he had made great preparations for it, and laid up immense quantities of gold, silver, copper, iron, and other materials (Y); all which, together with the plans and models of that edifice, the order and

<sup>a</sup> 2 Sam. xxiv. per tot.

<sup>f</sup> 1 Kings i. pass.

(Y) The book of Chronicles says, that the gold, which was that of Ophir, amounted to 3000 talents; and the silver, which was of the purest sort, to 7000 talents; as to the baser metals, they are said to have been without number (68).

Dean Prideaux observes * two things concerning this immense quantity of gold which David dedicated to the service of the temple: the first is, that it was that of Ophir; from which he concludes, that he must have established a navigation in his time, without which it cannot be conceived how he could have heaped it to that degree; for as for that which a and disposition of the several branches of the divine service, the courses of the priests and Levites, of the musicians, singers, and porters, the plan for establishing judges and courts of justice, with many other religious, civil, and military regulations<sup>a</sup>, he now resigned up to him to be perfected and improved, as his wisdom should direct him. He desired them to assist him in so desirable a work, and that those who were inclined to contribute towards that building, should bring their free-will offerings into the treasury. He concluded with exhorting both his son, and the rest of the assembly, to continue steadfast in the service of God, seeing, that was the only condition upon which they must hope for happiness. This speech stirred up such a spirit of munificence in the rich men of Israel, that they b outvied one another in the richness of their presents towards the building of the temple; so that David had the pleasure to see an incredible quantity of gold, silver, copper, and other metals (Z), besides precious stones, marble, porphyry, and other rich materials, brought to him from all parts of the kingdom. The sight of so much wealth, brought in with such expedition and alacrity, did as it were revive the monarch's poetic muse, and made him break out into an eucharistical rapture, full of the deepest gratitude to God, and good wishes for the prosperity both of his son and of the kingdom, which were seconded with a hearty and universal amen, and accompanied with solemn sacrifices, and other tokens of joy. On the next day, the king ordered 1000 oxen, 1000 sheep, and c the same number of lambs, to be offered up, besides the daily sacrifices, and a proportionate quantity of meat and drink offerings, with which the whole company feasted all that day, with a magnificence worthy so great and good a monarch<sup>b</sup>. In this assembly Solomon was anointed a second time by Zadok, received the homage of all his brethren, and of all the chiefs of Judah and Israel, and was proclaimed king through all the tribes; Zadok was at the same time declared sole high-priest, for his strict adherence to Solomon<sup>c</sup>; and Abiathar reduced to the second rank, for his defection to Adonijah.

AFTER this, the king sent for his son to give his last instructions; and first of all he put him in mind, that all the gracious promises, which God had made to d him and his posterity, were only conditional, and depended wholly upon their obedience to his laws, so that they must expect their prosperity to rise and fall in proportion to their obedience. He then proceeded to recommend to him, the family of the good old Barzillai, and of those other friends who had stuck to him in his adverse fortune, and charged him to make them suitable returns for their fidelity to him. As for Joab, added he, thou knowest how many vile actions he has been guilty of towards me, and how treacherously he has imbrued his hands in the blood of two brave generals, Abner and Amasa, after I had taken them into my service and friendship. I was not then in a condition to punish him for it; but I need not tell thee what to do, thou knowest but too well, that he has for-

David's last instructions to Solomon.

<sup>a</sup> 1 Chron. from chap. xxiii. to xxix. pass.

<sup>b</sup> Chap. xxix. pass.

<sup>c</sup> 1 Kings ii. 1, & seq.

<sup>d</sup> 1 Chron. xxix. per tot.

he got out of the spoils of war, and his public revenue, it makes an article by itself, exclusive of these 3000 talents.

His next observation we shall give in his own words, as they stand in the note under the former. "This sum, says he, is so prodigious, as gives reason to think that the talents whereby this sum is reckoned, were another sort of talents, of a far less value than the Mosaic talents, of which an account is given in the preface. For what is said to be given by David [1 Chron. xxii. 14, 15, 16. and xxix. 3, 4, 5.] and contributed by his princes [xxix. 6, 7, 8.] toward the building of the temple at Jerusalem, if valued by these talents, exceeded the value of eight hundred millions of our money, which was enough wherewith to have built all that temple of solid silver."

What seems to prove our author's last remarks, is, that those talents are only mentioned in the Chronicles, which were undoubtedly written after the return from the captivity. This appears, 1. From its mentioning of Cyrus's decree for rebuilding the temple; and 2. From its carrying the genealogy beyond Zerobabel, who was one of the chiefs that returned from Babylon; so that they might, by this time, have been used to compute either by Babylonish talents, which were but somewhat above half the value of the Mosaic one, or perhaps by the Syrian, which is but a fifth of this. We need not to add, that the difficulty seems as great, with respect to the prodigious quantities of silver, brass, and iron, which, if computed by the large talent, amount to such an incredible sum, that one will be at a loss to guess how it could be disposed of in that building, and yet leave room enough for so much timber and stone.

(Z) These offerings are said to have amounted to 5000 talents, and upwards, of gold; 10,000 talents of silver; of brass 18,000 talents; and 100,000 talents of iron; besides precious stones, marble, wood, and other costly materials (69).

His vast riches and burial.

Year of the
Flood, 1984.
Year before
Christ, 1015.

Adonijah and Joab put to death.

forfeited his life, and on how many accounts he is unworthy of it. Shimei doth a not less deserve a violent death, for his horrid curses and indignity to me, when I laboured under the deepest affliction; but as he took an opportunity to acknowledge his crime, at a time when I thought it more proper to forgive than to punish it, I sealed then his pardon with an oath; but thou, who art not under the same obligation, mayest, if thou thinkest fit, inflict such a punishment as his crime deserves. The king died soon after, in the 70th year of his age, after having reigned seven years in Hebron, over the house of Judab, and thirty three over all the twelve tribes. He left an immense treasure behind him, besides that which he had dedicated to the service of the temple; and was buried in a stately tomb (A), in that part of the city, which he had caused to be built, adjoining b to the old Jebus, or Jerusalem*. The author of the Chronicles adds, that his history was penned by three cotemporary prophets, Samuel, Natban, and Gad<sup>1</sup>. His zeal, piety, and repentance are likewise celebrated in several places of the Old and New Testament; but that which raises his character above all the rest, is, that the promise of the Messiah, which had been made to Abraham, Jacob, and Judab, was fixed to that monarch's posterity. Accordingly, the sacred genealogists have given us the two lines of it, in which his birth was joined, namely that of Natban, from whom his virgin mother was descended; and that of Solomon, from which was sprung Joseph, his reputed father<sup>m</sup>, as we shall further show in the second part of this history.

Solomon being seated on the throne, delayed not to fulfil his father's last injunctions. Adonijah obliged him to go the sooner about it, by an action, which, though owing perhaps to a youthful indiscretion, could not but render him suspected of some further design, in concert with the turbulent Joab. We have lately observed, that it was looked upon as a treasonable design against the regal dignity to marry, court, or to debauch any of the king's concubines †; notwithstanding which, Adonijah, obnoxious and disgraced as he was, for his late attempt upon the crown, was rash enough to make use of Bathsheba's intercession, to obtain the king's leave to marry Abisag, the young Shunamitish virgin, who had been the cherisher of David's old age; assuring her, that he desired no other recompense d for the loss of a crown, which belonged to him by right of primogeniture. Bathsheba, glad perhaps to find that her son's rival would be satisfied at so easy a rate, made no difficulty to promise him her interest, not doubting of success. Solomon, who expected nothing less than such a request from her, received her with all the marks of honour that were due to a queen and a mother, and had already promised to grant her suit; but when he heard the purport of it, he was so enraged at his ambitious brother, that he ordered him to be put to immediate death. Joab alarmed at the news, went and took sanctuary at the horns of the altar, where he met with the punishment of his crimes, and was succeeded in his post of general by Benayab, who had been before appointed his and Adonijah's e executioner. The next in guilt was Abiathar, who had been one of the chiefs of Adonijah's conspiracy; but the king contented himself with divesting him of his share

* 1 Kings ii. 1, & seq.
to 31.

<sup>1</sup> Ubi sup. ver. 29.

<sup>m</sup> Compare Matth. i. 1, & seq. and Luke iii. 23;

† See before, p. 774. a. (S).

(A) We have had occasion to speak heretofore of this stately tomb, and of the immense treasure that had been laid up in it by him and his successor, according to the Jewish historian †. The Jews have added many fables concerning that monarch, too extravagant to be inserted; the reader may guess at the rest, by that which follows. They tell us, that David foreseeing that he should die on the Sabbath, begged of God that he might die on any other day, because on that he could neither weep for his sins, nor order any thing concerning his burial. All he could obtain, was, that he should die towards the close of the Sabbath; whereupon the devil, who owed him a spite, and had tried part of that day, in vain, to divert him from reading the law, that he might take that time to dispatch him, bethought himself, at length, to go and shake some of his apple-trees, which made the king hasten down a wooden ladder to go and catch the thief; but in the mean time, Satan pulling it from under him, broke his neck with the fall. The consequence was, that his corps was to remain there till the Sabbath was over, in danger of being devoured by his own dogs. They consulted their Sanhedrim what must be done in that case, and were answered, that they should strew a good quantity of bread round his body; which pleasing the dogs better than his flesh, they left it untouched till sun-set, when it was lawful to remove it to a safer place (70). The Mohammedans have not been behind-hand with the Rabbies, in stuffing his history with monstrous extravagances; the reader may, if he pleases, see them in the author quoted in the margin (71).

† Vid. sup. p. 589. b. 698. c. (70) Vid. BARTOLOC. Biblot. Rabbin. BASNAG. Hist. Jud. & al. (71) HERBELOT. Biblot. Orient. sub voc. David.

a share of the high-priesthood, and confining him to his own territories at Anatboth, in consideration of his having carried the ark before his father, and been a sharer in his afflictions. The king then sent for Shimei, and told him, that though he thought him worthy of death, yet, out of regard to his father's promise, he would put it in his power to save his life, by confining himself within the walls of Jerusalem; but he assured him, at the same time, that if ever he stirred out of it without his leave, his disobedience should cost him his head. The old man, glad to come off so well, thanked the king for his unexpected clemency; but venturing some years after to transgress his orders, and to ride out after two run-away servants, was put to death for it at his return<sup>a</sup>.

b Solomon did not think it enough, that he had rid himself of two such powerful enemies as Alonijah and Joab; he sought to strengthen himself still more, by marrying the daughter of the king of Egypt (B), who was then one of the most powerful princes about him, and Pharaoh gave her for dowry the city of Gezer, which he had taken from the Canaanites, and burnt down to the ground; but which being rebuilt by Solomon, became a very considerable place<sup>c</sup>.

HITHERTO the people used to resort to several high places, to offer up their devotions and sacrifices; but the most considerable was Gibeon, because the tabernacle, altar, and all the other sacred utensils, except the ark, were there. Whilst therefore the temple was building, Solomon used likewise to repair thither upon all solemn occasions, with a magnificence suitable to his dignity. Here, having at one time offered a thousand sacrifices, the Lord appeared to him in a dream, and promised to grant him whatever he should ask. The young monarch, conscious of the weight of his kingdom, and of the stubbornness of his subjects, begged only for such a degree of wisdom, as might enable him to govern with that prudence and sagacity, as became a king of Israel; which modest request was so pleasing to God, that he not only gave him such a share of wisdom and knowledge, as had never been possessed by any mortal, but superadded to it a promise of such other earthly blessings as he had so judiciously overlooked. It was not long, before he gave his people a proof of his excellent wisdom and discernment, in the method he d took to pass a right judgment between two women, both contending for a living child, and disclaiming the dead one with such equal ardour, that it was thought impossible to adjudge the infants to their right mothers. But he soon found out an expedient to make nature itself unravel what reason could not, by ordering the living child to be divided by a sword between the contending mothers, which so alarmed the real one, that she chose rather to resign him up whole to her adversary, than to see him butchered before her eyes<sup>d</sup>. After this, the assembly could not be at a loss where to assign the living child, nor what judgment to make concerning their young monarch's wisdom, which was so much the more surprising and extraordinary, as he was then, at most, but twenty years of age, according to the chronology of our bibles, and the learned archbishop Usher†.

It became no less conspicuous in the choice he made of his officers, and in the order and magnificence of his court, the provisions for his house (C), the number and

<sup>a</sup> 1 Kings ii. pass.    <sup>c</sup> Ibid. ch. ix. 16.    <sup>d</sup> Ibid. ch. iii. per tot.    † Sub A. M. 2971 & 2991.

(B) These kind of alliances were indeed forbidden by the Mosaic law (72); wherefore the Jews affirm, that Solomon caused that princess to be instructed in, and to embrace the Jewish religion before he married her. Accordingly we do not find that God did reprove him for it in that intercourse which he had soon after with him, but on the contrary, seemed well pleased with what he had hitherto done. It is true, that he is said afterwards to have been inticed to idolatry by his strange wives (73); but they were those whom he married towards the latter end of his reign, after he had, as it were, forsaken God. But Pharaoh's daughter seems to be excepted out of the case, unless we will suppose, that she relapsed to her former idolatry, when she saw him immersed in it.

However that were, he is generally believed to have composed the xlth Psalm, if not also the book of Canticles, as an epithalamium upon his marriage with that princess. As for her dowry, the city of Gezer, it had formerly belonged to the tribe of Ephraim, and had been given by them to the Levites (74); but had been retaken by the Canaanites, and now, by her means, returned and continued in Israel.

(C) These provisions are said to have amounted every day to thirty measures, [each measure containing about eight bushels and a half] of fine flour, double that quantity of common flour, ten fatted and twenty pasture oxen, and an hundred sheep; besides venison, poultry, wild-fowl, fish, pulse, fruit, herbs, and other eatables, which were sent to him from all parts of the kingdom, under the direction of twelve officers, who took their turns, each in his respective month, and out of his respective canton (75).

(72) Deut. vii. 3.    (73) 1 Kings xi. 1, & seq.    (74) Ibid. Job. xxi. 21.    (75) 1 Kings iv. 7, & seq.

and richness of his tables, chariots, horses, stalls (D) and equipage; in the settling of a his customs and finances (E), and the regulating of his guards and his army (F); which, added to the vast number and valour of his subjects, and his immense riches, gave him such a powerful sway, that he lived in the profoundest peace, plenty and grandeur of any prince of his time; beloved by his friends and allies, who were constantly pouring the richest presents upon him; feared by his enemies, receiving large tributes from several crowned heads (G), and resorted unto from all parts of the world, for his excellent wisdom and magnificence, which brought in a continual concourse of strangers to his metropolis, and enriched it to such a degree, that gold and silver seemed to have lost their intrinsic value, by their extraordinary abundance. The very revenue which his navy brought him in, exclusive of his customs abounded to six hundred and sixty-six talents of gold. All this while his Israelitish subjects enjoyed the sweets not only of peace and plenty, but also of an universal freedom, there being no other slaves, during his reign, except the poor Canaanites, and some captives of other nations<sup>1</sup>.

Hiram's embassy and treaty with Solomon.

Of all the princes that sought his friendship, Hiram, king of Tyre, David's old friend and ally, was the first who sent ambassadors to congratulate his accession to the crown, and to offer his service to him, as he had formerly done to his father. Solomon returned the embassy, and acquainted him with his design of building the temple, desiring him to send a sufficient number of workmen to join with his artificers for the work; particularly, some that were well skilled in working in gold, silver, and other baser metals, precious stones, scarlet, crimson, and other fine dyes, all which was readily granted by the Tyrian king; in consideration of which, Solomon agreed to furnish him yearly with 20,000 measures of wheat, and 20,000 barrels of fine oil for his household, besides the same quantities of barley, wheat, wine and oil, which he engaged to give to his servants that were employed in the work. On the other side, Hiram was to send the cedars, fir, and other woods upon floats to Joppa, there to be delivered to Solomon's servants, to be thence brought to Jerusalem. He sent him also a man of his own name, a Tyrian by birth, who was a second Bezaleel, and was such an excellent workman in all kinds of metals, stones, carving, engraving, embroidery, tapestry, and in making all sorts of fine cloaths, that Hiram honoured him with the title of father. Him Solomon made overseer of all the artists, whom David had formerly procured out of Tyre and Sidon. An alliance soon followed between those two princes, which only ended with their lives (H)<sup>2</sup>.

To

<sup>1</sup> 1 Kings iv. 20. & seq. 2 Chron. ix. pass.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid.

(D) There is a considerable difference in the number of his stalls, between the book of Kings and that of the Chronicles; the former reckons them forty thousand, and the latter but four thousand (76). This last is justly preferred to the former, as the most reasonable, because Solomon is said to have had but 1400 chariots (77); for if we allow four horses to a chariot, which is double the number that chariots of war were then used to have, it will make in all but 5600; at which rate, there must have been more than six stalls to one horse, contrary to common custom, which allows several horses to one stall (78). Some other authors take another way of reconciling the difference, to whom we shall refer our curious readers (79). These horses, whatever their number was, were to be furnished with barley, straw, and other provender, by the same twelve commissioners we mentioned in the last note (80).

(E) Solomon was the first that introduced the use of chariots and horses in Israel, at least to any quantity. These he sent for out of Egypt; not only for his own use, but for that of several neighbouring kings, whom he obliged to pay him six hundred shekels for every chariot and four horses; and a hundred and fifty for every single horse. He had likewise abundance of yarn, linen, and other commodities brought to him out of Egypt, which he sold to his subjects and merchants at a certain price (81); all which produced an immense revenue, exclusive of his navy, of which we shall speak anon.

(F) What standing army he kept, the Scripture doth not tell us; but as he was in peace with all the world, and so much either loved or feared by his neighbours, he doth not seem to have needed a great one. Besides the number of his chariots and horses, mentioned in a former note, the text says that he had 12,000 horsemen (82), which some take to have been rather saddle-horses, and others his life-guard. But whatever they were, it is certain that such a multiplying of chariots and horses was expressly forbidden by the Mosaic law (83), whatever salvo he might find out to evade it, especially in a time of the profoundest peace. These he did not keep all at Jerusalem, but disposed of them in several of his strong cities, reserving only a convenient number about his person, either for guards or grandeur (84).

(G) The text says, that his dominion reached from the river Euphrates, or even beyond it, to the Nile, or borders of Egypt, and that all the kings of those countries were tributary to him (85).

(H) Josephus assures us, that the letters which passed between them, were still preserved in the archives

(76) Conf. 1 Kings iv. 26. & 2 Chron. ix. 25. (77) Ibid. i. 14. 1 Kings x. 26. (78) Vid. LUD. CAPEL. BOCHART. POOL. Synops. LE SCEN. Essay on a new vers. p. 2. ch. 7. (79) Vid. CALM. Com. in 1 Reg. iv. 25. MUNST. JUN. & al. ibid. (80) Ibid. ver. 27, 28. (81) 1 Kings x. 28, 29. (82) Ibid. ver. 26. (83) Vid. Deut. xvii. 16. (84) 1 Kings x. 26. (85) Ibid. iv. 24. 2 Chron. ix. 26.

- a To carry on this stupendous work with greater ease and speed, Solomon caused an account to be taken of all the Canaanites, and other foreign slaves, that were in the land, and it was found to amount to 153,600; 70,000 of whom he appointed to carry burdens, 80,000 to hew timber and stone in the mountains, and the remaining 3600 he appointed to be overseers over them. Besides these strangers, over whom he appointed some of his chief officers, to oversee the work, he levied 50,000 men out of all Israel, whom he appointed to work in Lebanus one month in three, 10,000 every month, under the inspection of Adoniram; these were likewise employed in hewing of wood, marble, and other stone, which was afterwards wrought by the Tyrian masons and carvers, and thence conveyed to Yoppa by water<sup>c</sup>. Whilst these were preparing, Solomon, who had been still adding immense quantities of gold, silver, precious stones, and other rich materials, to those which David had laid up before his death; did put them into proper hands, to be wrought into an almost infinite variety of ornaments. And the vast number of hands employed, and the diligence of the overseers and workmen was such, that he was able to lay the foundations of this vast structure in the fourth year of his reign, which was the second after David's death, and the 480th after the exod<sup>d</sup>. This great work was begun on Monday the second day of the month Zif, which answers to the 21st of our April<sup>e</sup>, being the second month of the sacred, and eighth of the civil year; and was carried on with such prodigious speed (1), that it was finished in little more than seven years; in which we have seen it represented in a vast number and variety of plans, and by some late models, exposed to publick view; yet, at least, in such rich and sumptuous manner, as did easily excel any thing then extant of that kind. What is still more surprising, is, that every piece of it, whether timber, stone, or metal, was all finished before it was brought to Jerusalem, so that there were no other tools wanted, or heard, than what were necessary to the joining them to each other.
- The building of the temple.
The building finished.
Year of the Flood, 1978.
Year before Christ, 1021.

AND here, it will be doubtless expected, not only that we should give our readers an exact description of that wonderful edifice; but perhaps also that we should make some improvements upon those authors, who have gone before us, and discover new ornaments and excellencies, which they had overlooked. This is, indeed, no more than they pretend to have done with respect to one another, especially of late years; not from any greater insight they have gained into the sacred language and writings, but from what they have fetched either out of the description of the prophetick temple of Ezekiel, or from that of Josephus, or from what the Jewish rabbies have been pleased to superadd out of their own heads, in order to raise this sacred fabrick to the highest pitch of grandeur and richness. The truth is, whilst those sublime paper architects can have their work and materials at archives of Jerusalem and Tyre (86); he adds likewise, out of Dio and Strabo, that those two kings used to puzzle one another with riddles, and that the non-solvent was obliged to pay some considerable forfeit to the proposer. Accordingly Hiram having once received such a one as he was not able to solve, was forced to pay Solomon a large sum; which he however made him to refund soon after, by getting one Abdemon, a Tyrian, to invent another, which proved too hard for that wise monarch (87). There is nothing improbable in all this; but what he, and other learned Jews add, by way of appendix to what the text records concerning his extraordinary wisdom, deserves notice, though it were but for its absurdity; for they make one part of his knowledge to have consisted in the deepest recesses of magic, in charms, evocation and ejection, or confinement of demons, and such-like witcheries; in which diabolical art he was not content to be the expertest man living, but took the pains to propagate it, by writing several books upon that worthless subject (88). Credat Judæus.

<sup>a</sup> 2 Chron. ii. 17, 18. <sup>c</sup> 1 Kings v. 9. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. vi. 1. <sup>e</sup> Vid. USSER, Ann. sub A. M. 3001.

(1) This foundation, which took up the whole group of mount Moria, did likewise cost an immense labour to level, because it consisted of several gibbous eminences, all of them solid rock, except the surface, some parts of which were to be considerably lowered, and others raised in proportion, in order to bring them to that capacious area; inasmuch that Josephus says, a man could hardly believe his own eyes when he beheld the stupendousness of that work, the very contriving of which was enough to have crased any brain but that of Solomon (89). It will, indeed, appear very surprising, how such a foundation could be laid, and the materials for the building could be in such forwardness, in so little a space as four years, as to have been finished in the seventh year after its foundation. But we see no reason against supposing that David, who appears to have formerly sent for a great number of Tyrian workmen, might, not long before his death, have set them to this work, and made them prepare stone and timber, as well as level some part of the ground.

(86) Ant. lib. viii. c. 2. (87) Lib. cor. Ap. p. 2. (88) Antiq. ubi sup. vid. & rabbini mult. apud BARTHOLOM. Biblioth. rabbinic. sub voc. Salom. (89) Ant. ubi sup. vid. sup. p. 414. s.

at so cheap a rate, it is next to impossible to keep a luxuriant fancy within due <sup>a</sup> bounds, and not to act the panegyrist rather than the historian, in rearing of this stately building. This is therefore what we would carefully avoid, though at the hazard of being taxed with running into the other extreme, whilst we strike off their three evidences, as far as they jar with, or exceed the account we have of it in the books of Kings and Chronicles.

For, after all, who has assured those authors, that the temple of Ezekiel, which was only seen in a vision, and was, for ought appears, only a type of that spiritual one under the gospel, did bear a constant analogy with that of Solomon, with respect to its members, dimensions, symmetry, ornaments and the like? Who knows not that that of Josephus, allowing it to have been equal in beauty and <sup>b</sup> magnificence to that author's description of it, had received such considerable additions and improvements from time to time, especially under Herod the Great, as might easily render it quite different, not to say vastly excelling, that of Solomon? Lastly, what discoveries can we hope for in this respect from the Talmudists and Jewish rabbies, who lived so many centuries after its final destruction, but what are of the same stamp with those they have made with respect to religion; mere pious fables and forgeries, calculated to raise the honour of their nation? And if Ezekiel, Josephus, and the rabbies must be set aside, where shall we find an author that has done so, or a description of this edifice that has not borrowed more from them, than from the sacred historians? For these reasons, we had once resolved to spare <sup>c</sup> our readers the charge of a new draught or description of it, seeing we could offer them nothing new or authentic, without being at the pains of delineating it afresh, according to the account we have of it in the books of the Kings and Chronicles, without any farther regard to the others, than as they helped to explain a doubtful passage, or some obscure terms, such as must unavoidably occur in great plenty in descriptions of this nature, written at such a distance of time, and in a language so little known as the Hebrew now is.

BUT whilst we were deliberating whether we should undertake so laborious a task, we were agreeably informed by a curious gentleman, a friend and encourager of this history, that having seen all the various descriptions of that edifice, <sup>d</sup> and being as dissatisfied as we with their borrowing so much from those authors we have excepted against, he had, some years ago, prevailed upon a learned clergyman of his acquaintance, to make such a delineation as we have been speaking of, out of the two sacred books above-mentioned. He has since favoured us with a sight of the plans, and given us time and leave to examine and compare them, and their proofs, with the original text; and finding how much we approved of them, and that they could not but be very useful and acceptable to the curious, he has not only made us a generous offer of the whole, to be communicated to the world, but has given us several opportunities of receiving farther satisfaction from his learned friend, touching any difficulties that might occur. However, <sup>e</sup> as his demonstrations from those sacred books, curious and exact as they are, would too sensibly interrupt the thread of our history, we think it will be more acceptable to our readers, if we join them with the plans of the city and temple, in that succinct and explanatory method in which he has been since prevailed upon to adapt them to this work, in an appendix at the end of this volume, that so both may at one view be compared either with each other, or with any of those descriptions that have hitherto appeared in the world (K). As for the elevations <sup>f</sup>

2

of

(K) It will not be amiss, however, to obviate two objections which may be made against these new delineations; the first is, that it is more than probable, that the sacred historians have omitted several particulars in their descriptions of that building, which, though perhaps of less consequence, are yet of such a nature, that one cannot well frame a just idea of the whole without them. This both our friend and we do readily grant, and therefore are far from giving this as a complete and perfect plan of the whole; all that is pretended is, that it contains all that the sacred historians have mentioned of it, without having recourse to Ezekiel, Josephus, or the Talmudists, for a supply of what they have omitted. And we think it cannot be unacceptable to the curious, to see how far those who have followed the last-mentioned authors, have added to what we find in the text; and to be able to distinguish what is authentic, from what is not so, by comparing this with theirs.

The next objection is, that the years which the ancients of Israel shed at the sight of the second temple, when they saw how far short it was of the first †, seems to argue, at least, that that of Solomon must have exceeded by far this of ours, seeing it is so much inferior to the description which Josephus, who had seen it, has left us of it. To this it may be answered, a of that edifice, we hope it will be thought a charge and trouble which may still be better spared, considering the vast number and variety we have already, and how little reason there is to be satisfied with any of them.

1. Th

† Ezra iii. 12.

We return to the king of Israel, who, to celebrate the dedication of this new temple with greater magnificence, chose to defer it till the next year, which was the jubilee (L), at which solemnity there used to be always a vast concourse of people from all parts of the kingdom, as we have elsewhere observed *. The ceremony began on the eighth day of the seventh month of the sacred year, which was the first of the civil year, answering to the latter end of our October, and lasted seven days, at the end of which began the feast of the tabernacles, which b was one of the three solemn feasts of the Israelites, and lasted likewise seven days; so that the vast concourse of people who were invited by the king, and flocked to that solemnity, stayed at least fourteen days in Jerusalem. The ceremony opened with a pompous procession, in which the priests carried the ark from the tabernacle which David had erected for it, to the temple; and deposited it in the most holy place, between the two golden cherubims, which Solomon had caused to be made by Hiram, and to be set up there, to be a kind of covering to the ark (M). The king himself, accompanied by all his chief officers, and the elders of Israel, marched

* See before, p. 614, & seq.

1. That the disparity between those two temples which those elders bewailed, might not consist so much in the largeness and magnificence of the building, as in the excellency of the work, and richness of its materials. We have seen what immense quantity of gold, silver, precious stones, and other costly things, had been bestowed upon the first; but we read of nothing like it in the second, neither indeed could they afford it.

2. Josephus, and the rabbies, describe the second temple after it was destroyed, when no man could contradict them; and how lavish they might be in adorning a building which was the glory of their nation, we need not say; one thing is certain, that though it was become, in Josephus's time, rather a strong fortress, than a place of divine worship, yet there is hardly a man of sense that believes half the wonders he says of it, or that it was capable of entertaining such a prodigious garrison as he affirms it did. And yet the Talmudists were so little satisfied with that author's description, that they have made an incredible number of additions to it; inasmuch that it looks rather like a new edifice of their own rearing, upon which they have bestowed all the grandeur and magnificence that their luxurious fancy could muster up.

But, lastly, allowing it to have been equal to their description, it doth not follow, that that of Zerobabel, over which the elders wept, was so; which having been burnt, rebuilt, improved, enriched, enlarged, and fortified, from time to time, and by several royal hands, had not, perhaps, one footstep left of its primitive figure, except in the very sanctuary. It is therefore in vain to pretend to guess, either at that of Solomon or Zerobabel, by that which we have in Josephus; or to object the largeness and magnificence of this last, against the seeming plainness which our friend gives us of the first.

(L) This was their ninth jubilee, which, according to Archbishop Usher, opened the fourth millenary of the world (90).

(M) We have spoken elsewhere of the shape and position of those which covered the mercy-seat (91). These that were made by Hiram for the most holy place, differed from them, and were of two sorts, namely, these two, which spread one wing over the ark, and touched the wall with the other; and those which were made in bass-relievo, to adorn the sides of the wall, being placed between palm-trees likewise in bass-relievo, and all of the finest gold. What the bigness of these last was we know not, but that of the two massive standing ones may be guessed at by the length of their wings, which reaching to the north and south walls with one extremity, and joining at least by the other over the center, must have been each five cubits long, because the place was twenty cubits in length and breadth; so that one may reasonably suppose the cherubims themselves to have been about ten cubits high. As to their form, we can affirm nothing certain concerning it, beyond what was said in the place above quoted.

There we took also notice, that Solomon made all the other utensils and ornaments of the temple proportionable, both in bigness and richness, to that of the edifice: The mosaic altar of burnt-offering, for instance, was set by on account of its smallness, and another placed in lieu of it, which was twenty cubits in length and breadth, and ten in height. The same was done by the altar of perfume, and the tables of shew bread; which last, as well as the golden candlesticks, he increased the number of five or six fold.

Besides these, there was a prodigious quantity of other gold and silver vessels and utensils; concerning which the text only says, that they were without number (92); but the Jewish historian has given us such a detail of them (93), that we chuse to refer the reader to him for it, because we can neither tell whence he had it, nor indeed find room enough, or use, for such vast quantities. Thus he tells us, that there were 10,000 tables to hold the sacred utensils, besides those of the shew-bread. He mentions likewise 10,000 candlesticks, besides those that were in the holy place; 80,000 cups for drink-offerings; and tho' the text mentions but 100 basons of gold, which seem to us to have been for the same use (94), and to have been sufficient for it, he has multiplied them to 100,000, besides double that number of silver ones. We may say the same thing of the 1000 prettily ornaments, which he tells us Solomon caused to be made for the sole use of the high-priest; the 10,000 linen robes and girdles for that of the common priests; and 200,000 more for the Levites and musicians; marched before the ark; these were followed by a great number of priests and Levites, who sang some canticles proper to the occasion, and played upon various instruments. Next to the ark followed another number of singers and players, with other priests bearing the golden candlesticks, altar of incense, and other sacred utensils of the sanctuary, which had been brought from Gibeon, where they and the tabernacle had stood ever since. These were not deposited in the sanctuary, because the king had caused a new set of them to be made, which were larger, and more answerable to the spaciousness of the place; but were laid up in some other repository prepared for that purpose. To add the greater magnificence to the procession, the king ordered the ark to stop at proper distances, and there caused a prodigious number of victims to be offered up before it, till they had reached the sanctuary. Whilst the priests were depositing the ark in the most holy place, the air rang with the sound of 120 trumpets, and with the voices of the Levites, who sang the praises of God, repeating these words at proper stanza's, Give thanks to the Lord, for he is good, and his mercy endureth for ever. It was then that God seemed to come down in a visible manner, to take possession, as it were, of his new temple, by filling it with a glorious cloud, as he had formerly done the tabernacle, inasmuch that the priests could not stand to offer up the sacrifices, which they had prepared upon that occasion*.

(90) Ann. sub A. M. 3001. (91) Vid. sup. p. 654. not. V. (92) 2 Chron. iv. 18, & alib. (93) Antiq. l. xv. c. 14. xx. & alib. & de Bell. Jud. c. 6, & alib. pass. (94) 2 Chron. iv. 8.

A vast number of victims offered.

DURING this time, Solomon, who stood upon a brazen scaffold three cubits high, and prepared for the purpose, having commanded the attention of the people, which stood in the court, and in the galleries round about; kneeled down, and spreading his hands towards heaven, dedicated the sacred building to God in an elegant and devout prayer, which he then made in their hearing; intreating the divine mercy to make it its residence in favour of Israel, and to be ready from thence to hear the prayers which his people should direct thither, from whatever part of the world; and what condition soever they were in, to grant their requests, and pardon their offences. All this while the priests had covered the spacious altar with proper victims, which, as soon as his prayer was ended, were consumed by a miraculous fire, as a token of the divine favour and acceptance. The king then turning himself about, blessed the audience, and retired; after which the priests went about offering a vast multitude of other sacrifices, which had been sent thither both by the king, and by the heads of the tribes, inasmuch that they were forced to rear a number of other altars in the court, the great one not being sufficient for them. On the very first day of this ceremony, which lasted seven days, they (N) sacrificed 20,000 bullocks, and 120,000 sheep, for peace-offerings, which served to feast the vast concourse of people; besides a prodigious number of burnt and other offerings, which were brought in every day. The feast of the tabernacles, which immediately followed this, was likewise observed with unusual magnificence; after which the people were dismissed in peace, and returned to their homes, with their hearts full of joy, and admiration of their wonderful monarch†. At the same time, lest that young prince's heart should be too elated by this extraordinary grandeur, God was pleased to appear to him in a dream, on the first night of the dedication, expressed his acceptance of that sumptuous edifice, and renewed his promises to him and his posterity, provided he and they served him with an upright heart: on the other hand, he assured him, that in case they provoked him by their idolatry and disobedience, that glorious building, which was now the wonder of the world, should infallibly become a desolation, a dwelling for owls and bats, and a proverb of reproach among all nations‡.

2

As

* 2 Chron. v. per tot. † 1 Kings viii. 12, & seq. ‡ 2 Chron. vi. & vii. per tot. † 1 Kings ix. & seq.

musicians; all which, if we may believe him, were never to be mended when torn, nor washed when stained with the least spot, but were to be made into whicks for the lamps. To these we shall only add the 200,000 trumpets, and 400,000 musical instruments made of a mixt metal between gold and silver, such as was called by the antients electrum; concerning all which we can only say, that the text is either silent, or contradicts his prodigious account, as well as where he says, that the 200,000 trumpets were made according to Moses's appointment.

(N) The text says, indeed, that Solomon himself offered that vast number of victims (95); but it appears from the end of the verse, and that which goes before it, that all Israel joined with him in it. We may likewise observe here, that it is not altogether clear from it, whether they were all sacrificed in one, or in the seven days of the feast; the latter, indeed, is the most probable of the two, but the tenor of the words seem to lean more to the former.

(95) 1 Kings viii. 63.

- a As soon as Solomon had finished this noble structure, he set his artificers to work Solomon's upon two other buildings, one for himself and another for Pharaoh's daughter<sup>2</sup>, palaces. and spared nothing that art or riches could furnish, to raise them to a proportionable splendor with it (O). He was almost thirteen years a building them, so that he finished those three magnificent edifices, with all their costly furniture, utensils, and ornaments, within the space of twenty years (P). After this, he sent back a great part of his Tyrian artificers; and to express his gratitude to their prince, who had so generously furnished him, not only with vast quantities of stones and wood, but also with great sums of gold, he presented him with twenty cities in Gallilee. But Hiram coming soon after to view these, was so disgusted at them, that he b could not forbear breaking out into some complaint against his brother Solomon, and expressing his dissatisfaction by his refusal of them, and by the contemptible name which he gave to that whole land (Q); upon which, Solomon built them a-new himself, and planted colonies of Israelites in them†. The rest of his workmen, whether Tyrians or others, together with the Canaanish slaves, who were by that time probably become very expert builders, were employed in surrounding the city of Jerusalem with a strong and stately wall, and fortifying Millo, Hazor, Megiddo, Gezer, Beth-boron, Baalath, Tadmor or Palmyra, and other places of consequence; besides several other store-cities for his chariots and horses, for his magazines of corn, wine, oil, and other provisions and ammunition. He built c moreover some fortresses in Lebanon, probably to secure a free communication between his kingdom and that of Syria. Soon after this, he brought under his yoke the remainder of the Anorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebuzites, who seem to have remained unconquered till his time, and made them all tributaries to him<sup>3</sup>. These were also probably forced to his works with the rest; for as for the

<sup>2</sup> Compare 1 Kings iii. 1. vii. 8. ix. 24. & 2 Chron. viii. 11. † Compare 1 Kings ix. 10. & 2 Chron. viii. 1, & seq. <sup>3</sup> 1 Kings ix. 15, & seq. 2 Chron. viii. 1, & seq. See before, p. 337. b.

(O) One of these palaces is called the house of the forest of Lebanon (96), tho' it was at Jerusalem; the reason of which cannot be easily guessed at. The Chaldee paraphrast calls it a summer-house, or house of refreshment; others think it to have been built in that forest, after Solomon had taken the city of Hamath-rubab (97); but the general opinion is, that they gave the name of the forest of Lebanon to the city of David, by reason of the prodigious quantities of cedar, and other trees, which had been brought from thence to build the temple, and other sumptuous edifices, insomuch that it seemed as if Lebanon had been transported to Jerusalem (98). Upon this account, and perhaps also from the fragrantcy of the cedar, both the city and temple, as well as the palace, are called Lebanon by the psalmist, and some of the prophets (99).

(P) These palaces were built with the utmost magnificence, whether for the prodigious quantities of gold, silver, cedar, and other precious woods, marble, and other costly stones, the stupendous bigness of them, or the exquisiteness of the workmanship; or for the richness of their furniture, and the sumptuousness of the galleries, porches, courts, and apartments. Among these there was one more spacious than the rest, which was called the porch, or hall of judgment, in which was placed the king's throne, and on each side of it the seats of his counsellors. This porch was by far the most magnificent of all, because it was both his seat of judgment, and the place of public audience, where he shewed himself either to his nobles, or to the strangers that resorted to him. It was placed in the midst of a flight of rich pillars of cedar, curiously carved and covered, or rather inlaid with gold. The throne itself, which was in the fashion of a niche, was covered with ivory, inlaid and intermixed with curious ornaments in gold; the ascent to it was by six steps, each step being supported on each side with a small lion, and the arms of the seat with two large ones as big as the life. All these, and even the steps themselves, were likewise covered with gold and ivory. The richness of the furniture of these sumptuous edifices may be guessed at, by the plate and drinking-vessels which were used in them, which were all of finest gold. To these he added 300 shields of the same rich metal, which used to be carried before him when he went abroad, and upon his return were suspended along the rows of pillars as an ornament. Besides these, he likewise caused 200 targets to be made of a larger size, which were hung up in some conspicuous places of the temple. All these were made of some precious wood, and covered with gold; these latter amounted to 600 shekels each, and the former to three pound weight (100).

(Q) Chabul, which is the name he gave it, comes from כבול, which signifies a fetlock; and is supposed to have alluded to the extremity dirtiness of it, because one could not travel in it without being up to the ancles in dirt.

Josephus derives it from a Phœnician word which signifies dislike, and adds, that Hiram refused to take them from Solomon upon that account (1); but as we find either a city or region of that name as early as Joshua's time (2), which might probably be so called on account of its dirtiness, Hiram might probably take the hint from it, and gave that contemptible appellation to all the rest.

Thus Chabul, which Josephus calls Chebalon, was, according to him, situated in the neighbourhood of Tyre, or between that and Ptolemais: that of Joshua could not be far from it; and yet St. Jerome places them on the other side Jordan (4), in that part which was called Decapolis (5).

(96) 1 Kings vii. 2. (97) Vid. JUN. in loc. & 2 Chron. viii. 3. (98) Ita Rabbin. vid. & MUXAT. CALMET. & al. in Psal. xxix. xcii. 12, 13. (99) Psal. xxix. pass. xcii. 12, 13, & alib. (100) 1 Kings x. 16, 17. 2 Chron. ix. 13. (1) Ant. lib. 8. c. 2. Vid. sup. p. 414. c. (2) Josh. xix. 27. (3) Ibid. & in vit. sua. (4) Hieron. in Amos i. (5) Vid. CALM. sub voc. Chabulon.

the Israelites, the text expressly says, that they were exempt from all kind of a slavish business, and only employed either as overseers over them, or as officers and soldiers in his army<sup>b</sup>.

Solomon's
navy.

To supply all these vast expences, Solomon went and built a navy at Exion-geber, upon the coasts of the Red-Sea, and put it under the care of some expert Tyrian sailors, who, with his own men, went with it to Ophir (R), and in about three

<sup>b</sup> 1 Kings ibid. ver. 22, 23.

(R) It is not to be expected that our readers will be contented with being told, that Ophir is to us a terra incognita, that has been sought in vain in all parts of the world, and through every point of the compass. And indeed one would hardly believe such a discovery to be so difficult, considering the various indices by which the Scriptures seem to lead us to it; such as those that follow: 1. That Moses speaks of Ophir the son of Joktan, who went with his brethren and dwelt from Mesha toward Shephar, a mount of the east (6). 2. That the same fleet went both to Ophir and Tharshish (7), and set out from Exion-geber, a sea-port near Eloth, in the land of Edom upon the Red-Sea (8). 3. That the voyage took them up three years (9). 4. That it brought gold, precious stones, spices, ivory, ebony, and almug-wood, peacocks and monkeys (10). 5. That Ophir not only afforded the greatest quantity of gold, but that it also exceeded all other gold in fineness and value (11); and lastly, that according to Eupolemus, an ancient author quoted by Eusebius (12), the Urphe or Ophir, from whence this metal was brought, was an island in the Red-Sea; not that which we commonly understand by that name, which lieth between Arabia and Egypt, but the great southern ocean, which extendeth itself between India and Africa, and walleth up to the coast of Arabia and Persia, and was called the Red-Sea, from the colour which the perpendicular sunbeams give it in those hot climates (13). To this let us add, that Josephus says, that Ophir was in India, or was since called India, or the land of gold (14), which may probably mean the Aurea Chersonesus, now called the island of Malaca, over-against Sumatra; these, one would be apt to think, might have chalked out such a chart, as would have directed us, if not to the very spot of ground, yet at least to the region whence all these riches came; and yet there are scarce any two authors that have steered the same course.

But not to dwell long upon a subject that affords so little certainty, we shall content ourselves with a bare mention of those who seem to have visibly erred from the point, and then give a short account of those who have spoken with a greater degree of probability.

Among the first, we may rank those who have gone to America for it (15), it being unconceivable how they could steer thither and back again in those early days, without charts or compass, with so imperfect a knowledge of geography and astronomy, and knowing no more of navigation than bare coasting. If it be said, that this was the method they steered by, and that they coasted along India, China, and the north parts of Japan, to the north part of America, and so on to Hispaniola, or any other place, whether of Mexico or Peru; besides that, in such a case, eighteen months will scarce be sufficient for such a prodigious round, how many islands might they have met with in India, that could have supplied them with all those commodities, and especially with gold? How came they at first to have such knowledge of those parts, as to go thither for that metal? Was America peopled so early? And if it was, which is scarce credible, were either its inhabitants such expert sailors as to bring those merchandizes to some famous emporium nearer to Asia, or did any of the Asiatic nations fetch them from thence?

2. Those who have gone no further than the coasts of Africa, or even nearer for it (16), because though it be probable that several parts of Africa might abound with gold, spices, ivory, and those other merchandises; or, according to others, that the Indians might bring them thither; yet the farthest coast of Africa was not distant enough from Exion-geber, to have taken up so much time as three years, tho' we should allow that they went to a different sea-port for each merchandise; much less to some of those places mentioned by some of those authors, which are a great deal nearer to it.

Lastly, we may reckon among them who have missed the mark, those who have fallen into the notion, that Exion-geber was not on the coasts of the Red-Sea, but of the Mediterranean (17). This they have indeed supposed, in order to avoid the difficulty into which Huetius stumbled, by making the canal of communication between those two seas to have been opened in David's time; but this has been fully confuted by several learned authors (18). But whatever the difficulty be of finding a passage from Exion-geber to the Mediterranean, it cannot be supposed to have been situated any where but on the Red-Sea, without doing manifest violence to the text; because there is not one single instance of 𐤇𐤓𐤁 Tom Suph signifying the Mediterranean, or any other than the Red-Sea; and secondly, because Exion-geber is said to have been beside Eloth, which last is always placed on the Red-Sea (19).

Among those who have conjectured with more probability, we shall mention, first of all, those who place it, with Josephus, in some part of the East-Indies (20), though without adhering too close to the particular place which each of them has made choice of, whether in the kingdom of Malabar, or the isles of Seylan or Tajobrana (21), or in Siam (22), or in any of those neighbouring islands or kingdoms beyond the Ganges (23), or that of Pegu, whose inhabitants pretend to be descended from the Jews, whom Salomon sent thither to work in the golden mines (24); for we think it labour lost to seek for a country that produced all the different kinds of merchandises which the fleet brought into Judea, when they had time enough to fetch some from one place, and some from another; or, which is equally probable, when they might be all brought by Indian merchants from several parts of a three years time, brought him back an immense weight of gold and silver, besides several kinds of precious stones, spices, ebony, and other curious wood, ivory; peacocks, monkeys, and other rarities<sup>c</sup>. The gold itself amounted to 450 talents yearly, besides the profit which he made of all the other commodities. Some of those precious woods the king did bestow in adorning the galleries about the temple, and in making of a great number of musical instruments for the service of God<sup>d</sup>.

India

(6) Gen. x. 29, 30. (7) Conf. 1 Kings ix. 28. x. 22. xxii. 49. & 2 Chron. xx. 36. (8) 1 Kings ix. 26. & alib. (9) Ibid. x. 22. & alib. pass. (10) Ibid. & 2 Chron. ix. 10. (11) Ibid. & alib. pass. (12) Præp. Evang. l. 9. (13) Vid. sup. p. 308. in fin. (1) & EPIDEAUX Concili. lib. 1. (14) Ant. l. viii. c. 2. (15) GENEER. ARR. MONT. CHRIST.-COLUMB. V. TABL. POSTEL. & al. (16) GROT. in 1 Reg. ix. Huet. Differs. de Navig. Salom. JEAN, DES SANT. & al. (17) GOROP. BECAN. BIVAR. HORN. & al. (18) MARIN. Cam. Egypt. sec. 15. CALM. prolegom. in Genes. (19) Vid. EUSEB. loc. Hebr. sub voc. Hæd. ARULFED. Deser. Arab. PLIN. STRAB. HIERON. PROCOP. & al. (20) LUC. HOLSTON not. in Ortel. (21) Vid. BOCHART. Phal. (22) Ab CHOISI. in vit. Salom. (23) Vid. LIPSEN. Traët. de Ophir. (24) Vid. MARR. & aut. ab eo citat.

0.2

ALL this time Solomon was still mindful of the concerns of religion, repairing to the temple at the solemn festivals, and settling the courses of the priests, Levites, musicians, and other officers of the temple, according to the model of his father; b and making all proper regulations for maintaining the service of God with a splendor and magnificence equal, at least, to that of his kingdom<sup>e</sup>. Upon all which accounts, he is justly observed, more than once, to have exceeded all the kings of the earth.

AMONG the great persons whom his fame brought to Jerusalem, the most considerable was the queen of Sheba (S), a princess of such excellent wisdom and extraordinary The queen of Sheba's wife to him.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid. ver. ult. x. 22. 2 Chron. viii. 17, 18. ix. 21. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. ver. 11. <sup>e</sup> 1 Kings ix. 25. 2 Chron. viii. 12, & seq.

India, into some common emporium. All these, by supposing the fleet to fall from the Red-Sea into the ocean, through the Persian gulph.

Dean Prideaux observes next, that it was the voyage to Tharshish, which took up three years going and coming; from which he conjectures, that Ophir might be much nearer Judea, and the voyage performed in less time, if they had not been obliged to go quite to the former for some commodities which the other did not afford; and, consequently, that any place in the great Indian sea, at the distance of three years voyage, which yielded gold, silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks, might be the Tharshish; and any other, though much nearer, where they could have gold, almug trees, and precious stones, might be the Ophir mentioned in the Scriptures. So that if the southern part of Arabia produced the greatest quantities of the best gold, as he shews they did from good authors, then that might be the land of Ophir (25).

But though it be granted, that Tharshish and Ophir might be distinct places, and at some considerable distance from each other, yet if the latter had been so nigh as south Arabia, and had yielded such plenty of the finest gold, almug trees, and precious stones, it is scarce credible that they would have gone so much farther for such inferior trifles as silver, ivory, monkeys, and peacocks; it is more likely that they went farthest for the finest gold, precious stones, and things of greatest value.

Lastly, a late author (26) has taken a quite different rout from all the rest, and thinks, that he has found out the Mesha and Sepphar, where Ophir the son of Joktan went to dwell; between mount Mafius and the mountains of Sapbar, somewhere toward Armenia and Media, where are the heads of the Tigris and Euphrates; which rivers might be subservient to this commerce. He adds several ingenious reasons for his conjectures, which we can not dwell upon, and may be better read in the author. The main objection against this hypothesis, and which we think he doth not sufficiently answer, is, that the nearness of the place doth not admit of a three years voyage, though we should suppose with him, that they took a large compass about from coast to coast; and that the three years mentioned in the text, might mean only three summers and two winters, or thirty months.

Upon the whole then, the most probable conjecture, and beyond that it is impossible to go, is, that Ophir was in some of those remote rich countries of India beyond Ganges, and perhaps as far as China or Japan; which last doth still abound with the finest gold, and with several other commodities in which Solomon's fleet dealt, as silver precious stones, ebony, and other valuable sorts of wood; to say nothing of spices, peacocks, parrots, apes, and other such creatures†; and by its distance, doth best answer to the length of the voyage.

All that we shall say farther is, that this Ophir gold was in great plenty in Judea even in David's time; since he left 3000 talents of it for the service of the temple, besides the 5000 talents which the princes of the people offered for the same purpose (27). Now as we can hardly believe either of them to have been so munificent, as to have given more than a certain proportion of it; should we suppose it to have been even a third part, there must have been at least 24,000 talents of that metal in his kingdom; this prodigious sum could never be heaped together from the bare spoil of the neighbouring nations; it is more reasonable to believe, that having conquered the Edomites, and taken Eloth and Ezion-geber, David set himself about opening a commerce from thence, by the assistance of Hiram's expert sailors; so that his son did but improve what the father had begun, by enlarging and fortifying those two places, and peopling them with the best mariners and ship-builders; and, in a word, by encouraging navigation and commerce to such a degree, as made him, by far, the richest prince of his time, and his kingdom the most flourishing in the world.

(S) Josephus calls her Nicanlis, and says, she was queen of Egypt and Ethiopia (28); and elsewhere, that Saba was the metropolis of the latter, till Cambyses called it by his sister's name, Meroes (29). The Ethiopians, accordingly, pretend, that she was queen of that country, and preserve still a list of her successors (30). They add, that she had a son by Solomon, whom she sent to be brought up by him; they call him Meilik or Menilebek, and pretend, that twenty-

(25) PRID. Connect. book i. (26) CALMET Proleg. in Genes. † Vid. VAREN. & al. descr. Japon. (27) Vid. 1 Chron. xxix. 4, & seq. (28) Ant. l. viii. c. 2. (29) Ibid. l. ii. c. 10. (30) Vid. HIER. ALMEID. & LUDOLPH. Hist. Ethiop.

Ordinary opulence, that she seemed to have come to vie with the Jewish monarch, a by the sumptuousness of her equipage, the richness of her presents, and the number of hard questions she put to him. She brought with her a vast number of camels laden with gold, precious stones, and such rich spices and perfumes, as had not till then been known even in Solomon's court. By all these, one may guess at the splendour of her equipage and retinue; and it is not to be supposed that she would have engaged with a prince so universally famed for wisdom, if she had not had some considerable share of it herself: but after having tried him with all the subtle and enigmatic questions she had prepared for him (T), she found in him such a readiness in solving, and such a sagacity in explaining his answers, that he seemed even to prevent her thoughts<sup>f</sup>; inasmuch, that she owned herself fully satisfied that he was not without just reason esteemed the wisest prince of his time. The king did then entertain her with a view of the temple, of his palaces and gardens, of his court, tables, and of the richness of their furniture, the great number and excellent order of his servants, stables, chariots, guards, and, in a word, of all the magnificence that reigned, both in his court, and in the city. So many surprising instances of his wisdom and greatness, could not but strike that princess with the deepest wonder; which, as soon as she could recover herself from, she owned with a kind of extasy, that the half of it had not been told her. After this, she expressed her extreme satisfaction in the most respectful terms, and presented the king with 120 talents of gold, a great number c of precious stones, and rich perfumes. Solomon, on the other hand, was too generous not to make her suitable returns, and dismissed her with the strongest proofs of his munificence (V)<sup>g</sup>.

HITHERTO we have seen nothing in that prince's life but what gives us the highest idea of his wisdom, piety, and magnificence; but the remainder of his reign proved far otherwise, and Solomon, emphatically called the wise, beloved of God, and admired by all the world for so many excellent virtues, did become such a slave to the passion of love, in his old age, that he ventured to marry an amazing His defection; multitude of strange women, without distinction of nation, country, or religion, and without the least regard to God's express commands to the contrary; till at d length, he but too sadly verified the divine warning<sup>h</sup>, by suffering himself to be seduced into all manner of idolatry. The number of his wives amounted to 700, besides 300 concubines, or wives of the second rank; and his complaisance for Idolatry; them went so far, as to build altars and temples to all their deities; inasmuch, that the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, if not the city itself, was filled with idols and twenty-four of their kings are descended from that prince successively down to Babylus, who reigned in the middle of the 17th century (31). Some ancient writers do likewise acknowledge, that that country was some time governed by women (32).

<sup>f</sup> 1 Kings x. 3.<sup>g</sup> Ibid. i. & seq. 2 Chr. ix. 1, & seq.<sup>h</sup> Vid. Deut. vii. 3, & seq.

The Arabians, on the other hand, claim this queen as their own; they call her Balkish, and pretend that she was queen of Arabia, had her residence in the city of Mareb, which they make the metropolis of the province of Saba. They have preserved also her genealogy, as well as the history of her journey to Judea, which they have stuffed with other fables; among others, that she was married to Solomon; and that after her return to Arabia, that prince used to keep an epistolary correspondence with her, by means of a bird which they called huthud, a kind of lapwing or puer, which used to carry letters between them (33).

But, setting aside these trifling stories, the opinion of those who think that that princess came from Arabia, seems certainly the most probable of the two; among many other reasons, because she is called, in the Gospel, the queen of the south, and is said to have come from the uttermost parts of the earth (34); which answers exactly to Arabia Felix, which lieth south of Judea, and is bounded by the ocean. To which we may add, that it abounded with gold, precious stones, and fine perfumes, more than any other country thereabouts.

(T) We have seen in a former note, that it was part of the diversion of princes in those times to puzzle one another with riddles and hard questions. An annalist tells us, that, among other ways that this princess tried to pose the king, she took a number of boys and girls which she had brought with her, and having arrayed them all alike, she presented them to him, to see which way he would take to know those of one sex from those of the other. Wherefore he ordered them to wash their faces before him; and easily found out the difference, by the robustness and effeminacy with which each sex performed his command. The reader may see his authority for this story in the author himself (35).

(V) Josephus adds, that the Jews had a tradition that the queen of Saba brought with her the first branch of that precious balsam-tree, or balm of Gilead, which Judea came afterwards to be so famed for. He mentions likewise a grove belonging to the house of Lebanon, which was such a masterpiece of art, that it raised the admiration of that princess, above all the rest of his stately works (36).

(31) Id. ib. lib. ii. c. 34. & seq. (32) STRAB. lib. xvi. c. 17. PLIN. l. vi. c. 26. (33) Vid. HERBELOT. Bibliot. Orient. sub voc. Balkish. (34) Matt. xii. 43. (35) MICH. GLYCAS. Annal. p. 182. (36) Ant. l. viii. c. 2.

a and temples; and the mount of Olivet, which was over-against it, was defiled with two altars, one to Chemosh the god of Moab, and another to Moloch the god of the Ammonites. Such a shameful defection could not but be highly displeasing to God; and Solomon was soon after made sensible of it, when he appeared the third time to him in a dream, and told him, that his ingratitude would cost his successors the loss of his kingdom, the tribe of Judah excepted, which he would leave them, in consideration of his former promise to David, for whose sake he also forbore to rend the other tribes from him till after his death. Whether this severe denuncia- and death.
tion awaked him to repentance, or whether he died immersed in his idolatry and Year of the lust, the text doth no where tell us; what the opinion of Jews and Christians is Flood, 2024.
b about it; may be seen in the next note (W). He died in the fortieth year of his Year before reign, Christ, 975.

(W) Among those that believe that Solomon did heartily repent of all his extravagancies, are, among the Jews, the Talmudists, who affirm, that God sent Asmodeus to strip him of all his glory, and drive him from his throne; upon which, that prince wandered about all the cities of Israel, weeping, and crying out, I, the preacher, was once king of Israel (37). 1. The generality of rabbies, ancient and modern, if we except the author of Ecclesiasticus, who finishes his elogy with an account of his crimes, and the ill effects which it caused in his posterity, without ever mentioning any thing about his repentance (38); these pretend to have a tradition, that in the height of his remorse, he caused himself to be dragged several times about the streets of Jerusalem; and that he came to the temple with five bundles of rods, desiring the doctors to chastise him for his faults; which they refusing to do, out of regard to his dignity, he scourged himself severely before them; and thinking himself unworthy to reign any longer, he stripped himself of every thing, and went a begging about the kingdom (39). Some of them have gone another way to work, and have affirmed, that it is false that his heart was ensnared by women to sin, or that he built any altars to Moloch, or any other heathenish deity; and say, that the text meant no more than that he would have done it, if he had not been withheld from it by God's special grace (40). As for Josephus, he only attributes his vices to the weakness of old age, without saying any thing of his repentance (41).

The Christians, both antient and modern, who have embraced the notion that Solomon repented before his death, are too numerous to be quoted here; we shall insert their names in the margin (42), and mention the principal reasons which have led them to it. In the first place, many of them have followed the notion of some of the fathers above quoted, that the book of Ecclesiastes was the result of his penitent meditations, after he was returned to a sense of himself; and these are very numerous (43). There are, indeed, in that book a number of expressions, which are very like those of a person who feels a sensible remorse for his past extravagances, and is desirous to forewarn others against them (44).

Another argument for his repentance, is taken from the promise made by God to his father, where, speaking of Solomon, whom he had chosen to build his temple, he adds, I will establish his kingdom for ever; I will be to him a father, and he shall be a son to me: If he commit iniquity, I will chastise him with the rod of men: —But my mercy will I not cause to depart from him, as I did from Saul: and much more to the same purpose (45).

It is likewise said, in another place (46), that Reboboam and his subjects walked in the way of David and Solomon but three years; and afterwards, that he did evil in the sight of the Lord (47). Solomon's way, therefore, being put with that of David, and opposed to that of his wicked son, argues, according to them, that it was right; which could not have been said of it, if he had died impenitent.

Some pretend, that the Proverbs were written after his repentance, and quote two places for it; the one, where he complains that he was more brutish than any man, having neither understanding, wisdom, nor knowledge of the holy One (48); for they pretend, that Agur there is Solomon: The other is still wider, being only, according to the Septuagint version, which makes him say, At length I repented, and have applied myself to live after a better rule; whereas in the original he only says, that having observed the field of a slothful man over-run with nettles — he considered well about it, and received instruction (49).

Lastly, so willing are they to make a penitent of him, they quote the words, And Solomon slept with his fathers, and was buried, &c. (50), as a token of his repentance; because there is nothing reproachful added to them, as is generally when a wicked king dieth impenitent; such as, that he did evil in the sight of the Lord; that he perverted his way; that he made Israel to sin; and such-like.

Notwithstanding all these reasons, many learned fathers, as well as modern authors, have not scrupled to call his repentance in question, and some of them even to deny it (51). We shall subjoin some of their reasons for this opinion. 1. Solomon's sins of idolatry, and love of strange women, are recorded in the strongest terms; but not a word is mentioned in the whole Scripture about his forsaking them. 2. God being highly offended with him, actually cut off ten tribes from his posterity, according to what he had told him (52). Would he have reign, and about the fifty-eighth of his age, and was buried in the stately sepulchre a of his father David, and succeeded by his son Rehoboam<sup>1</sup>. Josephus gives him eighty years reign, and ninety-four of age<sup>k</sup>. Were that indeed true, his impieties might well enough be attributed to his extreme dotage; perhaps also was this the motive that induced the Jewish historian to spin out his life so far beyond the text. Solomon is recorded to have written a great number of books; of which we have only his Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles; all the rest are lost, as well as those of the prophets Nathan, Abijah, and Iddo, who are said to have penned the history of that prince * (X).

(37) Vid. Talmud. tractat. קהלת. (38) Vid. Eccles. xlvii. 19, & seq. (39) Ex fragm. cui titul. De Salomone judicium, in fin. tom. 7. oper. BEDÆ. (40) Vid. PINED. de reb. Salom. CALMET. Dissert. de salut. ejusd. (41) Ant. l. viii. c. 3. (42) IREN. l. 4. MARCIO ap. Epiphan. de Hæres. BACCHIAR. Epist. de recipiend. lapsis. HILAR. in Ps. lvi. & cxvii. CYRIL. Hierosol. catech. 2. Hieron. in Ezek. xiii. & alib. GREGOR. TAUMAT. & al. (43) TH. AQUIN. HUGO. CARDINAL. PAUL. COMESTOR. GENEBRAND. CHEMNIT. J. HENR. HEIDEG. REYNER. MERCER. USSER. JUN. TREMEL, & al. plurim. (44) Vid. int. al. Eccles. i. 1, & seq. ii. pass. iii. 17, & seq. xi. & xii. pass. (45) 2 Sam. viii. 13, & seq. Ps. lxxxix. 19. & seq. ad 37. & alib. pass. (46) 2 Chron. xi. 17. (47) Ibid. xii. 14. (48) Prov. xxx. 23. (49) Ibid. xxiv. 30, & seq. (50) 1 Kings xi. ult. 2 Chron. ix. ult. (51) CYPRIAN. de unit. eccl. & epist. 6. ad ROGAT. TERTUL. lib. ii. iii, & v. cont. MARCION. ORIGEN. AUGUST. cont. FAUST. l. xxii. In Ps. cxvii. & alib. GREGOR. MAG. THEODORET. PROSPER. BEDA. DE LYRA. TOSTAT. BELLARM. PERER. VEGA. MALDONAT. & al. mult. (52) 1 Kings xi. 9, & seq.

WHILST Solomon spent the last years of his life in pleasure and indolence, the seeds of the threatened defection were sowing both in Israel and out of it; so that when his son Rehoboam came to the crown, he had three potent adversaries to encounter against. The first was Hadad, king of Edom, who bore a mortal hatred against Israel, ever since David's general had caused such an universal massacre in that kingdom. He was now returned from Egypt, where he had been forced to take sanctuary, during David and Solomon's reigns<sup>l</sup>. The second was Rezin, a subject of the king of Zobob, who fled likewise from David's conquering sword, and having put himself at the head of a band of brave warriors, went and established a petty kingdom at Damascus, and never ceased annoying Israel, and revenging David's old hostilities on the Zobeans<sup>m</sup>. But the most dangerous of the three was Jeroboam, a young daring man of the tribe of Ephraim, whom Solomon had formerly made overseer over his tribe, and that of Manasseh, in the carrying on of his works. This man had been told by the prophet Abijah, that God would give him the ten tribes, which were to be rent from Solomon's successors; and whether upon this account, or for some particular misdemeanor, he had been forced to fly into Egypt, to avoid the king's resentment, and there probably concerted with the king of Edom, about causing an insurrection in Israel. As soon, therefore, as he heard that Rehoboam was upon the throne, he returned from Egypt to watch a proper opportunity for it, and that weak prince soon after gave him such a one as his heart could wish.

Rehoboam.

Rehoboam was gone with his court, and the elders of all the tribes, to receive their homage at Shechem, but they refused to acknowledge him, unless he promised to lighten their yoke, which, they complained, his father had made too heavy for them.

<sup>1</sup> 1 Kings xi. pass. 2 Chron. ix. 30, 31. <sup>k</sup> Ant. l. 8. c. 3. * 2 Chron. ix. 29. <sup>l</sup> 1 Kings xi. 14, & seq. See before, p. 314, 315. <sup>m</sup> 1 Kings xi. 23, & seq. See before, p. 382. b. c.

have executed it so punctually, if Solomon had repented? 3. David, and others, who repented of their sins, had not only part of the punishment abated, but their conversion is particularly recorded? Why should Solomon be the only person whose repentance is omitted? Could he write the book of Proverbs, or of Ecclesiastes, after his conversion, and yet leave all the monuments of his idolatry to continue? Or, if he had destroy'd them, why was it not recorded? or rather, why is it said, that they subsisted till Josiah's time (53), that is, about 350 years after his death? What proofs are there, that the book of Ecclesiastes was not wrote before his defection, rather than after it? Lastly, as to the rabbinical traditions, doth not the authority of the book of Ecclesiasticus, mentioned above, out-weigh them all? and doth not that seem to imply that he died in his sins? Upon the whole then, we shall not venture to conclude any thing on either side, much less enter into the more dark and dangerous question about his salvation, which almost all the authors above-quoted, and many more, have presumed to handle with greater freedom than certainty.

(X) Several other books have been attributed to Solomon, especially those of Ecclesiasticus, the Wisdom and the Psalter of Solomon, which are now universally owned to be of more modern date. The latter consists of eighteen psalms, artfully collected out of the other psalms, and some of the prophets, a copy of which is in the Vienna library, and is placed between the two former books (54); they seem also to have been in our Alexandrian manuscript, by their being mentioned in the index, however they came to be torn or lost out of it. As for the other writings, which the Greek and Arabians attribute to that prince, they are less worth enquiring after: Some of them are written in the magic strain, others upon natural philosophy, and others upon moral subjects (55). Some indeed pretend, that the magic books were written by demons, who envied his glory, and wanted to asperse his fame, by making him the author of them; but that that prince, who was not only monarch of the world, but whose power extended over all creatures, and even over spirits, caused all those writings to be locked up in a strong iron chest, and buried under his throne; out of which, however, they were fetched after his death, by some demons or magicians, and published again under that monarch's name (56). There are some eastern authors, who attribute the invention of the Syriac and Arabic letters to him (57), and some make him the author of the book of Job (58); all without any foundation.

(53) 2 Kings xxiii. 13. (54) LAMBECH. Bibliot. Vindebon. (55) Vid. FABRIC. Apo. (56) Vid. HERBELOT. Bibliot. orient. sub voc. Solyman. (57) Vid. ABR. ECHELLENS & ABULFARAG. Hij. Arab. & al. (58) Vid. Polychron in Job DIEG. de STUNIC. & al. prefat. in Job.

a them. The king took three days to consider of an answer; and as he had attained to the fortieth year of his age, one might have expected that he would have hearkened to the wholesome advice of his grave counsellors, and given the people some fair promises; which if he had, it is possible he might have deprived Jeroboam, who was at the head of the mutineers, of an occasion of revolting; but he unfortunately preferred that of some hot-headed youths, who had been brought up at court with him; and instead of soothing the people on the third day, he answered them in a haughty tone, That he designed to govern them with greater severity than ever his father had done; and that if they dared to murmur, he would use scorpions instead of whips to chastise their insolence. This inconsiderate answer did so b provoke them, that they disclaimed all further allegiance to the house of David; and having murdered Adoram, whom the king had sent to appease the tumult, ten of the tribes chose Jeroboam to be their head. Judab and Benjamin, however, did cleave to Rehoboam, and conveyed him with all speed to Jerusalem, to avoid any insult being offered to him by the revolters. As soon as he was come thither, he caused an army to be raised out of the two tribes, which mustered 180,000 valiant men, to reduce the rest to their obedience; but whilst they were preparing for a battle, the prophet Shemaiah came and acquainted them, that this defection was from God, and persuaded them to desist, which they readily did for the present, tho' there were continual bickerings between those two kings all their life. Jeroboam, on the other hand, thought on nothing but how to secure his new-gotten kingdom; and took the advantage of that peaceful interval, to rebuild Shechem and Penuel, the former of which he made the place of his residence (Y). But there was still one thing which he feared might, in time, reconcile the ten tribes to the house of David, namely, their going three times a year to Jerusalem; and Jeroboam did not sufficiently rely upon the prophet's promise, to run the risk of becoming the victim of the people's inconstancy. This apprehension made him sacrifice religion to his safety, and to set up a couple of golden calves, the one at Dan, and the other at Bethel, which were at the two extremities of the kingdom, to which places he commanded the people to repair for the worship of God, without going to Jerusalem. He likewise built some temples and altars in the high places; and because the Levites did cleave to Rehoboam, he made priests to his deities out of the lees of his people, without regard to tribe or desert".

Rehoboam's folly occasions ten tribes to revolt;

who chose Jeroboam to be their king.

THE dedication of the two calves was proclaimed through Israel, and a great concourse of people had flocked to Bethel, when a prophet was sent thither by God; to denounce the destruction of the new altar by a future king of Judab, named Josiah; and for a proof of his prediction, he told them, that it should then receive such a crack, that the cinders would run out through the rent; and the thing happened accordingly upon the spot. Jeroboam was standing by the altar, being just going to offer incense upon it (Z); and when he heard the prophet's threatening, c he stretched out his hand to cause him to be apprehended, but, to his great surprize, felt it withered in an instant. Upon his submission, however, he had it restored again, and invited the prophet to his house, intending to have rewarded him for the

His idolatry.

" 1 Kings xii. pass.

(Y) These two places had been in a manner destroyed, the former by Abimelech (59), and the latter by Gideon (60). This last was an important place on the other side Jordan, very proper to keep the two tribes and a half in awe. Shechem was also a strong place by nature, about forty miles from Jerusalem (61), and so conveniently situate to become the metropolis of this new kingdom, which it continued to be till the building of Samarita by Omri, and resumed that dignity after this latter had been destroyed by the Affyrians. We find it called Sichar in the gospel (62), which is a term of contempt, which the tribe of Judab gave it after their revolt, and signifies drunkard.

(Z) It seems, by this action, as if Jeroboam had designed to join the high-priesthood and the royal dignity together in his own person. The places he made choice of to set up his two idols, were not only very commodious on account of their situation, but had been frequented, time out of mind, by the people. Bethel was had in great reverence, as having been resorted to by the patriarchs, and consecrated in a peculiar manner by Jacob, after he had seen the glorious vision we read of in Genesis (63); and Dan was become famous, or rather infamous, for the idol which had been brought thither from Micah's house, and for the concourse of people that went afterwards to sacrifice to it (64).

(59) Judg ix. 34, & seq. (60) Ibid viii. 17. (61) Vid RELAND in Shechem. (62) John iv. 5. (63) Chap. xxviii. 12, & seq. Vid. & chap. xxv. 1, & seq. (64) Judg. xvii. pass.

the cure; but he having been expressly forbidden to stay in Bethel, even to drink a cup of water, refused his offer, and went his way. He was, nevertheless, unadvisedly brought back by another prophet, who pretended a new command from God; but whilst he was refreshing himself at his house, he was told by him, that his disobedience would be punished by a speedy and extraordinary death, which happened accordingly soon after; for as he was returning into the land of Judab, he was killed by a lion, which did afterwards lay quietly down by his carcass, without offering any further violence either to it, or the beast he rode upon.

Jeroboam was nothing moved at these extraordinary events, but continued debauching the people from the worship of God<sup>a</sup>. At length, his son Abijah being fallen into some dangerous disease, he took it into his head to send his wife in disguise to Abijah the prophet, who had foretold him that he should be king over the ten tribes, to know whether he would recover. Abijah, though blind with age, knew her at her first coming; and having called her by her name, bid her go and tell her husband, that since he had proved so ungrateful to God, and had filled Israel with idolatry, the death of the child would be the least punishment that should fall upon him, for that his posterity should be cut off; so that they which died in the city, would become the food of dogs; and those that died in the field, should be devoured by the crows; all which was verified by the sequel accordingly. Notwithstanding all these threatnings, Jeroboam persisted still in his idolatry, and gave thereby no small advantage to the king of Judab<sup>b</sup>.

WHILST Jeroboam was strengthening himself in Shechem, Rehoboam was doing the same at Jerusalem; he built and fortified a considerable number of places in Judab and Benjamin, put garrisons in them, and stored them with arms and ammunition. At the same time, the tribe of Levi, which was dispersed over Israel, being displeased with Jeroboam, came flocking to Jerusalem from their respective cities, besides a vast number out of the other tribes, who abhorred his calves and idolatries, and came thither to serve God according to the law of Moses; so that he saw his subjects, in a little time, as numerous as those of his revolted rival<sup>c</sup>. But that weak prince had scarce continued three years in the true service of God, before he fell into the vilest idolatries, and even outdid the revolted Israelites in them; d infomuch, that his memory is branded for having suffered the people to set up groves, and to provide them with men and women fit for the most abominable and unnatural practices<sup>e</sup>. For these, God stirred up a potent adversary against them, Shishak king of Egypt, who came and took many of their fenced cities, and drove the wealthiest of Judab into the metropolis for shelter. Here the prophet Shemaiah took occasion to upbraid them with their wickedness, which had brought this distress upon them; he threatened the ruin of the city; and his speech had so good an effect upon them, that they humbled themselves before God, and by acknowledging the justice of this punishment, avoided the severity of it<sup>f</sup>. Shishak contented himself with stripping the temple and palaces of all their golden shields and vessels, and left them to substitute others in their room, of a baser metal. This happened in the fifth year of Rehoboam, after which he reigned twelve years longer peaceably, except a few skirmishes with the king of Israel, and died in the 18th year of his reign. He had 18 wives and 60 concubines, and by them 28 sons and 60 daughters; but of all his wives, he loved Maacab, the daughter, or rather grand-daughter of Abisalom<sup>g</sup>, by whom he had four sons, the eldest of whom he preferred to all his other sons to succeed him; for which end, he had him brought up under him, whilst he disposed of all his children in other cities of his kingdom, to be educated under proper tutors, in a manner suitable to their rank<sup>h</sup>. f His history was written by the prophets Iddo and Shemaiah<sup>i</sup>.

Rehoboam's death.

Abijah's reign.

Year of the Flood, 2041.
Year before Christ, 958.

Jeroboam had reigned eighteen years in Israel, when Abijah, or Abijab, as he is called in the book of Chronicles, came to the crown. He immediately put 400,000 men in arms, and went and incamped with them upon mount Zemaraim, upon the borders of Ephraim, where Jeroboam met him with an army of double that number. The two kings being within hearing of each other, Abijah began with upbraiding his competitor with his base extraction, and base actions; in that, from being <sup>a</sup> 1 Kings xiii. per tot.

xiv. 23, 24.
xi. 18, ad fin.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. xiv. 2, ad 21.

<sup>c</sup> See 1 Chron. xii. pass.

<sup>d</sup> Ibid. chap. xii. 15.

<sup>e</sup> 2 Chron. xi. 4, & seq.

<sup>f</sup> Comp. chap. xiii. 4, & 1 Kings xv. 2:

<sup>g</sup> 1 Kings

<sup>h</sup> 2 Chron.

a being a servant to Solomon, he had taken the advantage of Reoboam's weakness, to deprive him of the largest share of his kingdom, and had endeavoured to secure it by debauching the people from the worship of God, to the most abominable idolatries; he concluded with telling him, that he could expect nothing but ruin and destruction, as a just punishment for his rebellion to his God, and to his prince, who came against him with an army of men, which had faithfully adhered to the service of both. Jeroboam was too hardened a politician to suffer himself or his men, to be intimidated by such reproaches, and whilst he seemed to give him the hearing, he had cunningly ordered a body of men to file round the hill, and to surprise him in the rear, whilst he attacked him in front; and this was so punctually executed, that the king of Judab saw himself surrounded by the enemy before he was aware of it. This surprise caused an universal outcry in his army, and would, in all likelihood, have injected an universal panic, had not providence declared on their sides, so that they gained a compleat victory over the Israelitish army, of which there fell 500,000 on the spot. Abijah pursued his victory, and retook several considerable places from them, particularly that of Bethel, and weakened Jeroboam so much, that he never could recover his strength again, during the short time of his reign, which lasted but three years in all. Abijah left 14 wives and 22 sons, and was succeeded by Asa; his history was written by the prophet Iddo<sup>r</sup>. All that is further recorded of him, is, that he followed the sinful ways of his father, instead of serving God with the same sincerity that David had done<sup>s</sup>. About two years after, Jeroboam also died (A), after having reigned in Israel 22 years, and was succeeded by his son Nadab<sup>a</sup>.

Defeats Jeroboam's army.

Asa succeeded Abijah in the twentieth year of Jeroboam. He was a religious prince, and as the ten first years of his reign were blessed with peace, he spent a great part of that time in purging his kingdom from the heathenish abominations, which his predecessors had introduced in it. So sincere was his zeal in that good work, that he spared not his own mother, but deposed her from the regal dignity, which she had abused, by patronizing idolatry, and erecting a grove for the worship of some idol; both which he caused to be destroyed, with all the other monuments of irreligion, except the high places, which he endeavoured in vain to divert the people from. He also put his whole kingdom in a good posture of defence, by fortifying several important places, and entertaining an army of 580,000 men, 300,000 of which were of the tribe of Judab, famous for handling the target and spear; the rest, which were most of Benjamin, are likewise celebrated for their uncommon dexterity in the use of the shield and bow<sup>b</sup>. His riches increasing with his might, he likewise adorned the temple with a quantity of gold and silver vessels in the room of those which the king of Egypt had carried away. In the second year of his reign, Nadab succeeded Jeroboam in Israel; but nothing happened remarkable during his two years reign, except his cleaving to the sins of his father, and his being killed at the siege of Gibbion, a fortress belonging to the Philistines, by Baasha a man of the tribe of Issachar, who having seized upon the kingdom, destroyed the whole race of Jeroboam, according to the prophet's word<sup>c</sup>.

Asa's reign,

and piety.

At length, Asa saw his kingdom attacked by an army of 10,000,000 Cushites, besides chariots, with Zerah the Ethiopian at their head (B). Asa, who trusted more in his God, than in his own strength, was nothing terrified at this numerous host, but came against him with his army; and after a sharp battle, which was fought at Maresbab, did totally rout the Ethiopians, and returned to Jerusalem laden seq. & 2 Chron. xiv. 1, ad 9.

His victory over the Cushites.

<sup>r</sup> 2 Chron. xiii. pass.

<sup>s</sup> 1 Kings xv. 3.

<sup>c</sup> 1 Kings xv. 27, & seq.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. ver. 24.

<sup>b</sup> Comp. 1 Kings xv. 9, &

(A) It is said in the ii<sup>d</sup> of the Chronicles (65), that the Lord struck him with death; by which is meant, that he died by some unnatural death; and, indeed, his character is constantly loaded with infamy, for the idolatries which he introduced in Israel, which lasted till the dissolution of that kingdom.

(B) Archbishop Usher (66) places this famous action in the first year of Asa's reign; other chronologers about the fifteenth, more or less (67) of it. We have followed the author of the ii<sup>d</sup> book of Chronicles, which affirms, that there was peace during the first ten years (68); and that Asa offered great sacrifices at Jerusalem in the fifteenth year of his reign, as a thanksgiving for his late victory (69).

(65) Chap. xiii. 20.
CALMET, & al.

(66) Ann. sub A. M. 3063.

(68) Chap. xiv. 1.

(69) Ibid. ver. 10, & seq.

(67) Vid. & Sir I. NAWR. Chronol. p. 99.

laden with their spoil. At his return, he was met with by a prophet, who encouraged him with fresh promises from God, that he should still prove successful against his enemies, provided he continued firm in his zeal and obedience to God. Soon after his arrival at his metropolis, he sacrificed a considerable portion of the spoil to the service of God, and had the pleasure to see multitudes flock to him from several of the revolted tribes, whom either his zeal or success drew away from Baasha, the new-made king of Israel.

Makes an alliance with Benhadad.

It was, probably, this continual defection which caused a series of skirmishes between the two kings, and obliged the latter to build the fortress of Ramab, to stop the communication between the two kingdoms. He was then leagued with the king of Syria, and Asa, afraid of engaging two such powerful enemies, found no better expedient, than to bribe Benhadad to break his alliance with him, and to cause some powerful diversion in his kingdom. To this end, he sent him all the gold that he could find, both in his own treasury, and in that of the temple; which had such an influence upon the Syrian king, that he took all the fenced cities of the tribe of Naphtali, and obliged Baasha to desist from his enterprise, to go and defend his territories<sup>c</sup>. As soon as he was departed from Ramab, Asa issued out a proclamation, and ordered his subjects, none excepted, to transport all the materials of that fortress to Geba of Benjamin, and to Mizpeh in the tribe of Judah, and to fortify those two places with them. In the mean time, the prophet Hanani took the liberty to come and reprove Asa for his weakness, in seeking help from Benhadad, when he had been so lately victorious over the Ethiopian host; but the king, who was by this time grown impatient, by reason of a distemper in his feet, probably the gout, was so exasperated at his boldness, that he cast him into prison. He was likewise guilty of some cruelties towards other persons, upon what pretence the text doth not say; but it is likely that his disease had inclined him to it, because it is observed to have lessened his confidence in God, and to have sent him to the physician for help<sup>f</sup>. He died in the 41st year of his reign, and was succeeded by his son Jehoshaphat (C).

His disease,

and death.
Year of the Flood, 2085.
Year before Christ, 914.

Elah, king of Israel, murdered by Zimri.

Baasha all this while continued in the idolatries of Jeroboam, and in constant war with the king of Judah, when Jebu, the son of Hanani, came from the Lord to tell him, that since he had imitated his predecessor in his sins, he should likewise share in his punishment, and be cut off with his posterity. Baasha died soon after, and was succeeded by his son Elah, who ascended the throne in the 26th year of Asa's reign; he had scarce reigned two years before he felt the effects of Jebu's prediction; he was then at the siege of Gibbeton, where Zimri, who commanded over his chariots, slew him, and seized upon his kingdom. Zimri's reign lasted but seven days; Omri, another general officer, being chosen king by the army: yet found he time enough in that short space, to destroy the whole race of Baasha, even to his farthest relations. Omri left Gibbeton, and came to besiege him in Tirzah; but before he could enter that city, Zimri went into the royal palace, and set it on fire, and burnt himself in it<sup>g</sup>; however, he reigned long enough to shew himself unworthy of the kingdom, by his propensity to Jeroboam's idolatry.

Omri had another competitor, Tibni the son of Ginatb, whom one part of the people had elected king; but the party of Omri being much the stronger, soon persuaded the rest to join with them; so Tibni was killed, and Omri reigned unrivalled. This happened in the 31st year of Asa's reign.

DURING the first six years of his reign, Tirzah being then the royal palace of residence, Omri bought the hill of Someron, or Samaria, of one Shemer, for two talents of silver, and built the city of that name upon it, which he made afterwards the metropolis of his kingdom. We have nothing more recorded of him, except that he reigned another six years in Samaria, in all the sinful ways of his predecessors,

<sup>c</sup> 1 Kings xv. 18, & seq. See before, p. 383. <sup>e</sup> 1 Kings xvi. 1, & seq. ad 18.

<sup>f</sup> 2 Chron. xvi. 12, & seq.

<sup>g</sup> 1 Kings xvi.

(C) The book of Kings doth barely say, that he was buried with his ancestors<sup>a</sup>; but that of the Chronicles (70) adds, that he was embalmed, and laid upon a stately bed, covered with spices and odoriferous drugs; and that they made a great burning for him; from which some have concluded, that the custom of burning the bodies of princes began from Asa, and that they deposited the bones and ashes in their sepulchres. We have endeavoured to confute this notion, and to reconcile the seeming contradiction of these two accounts in a former note, to which we refer the reader †.

<sup>a</sup> 1 Kings xv. 24.

(70) 2 Chron. xvi. ult.

† Vid. sup. p. 697. not. V.

a cessors, and was succeeded by his son, who proved still more wicked than any of them<sup>b</sup>.

Ahab began his reign in the 38th year of Asa's; his unlawful marriage with Ahab king of Jezabel, the daughter of Etz-Baal, king of Zidon, proved a constant source of idolatries and wicked deeds in him, and of plagues and misfortunes to his king-<sup>Year of the Flood, 2081, Year before Christ, 918.</sup> dom. His complaisance for her made him suffer her to introduce the worship of the Zidonian deities, which consisted in human sacrifices, and in the most abominable ceremonies†. These were at first introduced into his court, for which a sumptuous temple, an altar, and grove, had been built to Baal in Samaria; but as his weakness suffered him to assist at those hellish ceremonies, his example soon b spread the infection through his whole kingdom. However, the prophet Elijah was sent to him very early, to deter him from his wicked courses, by assuring him, that God would shortly punish the land with a grievous famine, during which, there should be neither dew nor rain to refresh the earth, until he obtained it again by his prayers; after which, he went and concealed himself during the space of three years (D)<sup>i</sup>.

WHILST Ahab and his idolatrous queen were propagating their impieties in Israel, and murdering all those, whether prophets or others, who dared oppose them, Jehoshaphat, who succeeded Asa about the latter end of the fourth year of Ahab's reign, was destroying idolatry, and promoting the pure worship of God c in his own kingdom, with such zeal and application, that it drew upon him and his people the greatest prosperity and success. He was thirty-five years old when he began his reign, and the first thing that he set about was the pulling down all the monuments of idolatry, and sodomitical groves, which his father had not been able to abolish; and in the third year of his reign, he sent some of the chief officers of his court, with a competent number of priests and Levites, with copies of the Pentateuch, to instruct the people throughout his kingdom. At the same time, he fortified all the considerable places of the land, and put garrisons in them, as well as in those which his father had taken from the kings of Israel. Besides these, he had the most numerous army of any of his predecessors, it consisting d above 11,000,000 fighting men (E). Upon all these accounts, he was so prosperous and powerful, that none of his enemies dared molest him; the Philistines and Arabians were tributaries to him; and his allies were still increasing his wealth by their presents<sup>k</sup>.

THUS

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. ver. 21, & seq.
<sup>k</sup> 2 Chron. xvii. pass.

† See before, p. 401. c. & alib.

<sup>i</sup> 1 Kings xvi. 29, ad fin.

(D) There are many particulars relating to this extraordinary prophet, which have no proper connection with the history of the kings, and yet are too remarkable to be omitted; for which reason, we chuse to give them in a note in their order of time.

As soon then as he had foretold the famine, he was forced to fly from the fury of Jezabel, and retired into some cavern upon the border of Cherith, a brook which falleth into the Jordan, where he drank of the water of it, and was furnished twice a day with bread and flesh by the ravens. He stayed not long there, because the excessive drought had dried up the brook; but went to Zarephath, a city of Zidon, which laboured also with the famine. There he met with a poor widow gathering a few sticks without the walls of the place, having but so much flour and oil left as would make one cake, which she designed for her son and herself, without knowing how to procure more when that was spent. The prophet, tired with his journey, asked her for a mouthful of bread, and a little water to drink; and she having acquainted him with her condition, he bid her not fear, but bring him what he desired; assuring her, that as long as the dearth lasted, her barrel and cruse should not cease furnishing her with meal and oil enough to support them. The thing happened according to his prediction, and he continued with her till he was commanded to return to Samaria. During his abode with this hospitable widow, her only son chanced to die; and she, in the height of her grief, could not forbear accusing the prophet as the cause of her misfortune. Upon which, Elijah took the child from her, and carried him up to his bed, and having stretched himself upon him, and prayed to God on his behalf, he restored him alive to her again (71).

(E) We have had elsewhere occasion to speak of this prodigious number of soldiers*, and to shew that they were not kept like our standing armies, in constant pay and duty, but that their names were set down in the king's muster-rolls, in order to be summoned to arms whenever occasion required it; which, considering the small compass of the land, might be done with great ease, and in a very little space; after which they returned to their families, and followed their usual occupations. We may also suppose, that the garrisons might be relieved in the same manner every three months, more or less, that every one might have time to mind his private affairs between those intervals.

(71) 1 Kings xvii. per tot.

* Sup. p. 701. a, b. 703. c, d. & alib.

THUS it fared with that religious prince and his subjects, whilst war and famine a were the reward of Ahab's impiety in the kingdom of Israel.

Elijah's meeting with Obadiah :

and Ahab.

Elijah's zeal against Baal.

HOWEVER, at the end of a three years famine, Elijah came and shewed him- self to Obadiab, governor of Ahab's house, as he was going in search of some fresh springs of water, to save that little cattle they had left, whilst the king himself went another way upon the same errand. Obadiab was a pious man, and had shewed an uncommon zeal for the God of Israel, by saving 100 of his prophets from Jezebel's fury, and supporting them with food in their concealment during the whole time of the famine. As soon, therefore, as he saw Elijah, he fell down at his feet, and gave him a respectful welcome ; but when the prophet bid him go after the king, and acquaint him with his arrival, he modestly excused himself b from so dangerous a message, being afraid lest if the spirit should catch him away, instead of his appearing before the king, his life should answer for the disappointment ; for, added he, there is scarce a nation or kingdom from which Ahab has not exacted an oath, to bring you back to Samaria, where-ever you were found. At length, upon the prophet's promising that he would shew himself to the king, Obadiab went and stopt his farther search, by acquainting him with Elijah's return, and his promise of a speedy rain. Elijah accordingly appeared, and the first greet- ing between Ahab and him was such, as might be reasonably expected between a wicked haughty monarch, and a person of that prophet's character. After some mutual invectives on both sides, Elyab desired that all Israel might be gathered at c mount Carmel, with all the priests of Baal whom Jezebel maintained ; which being done accordingly, he reprov'd the people for halting between two opinions, and dividing their service between God and Baal. " You see, said he, that I am " the only prophet of the Lord that is left, and those of Baal are 450 ; let them " offer up a bullock to Baal, and I will offer another to the God of Israel ; and let " the deity whose sacrifice is consumed by a preternatural fire, be henceforth " the only object of your worship." As soon as the people had expressed their assent to his proposal, the priests of Baal were ordered to begin. They hewed their bullock in pieces, and laid it upon the wood of the altar, and called upon d Baal from morning till noon ; and not finding the least symptom of answer, they d began, according to their custom, to cut themselves with knives till the blood ran down upon the ground *. All this while, Elijah plied them with the most biting sarcasms, bidding them to cry louder, for Baal, no doubt, was a great God, and would hear them, unless he were either asleep, or more advantageously taken up. At length, when it was come about the time of offering the evening sacri- fice, he reared up an altar of twelve stones, according to the Mosaic law, and laid the wood and victim upon it ; and having caused a deep trench to be digged round it, he ordered them to pour water upon the altar once and again, till the trench was overflowed. He then called upon God with a loud voice, begging of him that he would shew himself to the whole people, to be the only God in all the e world ; upon which, a fire fell down from heaven, which consumed the victim, wood, and altar, and dried up all the water in the trenches ; at sight of which, the people fell upon their faces, and cried out, The Lord is the only God. The prophet then, addressing himself to the people, told them, that if they were really persuaded of it, they ought to seize on those false prophets, pointing to the priests of Baal, who had seduced them from his worship to serve that filthy deity, and take them to the brook Kishon, and put every one of them to death there. The people readily obeyed the motion ; and Ahab, whether the late miracle made him approve their zeal, or whether he thought it dangerous to obstruct it, suffered them to be hurried away to death. Elijah then advised the king to make what f speed he could to Jezreel, to avoid being caught by the rain, which would shortly come down in great plenty, as it did accordingly. As soon as Ahab had reached his palace, he acquainted his queen with what had happened at Carmel, and what shameful check her favourite deity had received there, in the sight of all Israel. One would expect, that the long-wished-for rain, obtained by the prophet's prayer, might have comforted her for that misfortune, and have inspired her with an uncommon respect for his person ; but it happened quite otherwise, and the death of so many of her prophets, threw her into such a rage, that she vowed to send the a the author of it after them by the next day. And Elijah was forced a second time to fly for his life (F)<sup>1</sup>.

By that time Abab had reigned 18 years, Benbadad, king of Syria, came at the head of 32 petty kings, and a numerous army, and laid siege to Samaria; where, notwithstanding his great forces, and the arrogance with which he threatened both king and city, he was beat by a handful of men, who sallied out upon him at mid-day, with Abab at their head; and forced to fly with a prodigious loss. He endeavoured, on the following year, to retrieve his credit, and was defeated again by the Israelites with a terrible slaughter, and himself in danger of being taken prisoner in the city of Apbeck; but upon his sending from thence a submissive message, Abab received him with an amazing generosity into his chariot, and brought him to his pavilion, where they made an alliance together; after which, he generously dismissed him without any further ransom. The particulars of these two famous actions, the reader will find in the history of Syria †. As soon as Benbadad was departed, one of the sons of the prophets presented himself before Abab, with his face all besmeared with blood and dirt, and complained, that during the action, a Syrian prisoner had been committed to his custody, with a strict charge not to let him escape, under pain of death; but that whilst he busied himself about one thing or other, the prisoner was fled, and himself now in danger of being punished for his neglect. Abab, who believed the fact to be really as he told it, made no scruple to pronounce him guilty of death; but the prophet wiping his face, and disdovring himself to the king, soon let him know that he had passed his sentence against himself, and that since he had let so powerful an enemy of Israel go free, when God had delivered him into his hand, his life should pay for that of his prisoner. Abab was struck with such surprize at the boldness of the stratagem, that he went away to Samaria full of grief and indignation (G)<sup>m</sup>; nevertheless, he kept his word with the king of Syria, till his detaining Ramoth-Gilead, a city which belonged to Israel, contrary to his promise, obliged him to invade his territories about three years after<sup>n</sup>.

IN

<sup>1</sup> 1 Kings xviii. pass. xix. 1, 2, 3. † See before, p. 383, & seq. <sup>m</sup> 1 Kings xx. pass. <sup>n</sup> See Usher's Ann. sub A. M. 3104.

(F) The prophet seems, at this time, to have been under such apprehensions, that he could not stay till providence directed him what course to take, as he had done in his last flight. He stopped not till he came to Beersebabab, a city in the land of Judah, and near 150 miles from Samaria; where having dismissed his servant, he continued his march one whole day towards the wilderness of Arabia Petrea. At length, being quite spent with the journey, and tired with life, he laid himself down under a juniper-tree, and after some bitter complaints, fell asleep. He was soon after awaked by an angel, who bid him refresh himself with some food, and when he looked about, he found a cake of bread, and some water, and did eat and drink, and fell asleep again. The angel awoke him again, and bid him eat once more, before he went on his journey, which he told him would be a long one; and so it proved indeed, for he went, upon the strength of it, forty days, till he came to mount Horeb, where he found a convenient cave to lodge in. Here the word of the Lord came to him, and asked him what he did there? and he answered, that he was the only prophet of the Lord whom the idolatrous Israelites had not slain, after they had broken his covenant, and destroyed his altars; and that because he had been zealous enough to reprove them for it, they sought his life also. The voice commanded him then to stand upon the mount, where he should hear the Lord pass by him; that he should hear a strong wind, capable of rending the rocks asunder; and afterwards an earthquake, and then a flame; but that the Lord would not manifest himself in any of these, but in a small and still voice. Accordingly, when Elijah heard the voice, he wrapped his face in his mantle, and the Lord commanded him to go back by the way of the wilderness, or by desert paths to Damascus, and there anoint Hazael to be king of Syria, Jehu to be king of Israel, and Elisha to be prophet in his room; telling him, that those three should not sheath their swords, till Abab's impious race, and his idolatrous subjects, were utterly cut off by one or other of them; all which happened accordingly, as we shall see in its proper place.

In his return, he passed by the grounds of Elisha, the son of Shaphat, where he and his servants were ploughing, and cast his mantle upon him. Elisha, ready to follow him, begged leave to entertain him at a feast, whilst he took his leave of his friends; but it doth not appear that he stayed to partake of it; and indeed the place was too near Samaria and Jezreel, and it was dangerous for him to stay there; however, he went after him as soon as they had made an end of eating. Neither doth it appear from the text, that Elijah went to anoint either Hazael or Jehu; it is most likely, that that ceremony was not performed till after his translation, as will appear by the sequel.

(G) Josephus (73) calls this prophet Micaiah, and adds, that the king caused him to be put into prison for his boldness; which is not unlikely, because, when Abab was afterwards going against Ramoth-Gilead, and had sent for him at Jehoshaphat's request, Abab expressed a particular aversion against him, because he was ever prophesying evil against him; and when he had foretold him his overthrow at Ramoth, he condemned him to the same punishment (74).

(73) Ant. l. 8. c. 8.

(74) 1 Kings xxii. pass.

Naboth murdered.

IN the mean time, Abab suffered himself to be seduced by Jezebel to an inhuman deed, which proved fatal to him and to his whole family. Naboth, an inhabitant of Jezebel, had a vineyard contiguous to the palace, which Abab offered to buy, or barter for another piece of ground, intending to make an herb-garden of it for his house; but as it was reckoned scandalous to sell an inheritance, Naboth was uncourteous enough to refuse the offer, to the great mortification of the proud king. Jezebel was acquainted with it, and being resolved at once to procure the vineyard, and to punish Naboth for his refusal, she sent a letter to the elders of Jezebel, sealed with the king's signet, commanding them to proclaim a fast, and to hire some loose fellows to swear treason and blasphemy against him, and then to stone him to death for it. The Jezebelites, not daring to disobey her orders, sent her word soon after of Naboth's death, and she acquainted Abab with it; but whilst he was taking possession of the ground, the prophet Elijah came to him from God, foretold the destruction that his murder would bring upon him, upon Jezebel, and upon all his whole house; that the dogs should lick his blood, where they licked that of Naboth, that Jezebel should be devoured by dogs, and all his posterity utterly cut off. This dreadful sentence, from so considerable a prophet, did so alarm the king, that he rent his cloaths, returned home filled with the deepest grief, and by a timely repentance, obtained a gracious respite; so that the calamities that were to fall upon his house, did not happen till after his death<sup>a</sup>. It is probably about this time, that he is supposed to have made his son Abaziah co-partner of his crown, or perhaps only his viceroy (H), whilst he humbled himself in sackcloth and ashes, to avoid the impending judgment of God<sup>b</sup>; but this change was but short-lived, and he soon returned to his former impieties.

Ahab's expedition against Ramoth.

ALL this while Jezebel had enjoyed a profound peace, and spent his time partly in strengthening his kingdom, promoting his naval trade, and partly in making all the proper regulations for the utter abolishing of idolatry, and promoting the worship of God. He is blamed only for two things, his not totally demolishing the high places, and his making alliances and affinity with Abab (I). It was in consequence of this last, that he came down to Samaria to pay a visit to him, having left the care of his kingdom to his son Jezebel. By this time, Abab had resolved upon retaking of Ramoth-Gilead from the Syrians: he took therefore that opportunity of asking his royal guest to assist him in the enterprise, to which he readily consented, but desired first of all, that God might be consulted concerning the success of that expedition. Abab immediately gathered 400 of his prophets to the gate of Samaria, where the king of Judah and he sat, each on a stately throne, and upon his asking the question, they one and all promised him, that he would come off victorious. Some of them pretended likewise to foretel his success, by some antick and awkward representations and gestures; but with such seeming eagerness and assurance, as rendered them suspected to Jezebel, who therefore begged, that if there were any other prophet of the Lord, he might be sent for and consulted. There was indeed such a one as he desired, Micaiah the son of Imlah; but his strenuous veracity had made him too odious to the king; however, he was obliged in complaisance to Jezebel, to send for him, and he being before acquainted with the flattering promises of the false prophets, by the officer who brought him, did likewise answer, in a jocular tone, that the expedition could not fail of success; but the king, observing that he did not speak seriously, adjured him to tell him the truth in the name of God: upon which, Micaiah told him,

<sup>a</sup> 1 Kings xxi. pass.

<sup>b</sup> Vid. ibid. ver. 17, & seq.

(H) At least this is the only expedient by which chronologists can reconcile the anachronisms, which one meets with between the books of Kings and Chronicles; the one beginning their reign from the death of their fathers, and the other from the time of their being raised to a partnership with them. The reader may see an instance of it proved in archbishop Usher's annals (75), both in Abab above-mentioned, and in his cotemporary Jezebel; who raised also his son Jezebel to be his viceroy, or partner. It may be further observed, that this method became very expedient, if not absolutely necessary, in dangerous wars, in which the kings used to lead their own armies, and often lost their lives, to appoint their successors, and to leave them vicegerents of the kingdom during their absence; upon which account, this wholesome custom prevailed also among many other eastern nations.

(I) This affinity was in suffering his son Jezebel to marry Ataliyah, the daughter of Abab, a most wicked princess, who proved the author of great mischiefs in Judah (76); and by whom he had a son named Abaziah, who afterwards succeeded his father, as we shall see in its proper place.

a him, that he would certainly lose the day, with his life, that his army would be defeated, and that God had suffered his prophets to be possess'd with a lying spirit, that he might go and meet his death where he expected a victory. The king, however, was so far from being deterred by this speech, from his favourite enterprise, that he caused the prophet to be kept in a dungeon with bread and water, until he returned victorious, and went resolutely upon his own ruin; and Jehoshaphat being too easily persuaded to accompany him, did narrowly escape sharing in the same fate: we have seen the ill success of this expedition in a former chapter *.

Abab, wounded by a random shot, died in the evening, and as soon as his death was known, his generals caused a retreat to be sounded through his army, and both sides withdrew before night. The king's corps was brought to Samaria, and buried in the royal sepulchre, and his bloody armour, chariot and harness, were brought to a pool in that place to be washed, where the dogs coming to lick his blood, verified Elijah's prophecy against him †.

His ill success and death.

Year of the Flood, 3102.
Year before Christ, 897.

Jehoshaphat, on the other hand, having thus happily escaped, returned to Jerusalem, and in the way was met by the prophet Jehu, who reprov'd him in the severest terms, for entering into a confederacy with the impious king of Israel, and told him, that if God had not had a greater regard for that zeal which he had express'd for his service, than to this last and unworthy action, he would certainly have suffered him to fall with his idolatrous ally. The king, become sensible of his error by this reproof, and by his late danger, endeavour'd to retrieve it by a more assiduous application to every thing that related, either to religion, or the good of his kingdom. To do this the more effectually, he took a progress through a great part of it, diligently examined how the priests instructed the people, the judges and magistrates administred justice, and every where exhorted them to their duty, with a zeal worthy so good a prince ‡.

In the mean time Abaziah, who had succeeded his father Abab, both in his kingdom and idolatry, happened to fall through a grate of his dining-room, about the second year of his reign, and was so hurt by the fall, that his life was despair'd of. In this extremity, he sent messengers to consult Beelzebub, the deity of Ekron, about his recovery; but these were met by Elijah, who sent them back with this mournful message to their master, that since he had sent to the god of Ekron, as if there had been none in Israel worth consulting, he should never stir more from his bed, till he was carried to his grave. At their return, they acquainted the king, who was surpris'd at the suddenness of it, that they had met a prophet, who sent them back with the sentence of death from the Lord; and upon their describing him, that he was a hairy man, girt with a leathern girdle, he knew him to be Elijah, and died soon after, according to his prophecy § (K). During his short reign, the Moabites, who had been tributaries to Israel, ever since Jeroboam's defection, rebelled against him; wherefore, when his brother Jehoram came to the crown, he sent to beg Jehoshaphat's assistance, who made no scruple, upon

* See before, p. 385. 2.

† 1 Kings ult. pass.

‡ 2 Chron. xix. per tot.

§ 1 Kings i. pass.

(K) The text adds, that Abaziah sent three officers, one after another, each at the head of fifty men, to fetch the prophet to him by main force, and that the two first companies were devoured by fire from heaven; but the last addressing himself to him in an humbler manner than the two former, not only escap'd their fate, but prevail'd upon him to go to the king; where he only confirm'd his first message, and went his way.

Soon after this, that extraordinary prophet was translated into heaven in a fiery chariot, and left a double portion of his spirit with Elysha, who, from that time, became as famous in Israel for his zeal and miracles, as his master had been (77), as we shall see in the sequel of this history. As soon as he had lost sight of his master, he took his cloak, which was fallen from him as he was taken up, and with it divided and repass'd the Jordan. Here he was met with a company of prophets, who perceiving that the spirit of Elijah rested upon him, prostrated themselves before him; and having observ'd to him the pleasant situation of Jericho, whose soil, however, was unhappily barren through the brackishness of its water, he went with them to the fountain-head, and flung a pitcher full of salt into it, from which time it always yielded sweet water, and the land became fruitful.

Elysha went from thence to Bethel, and, in his way, was met by a parcel of idle boys coming out of that place, who cried to him in mockery, Come up, thou bald man. These were, in all likelihood, the children of some of the worshippers of Baal, who had been taught to shew an unusual disrespect for the prophets of God. This seems at least very probable, from the punishment which befel them; for the prophet had no sooner curs'd them in the name of God, than forty-two of them were torn in pieces by two she-bears out of the wood (78).

(77) 2 Kings ii. pass.

(78) Ibid. ver. 23, & seq.

upon such an occasion, to go in person to help to reduce them. It was well for a Jehoram that he had so good a prince with him, for when their army was ready to perish with thirst, Elisha, at his request, obtained a miraculous supply of water, which did at once refresh the confederate army, and by the redness which it did cast at sun-rising towards the Moabitish host, did so scare them, that Israel gained a compleat victory over them, as we have seen elsewhere †.

Judah invaded.

At length, towards the latter end of his reign, Jehoshaphat saw his kingdom invaded by the Ammonites, Moabites, with a mixed multitude of other nations, and with such speed, that they were already got as far as Hazazon-Tamar, or Engedi, that is within 36 miles of his capital, before he knew any thing of it. In this b surprise he had recourse to God, proclaimed a strict and general fast, and went at the head of the people, who were assembled at Jerusalem upon that occasion, to the temple, where having implored the divine assistance, in an humble and pathetic prayer, he was answered by the prophet Jabaziel, that God would speedily deliver him from those invaders in such an extraordinary manner, that he should have nothing to do but seize upon their spoil. Accordingly, on the next morning, the king went out against them with a small army, whom he still encouraged, as they went on, to rely wholly upon God; but they soon beheld that which did it more effectually, their enemies seized with a kind of pannic phrensy, slaughtering one another with greater fury than themselves could have done; till they were all c cut off. The plunder they found among the slain, being more than they could well carry, they only picked out the richest, which they were three days gathering *, and on the fourth, they halted at a convenient valley, to return thanks to heaven for their victory, and from that day the place was called Berachab, or Blessing (L). The army, in their return to Jerusalem, marched at the sound of musical instruments, accompanied with canticles sung by Levites, after which Jehoshaphat ended his days in peace †. Some time before his death, Abaziah, who was then king of Israel, and as impious as his father Abab, obtained his consent, to send some ships of his own to Tarsish along with his fleet; for which Jehoshaphat was severely rebuked by the prophet Eliezer, who foretold him at the same d time, the loss of that fleet, which happened accordingly; for which reason he never would let any of the ships of Israel mix with his own ‡. He died in the 60th year of his age, after he had reigned 25 years, and was succeeded by his son Jehoram. His history is said to have been written by the prophet Jehu §, which book seems to have been lost, with many others, at the captivity.

Jehoshaphat's miraculous success.

His death.

Judah and Israel immersed in idolatry.

Jehoram, who, as we observed before, had born a share in the government of Judah towards the latter end of his father's reign, did no sooner see himself alone upon the throne, than he began to undo all that his pious father had done, and to bring upon himself and his house all the curses that had been pronounced against that of his father-in-law. Judah and Israel seem now but one kingdom, and one scene e of all manner of idolatry and wickedness: they are both governed by kings of the same name; Jehoram king of Judah, is influenced by his wife Atalia, the impious daughter of Abab, and Jehoram, king of Israel, by his mother Jezebel; this walks in all the abominations of his father, and that introduces them into his own kingdom, after they had been abolished by his two predecessors; both of them bringing down the heaviest judgments from heaven; the one, by forsaking the ways of his pious father, and the other, by continuing in those of his impious one; or what was still more surprising, whilst the king of Israel did endeavour so far to reform from him, as to destroy the Phœnician idols which Abab had reared up, and

† See before, p. 290. e. * See before, p. 291. c. ‡ 2 Chron. xx. 2, & seq. ad 30. § Ibid. ver. 36, 37. comp. with 1 Kings xxii. 48, 49. ¶ 2 Chron. ubi supr. ver 31. & 34.

(L) This valley is supposed, by many Jews and Christians, to be the same which is mentioned by the prophet Joel (79), and that it will be the scene of the universal judgment (80). Others think, that the valley of Jehoshaphat, there mentioned, is between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives (81), or in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem (82); but we can see nothing in that passage, that refers either to the last judgment, or to this Valley of Blessing; and it is most likely, that by the valley of Jehoshaphat, the prophet meant no more than the literal sense of the word imports, Jehoshaphat signifying the judgment of God, which may be applied to any place where God doth inflict his judgments upon offenders of any kind.

(79) Chap. iii. 2, & 12.
de locit. & al. in loc.

(80) Vid. ABENEZER. KIMCHI. & MUNST. in loc.
(82) CYRIL. ALEX. in loc. & al.

(81) BEDA

a and contented himself with the idolatrous worship of the two golden calves<sup>2</sup>, that of Judab was adopting those very deities in his kingdom, and even in Jerusalem<sup>3</sup>. Thus whilst the former forsook the God of Israel, and the other did but imperfectly return to him, both were involved in the same guilt, and in the same punishment; with this difference however, that that of Israel is entirely cut off, with his whole posterity; whereas, in that of Judab, an infant is miraculously preserved, to make good God's promise to the house of David.

Jehoshaphat had left a numerous issue, and disposed of all his sons into several cities of Judab, under proper tutors, and with incomes suitable to their rank; but he was scarce cold in his grave, before his impious son signalized the beginning of b his reign, with an universal massacre of them, and of all the nobles of his kingdom, who either dared to oppose, or dislike his cruelty<sup>4</sup>. After this, being wholly influenced by his impious queen, he gave himself up to idolatry, and set up the worship of Baal, both in his kingdom and metropolis, in imitation of his father-in-law. For these he was severely reprov'd, by a letter sent him by Elijah, a little before his assumption; wherein that prophet likewise foretold him, among many other evils, the almost total extirpation of his posterity, and his own death by an incurable disease in his bowels<sup>5</sup>.

THE first token of the divine displeasure which he felt, was the revolt of the Edomites, who refused to pay him the usual tribute. Jehoram went out against c them, and beat them; but they soon recovered strength enough to shake off the yoke, and to set up a king of their own over them, as we have seen elsewhere<sup>6</sup>; and in so doing, they verifed Isaac's prophecy, that Esau's posterity should in time, shake off the yoke of Jacob<sup>7</sup>. At the same time, Lisnab, belonging to the priests, in the tribe of Judab<sup>8</sup>, and upon the frontiers of Idumea, revolted from Jehoram, probably to Edom, though the text says not to whom<sup>9</sup>; but these were but the preludes of the judgments that were to fall upon him. His kingdom was presently after invaded by the Philistines and Arabians, and these penetrated even to Jerusalem, and carried off all the riches of that metropolis, together with Jehoram's wives and all his sons, except only Jehoabaz, who was the youngest, d and succeeded him after his death. Jehoram was soon after seized with an incurable disease in his belly, probably a bloody flux, which lasted two years, and weakened him to such a degree, that his bowels came out, and he died with extremity of his pain. He was buried in a sepulchre by himself, probably by reason of the corruption and stench which attended his disease, and without the usual ceremony of burning spices and other odoriferous drugs about his body, or any other royal pomp. He reigned eight years<sup>10</sup>, four with his father Jehoshaphat, and the other four by himself: his disease having made him incapable of governing his kingdom, obliged him to make his son Jehoabaz, otherwise called Abaziah, viceroy, who succeeded him about a year after, and in the 12th of Jehoram, king of e Israel<sup>11</sup>.

WHILST Judab was in this dismal plight, Elisba was working wonders for Israel. We have seen elsewhere, what a miraculous cure he wrought upon Naaman, a famous general of the king of Syria, and how he discovered all the secret designs of that prince to the king of Israel<sup>12</sup>, and by that means prevented the Syrians, for some time, from succeeding in their attempts against him. But at length Benbadad came up, not by ambushes and stratagems as formerly, but with a numerous host, and besieged Samaria so close, that it began to labour under a very pinching famine; inasmuch, that an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and a small measure of pulse (M) for five. How long this siege had lasted, is not easy
to

<sup>2</sup> 2 Kings iii. 1, & seq.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid. viii. 17, & seq. & 2 Chron. xxi. 11.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid. i. & seq.

<sup>5</sup> Ibid. ver. 12, & seq.

<sup>6</sup> See before, p. 316. a.

<sup>7</sup> Gen. xxvii. 40.

<sup>8</sup> Josh. xv. 41.

<sup>9</sup> 1 Chron. vi. 57.

<sup>10</sup> 2 Kings viii. 22. 2 Chron. xxi. 10.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid. ver. 18, & seq.

<sup>12</sup> Vid.

USSER. Ann. sub A. M. 3115, & 3118. & 2 Kings viii. 25.

† See before, p. 385, & seq.

(M) As most translations have rendered the word chirionim, by doves dung, they have given commentators a vast deal of trouble to find out such an use for it, as might answer this excessive price that was given for it, that a measure which held but six eggs should sell for above eleven shillings. It were endless to mention all their various conjectures (83), we have therefore followed the learned Bochart's version (84), who proves that the word doth, among other things, signify a kind of peas, common (83) Vid. lib. LE SCENE. & Essay on a new version, pt. ii. chap. iii. § 2. A. 1. c. 7. § 7.

(84) Hierof. tom. ii.

A great famine in the land.

to guess, but what might increase this grievous famine was, that it had began a some years before in the land, inasmuch, that Elisha, who timely foresaw it, sent his kind hostels the Shunamite, of whom we shall have occasion to speak hereafter, out of the kingdom, to seek for food where she could get it, whilst himself tarried in the college of the prophets, and now and then afforded them a miraculous supply of food<sup>a</sup>, till the Syrian army forced him into the city. By this time the extremity to which Samaria was reduced, seemed either to have obliterated all the former services of that prophet to the king; or, more probably, to have rendered him suspected of being since gained over to the Syrian interest, since he suffered the city to labour under these difficulties, without interposing his miraculous power, as he had done upon other occasions. His suspicion at length broke b out with unusual fury, upon the following dreadful occasion: The king was taking a melancholy turn round the walls of the city, when a woman came to him and begged for justice against another woman, whom she had admitted to eat a share of her boiled child, upon condition, that when they had made an end of him, her own should be likewise drest to supply their common want, and who had now hid her own child, and refused to let her partake of it. Such a shocking story, accompanied with all the tokens of despair, could not but fill the distressed monarch with the utmost horror: he rent his cloaths, and discovered his flesh covered with sackcloth, and not knowing how to vent his grief otherwise, he swore, that Elisha's head should pay for the distress of the people; and sent immediately c an officer to take it off. Elisha was aware of it, and was complaining of the king's cruelty, to the elders of Israel, who were at his house just as the messenger of death was entering it. However, the prophet found means to get him stopped at the door, till the king himself appeared, and then, after he had represented to him the unreasonableness of punishing an innocent person, for a calamity which was sent from above<sup>d</sup> (N), he desired him to have but patience till next day, by which time there would be such a supply of provision in Samaria, that a bushel of fine flour should be sold for a shekel of silver, and the rest in proportion. By this means the prophet saved his life, and thought the king could scarce give credit to him, yet he thought it more adviseable to defer his resentment, till he saw the d success of this wonderful promise.

THE thing, however, happened according to his prediction. On that very night some lepers, who lodged on the outside of the gate, and were ready to die with hunger, resolved, whatever betided them, to go into the Syrian camp, in hopes to find either some lucky supply of food, or, at the worst, to be put to a speedier death than that of starving. They were surprised to find their tents full of provisions and baggage, but empty of inhabitants. As soon therefore as they had satisfied their hunger with what they found at hand, they ventured further into the camp, and found it still the same; and after they had conveyed away a considerable quantity of rich plunder, they began to blame themselves for not e acquainting the famished Samaritans with the happy news. The king, as soon as he was acquainted with the story, suspected it to be a stratagem of the Syrians,
continued

2

<sup>a</sup> Comp. 1 Kings iv. 38, & seq. with viii. 1, 2, & seq.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. vi. pass.

common in all those countries, and which the Jews in particular used to parch over the fire for food (85), in the same manner as they did their corn.

As to what we read of further, that an ass's head was sold for upwards of nine pounds of our money, though it was an unclean creature, and forbidden by the law of Moses, we must attribute the eating of it at that time, to their extreme want of provision, which in all such cases may be allowed to dispense with law.

(N) The text is somewhat obscure here; the words run literally thus (86), and behold the messenger came down unto him, and he [but whether the prophet, or the messenger, or the king, is not easy to determine] said, Lo! this judgment is from the LORD, and what, or why should I wait any longer for the LORD? They seem therefore to be the words of a man in a kind of despair, and to have been rather spoken by Jehoram, and to imply thus much, If it be true that this evil, or this famine, is sent us from the LORD, it is in vain to wait any longer for a deliverance from him. It is likely, therefore, that the king had designed, before this unnatural accident happened, to have surrendered the city to the king of Syria, and had been dissuaded from it by Elisha, with some promise of some speedy relief. Under these dreadful circumstances, therefore, he goes and upbraids him with it; Has God, said he, reduced us to such extremity, that mothers are forced to eat their children, and wouldst thou still flatter me with vain hopes of some relief, till all my subjects are perished with hunger and misery, when I might, and ought to have saved their lives by a timely surrender? Whereupon the prophet appoints the precise time of their despaired of deliverance to be on the very next day.

(85) Ibid. 2 Sam. xvii. 28. & HIERON. in loc.

(86) 1 Kings vi. ver. ult.

<sup>a</sup> contrived to intice him out of the city ; but upon his sending a party to examine further into the matter, he found, that they were really fled with the utmost precipitation, and had left their tents, horses, and richest baggage behind them ; The siege for, on the foregoing night, the Lord caused them to hear an extraordinary noise raised. of chariots, horses, and armour, which made them conclude, that Jebeoram had hired the kings of Egypt, and other neighbouring nations against them*. This spread such an univerſal panic through the whole camp, that they did not ſo much as ſtay to mount their horses, but fled in the utmoſt confuſion on foot ; leaving, beſides an immenſe variety of rich plunder, ſuch a quantity of provisions A great plenty behind them, that a meaſure of fine flour was ſold for a ſhekel, and the reſt in in Samaria. proportion, at the gate of Samaria, according to the word of Eliſha. At the ſame time a nobleman, who had ventured to declare againſt the poſſibility of ſuch an unexpected plenty, and had been answered by the prophet, that he ſhould ſee it without taſting of it, was appointed by the king to ſtand at the gate of the city, to prevent any diſorders, and was, notwithſtanding his care, trod to death by the preſs, and verified Eliſha's prophecy<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> Soon after this unexpected deliverance, the prophet, whether out of diſcontent, or by divine impulse, took the way to Damaſcus, where the king lay ſick, being quite exhausted through old age, fatigues, and diſappointments. What the deſign and reſult of that viſit was, the reader may ſee in the hiſtory of Syria<sup>k</sup>. In the mean time the king of Iſrael entertained himſelf during his abſence, with recital of his wonderful actions, from the mouth of his ſervant Gebazi (O) ; who, among other things, was giving him an account of his raiſing the child of his Shunamitisſh hoſteſs to life (P), and of his ſending her and her family to ſeek their bread out of

* See before, p. 387. c.

† 2 Kings vii. paſſ.

* Ibid. viii. 1, &amp; ſeq.

(O) This ſervant, we read, two or three chapters before, had, for his covetouſneſs, inherited Naaman's leproſy (87), which was, according to Eliſha's word, to ſtick to him as long as he lived, and ſuch perſons were obliged to live apart from the reſt. It is therefore ſomewhat ſurprizing, that the king of Iſrael would converſe with a man whom the meanſt perſon in the kingdom would have carefully avoided. All that can be ſaid to it, is, either that he was made to ſtand at a convenient diſtance, and with his mouth covered ; or that the king's curioſity made him overlook ſuch nice circumſtances at that particular juncture.

(P) The occaſion of this miracle was as follows: The woman, who was rich and childleſs, having obſerved the prophet to paſs very often by her houſe, as he went through the city of Shunem, prevailed upon her husband to build him a bed-chamber, and to put a bed, table, and candleſtick in it, and to invite him to lodge there as often as he pleaſed. Eliſha, deſirous to gratify them for their hoſpitality, asked his ſervant what he might do for them ; and being answered that they had no children, he called the woman, and told her, that in due time ſhe ſhould embrace a ſon, as a reward of her kindneſs to him. She was accordingly brought to bed of a child ; and when he was grown big enough to go and divert himſelf with reapers, he was one day brought home ſick, and expired about noon in his mother's arms. As ſoon as he was dead, ſhe laid him on the prophet's bed, and made what haſte ſhe could to mount Carmel, where he then was ; and as ſoon as ſhe came in ſight of him, ſhe fell at his feet, and acquainted him with her ſon's death. Eliſha, ſurprized that the Lord had not revealed this accident to him, gave Gebazi his ſtaff, and bid him run with all poſſible ſpeed, and lay it upon the dead child ; but the woman, not daring to truſt to that, embraced his legs, and begged that he would come with her, which he readily complied with. The ſervant, however, was got to the houſe long before his maſter, and had laid the ſtaff upon the child, but without any ſucceſs. At length the prophet went up himſelf, and laid himſelf upon the child, mouth to mouth, calling ſtill upon God to reſtore him to his ſorrowful mother, which he at length obtained ; and whiſt ſhe received him with a maternal joy, ſhe owned that ſhe was now more than ever convinced that he was indeed a prophet, and that the words of truth were in his mouth (68).

During the famine, one of the prophet's widows came to Eliſha, and complained, that her husband died in debt, and that her two ſons were now upon the brink of being ſeized, and ſold by the mercileſs creditor. The prophet, moved with compaſſion, and unable to aſſiſt her any other way than by a miracle, asked her what ſhe had in her houſe that could be turned into money ; and being answered, that ſhe had nothing left but a poor cruſe of oil, he bid her go and borrow as many veſſels of her neighbours as ſhe could, and to fill them out of the cruſe ; which ſhe did, and the oil did not ceaſe flowing out of it, till ſhe had filled all the other veſſels. Eliſha then bid her ſell as much of it as would pay the debt, and keep the reſt for her own uſe †.

After this, Eliſha tarried ſome time in Gilgal with the reſt of the prophets ; and having one day ordered ſome pottage to be made for them, one of the ſervants went to gather a lapful of herbs, and inadvertently cut ſome wild gourd, or night-ſhade, among them ; as ſoon as they had taſted it, they cried out, that death was in the pot ; but when he was apprized of it, he cauſed ſome meal to be thrown into the pottage ; after which, they eat it without fear or danger (89).

At another time, a man having brought him a preſent of firſt-fruits, being twenty barley-loaves, and ſome new parched corn, Eliſha bid his ſervant to ſet it before the company, who were about one hundred of the kingdom, during the seven years of famine. He had scarce made an end of the story, when the woman herself came, in a lucky hour, to petition the king for her land, which had been confiscated during her absence, and gave Gebazi, who presently called her to mind, an opportunity of being both evidence and advocate for her. So many favourable circumstances could not but render her suit successful; but the king did even grant her more than she asked, and ordered an officer to accompany her, and see that she had not only her land, but likewise the seven years income of it refunded to her<sup>1</sup>.

(87) Ibid. v. ver. ult. (88) Ibid. iv. 8, &amp; ſeq. † Ibid. ver. 1, 2, &amp; ſeq. (89) Ibid. ver. 38, &amp; ſeq.

Jehoram's second expedition against Ramoth.

By this time, Hazael having murdered Benbadad, and invaded his throne, according to the word of Elisba, Jehoram, who was then at peace with the king of Judab, thought it a favourable juncture to try his fortune against Ramoth-Gilead, b which his father had attempted in vain. He sent at the same time to Abaziah, who had succeeded his father in Judab, and invited him to accompany him in that enterprize. Abaziah, who was then but twenty-two years of age (Q), being the youngest of all his brethren, who had been carried away captive in his father's days, was wholly conducted by his mother Ataliab, and by such counsellors as she pleased to appoint to him. And as he followed all the impious ways of his father, he made no difficulty to enter into a confederacy with the king of Israel. This expedition seemed at first more successful than the former; but in the event it proved the fatal source of endless misfortunes to Israel, by giving Hazael an occasion of exercising all those cruelties which had been foretold by Elisba. Neither c did it prove less fatal to Jehoram; the city was indeed taken, but himself was so desperately wounded in the attack, that he was forced to return to Jezreel to be cured, leaving Jebu at the head of a number of forces to secure the place, whilst the king of Judab probably returned to Jerusalem. In the mean time, Elisba sent one of the young prophets to Ramoth, where he ordered him to anoint Jebu king of Israel privately, and to tell him, that he was appointed by God to execute his vengeance against the whole race of Abab, even to the impious Jezebel, whose carcass should shortly be devoured by dogs, whilst all the rest of his family were condemned to perish by his sword. The prophet had no sooner executed his commission, and poured the oil upon his head, than he fled out of the tent with all d speed, to avoid being examined about it. When Jebu came out, the officers that were with him asked him what business that mad fellow had been transacting with him (R); and as soon as he had acquainted them with the secret, they all paid their homage to him, and proclaimed him king of Israel by sound of the trumpet. But Jebu did not think it proper to have the conspiracy known, till he had reached Jezreel, and surprized the wounded king there, before he could be in a condition to oppose him; he therefore told them, that if their hearts went with their mouths, they should suffer none to get out of Ramoth, to go and acquaint the king with the news, whilst he rode with all speed at the head of his men to Jezreel, which he did immediately after. As soon as he came within sight of the place, the watch, hundred in number. The servant hesitated some time, thinking it insufficient for such a multitude; but, upon his telling him that there would be more than enough for them, he obeyed, and found it even as his master had said; for they all eat their fill, and left some of it remaining (90).

He is wounded there.

Jehu anointed.

<sup>1</sup> 2 Kings viii. 15. See USSEK. Ann. sub A. M. 3120.

(Q) The book of the Chronicles makes him to have began his reign in the 42d year of his age; but that is allowed to be an error †, unless we will understand those 42 years not of his age, but of the time which had elapsed from Omer's coming to the crown, to the reign of Abaziah, as Tremellius doth, which amount just to that number (91).

(R) The Jews rightly observe, that there was something in the looks and gestures of these prophets, which made them pass for mad-men among those who did not know them ‡; which is agreeable enough to what we read of Saul, who lay uncovered a whole day, whilst the spirit was upon him (92). But what might still add to the uncommonness of their figure and behaviour, was the oddness of their dress, their living by themselves, and seldom appearing in places of public resort, but upon some extraordinary errand; which often proved of a dangerous nature, and put them under some dread whilst they went about it. Such was this, in particular, which made the young prophet run away with such speed, before any one could know it, but the person to whom he delivered it.

The text adds, that Jebu's company took off their upper garments, and laid them under him, to raise him up above the rest, whilst they paid homage to him. The place where this is said to be done, was upon the top of the stairs (93), which, according to the same Jews, being out of the house, served also for a sun-dial; the degrees of the shadow being marked against the wall (94), to shew the hours of the day (95).

(90) Ibid. xlii. ad fin. † See before, p. 736. d. (91) Vid. TREMEL. in 2 Chron. xxi. 1. ‡ Ibid. p. 731. c. (92) 1 Sam. xix. ult. vid. sup. p. 765. e. (93) Vid. MUNST. in 2 Reg. ix. sub not. 1. (94) Ibid. ver. 13. (95) Chald. Paraph. KIMCH. & al. vid. & MUNST. ubi sup.

a watch, alarmed at the sight of a troop that drove with such uncommon speed, acquainted the court with it; and the frightened king sent two messengers successively, to enquire whether they came peaceably or not. But Jebu having made them both turn behind his chariot, and the centinel having acquainted the king with it, he sent word of it to the king of Judab, who was come to visit him, and these two went with their guard against Jebu, who by that time was known by the centinel, by the furiousness of his driving. The place where they met one another was the vineyard for which Naboth had lost his life; and here Jeboram asked him, whether he came peaceably: but Jebu soon gave him proof of the contrary, by upbraiding him with his, and his mother Jezebel's murders and idolatries, and by putting himself in an hostile posture against him. The frightened monarch cried out in vain to Abaziah, that they were betrayed; before he could turn his chariot about to avoid his enemy, Jebu pierced his heart with an arrow, The kings of Israel and Judah killed by him. and ordered one of his captains to cast his body in Naboth's field, there to be devoured, according to the word of Elijah. At the same time, the king of Judab, frightened at this bloody tragedy, endeavoured to avoid sharing his brother's fate, by flying through the private road that lead to the garden-house; but Jebu commanded a party of his men to ride after him, which they did, and having overtaken him at the ascent of Gur, they gave him so many desperate wounds, that he died of them by that time he had reached the city of Megiddo, and was carried to Jerusalem and buried with his ancestors, having reigned one year, and leaving only one son, a child, who afterwards succeeded him, when he was yet but seven years of age.

WHILST Jebu's men went in pursuit of Abaziah, Jebu himself marched directly towards the royal palace of Jezebel, where Jezebel, the queen mother, who was by that time informed of her son's fate, was waiting to give him such a haughty welcome, as did not well suit with her present circumstances; but she hoped, perhaps, that he would shew some regard, if not to her quality, yet at least to her sex; perhaps also did she think, that she had still charms enough, in spite of her years, to captivate the new monarch, especially after she had improved them by art, and with the richest ornaments. She was looking out of a window when Jebu entered the palace; and, in a haughty tone, asked him, whether he expected a milder recompence of his rebellion, than his predecessor Zimri had formerly met with. Jebu stayed not to give her an answer, but observing some eunuchs standing d on each side, he commanded them to throw her out of the window, which they did, and in the fall, some of her blood was dashed against the wall, and her body soon after trampled to death, by the horses that were in his retinue. Jezebel killed. As soon as he and his company had refreshed themselves in the palace, he gave orders to some of Jezebel's servants to go and bury her corps, seeing she was of the royal blood; but when word was brought to him, that the dogs had devoured it all except her skull, the palms of her hands, and the soles of her feet, he made use of that circumstance, to convince his attendants of the truth of Elijah's prophecy<sup>m</sup>.

BUT that prophet's sentence did not stop at these three impious persons, the whole race of Abab was included in it, and he had left seventy sons who were all brought up under governors in Samaria. Jebu, therefore, did not think fit to enter into that capital, till he had tried whether the chief magistrates of it had courage enough to undertake any thing for the posterity of their late king. To this end, he sent letters to them, seemingly to exhort them to make choice of one of the bravest of Abab's sons, and to set him upon the throne. But they, who did rightly guess at the meaning of such a message, and were but too much intimidated by his late success against the kings of Judab and Israel, chose rather to sacrifice that unhappy race to Jebu's known valour, than to run the risk of turning it against themselves. They therefore sent a deputation to him, to acquaint f him, that they would do nothing but by his commands, which they were ready to execute, as soon as they should receive them; whereupon, he sent them an order to put all the young princes to death, and to bring their heads in baskets to him by the next day; which was punctually complied with. The bloody present of seventy heads was sent to Jezebel on that very night; and Jebu ordered them to be laid on heaps at the gate of Samaria; and on the next morning, 70 sons of Ahab killed. the the elders of that city came, and presented themselves before him there. As soon <sup>a</sup> as he saw them, he spake to them to this effect: "You do, in all probability, look upon me as the sole author of all this bloodshed, as the murderer of your late king, and the usurper of his throne; but if I conspired against Jehoram, did not you murder all these young princes, in whose defence you might have stood, if you had thought fit. Know ye therefore, that neither you nor I have done more than executed the sentence which had been pronounced against Abab's posterity. But I have not yet finished my task, as long as there remain any of his kinsmen, counsellors, priests, or any of the abettors of his crimes." This was his next work, and he did not leave Jezreel till he had put them all to death.

<sup>m</sup> 1 Kings ix. pass.

Jehu took then the road to Samarina, and in his way he met forty-two princes of the house of Judab (S), who were going down to pay a visit to those of the house of Abab, all whom he also caused to be slain upon the spot. After this, he met with Jehonadab the son of Rechab (T), and took him up into his chariot

2

to

(S) The text calls them the brethren of Abaziah (96), but we have often observed, that it means also brother's children; and these are called so, accordingly, by the author of the Chronicles (97). The place where they were slain, is called in the original בֵּית הַבֵּתֶל bet beth-betel, or, the pit of the house for binding or shearing; which was either a place of sheep-shearing, or, as some fancy, took its name from the young princes being bound and put to death there (98). It is not unlikely, neither, from the text, that they, having heard of the slaughter that had been made in Samarina, and that Jehu was going thither in person, might hide themselves, either in that pit, or in some of the shepherds huts, to avoid falling into his hands.

(T) The Rechabites, so famous in Scripture for the austere singularity of their life, were not content to excel in common moral virtues, but affected to distinguish themselves from the rest of the world, by a peculiar abstinence from wine, from dwelling in houses, from possessing either houses, vineyards, or fields, and from all kind of agriculture (99).

Who the author of this institution was, whether the Jehonadab here mentioned, or any other either before or after him, is far from being agreed. If we may believe a modern critic (100), he hath found the etymon of rechab in the רֶכֶב rekab, or chariot of Elijah; and that of the harisites, his supposed disciples, in the פֶּרָאִשִׁים perashim, or horses of it (1). So that, according to him, the words of Elisha should not be rendered as we do, My father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horses thereof; but, My father Rechab, &c. or, at least, the former called themselves Rechabites, from the rechab, chariot; and the latter from the perashim, or horses of it. Pursuant to this, our author observes, that when Josiah, king of Israel, came to visit Elisha as he lay on his death-bed, he addressed him likewise in the same words, My father, the chariot of Israel, and so on (2). He even ventures to prove that institution older than the flood; which, allowing his far-fetched etymology, will be no difficult task, if we can but suppose that Enoch was translated in the same kind of vehicle (3).

On the other hand, another bold critic (4) pretends, that it did not begin till about the time of Jeremiah, and that this Jehonadab, for whom Jehu shewed such regard, was only a person of the same name with the founder of that Rechabite life; and that he was too great a courtier, and too fine a gentleman, to be author of such an unpolite institution. What he offers to prove the one, and disprove the other of these points, having more of oratorical confidence, than solid reasoning, we shall not trouble our readers with it. Sure it is, that those Rechabites, whom Jeremiah speaks of, express themselves in such terms, as argue nothing less than the recentness of their institution (5).

Between the extremes of those two above-mentioned authors, are those who believe that Habab, the son of Jethro, of whom we have spoken elsewhere, as he was a Kenite †, was the founder of the Rechabites; that Rechab was one of his names, and Jehonadab one of his descendants; and lastly, that Heber the Kenite was also an observer of the Rechabite institution (6). Serrarius is of the same opinion in most of these points, but distinguishes two sorts of Rechabites; the one instituted by Jethro, or Habab, and the other by Jehonadab (7); but all this is said without foundation. We shall say nothing of those who pretend that they were either of the tribe of Judab (8), or of that of Levi (9); or that they were Rechabites, or descendants of Jethro, by the father's side, and Levites by the mother's; and, as such, that they were employed in much the same offices of the temple with the Nethinims (10). It is plain, the author of the book of the Chronicles calls them Kenites, descended from Kemath, the father of the house of Rechab (11); though it doth not appear that all the Kenites observed the institution of Jehonadab, but only those who were his immediate descendants.

For these reasons, we rather chuse the most received opinion, that Jehonadab, Jehu's friend, was the founder of it, he being the only one of that name mentioned in the Scripture, and nothing urged on any hand that can give any of the contrary opinions the face of probability. Jehu's behaviour to him, and his inviting him to be an eye-witness of his zeal for the God of Israel, and of the havoc he was going to make among the worshippers of Baal, argues him to have been an eminent person, not only for sense and virtue, but also for his uncommon piety and zeal; and, as such, he might have fallen into this new life, and enjoined the observance of it to his posterity, perhaps, through some disgust which he took at court, or at the idolatries of the Israelites, which made it needful to separate from them, (96) 2 Kings x. 13. (97) 2 Chron. xxii. 8. (98) Vid. TREVELL in 2 Kings x. 12. (99) Jer. xxxv. 6, 7. (100) J. BOLDUC. Eccles. ant. Leg. l. iii. c. 16. (1) 2 Kings ii. 11. (2) Ibid. xiii. 14. (3) Gen. v. 24. (4) SCALIG. Elench. Tribares. Vid. GOODWIN Mos. & Aer. lib. i. c. 9. § 23, & seq. (5) Jerem. ubi sup. ver. 8, & seq. † Vid. sup. p. 301. (6) Vid. in. al. ARR. MONTAN. in judic. 1. SNACTION. in Jerem. xxxv. MINERVA. cap. 13, & seq. (7) SERRAR. l. iii. c. 9. (8) THEODORET. in 1. Paralip. (9) HEGESIP. ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccles. l. 2. c. 23. Vid. CALMET. sub m. Rechabite. (10) Rabbim. alig. ap. SANCTION. & CORNEL. in Jerem. xxxv. (11) 1 Chron. ii. 15.

a to Samaria, that he might be an eye-witness of his zeal against the impious worshippers of Baal.

As soon as he was come to that capital, he caused a solemn feast to be proclaimed, pretending a much greater zeal for that deity, than any of his predecessors; and ordered all its priests, prophets, and votaries, to be present at it, none excepted, under pain of death; and as soon as they had filled the temple with them, from the one end to the other, he commanded a body of men to go in, and put them all to the sword, in the middle of their worship. After this, he took down all the idols and ornaments of that abominable deity, and burnt them out of the temple, and caused that building to be demolished, and turned into a common jakes.

Baal's priests and temple destroyed.

b But his metropolis was not the only place that had reared temples and altars to Baal, for the infection had spread itself throughout the kingdom; wherefore he did not stop his hand till he had entirely cleared it of that kind of idolatry; and this he did with such zeal and diligence, that God, highly pleased with it, sent him word by a prophet, that the kingdom of Israel should remain in his posterity till them, by living in the pure and unstained country, to avoid the danger of being either corrupted by them, or hated for not being so. The Aenites not being of the seed of Israel, many broils and disputes might have arisen between them about the possession of lands, which might make him disclaim even the use and culture of them. The almost continual depredations to which Israel was exposed from their enemies round about, to say nothing of famine and pestilence, made the pastoral life seem to him much more eligible; because, in such cases, it was more easy to remove into better or safer abodes, in imitation of the antient patriarchs. Wine was of too enervating a nature, and might, in time, have tempted his descendants into a looser and more luxurious life; for which reason, he thought it necessary to forbid the use of it. Lastly, whatever other private motives might determine him to that kind of primitive life, he seems chiefly to endear it to his descendants by the prospect of health, ease, and length of days (12). How far the horrid debauchery, both in religion and morals, which reigned as well in Judah as in Israel for a considerable time, to say nothing of the frequent conspiracies and rebellions which happened in the latter of those kingdoms, might contribute to determine, if not to force a man of his character to this kind of retired life, we need not say.

The question will only be, how he could bind his posterity to the observance of it. But here we need not repeat what has been said upon other occasions, concerning the power of parents in cases of the like nature*, because we do not find that Jehonadab did lay them under any curse, in case of disobedience; on the contrary, we find that the prophet Jeremy was directed by God to bring them to an apartment of the temple, to set wine before them, and invite them to drink it; which would have been an unworthy action, if they had been under an indispensable obligation of abstaining from it; and, on the other hand, the Rechabites refused it; not because their father had laid them under any curse if they disobeyed him, but because he promised that they should live many days in the land wherein they were strangers, if they obeyed his voice (13); which promise being also made to those who honoured their parents (14), might the more incline them to that strict obedience, for which they are so highly commended by God in the place above quoted. We may add farther, that their retiring into Jerusalem during the time of the siege, which was a breach of the injunction, without being so much as blamed for it by Jeremiah; is a proof that they were not under an indispensable obligation to live in tents, and in the country. Though even here we think it had been much better for them to have removed further out of Nebuchadnezzar's way, instead of sheltering themselves in the city; where they not only suffered all the common calamities of a long siege, but were, in all likelihood, carried away captive with the tribe of Judah; for we find some of them, at their return from Babylon, who settled themselves at Jabez or Jabez (15); and the Septuagint and Vulgate have these words in the title of the lxxth, which is our lxxixth psalm; A psalm of David to the sons of Jonadab, and the first captives; but as they are not in the Hebrew, we shall lay no farther stress upon them.

What became of them afterwards, whether they continued to observe their father's injunction, and whether the Pharisees, Assidees, and Essenians were their followers, is foreign to our present purpose, and may, perhaps, be inquired into, when we resume the Jewish history after the captivity. It is true, the Rechabites had a promise from God, as a reward of their obedience, in these words; Jehonadab, the son of Rechab, shall not want a man to stand before me for ever (16). But this phrase is far from implying, that they were either priests or Levites, and, as such, should continually minister at the altar, as some have fancied (17); or that they should have a seat in the great sanhedrim (18), which we have proved, elsewhere, was not yet in being†. The reader will see some better explications of the words, in the authors quoted in the margin (19), which is out of our province to dwell upon. Sure it is, that if our Jehonadab was the founder of this institution, his descendants did strictly observe it during the space of 300 years, whatever became of them afterwards; for so long it was between Jehu and the Babylonish captivity. A Jewish traveller of the 12th century (20), doth indeed tell us, that they are still in being, and strict observers of their old institution. He gives us also a fine description of their country, princes, government, and other particulars; but that author is so well known to deal in fables, and the account itself is so fully confuted by the learned Constantine L'empereur, that we shall leave it to his Jewish brethren to credit it, without giving our readers the trouble of reading it here.

(12) *Jer. ubi sup. ver. 7. Vid. PETER. MARTYR. ALTING. R. D. KIMCHI. & al. in lo. * Vid. sup. p. 631. c. & 751. not. O.* (13) Vid. Jerem. ubi sup. (14) Exod. xx. 12, & alib. (15) 1 Chron. ii. ubi. (16) Jerem. ubi sup. ver. ult. (17) THEODOR. & al. sub citat. (18) Vid. KIMCHI, in loc. † Vid. sup. p. 525. not. H. (19) Vid. SCALIG. Titbaref. c. xxv. ALTING. GOODWIN. ubi sup. & al. (20) BEN. de TUDEL. Itinerar. p. 75, & seq.

till the fourth generation. Happy had it been for him, if this promise had encouraged him to have extirpated likewise the worship of the golden calves of Dan and Betbel; but he unhappily followed Jeroboam's politicks as long as he lived; for which reason, God began to cut Israel short, even from the beginning of his reign, so that Hazaël greatly prevailed against them, and took a great number of towns from the two tribes and half on the other side Jordan, besides some other frontier places on this side, and ravaged all the places he came to, putting all the inhabitants to the sword in the most inhuman manner (V), as we have seen in the Syrian history †. Jebu died in the 28th year of his reign, and was buried in Samarina, and was succeeded by his son *Jebobaz*ⁿ and slaughter of David's race.

Athaliah's impious reign;

Joash is preserved;

WHILST Jebu was abolishing the worship of Baal in Israel, the impious Athaliah was using her utmost efforts to root out, not only that of the living God, but even the remembrance of it, out of Judah. The death of her son Abaziah, and of forty-two princes of his house, followed by that of Jezebel, by the hands of a person newly raised to the throne of Israel by divine command, filled her with such an abhorrence both for the race, and the God of David, that she resolved not to sheath her sword, till she had totally extirpated the one, and thereby invalidated all the promises of the other. But whilst she was wreaking her utmost fury against the sad remains of the house of Judah, providence conducted thither Jezebel's daughter of the late king Joram, who was then married to the high-priest *Jeboiada*⁰; and that pious princess found means to save young Joash, her brother Abaziah's son, who was then but a year old, from Athaliah's sword, and to convey him and his nurse out of the palace, unperceived by that bloody queen. This infant prince was carried into the temple, where he was brought up under Jeboiada's care, and kept there with the utmost privacy till he was seven years old. During those six years Athaliah tyrannized over Judah without controul, filling Jerusalem with blood, and destroying the servants of the true God, that she might the more effectually establish the worship of Baal through the kingdom. By this time, her murders and impieties were grown to such an height, that Jeboiada saw himself forced to put a stop to them, by producing the only remains of David's race, at once to convince the people that God was still mindful of his promise to that holy monarch, by preserving him, as it were by a miracle, from the common ruin; and to inspire his desponding subjects with a brave desire of shaking off the bloody yoke of the reigning tyranness. To this end, he privately called some of the chiefs and elders of Judah, upon whose valour and fidelity he could depend, and having bound them under the strictest oaths of secrecy, he shewed them the young monarch; told them by what means he had been saved; and exhorted them to stand now, if ever, in the defence of their young king, of their religion and liberty. The desponding chiefs, who thought that the cruel Athaliah had wholly extirpated David's race, and had lost all farther hopes in the promises made to his posterity, received the news of their preserved king with a surprising joy; and, to give him an immediate proof of their future zeal and attachment, they paid their homage, and took an oath of fidelity to him, promising the high-priest at the same time, that they would go out of hand, and raise what forces they could, whilst he strengthened himself in the temple, by retaining and arming all the priests, Levites, and Netbinims, who should otherwise have gone out in their courses, to make way for those who came thither to vacate at the divine service. All this was done with such secrecy and dispatch, that the temple was filled with armed men, unto whom Jeboiada appointed their several posts; by which time, the generals without had raised a sufficient number of men, ready to second them upon the first signal. When the day appointed was come, the young monarch f was brought out, and conducted into the priests porch, attended with a numerous train

† See before, p. 388. b.

ⁿ 2 Kings x. per tot.

⁰ Comp. 2 Kings xi. 2. 3 Chron. xxii. 10.

(V) It is not easy to guess at what period of Jehu's reign this cruel war happened; Usher doth make no mention of it till the time of his son (21), but we have ventured to place it nearer the beginning of the former, both here and in the Syrian history (22), which is according to the chronology of our Bibles; for though God had promised, that the crown of Israel should continue in his family during four generations, as a reward for his zeal against Baal; yet he did not promise him a quiet reign, and his continuing in Jeroboam's idolatry made him unworthy of it, however it might have proved if he had abolished that also out of his kingdom.

a train of armed Levites, and there the high-priest anointed and crowned him, and administred the usual oath to him upon the sacred volumes. He was immediately after seated upon a throne, where he received the homage and loud acclamations of all the people, who made that sacred place ring with, Let us live king Joash. and crowned.

AMONG the numerous crouds, whom this noise brought to the temple, was the frightened queen; but whether alone, or attended with her guard, the text doth not say. She ventured directly into the priests porch, from which her sex and idolatry excluded her, and as soon as she saw the young king seated on his throne, attended with such numbers of armed men; she rent her cloaths, and, in a desperate fury, rushed in amongst them, crying out treason; but Jeboiada, fearing lest his zealous b Levites should pollute that sacred place with her blood, ordered her to be hurried out of it, and to be put to death. The king was soon after conducted from the temple to the royal palace, and the news of this happy change proclaimed throughout the kingdom. The high-priest, who by this time was in the highest esteem, both with king and people, took hold of this happy juncture of the public joy, to root out once more the worship of Baal; he began with exhorting them to renew their covenant with God, to renounce Baal, and all other false deities, and to adhere strictly to the Lord. This was also immediately performed with uncommon readiness and zeal; and as a mark of their sincerity, they began with the temple of Baal, where having sacrificed Matban, the infamous priest of it, at the foot of its altar, they pulled the whole fabrick to the ground; nor did they stop their

c hand, till they had likewise destroyed all the other temples, altars, and other monuments of that idolatrous worship, which Athaliah and her predecessors had reared up, both in Jerusalem and Judab. On the other hand, Jeboiada, who by reason of the king's minority, was at the head of all affairs, both religious and civil, was making a new reformation at court and in the temple, by naming those who had shewed the greatest bravery and zeal in the late revolution, to the highest posts in the government, instead of those of the late usurper; and by restoring that regularity in the divine service, which had been interrupted during the reigns of so many impious monarchs; but more particularly by an express prohibition to all

d strangers, and idolatrous apostates, to enter into the temple of God, and by setting porters at the gates of it, to prevent all unclean persons, of what kind soever, entering into it. This gives us reason to suppose, that it had been exposed to such secluded persons, during the last reigns.

THUS did the divine providence preserve the race of David from the brink of destruction; and Joash, who was proclaimed king in the 7th year of his age, and of Jebu's reign, continued to testify his grateful sense of it, by his uncommon zeal for the worship of God, during the good high-priest's life. One of his first cares, after he was come to age, was to repair the dilapidations which had been made in the temple. To this end, he ordered the priests and Levites to take their yearly e circuits through all the cities of Judab, and to raise voluntary contributions among the people, besides the pole and redemption money (W); to be employed in finishing of those repairs. But the priests, who looked upon the latter as an encroachment upon their revenues, executed his orders with such shameful slowness, that he was forced to send for them, and to reprove them for their negligence, and for their misapplying of the sacred money; and to discharge them at once, both from the repairing of the temple, and from receiving any further sums towards it. The whole care of the work was committed to the high-priest, and other proper officers; and to prevent all further delays and misapplication, a capacious chest was ordered to be set up in some public place in the temple, where the f money was deposited, till it amounted to a sum sufficient to set about the work; which it very shortly did, through the generosity of the chiefs, elders, and other wealthy men of Judab, who poured in their presents with uncommon readiness and munificence.

¶ 2 Kings xi. pass. 2 Chron. xxiii. pass.

(W) The pole-money is supposed to have been the half-shekel which every soul was obliged to pay, first to the tabernacle, and afterwards to the temple, which continued to be paid till the destruction of it. As for the redemption-money, it was such as was to be paid to the priests; either to be acquitted from certain oaths or vows, or for exchanging one beast for another, and such like; of which we have spoken at large heretofore. This latter was certainly one part of the priest's income, which the king had no power to alienate from them, unless it were by way of reprisal for the former, namely, pole-money, which ought to have been employed in keeping the temple in repair; and which, it seems, they sunk into their own pockets, leaving that building to go to ruin.

science. This money was immediately distributed among faithful workmen, who <sup>a</sup> carried on the work with so much uprightness and diligence, that without being called to any account for the sums they received from time to time, they finished it to the satisfaction both of the king and people, and refunded the overplus into the king's hands. This, together with what was left in the chest, was by Jeboiada's direction, employed in making gold and silver vessels for the use of the temple, such as censers, trumpets, spoons, forks, and the like (X), instead of those which Athaliah had conveyed from thence into the temple of Baal<sup>a</sup>. But Joash's zeal did not long survive Jeboiada's life. That good old priest died in the 130th year of his age, and for his faithful counsel, as well as signal services to the king and nation, was buried in the royal sepulchre of Jerusalem, and with him seemed to expire the remembrance of all that he had done. Soon after his death, the base princes (Y) of Judah, tired with dissembling a zeal for God, which that pontiff's authority had only forced from them, came and prostrated themselves before the king, desiring that they might have leave to return to the old way of worship, which they had been used to in former reigns; which the easy king, pleased, perhaps, with their uncommon submission, having too readily granted, they immediately forsook the temple and worship of God, and set up new altars to those filthy idols which they had formerly been used to worship in their groves, with the most abominable ceremonies. This ungrateful defection, after so signal a deliverance, was not however punished, till they had been often forewarned by several <sup>c</sup> prophets, of the mischiefs which it would bring upon them. But when they proved deaf to all those divine admonitions, God stirred up the Syrian king against them, who began to pour some small number of troops into the land, and to commit severe outrages in Judea, whilst the cowardly Jews, though much superior in number, were delivered into their hands, as a punishment for their idolatry<sup>a</sup>. Among those prophets who dared to reprove the king and his nobles, and to assure them, that these would prove only the preludes of worse mischiefs, was the high-priest Zechariah, the worthy son and successor of the late Jeboiada; but his zeal cost him his life. The impious king caused him to be stoned to death in the very court of the temple, without regard to either the sacredness of the place, or of his character, as <sup>d</sup> a prophet and high-priest, or to the great services of his father, to whom he owed both his life and kingdom. However, Zechariah being full of the spirit of God, foretold to them, as he was dying, that God would speedily punish the murder upon the king and them, both which happened soon after accordingly: for Hazael, flushed with the success he had had against Judah, and with the vast quantity of spoil which he had sent from thence to Damascus, came up against Jerusalem, and made a terrible slaughter among those Jewish princes, who had been the first authors of that defection. The king himself found no other way to escape, either sharing of their fate, or a shameful slavery, but by stripping the temple and his own palace of all their treasure, and giving it as a ransom to the Syrian conqueror, who thereupon left Jerusalem, and returned to Damascus<sup>a</sup>. Joash, however, did not escape the divine vengeance, and though he then laboured under some grievous disease, his own servants conspired against him, and murdered him in his bed, in the 40th year of his reign, and crowned his son Amasiah in his stead. Joash was by this time in such abhorrence for the murder of the high-priest, that it proved not only the occasion of his own, but also of his being deprived of the royal sepulchre; for though he was buried in the city of David, yet the text says, that

Joash and his chiefs forsake God.

Zechariah is slain.

The king of Syria invades Judah.

Joash is murdered.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. 2 Chron. xxiv. 7, 13, 14. <sup>b</sup> Ibid. ver. 24: <sup>c</sup> Comp. 2 Kings xii. pass. & 2 Chron. xxiv. pass. See also before, p. 388. e.

(X) There seems to be a contradiction between the book of Kings, and that of the Chronicles; the former tells us, that none of this money was employed in making vessels for the temple (23), and the latter affirms the contrary (24), but the matter is easily reconciled, by supposing that the first means only, that none of that money was used to those purposes till the repairs of the temple, for which it was raised, were fully finished.

(Y) The author of the book of Chronicles calls them by that name (25), not as being of the royal blood, for those had been all destroyed by Athaliah, so that there were none then alive but Joash's children; but here is meant only the chief of the families of that tribe, which, as well as those of the other tribes, are often disguised with that title (26).

(23) 2 Kings xii. 13. (24) 2 Chron. xxiv. 7, 14: Numb. vii. 2, & seq. xxv. 14. & alib. pass.

(25) Ibid. ver. 17. (26) Vid. inter al.

a that they did not deposit his body in the sepulchre of his ancestors, but in some place a-part <sup>1</sup>.

Amasiab succeeded him in the twenty-fifth year of his age, by which time Jeboabaz, the son of Jebu, having reigned 17 years in Israel, had left the kingdom to his son Joash. During this time, nothing considerable had happened in that kingdom, except that their idolatries had also exposed them to the cruel oppressions of the king of Syria, till Jeboabaz's repentance and prayer obtained a kind of miraculous deliverance <sup>2</sup>; for the fuller account of which, we shall refer the reader to a former chapter †. What happened during his son's reign, we shall see in its proper place; in the mean time, the young king of Judah had no sooner

Joash succeeded by Amasiab.

Year of the Flood, 2160, Year before Christ, 839.

b settled himself upon his throne, than he caused the murderers of his father to be put to death. However, it is here observed, that he spared their children, accordingly to the law of Moses, which forbids them to be punished for their father's crimes <sup>3</sup>; from which one may reasonably suppose, that all his predecessors were not equally strict observers of it. The truth is, that Amasiab had seen such severe judgments inflicted upon Joash his father, and his apostate chiefs, as made him a long time afraid to imitate them; though he forgot them but too soon, and, like Joash, having began his reign piously and successfully, he made as impious and tragical an end of it. His signal success against the Edomites, of which an account has been formerly given <sup>4</sup>, promised to him by God himself, did but too much c swell the heart of that young monarch; he had an army of 300,000 fighting men, and had hired 100,000 more of the king of Israel, when he was going upon that expedition. But a prophet came to him, and commanded him, in the name of God, to dismiss those auxiliaries, assuring him, that such idolatrous troops would only be an invincible obstacle to his success, if he persisted in making use of them. The king, upon the point of obeying, was only solicitous how to get back the 100 shekels of silver which he had already paid for them; but the prophet having told him, that God was able to repay them to him with advantage, he dismissed the Israelitish troops, not without great resentment and heart-burning on their side, of which they failed not to give an ample proof, by burning and ravaging all the d countries they went through, in their return home. This broke at once all friendship between those two monarchs, and proved the source of a bloody war. Happy had it been for Amasiab if this had been all, but that infatuated prince, after his victory over Edom, became so stupidly fond of the idols, which he had taken from them, that, as if all his success had been owing to them, he caused them to be set up in Judah at his return, and went so far as to burn incense himself before them. He was severely rebuked for this by a prophet, who asked him, among other things, what assistance he could hope for from those false deities, which could neither deliver their votaries, nor themselves from his hands? But the king, who was then too elated to bear either his advice or reproof, asked him, who made him his counsellor? and in a threatening tone, commanded him to hold his peace, and not provoke him to punish his insolence. After such monstrous instances of his folly and ingratitude, we need not wonder if he was abandoned by God to rush into his own ruin.

Amasiab's success;

and idolatry.

Amasiab had indeed cause to resent the ravages which the disbanded Israelites had committed in his kingdom, during his expedition against Edom, and had he been less proud of his success, he might have taken more proper measures for doing himself justice for them; but he seems to have been above all these considerations, and the insolent challenge which he sent to Joaz, the then king of Israel, and grandson of Jebu, Come and let us see one another in the face, doth plainly show, that he wanted only to try his valour or fortune with him. On the other hand, Joaz had no less reason to trust to his own; Joaz, soon after his accession to the crown, had been paying a mournful visit to the prophet Elisba, who was then lying on his death-bed, to represent to that holy person, the melancholy state in which he was going to leave the kingdom, which had already suffered the greatest calamities from the kings of Syria, during the two last reigns; and the prophet, touched with a sense of it, had prophesied to him, that he should gain three succeeding victories over that domineering nation <sup>5</sup>. Joaz therefore, who had by this this time given such signal proofs of his courage and conduct, by those three victories, which he had gained over the Syrians, and by recovering all the places which they had taken from his predecessors (Z), could not forbear expressing the utmost indignation at the receipt of this arrogant cartel. The answer he returned, was couched in the most scornful and mortifying terms, under the allegory of a despicable thistle, which having aspired to an alliance with the noble cedar, had, for his ambition, been crushed under the feet of a wild beast; he concluded with advising him to rest contented with his late petty victories, and not suffer his ambition to drive him into a desperate attempt, which would end, in all likelihood, in the total loss of his kingdom. But Amasiah, who was not to be humbled by words, was only the more exasperated at this answer, and hastened to go out against his rival: the two armies met in the neighbourhood of Besthemesh, where Judah was totally routed. Josephus adds, that they were seized with such a panic, at the very first onset, that they turned their backs without striking one stroke, and left their king at the mercy of the conqueror. Amasiah was actually taken prisoner, and Joaz marched on with him, and his own army, to Jerusalem, where he obliged him to buy his freedom, at the expence of all the gold and silver which were found, either in the temple or in his own treasury; after which, having demolished about 400 cubits length of the city wall, and taken some hostages with him, he returned to Samaria. He did not outlive this victory above one year, after which he was succeeded by his son Jeroboam, the second of that name, after he had reigned 16 years. As for Amasiah, though he outlived his disgrace above 15 years, yet we read no more of him till the latter end of his reign; when having discovered a conspiracy, that was formed against him at Jerusalem, he was forced to flee to Lachish, where, notwithstanding his precaution, he was pursued and murdered by the conspirators. He was carried back upon horses to Jerusalem.

Is defeated by the king of Israel.

<sup>1</sup> 2 Chron. xxiv. 25. <sup>2</sup> 2 Kings xiii. 3, 4, 5, 6. † See before, p. 389. a. under note B. <sup>3</sup> Deut. xxiv. 16. <sup>4</sup> See before p. 316. b. <sup>5</sup> 2 Kings xiii. 14, & seq. See also before, p. 389. b.

Amasiah
taken prisoner.

2

1st Ant. l. 9. c. 10.

(Z) It is not easy to determine the time when Joaz won these three victories; but however, it is more than probable, that it was long before he received this proud challenge from Amasiah, when he was then in the 16th year of his reign (27). The text would even incline one to believe, that he began to beat the Syrians soon after the beginning of it (28). Archbishop Ussher places it in the sixth and subsequent years of his reign, when having, as he supposes, taken his son, the brave Jeroboam II. into consorship with him, he left the kingdom under his care, whilst he went out against the armies of Syria (29).

The manner in which the good old prophet did foretell these signal victories, is too remarkable to be past by. The king having express'd his sense for the loss of so great a protector, in the most pathetic terms, Elisha bid him take his bow and arrow in his hand, and put himself in a posture of shooting out of his window eastward towards Syria; which being done, he put his hand upon that of the king's, and bid him shoot; and as the arrow went, he cried out, The arrow of the Lord's deliverance, and the arrow of deliverance from Syria; and then told the king, that he would beat the Syrians in Aphrek, till he had quite consumed them. But when he bid him afterwards to smite upon the ground with another arrow, and the king had done so three times, the prophet was displeased at it, and told him, that if he had happened to have struck the ground five or six times, it would have been a certain sign of his totally defeating his Syrian enemy; but since he had stayed his hand at the third stroke, he should gain but three battles against him (30). The thing happened accordingly, and Syria, after having been kept under during Joaz and Jeroboam's reign, began to recover itself again, after the death of the latter, as we have seen elsewhere †.

As for Elisha, he died soon after; and before the year was out, some Israelites going to bury a corpse in the neighbourhood of Samaria, perceived a band of Moabites coming towards them, for fear of whom, they cast the dead body into Elisha's tomb, and fled; but as soon as it had touched the bones of the dead prophet, the man revived, and ran after them. What use a neighbouring church has made of this miracle, in favour of the relics of their saints, is foreign to our subject: we have Elisha's panegyric in few words in the book of Ecclesiasticus; "Elisha, says that author, was filled with the spirit of Elijah; whilst he lived, he was not over-awed by any prince, neither could any bring him into subjection; no word could overcome him; and after his death he prophesied, &c. (31)." The Jews add, that the man thus miraculously raised, was called Sallum, and that he begat sons and daughters afterwards. Some are of opinion, that he had been a wicked man, and, as such, unfit to lie near the sacred remains of that prophet; others think otherwise (32); neither is it worth enquiring which of the two is most in the right.

Some authors, however, not content with the miracles that he wrought during his life, and after his death, have accompanied his birth with a remarkable one; namely, that one of the golden calves bellowed out these words, with such a loud voice that it was heard from Gilgal to Jerusalem; This is he that is to destroy the carved idols, and break the molten images in pieces (33).

(27) Vid. Usser. Ann. sub A. M. 3178.

(28) Vid. 2 Kings xiii. 22, & seq.

(29) Ubi sup.

sub A. M. 3168.

(30) 2 Kings xiii. 14, & seq.

† Vid. sup. p. 389. b, c.

(31) Ecclef.

xlviii. 12, & seq.

(32) Vid. Munst. in 2 Reg. xiii. sub not. F.

(33) Vid. Doroth. Eri-

phan, & Isidor. de mort. prophet. & Chron. paschal. ap. CALM. sub voc. Elisee.

a salem, and buried with his ancestors; and his son Azariab proclaimed in his stead<sup>a</sup>.

In the mean time, whilst Amasiah spent the remnant of his reign in a kind of inactive security in Jerusalem, Jeroboam II. the brave great-grandson of Jehu, Jeroboam II. seemed ordained by providence to restore the kingdom of Israel to its pristine splendor and greatness. His reign, which lasted 41 years, besides those 10 which he had spent in copartnership with his father, gave him time more than sufficient to perform that noble work, to which he was encouraged by the prophets Jonah the son of Amittai (A), and Hosea the son of Beeri, who were contemporaries with him, and foretold, that he should compleat the deliverance of Israel which his father had began, notwithstanding his cleaving to the idolatries of his predecessors. Accordingly, he took the Syrian capital, Damascus, and Hamath, with all their territories; both which had formerly belonged to Judah<sup>a</sup>, and all the country on the other side Jordan, from Hamath to the sea of the plain, or the dead sea<sup>b</sup>. The particulars of all these glorious actions are unknown to us, having been written in the annals of the kings of Israel, long since lost. He died in the 41st year of his reign, and was buried with his ancestors in Samaria, and succeeded by his son Zechariah<sup>c</sup>. Jeroboam's reign was indeed a glorious one, with respect to his conquests; but it stands branded for various idolatries, and for the injustice, luxury, rapine and other immoralities which reigned at that time; inasmuch, that the prophets Hosea and Amos, who lived in his days, give us a very dreadful account of the disorders and debauchery, which were committed both in Samaria and in Israel (B), and were sent to foretel the sad and total ruin, which their sins would

<sup>a</sup> 2 Kings xiv. pass. to ver. 21. 2 Chron. xxv. per tot. <sup>a</sup> See 2 Sam. viii. 6. 2 Chron. viii. 3. & Numb. xiii. 21. <sup>b</sup> 2 Kings xiv. pass. <sup>c</sup> Ibid. ver. ult.

(A) This is the same Jonah, or Jonas, as he is called in the Gospel (34), who was afterwards sent to preach repentance to the Ninevites (35). Usher justly observes, that he was a native of Gathhepher (36), a town in the tribe of Zebulun (37) in Galilee of the Gentiles (38), against that false affirmation of the Jews: That out of Galilee there never arose a prophet (39). It is uncertain whether those glorious successes, which he foretold to the king of Israel, were committed to writing, and since lost; or, which is more probable, were only delivered by word of mouth. We have nothing left of him but the book that bears his name, which relates to his being sent to preach repentance at Nineveh, the metropolis of Assyria, and is therefore foreign to our present subject.

(B) The former of these prophets seems to accuse the Israelites (40) of the same enormities as had been formerly committed in Gibeath, where the Levite's concubine had been abused to death (41). He speaks of their having multiplied their idols to a shameful degree all over the kingdom, for which, and for all their other abominable practices, he denounces a total ruin and desolation to the king and people; which he also lived to see accomplished in the sixth year of Hezekiah, when Israel was carried away captive (42).

Hosea's prophecy begins with the command which he received from God, to go and marry a common prostitute, and to adopt her spurious brood (43); a command, which has given so much offence to the pious, and has administered such occasion of ridicule to the libertines, that we hope it will not be thought improper to set the matter in a true light, for the benefit of those who have not leisure, or opportunity, to consult the best commentators upon it. And here we may safely reject the solution of those subtle doctors, who pretend, that God may dispense with the laws of purity; or of those who look upon this marriage to have been transacted only in a vision; or that it is only a parable; such evasions do often leave a greater difficulty than they endeavour to remove.

Nothing is more obvious than that the Scriptures, we may add all languages, give to men and things the qualities they formerly had; thus the blind and deaf are said to see and hear, the dead to live, sinners to be reformed, and publicans and harlots [not those certainly who continued such, but those who were converted] to enter into the kingdom of God, before the priests, elders, and outwardly sanctified Pharisees (44). Will it not therefore be more natural to think, with better commentators (45), that the woman whom the prophet is commanded to marry, had been a common prostitute before she became his wife? The priests, indeed, were forbid to marry such women, but none else; and provided they were reclaimed by it from their wicked lives, there was nothing in such marriages unworthy of a prophet. On the contrary, it was the properest emblem of God's merciful dealings with the Israelites, whom he espoused and adopted, notwithstanding all their former wickedness; and from whom he might justly challenge the suitable returns of obedience, faithfulness, and gratitude; but which if they failed of, they could expect nothing but divorcement and rejection; such as a woman in Gomer's case would deserve, if she should relapse into her former vices, after she had been so kindly reclaimed from them (46).

We may add, that Hosea, or as the original calls him יְהוֹשָׁעָה Hosheah, which word implies a Saviour, was a kind of type of Christ, who, we know, came to espouse to himself a church, consisting not of righteous, or of those that thought themselves such, but of repenting sinners, of all kinds and nations, (34) Matt. xii. 41. (35) Jonah iii. pass. (36) 2 Kings xiv. 25. (37) Job. xix. 13.

(38) Isai. ix. 1. (39) John vii. 52. Vid. Usher. Ann. sub A. M. 3197. (40) Hosei. x. 9.
(41) Judg. xix. 14, & seq. (42) Conf. Hof. i. 1, & 2 Reg. xviii. 10. (43) Hof. ibid. pass.
(44) Matt. xxi. 31, & alib. (45) Vid. de LYRA. RIBER. PISCAT. & al. in loc. (46) Vid. PLEISER. Dubia S. Script. LE SCENE. Essay on a new ver. p. 1. chap. 10.

would shortly bring upon the whole kingdom. Amos, in particular, was sent from a Judah, where he was a common shepherd, to denounce the most severe judgments against Israel, even to the total dispersion of it; which he did under the types of grasshoppers, which destroyed all the fruit of the land; of a devouring fire; and lastly, of a plummet line and tottering wall, ready to bury the idols of Israel under its ruins<sup>d</sup>. For these prophecies he was accused to the king, by Amasiah, one of the idolatrous priests of Bethel, and by him commanded to return into Judah and prophesy there; which he was forced to do, though not before he had denounced this heavy judgment against the messenger Amasiah, that his wife should become an open prostitute in the city, that his sons and daughters should fall by the sword, and himself die in a polluted land<sup>e</sup>, namely, that of Affyria; whither the ten tribes were soon after carried away captive, and he, in all probability, along with them (C).

Zechariah.

Year of the
Flood, 2227.
Year before
Christ, 772.

Zechariah succeeded his father Jeroboam: he was the great-grandson of Jehu; and so far was God's promise to this last fulfilled, that the kingdom should continue in his family to the fourth generation; but his threatnings against that kingdom did not lag behind, and we may date the downfall of Israel from the reign of Zechariah. From that time, we read of nothing but treasons and rebellions, of murders, anarchy (D), and universal desolation: Zechariah had scarce reigned six months, before he was publicly massacred by Shallum, one of his own domesticks, according to Josephus<sup>f</sup>, who seized upon the kingdom, and after a reign of thirty days, was himself murdered by Menabem, Zechariah's general, in the metropolis of Samaria. As soon as this last was seated upon the throne, he returned to Tirzah, a city in the tribe of Ephraim, formerly the residence of Jeroboam I.<sup>g</sup>, which place refusing to open the gates to him, he put all the inhabitants to the sword, and committed the most horrid cruelties on their pregnant women that ever were done by the vilest barbarians. It was not long, however, before he saw himself invaded by Pul king of Affyria (E); and as he was not in a condition to make nations, and to reclaim them from their sins by his precepts and example, as well as by his grace and holy spirit. This typical marriage might therefore have a view to him, as well as to the literal salvation of Judah, and ruin of Israel, with which his prophecies are filled. This may further appear to be the case, if we consider the names, character, and other circumstances, relating to the children which the prophet had by this woman; particularly, their changing their names from Lo! Ammi, thou art not my people; into Ammi, thou art my people; and from Lo! Ruhamah, she shall have no mercy, to Ruhamah, she shall obtain mercy; as also, their becoming as numerous as the sands of the sea; all which seem chiefly to relate to the conversion of mankind to the Christian religion. But these are out of our province.

I

<sup>d</sup> Amos vii. pass.    <sup>e</sup> Ibid. ver. ult.    <sup>f</sup> Ant. l. ix. c. 11.    <sup>g</sup> See 1 Kings xiv. 17.

Hosea is the first, whose prophecies we have had transmitted in writing; he continued in the exercise of his prophetic office near the space of seventy years, during the reigns of Uzziah, or Azariah, Jotham, Abaz, and Hezekiah. His prophecies are divided into fourteen chapters; in the four first, he exposes the various iniquities of the ten tribes; from thence, to the twelfth chapter, he denounces the punishments impending on them, particularly their destruction by Shalmanezzer. The remainder is full of comfortable promises to the godly and penitent: What became of him at last, the text doth not tell us, and it is dangerous to trust to any thing else.

(C) As for Amos, as he was neither priest nor prophet, but only called, upon this extraordinary case, to the latter, it is probable, that after his return into the land of Judah, he retired into the city of Tekoa, where he continued to prophesy against Israel, for silencing and expelling him out of their kingdom (47). He foretold, in particular, the calamities which they would fall into after Jeroboam II.'s death; the murder of his son and successor; the coming of Pul and Tiglath-pileser, kings of Affyria, against Israel; and the captivity of the ten tribes. Some other of his prophecies are levelled against Syria, Tyre, the Philistines, Edomites, Ammonites, and Moabites; and some against the kingdom of Judah. His style is plain and low, and his expressions such as one might expect from a rustic or shepherd. Other particulars relating to his life and death, which we meet with in ancient fathers, we omit, because we neither think them material nor certain.

(D) Our archbishop Usher (48) observes here, that there must have been an inter-regnum of eleven years and half before Zechariah ascended the throne; without which supposition, it will be impossible to make his death, and Shallum's short-liv'd reign, to co-incide with the 39th year of Azariah king of Judah, in which it is said to have happened (49).

(E) The same prelate (50) thinks, that this Pul was the father of Sardanapalus, called from him Sardan-Pul; as Merodach, king of Babylon, was called Merodach-Baladan, from his father Baladan. Pul is the first king of Affyria we find named in Scripture, from the time of Nimrod, and may be reasonably enough supposed to have reigned in Nineveh at the time of Jonah's preaching; and to have been converted by him.

Those who follow the version of the Seventy, believe that Pul was invited by Menabem to come to his assistance. One of the prophets upbraids, indeed, the king and people of Samaria, with sending to Affyria for help, for which he threatens them with a make head against him, he was forced to buy his friendship at the price of 1000 talents of silver, which he levied upon the wealthiest of his own subjects, whom he obliged to pay 60 shekels per head; upon which Pul returned homewards, and Menabem reigned quietly the remaining eleven years of his life, and was succeeded by his son Pekabiah, in the 50th year of Azariah, or Uzziah, king of Judah<sup>b</sup>.

(47) Amos ii. 13, & seq. iii. pass. & alib.    (48) Ann. sub A. M. 3220.    (49) 2 Kings xv. 2, 17.    (50) Ubi sup.    (51) Hos. v. 13. viii. 9, 13. x. 6, 13.

The kingdom of Judah all this while enjoyed a perfect peace, Azariah, whom the people had set upon the throne, immediately after his father Amaziah's murder, (that is, as the text expresses it) in the 27th year of Jeroboam II's reign<sup>c</sup> (F), was then but sixteen years of age, and was wholly directed by Zechariah, not the prophet of that name, who lived after their return from the captivity, but another, who is only known for the great wisdom and piety of his counsels to the young monarch; so that during the life of that faithful counsellor, Azariah became equally conspicuous for his zeal against idolatry, for his pious imitation of his best predecessors, and for his great success against several of his neighbours, especially the Philistines<sup>k</sup>. He likewise fortified his own metropolis, repaired the wall of it, which had been demolished by the king of Israel, and built several fortresses and magazines in several parts of his kingdom, and in those countries which he had taken from the Philistines, Arabians, and Mebunims (G). His army consisted of 307,500 brave men under the command of two expert generals, Maasiah, and Hananiah, and of Jebiel, his scribe, or secretary of war, who appointed each band

c their respective turns, according to the muster-rolls. Besides these, he had also 2600 officers, all famous for their valour and experience; and a prodigious quantity of arms of all sorts, to supply his army with, and which he kept in several strong store-cities all over his kingdom. To these he added the invention of new machines for throwing darts, large stones, and other destructive materials, from his towers and bulwarks; which are said to have been contrived by some of his expert engineers. Whilst he was thus employed in his military affairs, he did not forget the business of agriculture; on the contrary, the text says, that he was a lover of it, that he had great herds of cattle, a great number of fields and vineyards, of husbandmen and vine-dressers; and that he built towers and cots, and d digged wells, every where, for the convenience of his servants and cattle. So that whether we look upon him in peace or war, he seems to have arrived at the height of glory and wealth.

But all this he unhappily lost by one rash act, his attempting to infringe upon the priestly office, and to burn incense upon the sacred altar. He was, however, strongly opposed by the then high-priest Azariah, at the head of fourscore other zealous priests, who represented to him, in vain, that it was a province which belonged only to the sons of Aaron; the infatuated king would not desist from it, till he felt himself smitten with leprosy in such a sudden and extraordinary manner, as made him sensible that it was sent from God, as a punishment for his presumption. The priests, as soon as they perceived the first tokens of that polluting disease appear in his forehead, were going to force him out of the temple; but

but all this he unhappily lost by one rash act, his attempting to infringe upon the priestly office, and to burn incense upon the sacred altar. He was, however, strongly opposed by the then high-priest Azariah, at the head of fourscore other zealous priests, who represented to him, in vain, that it was a province which belonged only to the sons of Aaron; the infatuated king would not desist from it, till he felt himself smitten with leprosy in such a sudden and extraordinary manner, as made him sensible that it was sent from God, as a punishment for his presumption. The priests, as soon as they perceived the first tokens of that polluting disease appear in his forehead, were going to force him out of the temple; but

but all this he unhappily lost by one rash act, his attempting to infringe upon the priestly office, and to burn incense upon the sacred altar. He was, however, strongly opposed by the then high-priest Azariah, at the head of fourscore other zealous priests, who represented to him, in vain, that it was a province which belonged only to the sons of Aaron; the infatuated king would not desist from it, till he felt himself smitten with leprosy in such a sudden and extraordinary manner, as made him sensible that it was sent from God, as a punishment for his presumption. The priests, as soon as they perceived the first tokens of that polluting disease appear in his forehead, were going to force him out of the temple; but

but all this he unhappily lost by one rash act, his attempting to infringe upon the priestly office, and to burn incense upon the sacred altar. He was, however, strongly opposed by the then high-priest Azariah, at the head of fourscore other zealous priests, who represented to him, in vain, that it was a province which belonged only to the sons of Aaron; the infatuated king would not desist from it, till he felt himself smitten with leprosy in such a sudden and extraordinary manner, as made him sensible that it was sent from God, as a punishment for his presumption. The priests, as soon as they perceived the first tokens of that polluting disease appear in his forehead, were going to force him out of the temple; but

but all this he unhappily lost by one rash act, his attempting to infringe upon the priestly office, and to burn incense upon the sacred altar. He was, however, strongly opposed by the then high-priest Azariah, at the head of fourscore other zealous priests, who represented to him, in vain, that it was a province which belonged only to the sons of Aaron; the infatuated king would not desist from it, till he felt himself smitten with leprosy in such a sudden and extraordinary manner, as made him sensible that it was sent from God, as a punishment for his presumption. The priests, as soon as they perceived the first tokens of that polluting disease appear in his forehead, were going to force him out of the temple; but

but all this he unhappily lost by one rash act, his attempting to infringe upon the priestly office, and to burn incense upon the sacred altar. He was, however, strongly opposed by the then high-priest Azariah, at the head of fourscore other zealous priests, who represented to him, in vain, that it was a province which belonged only to the sons of Aaron; the infatuated king would not desist from it, till he felt himself smitten with leprosy in such a sudden and extraordinary manner, as made him sensible that it was sent from God, as a punishment for his presumption. The priests, as soon as they perceived the first tokens of that polluting disease appear in his forehead, were going to force him out of the temple; but

but all this he unhappily lost by one rash act, his attempting to infringe upon the priestly office, and to burn incense upon the sacred altar. He was, however, strongly opposed by the then high-priest Azariah, at the head of fourscore other zealous priests, who represented to him, in vain, that it was a province which belonged only to the sons of Aaron; the infatuated king would not desist from it, till he felt himself smitten with leprosy in such a sudden and extraordinary manner, as made him sensible that it was sent from God, as a punishment for his presumption. The priests, as soon as they perceived the first tokens of that polluting disease appear in his forehead, were going to force him out of the temple; but

but all this he unhappily lost by one rash act, his attempting to infringe upon the priestly office, and to burn incense upon the sacred altar. He was, however, strongly opposed by the then high-priest Azariah, at the head of fourscore other zealous priests, who represented to him, in vain, that it was a province which belonged only to the sons of Aaron; the infatuated king would not desist from it, till he felt himself smitten with leprosy in such a sudden and extraordinary manner, as made him sensible that it was sent from God, as a punishment for his presumption. The priests, as soon as they perceived the first tokens of that polluting disease appear in his forehead, were going to force him out of the temple; but with being sent thither captives (52); but the original affirms, that he came against, or invaded the land; and the book of Chronicles says expressly, that God stirred up the spirit of Pul against him, as he did afterwards that of Tilgath-pileser, who carried away the two tribes and half beyond Jordan into captivity (53). Josephus reckons this invasion of Pul to have happened towards the latter end of Menabem's reign (54); but Usher, whom we follow, places it in the beginning of it.

<sup>b</sup> 2 Kings xv. 13 ad 22. <sup>c</sup> Ibid. ver. 1. <sup>k</sup> 2 Chron. xxvi. 6, & seq. See before, p. 358. d.

(F) That is, as the same Usher, and the margin of our Bibles rightly observe, the 27th year from his being admitted co-partner with his father Jeroboam, though but the 16th from his reigning sole monarch.

(These Mebunims the Chaldee paraphrast renders בְּשֵׁיטֵי הַמִּדְבָּר the inhabitants in the wilderness of Mahon, which was in that part of Arabia-petrea toward Gerar and Pharan; for which reason, they seem joined with the Arabians of Gur-baal, who dwelt in another canton of the same province; and as both were in the same neighbourhood of Egypt, therefore the text adds, that Uzziah's fame was spread abroad, even unto the entering into Egypt (55).

We ought to observe here, that these wars of the king of Judah are not recorded in the book of Kings, where his history seems strangely curtailed, but only in that of the Chronicles (56).

(52) Chron. ix. 3, & alib. pass. (53) Conf. 2 Kings xv. 19. & 1 Chron. v. ult. (54) Ant. l. ix. c. 11. (55) Vid. BOCHART. Phaleg. l. ii. c. 23. LE CLERC. Com. in loc. & al. (56) Comp. 2 Chron. xxvi. 1, & seq. & 2 Kings xiv. 21, & seq.

His death.

but Azariah was by that time struck with such terror and remorse (H), that he saved them that trouble, and made what haste he could, not only out of that sacred place, but even out of the city, and went to live in a separate house, where he continued, infected with that distemper, secluded from common society, and deprived of the regal power, unto the day of his death, and was buried in a sepulchre, apart, adjoining to that of his ancestors<sup>1</sup>. He died in the 52<sup>d</sup> year of his reign, and the 68th year of his age<sup>m</sup>, and was succeeded by his son Jotham, who had taken the government upon him immediately after his father's seclusion. The author of the Chronicles adds, that Uzziah's history was written by Isaiab the son of Amos<sup>n</sup>; but we find nothing now of him in the writings of that prophet, but his name<sup>o</sup>.

Pekejah king of Israel murdered, and succeeded by Pekah.

Jotham king of Judah.

Two years before Azariah's death, Pekejah succeeded his father Manabem in Israel;<sup>b</sup> and, after two years reign, was killed in his own palace by Pekab the son of Remaliab, one of his generals, who ascended the throne about a year before Jotham succeeded his father in Judah. The character of these two princes was very opposite; Pekab was a wicked prince, and followed the steps of his predecessors, so that his reign proved troublesome and unsuccessful, and ended in a violent death: Jotham was 25 years old when his father died, he was a wise and pious prince, and appears to have inherited all his father's virtues, without any of his vices, and was blessed with extraordinary success. Pekab having made a league with Rezin king of Syria, made an attempt against Judah; but he was soon forced to go back, and defend his own territories against Tilgath-pileser king of Assyria, who had invaded the land of Naphtali, took the most considerable towns of it, and carried that whole tribe captive into his own kingdom; whilst Jotham gained several considerable advantages against his neighbours, especially against the Ammonites, whom he brought under a yearly tribute of 100 talents of silver, 10,000 measures of wheat, and the same quantity of barley<sup>p</sup>; as we have seen elsewhere†. At length, having repaired and beautified the temple, fortified the city, and done many other publick acts, Jotham died in peace, after he had reigned sixteen years, and was succeeded by his son Abaz. As for Pekab, after he had had the mortification to see one whole tribe torn from him by a foreign power, and his kingdom, during the last ten years of his reign, reduced into anarchy and rebellion; he was murdered and succeeded by Hoshea the son of Elah, in the 20th year of his reign<sup>q</sup>, and about three years after Jotham's death.<sup>d</sup>

HOWEVER, he was more successful, during those three last years, against Jotham's unworthy son, whose impieties made his reign as unfortunate and inglorious, as that of his father had been glorious and successful. He was scarce seated on the throne, before his kingdom was invaded by the joint forces of the kings of Israel and

<sup>1</sup> 2 Chron. xxvi. per tot.    <sup>m</sup> 2 Kings xv. 2.    <sup>n</sup> 2 Chron. ib. ver. 22, 23.    <sup>o</sup> See Iſai. i. 1, vii. 1.    <sup>p</sup> 2 Chron. xxvii. 5.    † See before, p. 297. d.    <sup>q</sup> 2 Kings xv. pass. 2 Chron. xxvii. per tot. See also USHER. AN. sub A. M. 3245. and the margin of our Bible on 2 Kings xv. 30.

(H) The reason of Uzziah's being thus miraculously smitten with leprosy, is only found in the book of Chronicles. Josephus (57) adds a very remarkable circumstance which accompanied this punishment, if we may take his word for it; namely, that while the king persisted to threaten the priests who opposed his impious design, God sent a miraculous earthquake, which had this double effect, that it opened the roof of the temple, through the crack of which that ray of light got entrance which lighted upon his face, and covered it with leprosy; and 2. That it rent a mountain in two which stood at a small distance from Jerusalem, one half of which having rolled about four furlongs, stopt against another mountain, choaked the highway, and covered the king's garden all over with rubbish.

Some of the prophets do, indeed, speak of an earthquake, which happened in Uzziah's days; but besides that, neither they, nor the sacred historian, mention any thing of its wonderful effects against that monarch; it is plain, Josephus must be out in his chronology, because he makes it to have happened towards the latter end of that monarch's life; (for he says expressly, that he died of grief soon after his misfortune) whereas the former of the prophets above-mentioned says, that the earthquake happened in the days of Uzziah, and of Jeroboam II. Now it is plain, as the learned Usher observes, that this was long before Uzziah was smitten with leprosy, because his son Jotham, who took the government upon him immediately upon his seclusion, was not born till some time after Jeroboam's death (59). This remark will also hold equally good against the rest of the Jews, who, to make the earthquake and the king's punishment meet, affirm, that they happened in the 25th year of his reign, that is, before Jotham was born. Both, therefore, Josephus and they have joined two events together, to make the king's punishment appear more wonderful; which, it is plain from what has been said above, happened, the one about the middle, and the other towards the latter end of that prince's reign, that is, at about 25 years distance from each other.

(57) Ant. l. 9. c. 12.    (58) Amos i. 1. Zachar xiv. 5.    (59) Vid. USHER. AN. sub A. M. 3221.

<sup>a</sup> and Syria. Abaz was then under the utmost consternation, at the news of two such <sup>Ahaz's idolatrous and unsuccessful reign.</sup> powerful enemies coming up against him, and seems to have expected nothing less than the total dissolution of the Jewish monarchy; when Isaiab the son of Amos (I), who had begun to prophesy even from the latter end of Uzziah's reign, came to him from the Lord, to assure him that those two princes should try their strength in vain against Jerusalem, which they were then about besieging<sup>1</sup>. At the same time to assure him, that the final end of the Jewish monarchy, which he feared, was far enough off, he bid him ask a sign of God, though never so hard, and it should be granted to him. Here the king, whether out of respect, or despondency and unbelief, refusing to ask for the promised sign, the prophet assured <sup>b</sup> him, from the Lord, that before that time came, a virgin should conceive and bear a son, and call his name Himmanu-el or God with us, and so on (K).

No sooner had the first part of the prophecy been verified, and the city been delivered from the impending ruin, than the impious Abaz gave himself up to the vilest impieties and idolatries, in which he far outwent the very worst of his predecessors; burning incense to every deity, in groves, high places, and in the valley of Hinnon, and burning his very children in the fire, after the manner of other nations<sup>2</sup>, till God was pleased at last to give him up to his two grand enemies. Rezin, to make himself amends for his ill success against Jerusalem, went and recovered Eloth, a considerable sea-port town upon the Red-Sea, which Uzziah had <sup>c</sup> taken from him; he repaired and fortified it, drove the Jews out of it, and peopled it with his Syrian subjects; and from that time the Jews never could retake it from his successors<sup>3</sup>. What havoc he made in his territories, we have already partly seen in the Syrian history<sup>4</sup>.

THE king of Israel was still the more inveterate and successful of the two, and it is not easy to say how far he might have carried on his conquests against him, had not a prophet been sent from God to put a timely stop to them. He had already killed in one single battle 120,000 of his bravest subjects, besides Maazaiab, <sup>A great slaughter of his subjects.</sup> Abaz's son, his subjects.

<sup>1</sup> See Isai. i. 1. <sup>2</sup> Ibid. vii. 1, 2, & seq. <sup>3</sup> 2 Kings xvi. 5. See also before; p. 389. b. <sup>4</sup> 2 Chron. xxviii. 3, & seq. <sup>5</sup> 2 Kings xvi. 6. <sup>6</sup> See before, p. 390. a.

(I) Isaiab, called from the womb to be a prophet (60), and endowed with singular courage and eloquence for that important office (61), is affirmed by the Jews, and believed by many Christians, to have been the grandson of Joash king of Judah (62). His first vision was about the latter end of Uzziah's reign (63), but his prophecies relate to his successors; namely, the first six chapters to Jotham, the six next to his son Abaz, and the rest to Hezekiah; excepting, that several of them are interspersed, which relate to the Messiah, and to the fate of several foreign kingdoms. He is justly esteemed the prince of the prophets, for the inimitable loftiness and majesty of his style, as well as for the clearness of his prophecies.

He was highly respected by the good kings, especially by Hezekiah, who sent to consult him upon all emergencies; and as ill treated by the bad ones, especially by Manasseh, by whom he is supposed to have been put to a cruel death, as we have hinted elsewhere<sup>7</sup>.

(K) This we take to be a much more natural sense of that prophecy, than to suppose, as some have done (64), that such a miraculous child was really born in Abaz's time, to assure him of the promised deliverance; for as there is not the least mention of such an extraordinary birth, so neither do we see that there was any necessity for it, in order to convince the desponding king, who could not be ignorant of that prophecy of Jacob, that the sceptre should not depart from Judah—till Shiloh was come (65); much less, that he was to spring of the lineage of David. But what staggered Abaz's faith, and made him fear that the regal power was going to depart from his family, was, that his two enemies had combined to set up a stranger upon his throne (66). All, therefore, that was wanting to dispel his present fears about it, was for the prophet to assure him from God, that this Shiloh, promised to Judah and David, who was to fore-run the total excision of the Jewish polity, was to be born in a miraculous manner, and with a divine character; and other remarkable circumstances, such as he might be easily satisfied had not as yet happened in his kingdom.

As for that part of the prophecy which is commonly urged on the other side, namely, Before this wonderful child shall know good from evil, the land which thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings (67); we think that, if it be rightly understood, it will rather confirm our sense of the prophecy, and that the words ought to be thus rendered: For (or rather, as the particle כי seems to import here) may, before this child can know good from evil, this land which thou (V) dost not abhorrest, as our version renders it, but art so solicitous about, or givest up for lost, shall be bereaved of both her kings; by which, we think, ought to be understood, not the kings of Syria and Israel, for the former could not be called her (Canaan's) king; and the latter had but a share in it at best; but the kings of Israel and Judah, as it really was before the coming of the Messiah.

However, though we have delivered this our own private opinion, we shall venture no further upon the argument, much less upon some other parts of this prophecy, lest we should be thought to expatiate too far out of our province.

(60) Vid. Isai. xlix. 1, & seq. (61) Ibid. i. 4. (62) Ita Rabbin. Omn. Vid. U. Hieron. in Isai. pass. (63) Ibid. vi. 1, & seq. † Vid. sup. p. 674. not. D. (64) Whitb. in loc. Literal. proph. & al. (65) Gen. xlix. 10. See before, p. 462. not. G. (66) Isai. vii. 6. (67) Ibid. ver. 16.

son, and some of the noblest that were next his royal person; and had likewise a taken 200,000 captive women and children, whom they were carrying away to Samaria; when Obed, that was the prophet's name, stopped them short, and asked them, whether they did not think it enough to have made such a horrid and universal slaughter of their brethren, unless they carried away a much greater number into slavery? He added, that though the idolatries of Judah had drawn those heavy judgments upon that unfortunate tribe, yet if they persisted to carry those innocent prisoners into captivity, their cruelty would bring down much severer ones upon themselves. He concluded, with exhorting them to be contented with the rich plunder they had got, and to send their captives back to Jerusalem; which they at length complied with. This speech did even work so far upon them, that they did not dismiss them without some signal tokens of pity and humanity<sup>a</sup>.

Edom and the Israelites invaded him.

WHILST Abaz's affairs were in this dismal plight, the Edomites and Philistines did invade other parts of his land; the former of whom carried away a great number of captives, and the latter recovered several considerable frontier towns from him<sup>a</sup>. In this extremity, he had recourse to his old ally the king of Assyria, whom, to gain to his assistance, he made no scruple to strip both temple and city of all the gold and silver. Tilgath-pileser received his presents, but, instead of coming to assist him against the confederate kings, he turned his whole strength against that of Syria, under pretence of causing a diversion (L); and having killed Rezin, and seized upon his capital †, Abaz came thither to pay a visit to him, upon what c design is not easy to guess. Among the curiosities which he saw at Damascus, he was so taken with the elegance of a heathenish altar, that he caused a model to be taken from it, and to be sent to Urijah the high-priest, with orders, that he should cause one to be made after it, and to be set up in the temple. Urijah dared not disobey, but caused the altar to be made, and to be placed in the room of the old one, which had been set up by Solomon; which last was put by on the north side of it. At his return, the king, highly pleased to see his orders so punctually executed, offered up incense, and a vast quantity of sacrifices upon it: but he soon after caused the temple to be shut up, whilst he reared altars in every corner of Jerusalem, and every where else, to the Syrian gods, which he said had been so d successful against him; and having abandoned himself to the most abominable idolatries, he finished his impious reign in the 36th year of his age, and was succeeded by his son Hezekiah; he reigned sixteen years<sup>y</sup>, and was buried in Jerusalem, not in the sepulchre of David, of which he was esteemed unworthy, but in some other place by itself<sup>z</sup>.

His idolatry;

and death.

THE kingdom of Israel, all this while, was in no better plight than that of Judah: Pekah had paid dear for his success against it, being murdered by Hoshea soon after his return; that is, in the fourth year of Abaz (M). This revolution, however,

<sup>a</sup> 2 Chron. xxviii. from ver. 6 to 16. before, p. 359. a. <sup>y</sup> 2 Kings xvi. 2.

† See before, p. 389. b. <sup>z</sup> Ibid. ver. 17, 18. See also 2 Chron. xxviii. ult.

(L) This is, at least, the best way to reconcile the book of Kings and that of Chronicles; the former of which says, that he came to Abaz's assistance; and the latter, that he did not, but rather straightened him (68).

Some indeed (69) think, that Abaz put himself too much in his power, and was become a kind of dependant upon him, living in continual fear of being invaded by him †. This is indeed far from improbable, since he left his successor under an obligation of paying a tribute to the Assyrians, whose general taxed him with rebellion for not paying it accordingly, as we shall see in the sequel. This made Tremellius conjecture to be the reason, why he is said to have turned the outward entry, which led from the royal palace to the temple (70), namely, lest Tilgath should assault him that way, and so break into his palace (71). Another author (72) thinks, that the same fear made him remove the מוסר mussac, or covering of the sabbath: which he agrees, with us, was the throne on which the kings used to seat themselves during the service of the temple; and caused it to be hid, lest that prince should carry it away with him. There might, indeed, be some ground for it, if we had the least hint in the text of his coming towards Jerusalem; but as that is not the case, we may suppose that Abaz did remove both that, and all that was valuable in the temple, only to convert it all to his own use.

This Tilgath-pileser is the same with Nimus the younger, who reigned in Assyria nineteen years, as will be seen in its proper place.

(M) The text says (73) in the 20th year of Jotham; but as he reigned but 16 years (74), it can mean no more than 20 years, from the time that he began to reign; that is, in the fourth year of his son and successor. In the same manner we must understand what is said in another place (75), that Hoshea began to reign in the 13th year of Abaz; by which is meant, that he did not properly begin to reign till then, by reason of the civil and tumults which arose after the murder of his predecessor.

(68) Conf. 2 Kings xvi. 7, & seq. & 2 Chron. xxviii. 20, 21.

(69) Vid. Usser. An. A. M. 3265. & sup. A. 389 b.

(70) TREMEL. in loc.

(71) 2 Kings xvi. 18.

(72) CALM. Hist. V. T. l. v. c. 44, & al.

(73) 2 Kings xv. 13.

(74) Ibid. ver. 33.

(75) Ibid. xvii. 1.

a however, proved so distasteful to the Israelites, that it caused a kind of anarchy, which lasted almost nine years; during which time, Hoshea found it a difficult task to keep himself upon the throne: and after he had quelled these commotions, and began to reign more peaceably, we do not find that he made any hostile attempt, either against Abaz or his successor. He had, indeed, other business upon his hand; Shalmanezzer had, by this time, succeeded Tiglat-pileser in Assyria; and whether Hoshea had been forced to make use of his assistance to settle himself upon his throne, or whether his predecessor had committed any hostilities against Israel, during his alliance with Abaz, Hoshea was, by some means not mentioned in the text, become tributary to Assyria<sup>a</sup>, and was endeavouring to free himself from that yoke, by courting So, king of Egypt, to an alliance with him. This attempt proved the source of new troubles, which ended at last in the total excision of the Israelish monarchy, as we shall see very soon.

In the mean time Hezekiah had ascended his father's throne, in the 25th year of his age, and in the 12th, or as the text hath it, in the third year of Hoshea's reign, that is, abating the first nine years of anarchy, mentioned in the last note. It was not difficult for him to discover the source of all Judah's misfortunes, and the most effectual means to retrieve them: this is what he set about with the utmost diligence and application. He began with opening the temple, which his impious father had caused to be shut up, and commanded the priests and Levites to purify themselves and it, and to renew the daily worship of God, according to the law of Moses. This good work was begun upon the first day of the year, being the sabbath<sup>b</sup>, and was finished on Saturday the 16th of the same month. The king then assembled the elders of Judah on the next morning, and went with them to the temple, attended with the priests and Levites, and a numerous croud of people. Here they began to offer up the proper offerings to expiate the sins of the nation; after which, they sacrificed such numbers of burnt and peace-offerings, that the priests who assisted at the ceremony, being insufficient for the service, were obliged to call in the Levites to their assistance, and these accepted the office with the utmost readiness and joy (N). All this while, the air was filled with the sound of the trumpets, and other musical instruments, and with the voices of the singers, who accompanied the ceremony with psalms and hymns suitable to that extraordinary solemnity, which was concluded with expressions of the utmost joy and satisfaction, both in the king and people. It could not, indeed, but be a pleasing sight, to see a king and nation so suddenly turned from the worship of the filthiest idols, to that of the living God<sup>c</sup>. One misfortune there was however, that the season was past for celebrating the passover; that solemnity was to begin on the eve of the 14th day of that month, and it was now the 17th; but their zeal pointed to them an expedient out of the law of Moses, where it is prescribed that those, who by reason of any legal impediment, could not celebrate that festival on the first, should do it on the second month†. The good king postponed it accordingly, and made use of that interval, to send circular letters through his whole kingdom, to invite his subjects to be present at that feast, on the 14th of the next month. His piety went further; and the miseries under which the idolatrous Israelites groaned, inspired him with a desire of endeavouring, at least, to work a reformation in that unhappy kingdom: to this end, he wrote a most pathetic letter to them, which he sent by proper deputies, wherein he discovered to them the source of all their misfortunes, and exhorted them to return to the worship of the true God, and to present themselves before him at the ensuing solemnity, as the most effectual means,

<sup>a</sup> 2 Kings xvii. 3, & seq. & not. P.

<sup>b</sup> 2 Chron. xxix. 3, & seq.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid. per tot.

† See before, p. 604.

(N) It appears by the text, that a great number of priests had proved tardy in obeying the king's command, so that they could not vacate at the service of the temple, for want of being purified; whilst the Levites, who had shewed a more than ordinary diligence in complying with it (76), were honoured with that office, from which their inferior rank excluded them. What part they did bear in it, doth not appear; but we may reasonably suppose that they helped to kill, and prepare that vast number of victims which were then offered; whilst the priests were taken up with making the proper aspersions with the blood, and offering the fat and flesh of them, as they received them at their hands.

(76) 2 Chron. xxix. 34. xxx. 15, & seq.

means, not only to avert his future judgments, but even to obtain from him the gracious recalling of their unhappy brethren, whom the kings of Assyria had carried into captivity <sup>d</sup> (O).

Several of them came to the feast.

WHILST the king's messengers took their progress from Dan to Beerseba, the Jews were taken up with burning and demolishing of all the idols, altars, and other idolatrous monuments, which had been reared in Jerusalem, and flung them into the brook Kedron; so that that metropolis was thoroughly purged, before the appointed festival was come. By this time the city was filled with people, not only from all the parts of the kingdom, but also from that of Israel, out of the tribes of Asser, Zebulun, Manasseh, and Issachar. These did not indeed come in such numbers, there being many, even of these four tribes, as well as of the other five, who made a jest of the king's pious invitation; not that Hoshea did in any way oppose it, for it doth not appear that he did. On the contrary, as he is recorded to have been far less wicked than any of his predecessors <sup>c</sup>, it is probable the bad situation of his affairs may have induced him to embrace any means that would render providence more propitious to him. However, those of his subjects who came to the feast, either had not had time enough to purify themselves, or, which is as probable, the very memory of those necessary preparatives had been quite obliterated in Israel, during so long an interval of disuse, so that they ventured to eat the passover with the rest, without regard to the illegality of it. Some therefore acquainted Hezekiah with it; but the king, who had nothing more at heart than to cherish their pious zeal, easily overlooked that circumstance, and only prayed to God to do the same. However, for the sake of those of his own people, who were also unpurified, among whom were several priests and Levites, he ordered the festival to be celebrated another seven days, that none might be excluded from it. This solemnity, the like to which had not been observed since the latter end of Solomon's reign <sup>f</sup>, inspired the people with such uncommon zeal, that as soon as they were dismissed from it, they went about destroying all the old relicks of idolatry, each in their respective countries, the king himself encouraging them by his example, till he had utterly cleared his kingdom from them. Even the very brazen serpent, which Moses had caused to be set up in the wilderness <sup>e</sup>, did Hezekiah cause to be broken in pieces, because he found that the people had offered incense to it, and, in contempt, called it Nebushtan; that is, a piece of brass <sup>h</sup>.

HIS next care was to restore all the branches of the worship of God, to make an exact scrutiny into the genealogies of the priests, Levites, and musicians, in order to settle their several classes, according to David's model. He provided for their maintenance, by reviving the laws of Moses concerning the first-fruits, tithes, redemption, vows, and such-like, relating to the Levitical revenues, and appointed proper officers for receiving them; so that by October following, by which time all the fruits are brought in, they had received their income, and proper distribution had been made of it among them <sup>i</sup>. Hezekiah, all this while, was blessed with success equal to his piety; and as soon as he found himself strong enough to free himself from the tribute which the Assyrians had forced from his predecessor, he withheld his hand from paying it, and turned his forces against the Philistines, over whom he got such considerable advantages, that he regained, with usury, all that they had gotten during Ahaz's unhappy reign <sup>j</sup>.

Hezekiah's success.

Israel invaded.

IT fared quite otherwise with the kingdom of Israel, and Hoshea, little thinking how near it was come to its final period, was only thinking how to free it from the Assyrian bondage. But Sabalmaneser, who kept, no doubt, a watchful eye over him, did soon discover and break all his measures. To work his overthrow more effectually, and that he might leave no enemy behind to stop his progress, he took care to secure the land of Moab, by razing their two chief cities <sup>k</sup>, according to

Isaiab's

I

<sup>a</sup> 2 Chron. xxx. 6, & seq.    <sup>b</sup> 2 Kings xvii. 2.    <sup>c</sup> 2 Chron. xxx. pass.    <sup>d</sup> Numb. xxi. 8, & seq.
<sup>e</sup> 2 Kings xviii. 4.    <sup>f</sup> 2 Chron. xxxi. pass.    <sup>g</sup> See before, p. 359. b.    <sup>h</sup> Ibid. p. 292. a, b.
See also Cler's Ann. sub A. M. 3280.

(O) This shews that Tiglath-pileser, or his successor, had invaded part of Hoshea's kingdom; and it is probable, that it was at this time that he laid it under a tribute; unless we will suppose, with some authors (77), that it had began in Pul's time: See the next note.

Isaiab's prophecy denounced three years before<sup>1</sup>, and laying waste all that land and that of Israel, till he was come to the gates of Samaria, and had laid close siege to it. Hoshea, who had not been able to make head against him, had how-<sup>Samaria be-</sup> ever so well fortified himself in that city, that it held out almost three years against<sup>sieged and</sup> the Affyrian king. The text gives us no further particulars, either of this siege or<sup>taken,</sup> war, except, that after the taking of that metropolis, the rest of the kingdom was forced to submit to the conqueror, and that both the king and all his subjects were carried away into captivity, and disposed of into the same provinces of that empire, whither their brethren had been sent in a former reign (P); but we have a dreadful account of it in some of the prophets, who describe the distress of the b people in the strongest terms<sup>m</sup>. The Affyrians committed the most horrid cruelties against their captives, ripping up their pregnant women, and dashing their children against the ground<sup>n</sup>; and having reduced Samaria into a heap of rubbish<sup>o</sup>, and laid waste all the land, returned home laden with the spoil of Israel. As for the land into which the ten tribes were carried, it has been sought in vain by the learned of all ages: what the most probable conjecture is concerning it, will be best seen in the next chapter. This was the sad and fatal end of the Israelitish kingdom<sup>p</sup>, after it had stood divided from that of Judab 254 years<sup>q</sup>. It happened in the 6th year of Hezekiab, and in the 9th of Hoshea. A great number, however, of the Israelites did escape with their lives, some into Egypt, and a much greater number c into the kingdom of Judab; where they weaned themselves by degrees from their former idolatries and rebellion, and became subjects to Hezekiab and his successors.
On the other hand, the Affyrians, Josephus says Shalmaneser<sup>r</sup>, but it was more probably his successor, sent colonies from several of their provinces, but chiefly from Cutbab, to repopulate the land of Israel, from whence these new inhabitants came to be called Cutbeans<sup>s</sup> (Q).

Hezekiab all this while had enjoyed a profound peace in his kingdom; and Sennacherib, the new king of Affyria, contenting himself with the tribute which both he and his predecessor paid to him, had suffered him to enjoy the fruits of his piety and conquests; but as soon as he found him to fail in it, he came against d him with such a powerful army, and took from him a great number of fortified cities, in so short a time, as seemed to threaten nothing less than the total ruin of the whole kingdom. Hezekiab, who saw his error too late, had no way left to retrieve it, but by a speedy submission; he sent an embassy to Sennacherib, acknowledging his fault, and promising him to submit to whatever terms he should impose upon him; and accompanied it with the richest presents, for which he was forced to strip the temple and his own treasury of all their silver and gold. This wrought so well upon the conqueror, at least for the present, that he returned with his army, without inflicting any other penalty, than a yearly tribute of 300 talents of silver, and 30 talents of gold. But this respite, though so dearly bought, did not

<sup>1</sup> Isai. xv. 1. <sup>m</sup> Hosha. pass. <sup>n</sup> Ch. x. 8, 14. <sup>o</sup> Micah i. 6, & alib. <sup>p</sup> 2 Kings xvii. pass.
<sup>q</sup> Vid. USSER. Ann. in A. M. 3283. See also before, p. 733. c. <sup>r</sup> Ant. l. ix. c. 14. <sup>s</sup> 2 Kings xvii.
24. Vid. JOSEPH. ubi sup.

(P) The first book of the Chronicles tells us, that God stirred up Pul and Tiglath-pileser, kings of Affyria, against the impious Israelites; and that the latter did carry away the two tribes and half from beyond Jordan, and sent them into the countries of Hala, Habor, and Hara, and to the river Gozan (78). And the book of Tobit adds, that the tribe of Naphthali, of which Tobit was, being carried away by Enemasser, who is the same with Shalma- neser, was placed in the province of Media, and himself in the capital of it, called Rages, where he left ten talents with his kinsman (79). What those countries were, which we mentioned out of the Chro- nicles, and how they are understood, belongs to another chapter; but it is plain by this, that there was at least a double invasion of the land of Israel by the Affyrians, and a double captivity.

(Q) The text adds (80), that these new colonies were like to have been destroyed by lions; Josephus says by pestilence (81), upon their very first settlement, for their disregard to God; so that they were forced to send into Affyria, to desire the king to send them some Israelitish priests, to instruct them how to worship and appease him. This being complied with, they set themselves immediately about it, but without forsaking that of their own gods, which they had brought from their respective countries.

And here began a new kind of religion, not unlike that of the Israelites; consisting in the worship of the true God, and of a number of false deities.
Hence sprang that mutual hatred between the Jews and Samaritans, the former abominating even the name of the latter; and these always disclaiming any kindred with them, in time of adversity, tho' forward enough to claim it in time of prosperity (82).

(78) Chap. v. ult.
l. 9. c. 14.

(79) Chap. i. pass.
(82) Idem ibid.

(80) 2 Kings xvii. 25, & seq.

(81) Ant.

not last long; for the treacherous Assyrian king, who continued still at Lachish, did a soon after send his army, under the command of Tartan, Rabsharis, and Rabshakeh, directly against Jerusalem; so that Hzekiab saw himself in much greater danger than ever of losing his kingdom and liberty, if not his life.

WHILST these were coming against him, the king made all proper preparations for a brave defence; he fortified the city, repaired the wall of it, surrounded it with another wall, fenced it with towers, and laid in good store of arms and provisions for the siege. He likewise caused all the fountains about the city to be stopped, and the course of the brook Gibon, which watered all that region, to be turned another way, to cut off as much as possible all supply of water from the enemy. This done, he called together all his chief officers to one of the gates of the city; b and exhorted them, in a grave and pious speech, to rely wholly upon God, to behave with becoming valour, and by no means to be discouraged at the number and strength of the faithless Assyrians†. It is not, indeed, easy to determine, whether a) this was done before his recovery from a dangerous illness, or after it; more probably the latter, and that his imminent danger, and the treachery of Sennacherib, brought it upon him; for about this time he was seized with a dangerous disease (R), and forewarned by the prophet Isaiab to set his affairs in order, since he would certainly die of it. The good king, who about a year or two before had received a severe reproof from that prophet, and probably also about the same time from Micub the Morashite, for trusting too much upon Egypt, and seeking for help from thence<sup>c</sup>, received the dreadful summons with inexpressible grief, not doubting, in all likelihood, but that he had provoked God by it to shorten his days, he being then but in the 38th year of his age<sup>u</sup>. Jesphus attributes this excessive sorrow to another cause, namely, his dying then without an heir to succeed him<sup>w</sup>; which is not at all improbable, because his son was but twelve years old when he ascended the throne<sup>x</sup>. As soon, therefore, as the prophet was gone, Hzekiab turned himself towards the wall, and addressed himself to God in the most humble and pathetic terms, accompanied with a flood of tears, which proved such powerful advocates with the divine mercy, that the prophet, who was scarce got out of the palace, was commanded by God to return, and carry the dying d monarch the joyful news of his recovery, which would prove so speedy, that he should be able, within three days, to go to the temple, and pay his thanks to God for it. And, as a farther proof of the efficacy of his prayer, Isaiab was bid to assure him, that his life should be prolonged fifteen years, and himself and his kingdom be delivered from the impending danger (S)<sup>y</sup>.

THESE glorious promises did not, however, gain credit with the desponding king; he could not easily reconcile two such different messages from the same prophet, and therefore thought that he had a right to insist upon some more signal proof to assure him of the last. The prophet soon obtained, by his prayers, such an authentick proof, as should at once convince, both him and his whole e kingdom, that it was backed with the divine sanction. It was a retrogradation of ten degrees of the sun's shadow, by the dial of the royal palace (T); after which, a cata-

† Kings xviii. 13, & seq.    <sup>c</sup> Comp. 2 Kings xviii. 21.    2 Chron. xxxii. 24, & seq.    Isai. xxx, & seq. & Jerem. xxvi. 18.    <sup>u</sup> Comp. 2 Kings xviii. and the last note.    <sup>w</sup> Ant. l. x. c. 1.    <sup>x</sup> See 2 Kings xxi. 1.    <sup>y</sup> 2 Kings xx. 1, & seq.    Isai. xxxviii. per tot.

(R.) This disease, if we may guess at it by the remedy which the prophet applied to it, and by the speediness of the cure, seems to have been a kind of quincy, or imposthume in his throat, which was happily broke by the lump of dried figs.

(S.) This sickness of the king is, indeed, postponed in the sacred history, and related after that of his deliverance from the Assyrian host (83); but it is plain, that it must have happened before it; 1. Because the prophet assures the king from God, both of that deliverance, and of his recovery; and 2. Because he promises him an addition of fifteen years reign (84). Now Hzekiab reigned but twenty-nine years in all (85), from which the fifteen being subtracted, it is plain that he fell ill in the 14th year of his reign, which was the year in which the king of Assyria began to invade his kingdom (86).

(T.) The text runs literally thus in the original; And the Lord brought back the shadow of the steps, or degrees, which was gone down by the dial, or degrees of Abaz, ten degrees or steps (87), which we purposely take notice of here, as we did before of a parallel miracle †, to shew that the sacred historian had expressed him in such terms as were within reach of the vulgar, and yet very compatible with the solar system now commonly received.

It

(83) 2 Kings xx. 1, & seq.    Isai. xxxviii. 1, & seq.    (84) 2 Kings ibid. ver. 6.    (85) Ibid. chap. xviii. 2.    (86) Ibid. ver. 13.    Vid. UssER. sub A. M. 3291. p. 70.    (87) 2 Kings xx. 11.    † Vid. sup. p. 558. not. G.

a cataplasm of dried figs was effectually applied by the prophet's direction; and the king, thus happily recovered by the time appointed, composed that noble psalm wherein he expresses the exquisiteness of his anguish and grief, acknowledges the infinite mercy of his divine deliverer, and promises to be everlastingly thankful for it. The next part of the prophet's promise, the deliverance from the Assyrian power, did not remain long unfulfilled. The generals presented themselves at the

It is true that Isaiab, who relates the story in almost the same words, and mentions only the shadow, when he puts it to the king's option, whether it should go backwards or forwards, doth add, that the sun went back ten of the degrees which he had gone (88). But it is plain, that he intends no more than the rays of it. Thus the Psalmist says, The sun shall not hurt thee by day, nor the moon by night (89); and in Jonab, that the sun beat upon his head (90), by which can be only meant his beams. There is nothing more common than that expression in all languages, the sun comes in at such a window, or such a part of the house, and the like. The words, therefore, of the prophet, may be naturally rendered thus; and the beams of the sun (being miraculously inflected) caused the shadow to go back over ten of the degrees, or steps, which it had past upon Ahaz's dial, or flight of steps. This was miracle sufficient to convince the doubtful king, without magnifying, or rather multiplying it, as many of the fathers, and others after them, have done.

For to suppose, as they do, that the whole fabric of the universe went back, or even that the earth alone did so, was not only needless, because the business was not to lengthen the day, as it was in Josua, but only to put the shadow back so many degrees: but it seems to carry a further absurdity; for either this extraordinary motion must have been caused all at once, which, considering the velocity of the earth's motion, much more that of the universe round it, is scarcely conceivable; or if it was done gradually, it would hardly have been perceived, in case Hezekiab had chosen to have the shadow go forward instead of backward. By the tenor, however, of the whole history, it seems as if the thing was done in an instant, and not gradually. What need then is there to suppose that God did interpose his miraculous power, to cause such a retrogression, even in the bare earth, when the end might be answered by the sole inflection of the sun's rays? To say that either of them was equally easy to an omnipotent power, is too unphilosophical to deserve an answer, because it were absurd to suppose, that God acts with less economy in his supernatural, than he doth in his natural works.

This hypothesis of the inflection of the rays, which is now the most received, because attended with fewest difficulties, will save us a great many needless inquiries, such are those that follow; What portion of time is implied by those ten degrees: How much the day was lengthened by it: Whether this miraculous irregularity was afterwards recovered, and the course of nature was again hastened, by the same miraculous power, to its pristine harmony, either by subtracting as much from the night as had been added to the day, or by any other way: Whether the miracle was felt all the world over, or only in Judea? And many more of the like nature.

The Jews, indeed, who are ever ready to help us at a pinch, do tell us, that God, who had already shortened one day by ten hours, when wicked Ahaz died, that there might be no mourning made for him, did only restore the universe in statu quo upon this occasion. But such an expeditious way of answering all those enquiries, will scarcely be allowed of by any but Jews. However, Archbishop Usher, who believed that the whole frame of heaven went backward at this time, doth yet observe, that the divine providence so ordered it, that the constant and ever self-like motion and harmony of heavenly bodies, did receive no hinderance from it: he proves it by three previous eclipses of the moon, out of Ptolemy, whose calculation being traced back from this time, coincide as exactly with the Chaldean account, as if no such retrogression had happened in nature (91). But is not this multiplying the miracle without any necessity?

But what confirms still farther our opinion, that all the whole miracle consisted in the bare reversion of the sun's beams, is, that if either the sun or the earth be supposed to have gone back so many degrees, it must have been perceived all over the world. But the contrary seems plain to us, from the embassy which Meredach-Baladan sent to Hezekiab, to inform himself about this miraculous phenomenon (92); for if it had been seen at Babylon, there would have been no necessity for sending into Judea to know the truth of it; and it is hardly to be supposed, that he sent thither to be informed about the cause of it. The Babylonians were much better astronomers than the Jews, or rather, these last were known to be perfectly ignorant of that science, as we have seen elsewhere †. It seems then much more probable, that this retrogression was only felt about Judea; and if so, it cannot be better accounted for, than by supposing an inflection of the sun's rays.

We need not add, that if it had been felt all the world over, or even beyond Judea, we should certainly find some footsteps of it in profane history; it being hardly to be supposed, that so remarkable a change could go unobserved, or unrecorded, at a time when the world did yield so many good astronomers and historians; or that the memory of it should be since entirely lost, when we can find so many footsteps of the sun's standing still in Josua's time, that is, upwards of 730 years before (93). For these reasons, we shall wave all farther enquiries which result from the other side of the question, and only add some few remarks concerning the most probable figure of the dial in the text.

And here let it be considered, 1. That the original מַעְלִילִית me'aloth, doth signify no more than steps or stairs. 2. That the Septuagint and Chaldees paraphrasts render it, the former ἀνακαθήμενος, and the latter by אֶבֶן שְׁעוֹרָא a stone of time, accordingly. 3. That the Jews did not reckon by, or had even a name for hours, before the captivity (94). 4. That the invention of gnomon dials is reckoned of much later date, it being attributed to Anaximander, who did not flourish till almost 200 years after Hezekiab. And lastly, that there is not a word of a sun-dial in all the writings of Homer. All these will, at least, amount to a strong presumption, that it must have been a kind of steep ascent, leading the foot of the city wall, to demand a parly with Hezekiah's ministers; and as soon as these appeared upon the battlements, attended with vast crouds of people, who came to hear the purport of their message, Rabshakeb addressed himself to them in a haughty and threatening speech, filled with the bitterest invectives and opprobrious language, not only against the king, but even against the God of Israel. It was spoken in the Hebrew tongue, to inject the greater terror into the listening people; and when they were desired to speak in Syriac to them, instead of complying with their request, they only renewed their threatnings of reducing the kingdom to the worst extremities, unless they prevented it by a timely yielding of themselves captives to the great Sennacherib.*

(88) Cbron. xxxvi. 8. (89) Psal. cxi. 6. (90) Jonab iv. 8. (91) Sub A. M. 3291. p. 71. (92) Vid. 2 Cbron. xxxii. 31. † Vid. sup. p. 729. c. d. (93) Josb. x. 12. See also before, p. 558, & seq. (94) Vid. sup. p. 729. c.

THIS vapouring speech was, by the king's order, answered only by a deep b silence; but the Assyrian generals being soon after informed, that their master was forced to go back to defend his own territories against Tirbaka, king of Ethiopia, who was then invading him, they left Jerusalem, and marched directly after him. But before Sennacherib departed from Lacish, he sent a threatening letter to Hezekiah, to assure him, that if he still persisted in his refusal of yielding himself his captive, he would shortly come again with double fury against him, and make him severely feel the effects of his own folly and vain confidence in his God, whom he should find as weak and impotent against his irresistible power, as those of many other nations had hitherto proved. As soon as the king had read the letter, he went up to the temple, accompanied with his chief ministers, and spread it before the Lord, and, c in the humblest terms, besought him that he would make good his late promises, and vindicate his honour against his insolent and blasphemous enemy, who had dared to level the God of Heaven to the senseless idols of the more senseless heathen. He had scarce ended his prayer, when he received a gracious answer by the prophet Isaiab, importing, that though Sennacherib would certainly bring back his forces against Jerusalem, yet God would so protect it against them, that they should not shoot an arrow against, nor open a trench before it; that this proud insulting enemy should be forced to flee with shame and loss, and fall at length by the sword in his own land. This prophecy was likewise soon after verified. Sennacherib returned against Judab, flush'd with his late victory over the Ethiopians*, and d breathing death and destruction against the whole kingdom; but before he could have time to commit any hostilities against it, the best part of his army was smitten by an angel in one night, Josephus says with pestilence<sup>b</sup>, inasmuch that 185,000 of them were found dead by the next morning. This dreadful judgment did so alarm the proud Assyrian monarch, that he retired with the utmost confusion and speed into his own capital, where he was soon after assassinated by two of his sons, and succeeded by a third<sup>c</sup>. Thus was Isaiab's prophecy exactly fulfilled against that blasphemous tyrant<sup>d</sup>, and the kingdom delivered from the most imminent danger. As for Hezekiah, though one would expect that so many extraordinary blessings proud letter.*

*Sennacherib's

His miraculous overthrow.

2

would

* 2 Kings xviii. 17, to the end. 2 Chron. xxxii. 9, & seq. Isaiab xxxvi. 2. & seq. xxxvii. 1 ad 10.
<sup>b</sup> See Usher's sub A. M. 3292. ex Isaiab c. xviii. & xx. <sup>c</sup> Ant. l. x. c. 2. <sup>d</sup> 2 Kings xix. 1, & seq. to the end. 2 Chron. xxxii. 1 ad 22. Isaiab xxvi, xxvii. per tot. <sup>e</sup> Ibid.

ing up to the gate of the palace, and marked at proper distances with figures, shewing the division of the day, rather than a regular piece of dial-work.

We have, indeed, a much finer description of it in Grotius, out of one Rabbi Eliab Chomer, who pretends, that it was a regular globe placed in the center of a hollow hemisphere, on which were drawn, at proper distances, the several lines which divided the day into twenty-eight parts (95); but who can believe, after what has been observed above, that such a curious and compound piece of art could be the product of those early times? for our part, we cannot think that even this slight of steps was originally designed by the architect to serve both for that and for a sun-dial: On the contrary, it seems to us more probable upon the whole, that the latter use was owing to observation. Some ornaments, such as pyramids, obelisks, flower-pots, and the like, might have been placed upon the rails or battlements of the ascent, whose shadow being in time observed to go over those steps at proper periods of the day, might naturally induce some curious observer to mark down the several portions of the day; first into four parts, according to the Jewish custom of dividing it, and then into as many sub-divisions as was thought proper; so that all that we think is meant in the text before us, is, that the shadow of the obelisk, or whatever other ornament did serve instead of a gnomon, went back again over ten of those steps which it had already past. But what portion of time the shadow did usually take in going over those steps, is impossible to determine; however, though we have ventured to deliver this our opinion, as the result of what we find written upon the subjects; yet, for the satisfaction of such of our readers as desire to be further informed about it, we shall refer them to the authors quoted in the margin (96).

(95) Vid. GROT. in loc. (96) CYRIL. ALEX. & HIERON. in loc. & in Isaiab xxxviii. 8. SCALIG. GROT. VATABL. MÜNST. SALMAS. GASPAR. SANCTIUS. LE CLEBER, CALMET, & al.

a would have inspired him with sentiments of the deepest gratitude, yet they wrought a quite different effect upon him; so that instead of acknowledging the amazing goodness of his great deliverer, he suffered himself to be so elated, that he brought a train of evils upon himself and kingdom, which, however, upon his repentance, were adjourned till after his death*. Hezekiah was a pious prince, but vanity seems to have been his predominant passion, and to have been swelled to an unreasonable height by such a wonderful series of successes; and God made use of the following juncture, at once to make him sensible, and to cure him of it.

The king had, about this time, received a special embassy from Berodach, or, as Isaiab calls him, Merodach Baladan, king of Babylon, to congratulate him upon his late success and recovery, and to inform himself about the prodigy of the sun's retrogression†; and as his success and the spoils of his enemy had made him exceedingly rich, he took a particular pleasure in entertaining the ambassadors with a sight of all the wealth, grandeur and strength of his court and kingdom (V). This brought Isaiab to the king, who had no sooner acquainted him with his own weakness and ostentation, than he received this dreadful message from God; that those very Babylonians, whose eyes he had glutted with all the glory of his kingdom, would, in a short time, not only strip it of all that was valuable in it, but even carry away captive some of his off-spring, and make them eunuchs in their monarch's palace; at which Hezekiah was brought to such a sense of his oversight, that he acknowledged the mildness of the sentence, since he was suffered to end his days in peace‡. Among others of his publick acts, he is recorded to have made a large pool and a conduit, to supply Jerusalem with water; and to have been an encourager of husbandry, himself having numberless flocks and herds in his own pasture-grounds, besides vines and other grounds. He died in peace, in the 54th year of his age and 29th of his reign, according to the words of the prophet, and was buried in the chiefest of the sepulchres of the sons of David. His funeral obsequies were performed with uncommon magnificence, not only in the city, but also throughout the whole kingdom§ (W).

Year of the Flood, 2306.
Year before Christ, 693.

Manasseh was but 12 years of age when he succeeded Hezekiah; and whether he was naturally vicious, or fell into the hands of wicked counsellors, we may date the ruin both of the kingdom and religion from the fatal day of his ascending the throne. He seems not only to have strove to outdo all his predecessors in wickedness, idolatry, tyranny and sacrilege, but even to have shewed an impious emulation to undo all that his pious father had done, and to act in direct opposition to him. Hezekiah's first care had been to root out all idolatry out of his kingdom, and to restore the worship of God, and the service of the temple, to its pristine order a splendour. His graceless son, on the contrary, made it his study to banish religion and morality out of it, and to revive all the old idolatry, and to introduce new and unheard-of deities, idols and ceremonies; besides witch-craft, forceries, and every wicked custom that was used among the Heathen far and near. Baal became now the favourite object of his worship; the sun, moon, planets, and a vast multitude of other heathenish gods had also their altars and groves erected to them, both in Judab and in Jerusalem. Moloch and the valley of Hinnon became more frequented than ever, the impious king encouraging his subjects to sacrifice their children there as Abaz had done before. But the most execrable piece of wickedness and sacrilege was, his introducing the vilest of idolatries into the very temple of God, and causing a graven image of the grove, a filthy idol, worshipped with

Manasseh's wicked reign idolatries;

sacrilege.

* 2 Chron. xxxii. 25, 26. † Ibid. ver. 32. ‡ 2 Kings xx. 12, & seq. Isaiah xxxix. per tot.
§ Comp. 2 Kings xx. 20. & 2 Chron. xxxii. 32, & seq.

(V) The jubilee year seems likewise to have been about this time (97), at which solemnity there flocked a vast concourse of people to Jerusalem; which could not but add very much to the magnificence of that court, and metropolis, because, upon such occasions, the wealthy men of the kingdom were used to pour their rich presents into the temple, especially after such signal successes and deliverances as they had lately had; and the text says, that they did so accordingly (98).

(W) Besides the prophets Isaiab and Micah, of whom we have had occasion to speak, Nabum did likewise prophesy in the days of Hezekiah. It is he who foretold the dreadful destruction of Nineveh, which happened afterwards in the days of Josiah, and describes it in the most lively colour, comparing it to that of No, a populous city in Lower Egypt, lately taken by the Assyrians, who committed the most horrid cruelties against her inhabitants (99).

(97) Vid. UssER. in A. M. 3295. (98) 2 Chron. xxxii. 23, & seq. (99) Nab. pass. &c. 3, 8. & seq.

with the filthiest ceremonies, to be set up in the most sacred (X) place; as if he<sup>a</sup> had designed to drive the God of Israel out of his habitation, and to disclaim at once all those great blessings which he had made to David and Solomon, and to all that did worship him there<sup>1</sup>.

His murders and tyranny.

For these abominations he was often and severely reproved by several prophets, who foretold him, that he was provoking God to bring such dreadful desolations upon him and his kingdom; that Jerusalem would become like a dish that is wiped clean and turned upside down. But these threatnings were so far from reforming, that they hardened him the more, and made him seek only for the most violent means to silence not only those prophets, but all that dared to express a dislike to his impieties. Jerusalem became soon after the scene of the most horrid cruelties, b which Manasseh, now become a tyrant of the first magnitude, caused to be exercised on prophets and priests, nobles and people, indifferently, till he had filled that metropolis with blood, and with butchered bodies, from the one end to the other<sup>k</sup>. At length, providence was pleased to put a signal stop to his bloody career, by delivering him into the hands of some of the chief commanders of the Assyrian army, who came upon him so suddenly, that seeing no way to escape, he went and hid himself in a thicket. He was, however, soon brought out of it, and laden with chains, carried away into Babylon, and there cast into a dungeon by Esar-baddon or Assaradin, king of Assyria, who, according to Ptolemy's canon, had made himself master of Babylon about six years before, and was by this time c become sole monarch over both empires<sup>1</sup>.

His miserable captivity.

THE text doth neither tell us how this was done, whether by an open invasion, or, which seems more likely, by some sudden incursion, nor in what year of Manasseh's reign it happened; the Jews affirm, that it was in the 22d year, in which they are followed by the generality of our annalists. However that be, the distressed king soon opened his eyes to all his miscarriages and impieties, which his prosperity would not suffer him to see; and in the bitterness of his soul, did send so many deep sighs to heaven, so humble an acknowledgment of his fault, and such earnest prayers for mercy and pardon, that he at length obtained both that, and a happy deliverance out of his captivity. How long his imprisonment lasted d (Z), or by what means he regained his liberty, the text doth not say; thus much is plain from it, that from the greatest sinner, he returned the greatest penitent (A), and from the bloodiest tyrant, became one of the best monarchs. So that

Restored to his liberty.
His repentance and reformation.

<sup>1</sup> 2 Sam. vii. 13. 1 Kings viii. 29. ix. 3. & al. pass. xxxiii. 1 ad 10. <sup>1</sup> See USSEK sub A. M. 3323.

<sup>2</sup> See 2 Kings xxi. 1 ad 16. 2 Chron.

(X) Some think that he did even cause the ark to be taken out of the most holy place, to make room for his molten idol; because it is said in the Chronicles, that Josiah did order the Levites to deposit it again into its place (100); but from the words which do immediately follow, it shall be no longer a burden upon your shoulders, or unto you, we are more inclined to think, that the priests had timely conveyed it out of the sanctuary, before the idol was brought in; and that it had been kept in their custody till Josiah's reign.

(Y) These remarkable circumstances are not mentioned in the book of Kings, which says only, that he reigned fifty-five years, without taking notice either of his captivity, repentance, or reformation. All these particulars are only found in the Chronicles (1).

Archbishop Usher observes (2) from the following chapters out of the same author, that the kingdom of Israel had not been so far emptied of its inhabitants, but that there was a considerable remnant of them left behind, the far greater part of whom were carried away captive about the same time, and perhaps, by the same forces which took Manasseh prisoner. This last and total captivity, that prelate thinks to have been foretold by Isaiah about sixty-five years before against Israel, under the name of Ephraim (3). We read, indeed, of several Israelitish tribes being invited to the passover at Jerusalem in a succeeding reign; but we take them to be those who came and sheltered themselves in the kingdom of Judah during the siege of Samaria, to escape being carried into bondage by the Assyrian king; as we hinted under the last reign.

(Z) Some will have it, that it lasted as long as Esar-baddon lived; that is, as our Chronologers compute it, about six years (4). Josephus only says, that the king of Babylon gave him his liberty after some time, but doth not say how long (5); but the general opinion is, that he was set free in the very same year that he was taken prisoner. This is also the opinion of the Talmudists, who place both his repentance and imprisonment in the 34th year of his age; and this seems the more probable of the two, because the author of the book of Kings makes no mention of this captivity, but allows him his fifty-five years reign, as if no such thing had happened to him.

(A) We have a prayer among the apocryphal books of the old testament, intituled, The prayer of Manasseh king of Judah, when he was holden captive in Babylon, which, if it was penned by him, expresses the a that after his return, he bestowed his whole time and application in repairing the damages which his impiety had caused, both in religion and in his kingdom. One of his first cares was to clear the sanctuary, and the court of the temple, of those idols which he had caused to be set up there, and which the priests had not had the courage, or power to remove during his absence; and to restore the service of it to its antient order and splendor. He then sent circular letters throughout his kingdom, exhorting his subjects to follow his example, and to demolish all the groves, altars, and idols, which had been reared during the former part of his reign, and this was readily complied with also by the people every where; only the b high places were left untouched, the king wanting either power, courage, or zeal to go through with these, by reason of the peoples obstinate fondness for them. He took the same care to repair and fortify the city and other places of his kingdom; and having reigned peaceably about 33 years after his return from Babylon, he died in the 55th year of his reign, and 67th of his age. He was buried in his own garden, probably by his own choice, the sense of his former miscarriages not suffering him to think himself worthy to be deposited among his ancestors; and was succeeded by his son Ammon<sup>m</sup>.

(100) 2 Chron. xxxv. 3. (1) Ibid. xxxiii. 11, & seq. (2) Sub A. M. 3327. (3) Isaiah vii. 8. (4) Vid. USSEK. ubi sup. CALMET. Hist. V. T. sub A. M. 3310. (5) Ant. l. x. c. 4.

His death.
Year of the
Flood, 2356.
Year before
Christ, 643.

Ammon was but 22 years old when he came to the crown, so that he could have observed nothing in his father's example, but the greatest tokens of piety and goodness; and yet so infatuated was he, that he gave himself up to all the vile idolatries of the former part of his reign. He began even to give some early proofs, c that he designed to outdo him in his most abominable debaucheries; but before he had reigned two years, a conspiracy was formed against him by some of his chief officers, who assassinated him in his own palace, and buried him in the same garden with his father. They did not however go long unpunished: the inhabitants of Jerusalem, who had had no share in this rebellion, rose up in arms immediately upon the news of it, and having revenged their king's murder by that of the conspirators, they placed his son Josiah upon the throne, who was then about eight years of age<sup>n</sup>.

*Ammon's
idolatry,*

and death.

It is amazing to think how the whole kingdom could be so soon over-run with d all kind of wickedness and idolatry in the short time of Ammon's reign, after it had been so thoroughly purged from them by his father; and yet it was grown to such a degree of impiety when Josiah came to the crown, that the prophet Zephaniah, who was cotemporary with him, gives us a most dreadful catalogue of the licentiousness and irreligion, that then reigned through the whole kingdom. Among the princes, judges, and magistrates, reigned injustice, oppression, cruelty, and all manner of debauchery; among the priests, pride, avarice, corruption, and a shameful traffick of religion; among the people, ignorance and irreligion, men swearing with the same breath by the Lord and by Malcom; altars reared every where to Baal, to the whole host of heaven, and to all the other deities of the heathen<sup>o</sup>; the very sanctuary itself was again polluted by the filthy idol of the grove, and its court furnished with male prostitutes, and with women who wove hangings, and tents to hide the unnatural and abominable ceremonies of its votaries<sup>p</sup>.

In this sad and horrid condition was the kingdom, when the infant monarch took the reins of it; so that it required nothing less than a miracle to reform it. But as Josiah had been miraculously promised above 300 years before, by a prophet sent on purpose to Jeroboam at Bethel †, one who was to work the greatest reformation that ever reign.*

*Josiah's good

<sup>m</sup> 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11 ad 20.

<sup>n</sup> Ibid. xxxiv. ver. 21, to the end.

2 Kings xxi. 19, & seq.

<sup>o</sup> Zephani. pass. iii. 1, & seq.

<sup>p</sup> Vid. 2 Kings xxiii. 4, 6, & seq.

† See before, p. 805. d.

the greatness of his guilt, repentance, and misery, in the strongest terms; particularly with respect to the last, it has this expression, that he was so loaded with iron bands, that he could not lift up his head. But we have a more authentic proof of these, the wonderful change that was wrought in him; though we should be loth to deny that this prayer was composed by him during his imprisonment, because we find an expression in the book of Chronicles (6), which shews, at least, that there was some such prayer of his composing kept upon record; and it is scarce possible to pen one more expressive of his misery and repentance, than this we are speaking of.

It was also about this time, or soon after it, that the siege of Bethulia happened, at which Holofernes was treacherously murdered by Judith; but as the story is apocryphal, and has no connexion with the history of the kings of Judah, we shall say no more of it here.

(6) 2 Chron. xxxiii. 19.

A total reformation in his kingdom.

ever was done in the land, since it was to reach through the two kingdoms, and a this Josiah was the person designed by God for that glorious work. However, his tender years would not permit him immediately to undertake any thing, except perhaps advising with such pious counsellors, as could best instruct him, both about what was to be done, and the properest means of accomplishing it. He married in the 15th year of his age, and in the 16th he had a son and successor born unto him, whom he named Eliakim (B); after which he set himself about his premeditated design, with a zeal, diligence and intrepidity, which, considering his years, and the arduousness of the task, could be owing to nothing less than a supernatural impulse. His extraordinary success and expedition, and the universal destruction he made both in Judah and Israel, not only of all the idols, altars, groves, and other idolatrous monuments, but also of the high places, which several of his predecessors had in vain attempted to abolish, do shew, indeed, that he was assisted by the same divine power that had inspired him with the design. This last kind of worship was not indeed an idolatrous one, because it was directed to the God of Israel, to whom the priests, the sons of Aaron, offered sacrifices upon those altars which had formerly been reared by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; but it was afterwards expressly forbid by the law of Moses, and the tabernacle and temple ordered to be the only places for such sacrifices, unless it was otherwise commanded by inspired persons, and upon some particular occasions, as we have elsewhere hinted *. The more effectually therefore to cure this obstinate evil, Josiah caused all those places to be polluted with dead mens bones, and ordered all those priests who had vacated at that unlawful worship, to be for ever excluded both from all sacerdotal functions, and from the privilege of eating of any holy things. He likewise ordered all the wooden idols, altars, and other combustible materials, which had served to any idolatrous purposes, together with the chariots and horses which had been dedicated to the sun (C), the vessels where the perpetual fire was kept to his honour, the image of the grove, and all that he found of that nature in the temple, to be burnt, and the ashes of them to be thrown over the graves of their votaries; and those that could not be burnt, he caused to be flung into the river Kidron.

FROM Jerusalem he went to the mount of Olives, called also the mount of corruption, from the great number of idolatrous altars which had been set up there by Solomon, and repaired, from time to time, by several of his impious successors, and demolished and defiled them all. He did the same at the valley of Hinnon, a place infamous for the horrid cruelties that were practised by the worshippers of Moloch; and thence marched directly to Bethel, the place where Jeroboam, the first king of Israel, set up one of his golden calves; which he destroyed, together with the groves, idols, and altars, causing the bodies of the idolatrous priests to be digged

* See before, p. 662. not. H:

(B) Probably, in full confidence that God would prosper his design; עֲלִיָּאִים Eliakim signifying, God shall establish, make to prosper, &c. the text doth not indeed mention the time of his birth, but it is easily inferred, from his being 25 years old when he began to reign (7); for his father died in the 39th year of his reign (8), and was succeeded at first by Jehoahaz, who was younger by two years than Eliakim, whom Pharaoh-Necho set upon the throne some three months after (9).

(C) These chariots and horses, the text says (10), stood at the entrance into the house of the Lord; but whether they were real, or only carved or molten, is not easy to determine. The ancient Persians, we are told, did indeed use to consecrate white horses and chariots to the sun, with which they adorned their processions (11); in which they were imitated afterwards by other nations (12). We can see no reason, therefore, why so many learned commentators should scruple to suppose that the Jews had adopted this, among other far worse heathenish idolatries, and rather chuse to fancy, that these chariots and horses were only carved, or cast, and set up in a chapel dedicated to the sun, or barely carved in bass-relievo, or even painted against the walls of it; especially, considering how soon the prophet Amos, and from him St. Stephen (13), charges them with having carried about the tabernacle of Moloch, that is, of the sun, as we have shewed more than once, and the star of their god Remphan.

What convinces us farther that these were real chariots drawn by horses, and bearing some image of the sun, is, that the text expressly says here, that Josiah did not burn chariots and horses, as he would have done, if they had been only carved or painted, but that he took away the horses, and burnt the chariots (14). The reader may, if he pleases, see what we have observed concerning this kind of idolatrous processions in another place, out of some verses of the xviiith psalm †.

(7) Vid 2 Kings xxiii. 36. (8) Ibid. xxii. 1. (9) Ibid. xxiii. 31, & seq. (10) Ibid. ver. 11. (11) Vid. HERODOT. lib. 7. XENOPH. Q. CURT. al. & QVID. Fist. lib. 1. JUSTIN. l. 1. § 10. Vid. & BOCHART. HIEROZ. pt. I. l. 2. c. 10. & al. (12) Vid. HINDS. Rel. vet. Pers. KOPPING. Ant. Rom. (13) Amos vi. 25. Acts vii. 43. (14) 2 Kings xxiii. 11. † Vid. sup. p. 531. not. O.

a ged up, and burnt upon them. It was upon this occasion, that having observed a kind of monumental inscription upon one of the tombs, he was informed, that it was that of the prophet who came from Judah, to denounce to Jeroboam that total destruction of idolatry, which he was then fulfilling; whereupon the good king ordered, that a particular regard should be paid to his ashes; by this means, those of the lying prophet, who had been the cause of his disobedience, and untimely death, and had ordered his body to be buried close by him, escaped being disturbed, and, perhaps, being burned with the rest. After this, Josiah took a circuit through all the cities of Israel, many of which lay almost desolate, and destroyed every where the idols and altars, which either the Israelites or the Assyrian colonies had set up, and put all their idolatrous priests to death; and having thoroughly purged both kingdoms from every kind of idolatry, he returned to Jerusalem, and set himself about restoring the worship of God, and the usual service of the temple (D).

By this time Josiah had attained to the 26th year of his age, and 18th of his reign, and beheld, with regret, the dilapidations of that sacred place, which made it necessary to have them repaired before all things. To this end, he ordered the great coffer, into which the poll-money and free-will offerings used to be deposited, to be opened, and the money to be distributed among such faithful overseers, as would set about the work out of hand; and to encourage them to be doubly diligent in it, he told them, that he would depend upon their fidelity for their right management of the money committed to them. Whilst this was doing, the high-priest, who probably presided over the work, sent word to the king that he had found the book of the law (E), which he had sent to him by the secretary of the temple.

(D) It is very likely that the king was encouraged to this good work by the prophet Jeremiah, who began to prophesy in the 13th year of his reign (15). Jeremiah was a prophet altogether miraculous, being chosen to this office even from the womb, and called to the exercise of it whilst he was but a child; he was the son of Hilkiah, not the then high-priest of that name, as some have imagined, but of the race of Ithamar, and lived at Anathoth (16), a place within two or three miles from Jerusalem, it being the seat of one of their ancestors (17); so that it is hardly possible that he should be unknown to so pious a prince. It is true, we find nothing like it in his writings; but it must be remembered, that he delivered his prophecies at first only by word of mouth, and did not begin to pen them down till the fourth year of Jehoiakim; but we find him very early at the gates of the temple, denouncing God's heavy judgments against Judah, and exhorting them to avert his anger, by abandoning their impieties and idolatries (18). As he continued to prophesy till the taking of Jerusalem, and was often consulted by several kings and nobles, we shall have occasion more than once to speak of him in the sequel.

Zephaniah did likewise prophesy in the same reign, and much to the same purpose with what we mentioned of Jeremiah; the main scope of their prophecies being chiefly levelled against the various abominations committed in Judah and Jerusalem (19); and both were probably designed to exhort the people to imitate the king's zeal and piety, and to prevent their murmuring against, or obstructing his reformation.

(E) This is generally agreed to have been the archetype, written by Moses, and by him ordered to be deposited, with the ark, into the most holy place (20), but which some pious high-priest had caused to be thus hid, in the reign of Abaz or Manasseh, to prevent its being destroyed with all the other copies of it; for it plainly appears by the tenor of the history, that this was the only perfect one left (21).

But it is much disputed, whether it was the whole Pentateuch, emphatically called התורה hatorah, the law, or only Deuteronomy; or even barely the 28th, 29th, 30th, and 31st chapters of it. Josephus, by calling it the sacred books of Moses (22), seems to declare intirely for the first; others have declared for the second (23), because the book of Deuteronomy is a kind of repetition, or epitome of the Mosaic law; lastly, a late commentator, among some others, holds the last of these three opinions (24); and thinks that nothing more is meant here, than that short summary which is found in the 28th, and three following chapters of that book, in which are contained all the blessings and curses which so alarmed the pious monarch. This is, indeed, that part, which we observed elsewhere, Moses enjoined their future kings to write, and preserve a double copy of, to regulate their conduct by (25), and which he commanded Joshua to set up upon mount Garizim (26); perhaps it might also be all that he ordained to be read by the priests, in the audience of all the people, every seventh year, at the feast of Tabernacles (27); though it is called the law in all those places.

But if either this short epitome, or even the whole Deuteronomy, was all that the high-priest found hid in the temple, when was the rest of the Pentateuch recovered? If it be said, that there might be some copies of this last still extant, then this summary must have been in it; and it will be surprising that some one or more should not have been brought to so good a king, after he had given such signal proofs of his piety and zeal; and if any such had been presented temple. Josiah delayed not to read it; and when he found what dreadful judgments were denounced in it, against those very abominations with which he had found the whole land over-run at his first coming to the crown, he rent his cloaths, and expressed the most lively tokens of grief, not doubting but both he, and his whole kingdom, would soon feel the effects of those threatenings. There lived at that time, in one of the colleges of Jerusalem, a famed prophetess named Huldah; to her therefore Josiah dispatched some of his prime officers, with the high-priest at their head, to inquire what would be the fate both of the king and people, seeing they had incurred the curses contained in that sacred volume; and these brought him word back from her, that God would not fail to inflict all those severe punishments upon his faithless and ungrateful subjects; but that as for himself, the concern and remorse which he had lately expressed for it, had so far suspended the divine vengeance, that he should be happily gathered unto his fathers in peace, before the nation felt the dire effects of them.

(15) Jerem. i. 1. (16) Ibid. & ver. 5, 6. (17) Ibid. 2 Kings ii. 26. (18) Jerem. c. vii. & seq. (19) Zeph. i. 1, & seq. ii. iii. pass. (20) Deut. xxxi. 24, & seq. (21) 1st Jud. ser. omn. Vid. lib. NITZACHON. (22) Ant. l. x. c. 5. (23) PROCOPIUS. GAZEN. & al. ap. PATRIC. in loc. (24) CALMET. Comm. in loc. & Hist. V. T. l. 5. c. 8. (25) See before, p. 540. in fin. not. F. (26) Ibid. & alib. (27) Ibid. p. 541. c.

The passover kept.

It was in this same year, and probably upon the reading of this sacred book, that Josiah became sensible, that they had been guilty of a shameful neglect of the three grand festivals enjoined by Moses. To retrieve this fault, he assembled all the heads of the people from all parts of the two kingdoms to the temple, where having mounted the royal tribune, he acquainted them how they had happily recovered the volume of the Mosaic law, and read it himself before them; he then acquainted them with his design of expiating as much possible their former neglect, by a more careful observance of it; and, as the solemn feast of the passover was near at hand, which he was resolved should be celebrated with the utmost solemnity, he exhorted them to follow his example, and to prepare themselves for that grand festival. Whilst the people were purifying themselves, Josiah commanded the priests to make a more strict search into the temple, and to cast out and destroy all the prophane and idolatrous lumber that was found in it, and to bring the ark, and all the sacred utensils, which had been removed out of it in some former reigns, and to deposite them in their former place and order: All these were readily complied with both by priests and people; after which, they went in due time, about killing the paschal lamb. This is again noted to have been observed with greater zeal and magnificence than had been done by any of his predecessors since Samuel's time. After this, the king took a second progress through the kingdom, to purge it of all those abominations, which he might chance to have overlooked at the first circuit; he expelled all the vizards, enchanters, and such-like dealers in dark practices, out of the land; settled courts of judicature every where, giving strict charge, both to the magistrates, and also to the priests and Levites, to see that the people were instructed in, and kept obedient to the law of Moses.

Thus did that good monarch endeavour, with the sincerest zeal, to restore the pure worship of God through his dominions, and to clear it from all the dregs of superstition and idolatry; in hopes, if possible, to avert his impending judgment from sent to him, he must either have shamefully neglected the reading of it, or if he had not, he could never have been under such surprise and fear, at the reading of that which the high-priest sent to him. We therefore think, with the far greater number of Jews and Christians (28), that it was the whole Pentateuch; and that there might be still several imperfect and mutilated copies dispersed here and there, which might be now rectified by this prototype, after it was now brought to light.

<sup>1</sup> 2 Kings xxii & xxiii. pass. 2 Chron. xxxiv & xxxv. pass.

If it be asked, how the king could run over those five books so quickly as to come presently to those blessings and curses, which are contained in the very latter end of the last of them; it may be answered, that that might be the very reason; for as their manner was to write upon volumes of a considerable length, which were rolled up round one or two sticks, it might so happen that these last chapters proved on the out-side, and that the king, impatient to know the contents of it, might have curiosity to read in it, before he had unfolded a round or two. We are, however, very far from rejecting the notion of the Jews, who believe, that providence directed him to that very part (29). Something like which we find happened under the gospel (30).

What appears most surprizing, is, that all the copies of the Scriptures, which the good king Hezekiah seems to have caused to be written and dispersed about his kingdom (31), should be so soon vanished, that neither Josiah, nor the high-priest, had ever seen any of them, till this one was brought to light. All that can be said in the case is, that Manassah, during the former part of his reign, had made such havock of them, that if there were any left, they were only in few private hands, who preserved them with the utmost caution and privacy. The Jews do even add, that he caused not only the Scriptures, but all the books that had the name of God in them, to be destroyed.

(28) Ibid. MUNT. GROT. JUN. USSER. LE CLERC. PATRIC. PRIDEAUX. & al. mult. (29) Ibid. MUNT. in loc. PRID. Conn. lib. i. (30) Acts viii. 26, & seq. (31) Ibid. Prov. xxv. 1.

a from falling upon them. But for all this, the text observes, that his anger was not abated in the least against the people; and we need not wonder at it. They were, as their whole history shews, ready for every market. They could so far comply with their pious monarchs, as to shew an outward zeal for God, and a dislike for idolatry; but what proves their want of sincerity, whenever they acted such a part, is, their readiness to relapse into the vilest abominations; whenever they met with any encouragement for it under a wicked reign. These forced reformations therefore could not but render them more odious in the sight of God; so that having denounced a total destruction against the land, by his prophet Zephaniah<sup>a</sup>, and by the prophets Huldah, he hastened to take the good prince to himself, according to his promise, that his eyes might not behold the dreadful calamities that were to fall upon his nation.

Josiah had by this time reigned 31 years in profound peace, when Pharaoh Necbo came up against the Affrians, or rather Babylonians, as far as the city of Carchemish, which was situate upon the river Euphrates<sup>b</sup>. It is not easy to say, whether Josiah looked upon the design of this expedition to be levelled against his own territories (G); or, which is still more probable, whether the kings of Judah were under a kind of tribute and obligation to those of Babylon, ever since Manasseh had been restored to his kingdom; which would have made it a breach of faith in Josiah, to have suffered an enemy of theirs to pass through his territories in an hostile expedition against them; or, lastly, whether he had entered into some alliance with them; he came with a powerful army against him, and encamped in the valley of Megiddo. Here Pharaoh endeavoured in vain to dissuade him from concerning himself in the war between him and the Babylonians, by assuring him by his ambassadors, that he had no hostile design against him; Josiah would not be persuaded, but disguised himself, and drove directly against him. The text seems even to intimate, as if his chief design had been to fight him in person; but before he could reach him, he received a mortal wound, and was forced to be put into another chariot, and brought out of the field of battle. He died as soon as he had reached Jerusalem<sup>c</sup>, in the 39th year of his age, greatly lamented by all his good subjects; particularly by the prophet Jeremy, who is supposed to have composed that most excellent elegy, known to us by the name of the Lamentations, upon his death<sup>d</sup>; wherein he expresses the mournful state of the kingdom, with an energy and pathos, which we can better feel than describe. This is the only poetic piece of that kind in holy writ, for length and method; the composition is of the acrostic kind, and as the subject of the whole is mourning, which is always most naturally and freely vented and expressed, when confined to number, so here every verse is a sentence, which abounds still with some new, strong, and lively image of the deepest grief (H). There was indeed the greatest cause to lament so good

Josiah mortally wounded at Megiddo.

Year of the Flood, 2389.
Year before Christ, 610.

<sup>a</sup> Zeph. i. 1, & seq. <sup>b</sup> See 2 Chron. xxxv. 20. <sup>c</sup> Comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 29, & seq. & 2 Chron. xxxv. 20, & seq. See also before, p. 267. c, d. <sup>d</sup> Vid. Hieron. præf. in thren. Usser. & al.

(F) This place, Isaiah tells us, had formerly belonged to Sennacherib (32), and was now under the Babylonians; for these had, ere now, reduced the Affrian empire under their yoke, as we have hinted in some former note.

(G) This valley being in the tribe of Manasseh (33), Josiah might not only resent his passing thro' his territories without his leave, but also think that his design was to invade them, notwithstanding all his protestations to the contrary, and his pretended commission from God to make war against the king of Babylon (34). It is likely, indeed, that this last pretence, from an Egyptian prince, could not make any great impression upon him, because he had only his bare word for it; and, if real, might be supposed to come not from the true God, but from his Egyptian deities. But Josiah was given up to die by this expedition, and was suffered to rush into it, without consulting the Lord about the justice or success of it.

(H) The text says, indeed, that Jeremiah composed a lamentation, which was sung by a number of singing men and women, both at his funeral, and passed into use afterwards upon all mournful occasions, and that they are written in the Lamentations (35). And Josephus adds (36), that they were still extant in his time; by which one would be induced to think, that he meant the same with those we have now under that name.

But as Josiah's death was sudden and unexpected, it is hardly credible that such a long elegy as this, could be composed, and set to music, against his funeral; and it is more probable, that that which accompanied his obsequies was much shorter; such, perhaps, as David made upon the death of Saul and Jonathan (37), and was since lost; and that this we are speaking of, was composed in some subsequent reign, or perhaps, more probably, upon occasion of the Jerish captivity (38); we find likewise, that the prophet Ezekiel was commanded by good a prince's fall, since with him expired at once the religion, happiness, and a glory of the nation.

(32) Chap. x. 9. (33) Vid. Jos. xvii. 11. (34) 2 Chron. xxxv. 20. (35) Ibid. ver. 25.
(36) Ant. l. x. c. 6. (37) 2 Sam. i. 17, & seq. (38) Vid. int. al. Lament. i. 3.

Josiah was succeeded by his son Jeboabaz, whom the people set upon the throne in the 23d year of his age; not in right of succession, for he was the youngest of Josiah's sons (I), but by downright faction. He began to give them early proofs that he designed to reign as wickedly as some of his predecessors had done, but it was soon put out of his power: however, Jeremiab was at first sent to him from God, to exhort him to imitate his father's piety, instead of making a shew of bewailing his death; adding, that if he did not, he should be carried away captive, and die in a strange land*. Pharaoh Necho came accordingly against Jerusalem, in his return from the Assyrian expedition, and dethroned him in the third month of his reign; and having set his elder brother Eliakim, whose name he changed into that of Jeboiakim (K), upon the throne, and laid him under the yearly tribute of 100 talents of silver, and one talent of gold, he put the captive prince in bands at Riblah, and carried him into Egypt, where he ended his days† (L).

Jeboiakim was nothing terrified by this from following his unhappy brother's steps, nor the people from conforming to his wicked ways: For this Jeremiab was ordered by God, in the very beginning of his reign, to denounce his severe judgments against them, unless they repented. The time chosen for this, was the feast of tabernacles, when there was the greatest concourse of people from all parts of the kingdom; and the place, the court of the temple. He threatened them, among other things, with the destruction of the city and temple; and for this he was seized by the priests and people, and accused as a seditious person, worthy of nothing less than death. He was, however, acquitted and set at liberty by the more equitable princes and elders of the court; who, being persuaded that he spoke by divine command, reminded his accusers of some other prophets, who had formerly denounced the same heavy judgments unpunished and unmolested*. Jeremiab was not the only one who was sent upon this dangerous errand; Uriah, another prophet, was forced to fly towards Egypt, for having dared to utter much the same prophecies against Judah and Jerusalem; but the king was so exasperated at him, that he sent some of his men to fetch him back; and as soon as he was come to Jerusalem, he ordered him to be put to death, and his carcass to be thrown among those of the viler sort. Jeremiab had doubtless undergone the same fate, had he not by God to compose such another Lamentation upon this last occasion*, though not equal to it in beauty and eloquence.

* See Jerem. xxii. 1, & seq. † 2 Kings xxiii. 31, & seq. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 1, 2, 3, & 4. and Ezek. xix. 1, 2, 3, 4. * Jerem. xxvi. 1 ad 19.

(I) It appears by the first book of Chronicles (39), that Josiah left four sons; the youngest is there, and by Jeremiab, called Shallum, but is the same with Jeboabaz (40); it is plain, moreover, that he was at least two years younger than his brother Eliakim, who was twenty-five years old when he succeeded him, which he did three months after. Archbishop Usher, who thinks that the people chose him in haste, lest Pharaoh-Necho should surprise them without a head, supposes that they exchanged his name Shallum, which they thought unfortunate, because the only king of Israel of that name had been murdered in the first month of his reign; for that of Jeboabaz, which they thought carried a more promising omen (41).

(K) The same learned prelate supposes this change of names to have been designed by the Egyptian king, as an acknowledgment that he owed his victory over the Assyrians to the God of Israel, by whose command he had undertaken that war against them (42); being a kind of abbreviation of יהוה יהוה Jeboiab-Jakim, that is, the God of Israel hath, or shall make it prosper, &c. But as it was the custom of conquerors to give new names to those whom they thus brought under tribute, in token of subjection, this last seems as likely to have been the motive of that change.

(L) It is not easy to guess what induced the Egyptian monarch to shew such preference to Eliakim, and to use Jeboabaz with such severity. It can hardly be supposed, that he laid so much stress upon the right of primogeniture, as to punish this last for his having usurped his brother's crown; perhaps the Jeus have found out, for once, the reason of it from the words of Ezekiel; the prophet represents that young prince as a courageous, undertaking youth, under the figure of a young lion ready for the prey; and concludes with this expression, The nations heard of him, he was taken in their snare, and brought into Egypt, laden with chains (43).

From this passage they conclude, that as soon as he had got himself chosen king, he put himself at the head of an army, resolving to revenge his father's death, and that he was overpowered by him; but whether Pharaoh came against him to Jerusalem, or Jeboabaz went out against him to Carchemish, they are not agreed; but either of these was enough to induce the conqueror not only to dethrone, but to carry him away prisoner, lest he should, in time, undertake the same exploit against him (44).

* Ezek. xix. 1, & seq. (39) Ch. iii. 15. 3371. (42) Sub A. M. 3394. p. 82. MUNST. in 2 Reg. xxiii. 33.

(40) Jerem. xxii. 11, 12. (41) Sub A. M. (43) Ch. xix. 2, 3, 4. (44) Vid. SANCT. &

- a not had a powerful protector with the king, Abikam, the son of Shaphan, who had formerly been in great credit and authority under Josiah, who found means to screen him from the fury of the king and people<sup>a</sup>; though he had foretold, about the same time, the accession of Zedekiah to the crown of Judah, and of Nebuchadnezzar to that of Babylon<sup>b</sup>.

ABOUT four years after, finding that his prophecies had had no effect either upon the king or people, he foretold the destruction of Jerusalem and of the temple, and the Babylonish captivity under Nebuchadnezzar, which he said would last seventy years, soon after which that monarchy would be at an end, and the land become desolate<sup>c</sup> (M). And in the same year, being shut up in prison, either b for that or some former prophecy, he caused Baruc, who was his scribe, to write from his mouth the tenor of the same threatnings, and to go and read them in the hearing of all the people, who were then assembled at the temple, it seems, upon some solemn fast (N). Baruc obeyed, and some of the chief ministers being informed of it, got the roll from him and brought it to the king, who was then sitting by the fire. He had scarce read a column or two in it, before he cut it in pieces, and flung it into the fire, notwithstanding the endeavours of those that were present to prevent it. Jeremiah and his messenger had doubtless felt the effects of his fury, had they not, as it were by a miracle, been kept out of his reach; however, his impiety did not go long unpunished. The prophet was ordered to write the c same denunciations again<sup>d</sup>, which were soon after fulfilled by the coming of the Babylonish king with a powerful army, and a more effectual commission from God against him and his whole kingdom; as we shall see in due time.

NEITHER were idolatry, and contempt of God's worship, the only crimes with which Jeboiakim's reign is branded; he added to them the most horrid cruelties and tyrannies, rapines and bloodshed; building and adorning the most sumptuous palaces by violence and oppression; perverting justice, inventing crimes against the innocent to put them to death, and many more such like impieties; besides his being deaf to the admonitions of so many prophets. For these, Jeremiah pronounced at last this dreadful sentence against him; That he should be given up d into the hands of his most dreaded enemy, even of Nebuchadnezzar; that he should die unpitied and unlamented; that he should have the sepulture of an ass, and that his carcass should rot upon the ground<sup>e</sup>. By this time also, two singular predictions of that prophet had been fulfilled, which ought both to have added weight to the rest, and opened the infatuated prince's eyes to his imminent danger. Jeremiah had some time before forewarned him from relying upon the assistance of the king of Egypt, whose army was still at Carchemish, since it would be totally overthrown by the more successful arms of the young Nebuchadnezzar<sup>f</sup>, the prince pointed out by providence to subdue, among many other nations, that rebellious one of the Jews. This happened accordingly in the fourth year of Jeboiakim's reign, when that young e victorious prince, having been taken into partnership of the empire with his father, and sent against the king of Egypt, gave him an entire defeat at Carchemish, took the place, put the whole garrison to the sword, and beat back the troops that came to its assistance†.

THIS

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. ver. 20, ad fin.    <sup>b</sup> Ibid. xxvii. 1 ad 11.    <sup>c</sup> Ibid. xxv. 1, 2, & seq.    <sup>d</sup> Ibid. xxxvi. 1, & seq.    <sup>e</sup> Ibid. ver. 30, 31. comp. with ch. xxii. ver 13, to the end.    <sup>f</sup> Ibid. xli. 1, & seq.
 † See before, p. 267. f. UssER, sub A. M. 3397.

(M) This captivity was likewise foretold, though not in such plain terms, by Isaiab (45), under the type of Tyre; and also by Habakkuk. This last, expostulating with God about the incorrigible hardness of the Jews, is answered, that they would be shortly invaded, and captivated by the Chaldeans (46). He likewise foretold the vast successes of Nebuchadnezzar; and when he repined at the prosperity of that wicked prince and people, he is answered, that they also should in due time become the scorn of other nations, and a prey to those whom they had subdued.

(N) Probably, that of expiation, which, as we observed elsewhere, happened on the 10th day of the month Tisri, answering to the latter end of our September; for it is here observed to have been towards winter, and we do not find that they had any other fast before the captivity†; neither do they seem to have been sensible enough of their approaching calamities, to have appointed one for that purpose. It is, indeed, said there, that it was in the 9th month that the king flung the book into the fire (47); but that interval may easily be supposed to have elapsed, before those nobles were acquainted with the matter, or could find a proper time to inform the impious king with such disagreeable news.

(45) Cb. xxiii. 15, & seq.
 UssER. sub A. M. 3397. p. 83.

(46) Habak. i. 2, & seq.
 (47) Jerem. xxxvi. 22.

† Vid. sup. p. 617, & seq. & UssER.

Jerusalem taken.

THIS victory proved the unhappy prelude of Judah's misfortunes: the conqueror <sup>a</sup> marched directly against Jerusalem and took it (O); rifled the temple of its most precious furniture, and the royal palace of its most hopeful and beautiful young princes, to be made eunuchs in his own court, according to Isaiah's prophecy to Hezekiah<sup>c</sup>; and the city of all its choicest youths, whether for blood, learning, wit, or beauty, to be likewise sent to Babylon. Among these last was Daniel and his three companions: Jehoiakim was at first put in bonds, and designed to be sent away with the rest; but upon his submission, and promise of paying a yearly tribute to him, the king changed his mind, and left him as a kind of viceroy under him over the kingdom. But whilst Nebuchadnezzar was taken up with his other conquests, he found means to rebel against him, after a three years subjection, <sup>b</sup> and continued about three years without paying him any tribute; his rebellion cost him dear, for that prince, exasperated against him, instead of coming in person, sent an army into Judea, consisting of Syrians, Chaldeans, Ammonites, and Moabites, who wasted the whole kingdom, carried away 3023 prisoners; among whom, Josephus says, was the prophet Ezekiel<sup>h</sup>; but it is more likely that he stayed at Jerusalem till the next reign; took and murdered the unfortunate Jehoiakim, and dragged his carcass out of the city gates, where they left it unburied, according to Jeremiah's prediction (P).

Jehoiakim's
death.

Jehoiachin's wicked reign.

Year of the
Flood, 2400.
Year before
Christ, 599.

and captivity.

He was succeeded by his son Jehoiachin, called also Jechoniah, and in contempt <sup>c</sup> Coniah (Q), who was then but 18 years old; whether he took the crown contrary to Nebuchadnezzar's mind, or had endeavoured to shake off his yoke, the text doth not say, but only observes, that he was as wicked as his father. However, that monarch came up against him before he had reigned three months: Jehoiachin came out to him, not in an hostile, but submissive manner, attended with his mother and his whole court; but they found him inexorable, and were all sent away captives into Babylon, and died there, according to the prophet's prediction, mentioned in the last note. The temple, palace, treasury, and the whole city were a second time ransacked and stripped of all that was valuable in them; even many precious ornaments and utensils of the temple, which continued there ever since the time of Solomon, became a prey to the conqueror: he likewise transported 10,000 men, <sup>d</sup> famed either for their valour or wisdom; besides 1000 of the best artificers in gold, silver, and other metals and materials; in a word, he left scarcely any behind but the very common people, to cultivate the land. Among his captives of note, was the famed Mordecai, and, as is most generally believed, the prophet Ezekiel. After this he set Mattanab, who was the son of Josiah, and uncle to the unhappy Jehoiachin, upon the throne, and changed his name into that of Zedekiah; and having laid him under a certain tribute, and taken an oath of fidelity and subjection<sup>i</sup>, returned into his dominions.

Zedekiah

<sup>a</sup> Dan. i. 2, & seq. <sup>2</sup> Chron. xxxvi. 7. <sup>b</sup> Ant. l. x. c. 8. <sup>c</sup> 2 Chron. xxxvi. 13. Ezek. xvii. 10, & seq.

(O) This Usher proves to have happened in the ninth month from the anniversary fast, which the Jews have kept ever since in memory of that calamity. This is the more worth observing, because the seventy years captivity foretold by Jeremiah, must be reckoned from this epocha (48).

(P) This last circumstance of the king's death, is only inferred from the tenor of the prophecy above-mentioned; for neither the book of Kings, nor that of the Chronicles, make mention of it; the former of which doth even say, that he slept with his fathers (49); by which must be only meant, that he died as they did. Josephus, who relates this story a little differently, and throws the fault upon the perfidy of the Babylonians, doth however own, that his body was cast out of the city, and left exposed in the field (50). Other Jews think, that he died as they were carrying him prisoner into Babylon, and that they left his body in the high-way, without farther care (51).

The last quoted place out of the Chronicles, says, that his acts and abominations were recorded in the book of the kings of Israel and Judah. These abominations may be reasonably supposed to be his idolatries, murders, oppressions, and rebellion; but the Targum mentions, moreover, his having the image of Baal upon his forehead; others say, that he had several charms and stigmata found upon his body, which proved that he dealt in devilish arts (52); and much more to the same purpose.

(Q) He is called by this last name in Jeremiah, who uttered this dreadful prophecy against him (43). —That he should be given into the hand of the king of the Chaldeans; —that he and his mother should end their days in a strange country, wishing still in vain to return into their own land; as it happened accordingly not long after.

(48) Vid Usher. ubi sup. (49) Conf. 2 Kings xxiiv. 6. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 8. (50) Ant. l. x. c. 8. (51) ABARBAN. ap. PATRIC. in 2 Kings xxiiv. 6. (52) Vid. de his. ant. tradit. Hebr. in paralip. HIERON. in sec. EUSEB. TOITAT. & al. (53) Ch. xxii. 24, & seq.

- <sup>a</sup> Zedekiah began to reign in the 21st year of his age, and proved as impious as his Zedekiah's late predecessors; however, he continued faithful to the king of Babylon some few years, during which, he received some embassies from the kings of Ammon, Moab, Edom, Tyre, and Sidon, who were all under the same yoke with him; seemingly indeed to congratulate him upon his accession to the crown, but in fact to enter into a confederacy with him against the Chaldeans †. The young prince gave but too much heed to their proposal; but Jeremiah, who was warned of it, sent to every one of the ambassadors, chains and yokes, which he bid them carry to their respective masters, advising them in the name of God to submit themselves willingly to the king of Babylon, and not provoke him to lay a much severer yoke upon them, by giving credit to their lying sooth-sayers and star-gazers <sup>k</sup>. There were, at the same time in Jerusalem, several pretended prophets, who endeavoured to persuade the too credulous king, that in spite of Jeremiah's predictions to the contrary, the captivity would be shortly at an end, and that the sacred vessels which had been carried away, would be all restored to the temple; to which Jeremiah replied, that those few, on the contrary, which had been left behind, would be carried off with the rest. Thus for some years, there was nothing scarcely to be heard but victory and deliverance on the part of the false prophets, and desolation and ruin from the mouth of Jeremiah. This raised him many a bitter enemy, not only in Judea, but even in Babylon: for he had taken the opportunity, as often as Zedekiah sent his yearly tribute thither, to write letters to the captives, exhorting them to bear their yoke patiently, and not to expect a deliverance before the seventy years were expired; and they, in return, wrote letters into Judea, to desire that he might be apprehended and punished as a dangerous enemy to his country, who uttered, not what the God of Israel, but the king of Babylon, dictated to him <sup>l</sup>.
- THIS contest lasted some years, during which, his enemies had in vain essayed to stop his mouth, by causing him to be apprehended and imprisoned. The infuriated king was at length persuaded by his false prophets, to shake off the Babylonish yoke, and that rash enterprise completed both his own and his kingdom's ruin, and hastened the total destruction of the temple and city. He was then in the ninth year of his reign, when Nebuchadnezzar came with a powerful army, wasted the whole country, seized upon his fortresses, and at length laid close siege to Jerusalem, before Zedekiah could make any provision either for his own defence or escape <sup>m</sup>. It was then, that seeing his error too late, he sent privately for Jeremiah, to consult with him what to do; but the prophet only told him, that the city and temple would certainly be destroyed, and himself and all his subjects carried into captivity (R); which answer did so exasperate the king, that he ordered him to be immediately carried into prison <sup>n</sup>. In the mean time Pharaoh Hophra, or Apries, came with an army against the besiegers: Josephus says, that Zedekiah had made an alliance with him, before he ventured to throw off the yoke <sup>o</sup>; if so, he was the only one that kept it with him; for as for all those other princes, who sent their ambassadors to him at the first, it is plain that they were so far from assisting him, that they rather became his enemies and accusers. However that be, Nebuchadnezzar did not think fit to let the Egyptians come up to him, but raised the siege for the present, and marched directly against them. This spread such an infatuation among the people in the city, that, looking upon themselves as already out of all danger, they ventured even to force into their service those very servants whom they had but lately dismissed, it being the sabbatic year; not so much out of regard to the law of Moses, as out of the fear they were in, of their revolting to the Chaldeans.

† See before, p. 292. c. <sup>k</sup> Jerem. xxvii. pass. <sup>l</sup> Ibid. <sup>m</sup> 2 Kings xxv. 1, & seq. Jerem. xxxix. 1. & JOSEPH. Ant. l. x. c. 10. <sup>n</sup> Jerem. xxxiv. 1, & seq. <sup>o</sup> Ubi sup. p.

(R) About the same time, Ezekiel prophesied at the captivity (54) much the same things that Jeremiah did at Jerusalem; only with this difference seemingly, that the one said, the king should never see Babylon; whereas the other said expressly, that he should be carried thither prisoner, and end his days there. This seeming contradiction, Josephus tells us (55), staggered the king's faith, and made him give less heed to them; but the difficulty was rather how to reconcile Ezekiel to himself, who adds, that he should die there, though he did not see it. However, Nebuchadnezzar found out the way of doing it, by putting that unfortunate prince's eyes out.

(54) Ezek. xii. 13. xxiv. 1, & seq. (55) Ant. l. x. c. 10.

Chaldeans. The king, however, was not so sanguine, but sent to desire Jeremiah <sup>a</sup> to put up his prayers to God for him and the nation; but was answered by him, that the Chaldeans would renew the siege with fresh vigour, and that his Egyptian allies would leave him to their mercy, and return into their own country. Soon after this, the prophet attempted to make his escape, but was caught in his flight, and brought before the princes, who ordered him to be scourged and flung into a dungeon. In the mean time Nebuchadnezzar, having routed the Egyptians, returned to the siege, and carried it on so vigorously, that the inhabitants began to labour under such great scarcity of provisions, that they found it impossible to hold it out longer. During this last siege, the king sent often to Jeremiah, in hopes of receiving at length some comfortable news; but neither his resentment, nor the grievous things <sup>b</sup> which he was made to suffer, could make him send a better answer, than that they must be all carried away into captivity. Happy had it been for them if they had taken his counsel, and tried to soften their conqueror by a timely submission; but instead of it, the king, to avoid the threatened captivity, endeavoured to make his escape by night, attended by his nobles and guards. The Chaldeans, who were soon apprised of it, pursued after them, and brought them back to their exasperated monarch, at Riblah; where he glutted his revenge upon the unfortunate king of Judah with the utmost cruelty, by causing all his children to be butchered before his eyes, and ordering them immediately after to be put out, that no object might afterwards obliterate the idea of that bloody scene. This happened towards <sup>c</sup> the end of the eleventh year of his reign; he was soon after sent into Babylon, laden with chains, and ended his days in a prison.

Zedekiah's miserable end.

Year of the
Flood, 2411.
Year before
Christ, 588.

The city plundered,

and burnt.

In the mean time, the Chaldeans having entered the city, fell a plundering the temple, palaces, and noblemen's houses, and seized every where upon the richest spoil. Nebuzar-adan, who commanded them after Nebuchadnezzar's departure, caused the two brazen columns, that stood in the court of the temple, to be broken in pieces (S), and all the gold, silver, and costly furniture to be taken away, whilst the rest of his army made the same havock in the city; and on the third day after his entrance into it, which was the tenth of the fourth month, answering to our August 27<sup>e</sup>, and a sabbath-day; he ordered the temple, palace, and the whole <sup>d</sup> city to be set on fire, and burnt to the ground. The walls, towers and other fortifications were next ordered to be demolished, and all the Jews, down to the very common people, to be carried away prisoners, except some few of the baser sort, whom he left to till the land<sup>e</sup>. As for Jeremiah, Nebuchadnezzar had given his general such charge concerning him, that he was well treated and set at liberty, and went and lived with Gedaliah (T), whom that general left as a kind of governor over the miserable remnant left behind.

THIS was the dreadful end of that glorious kingdom, and of the Israelitish monarchy, after it had stood 468 years from the time that David began to reign over it, 388 years from the revolt of the ten tribes from it, and 134 years from the ex- <sup>e</sup> cision of the Israelitish commonwealth; and had continued under the sun-shine of the divine protection, which nothing could have eclipsed, but their almost constant and horrid ingratitude, and invincible itch of imitating the idolatries and witcheries of other nations: crimes which though become as abominable to God, as they were universally practised by mankind, yet seem to have flowed from a purer source, though corrupted by degrees to this vast height, by the amazing degeneracy of mankind;

<sup>a</sup> USSER. sub A. M. 3416. p. 91. <sup>b</sup> 2 Kings xrv. pass. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 11, & seq. Jerem. xxxix. pass. JOSEPH. Ant. l. x. c. 11. <sup>c</sup> See USSER. ub. sup.

(S) The same which Solomon had caused to be made by the famous Hiram (56), and which we have spoken of in the description of the temple. These, together with the large molten sea, lavers, and many more of the like nature, though all of them master-pieces in their kind, had hitherto been spared by other conquerors, but became now a prey to the fury or avarice of the Babylonish general, who caused them to be all carried away, with a vast multitude of other sacred utensils, such as cauldrons, censers, tables, tongs, forks, and many others, whether of gold, silver, or copper.

(T) This Gedaliah, was the son of Abican, a person in such credit in all the latter reigns, that he had been able to screen that prophet from the resentment of the king, and fury of the people; so that it is very probable Jeremiah, in gratitude to his father, obtained this favour for him from Nabuzzar-adan. And this might also be the motive that induced him to go and live with him in Judea, rather than to go into Babylon, when that general put it to his option, not without some considerable encouragements, to invite him to the latter.

(56) 2 Chron. iv. 11, & seq.

a mankind; but for this we shall refer the reader to the appendix here annexed: How the Jewish captives fared in Babylon, will be seen in the next chapter: all that remains to be taken notice of, with respect to the Jews that were left in Canaan, is, that treacherous and bloody action, which was committed upon Gedaliab, the Jewish deputy, by one of the princes of Judab.

His name was Ishmael, he had escaped the common fate, by taking timely refuge with the king of Ammon. After Nabuzar-adan's departure, he observed that great numbers of dispersed Jews flocked to Gedaliab, who gave them a kind reception and plenty of provisions to subsist upon, till they could come to till the land; and being moved with envy, and instigated by the Ammonitish king, came b to him with ten resolute fellows to Mizpab, with a design to assassinate him. Gedaliab was indeed warned of his intent, but was so far from giving credit to it, that he entertained him with all the tokens of friendship and respect, and gave thereby the treacherous Ishmael an opportunity of murdering both him, and all the brave Chaldeans he had about him. Two days after, meeting with about fourscore Israelites clad in mourning, who were going to bewail the ruin of the city and temple, and to offer up their devotions there; he by some means enticed them to Mizpab, where he murdered them, and threw their carcases into a well. He was returning into the land of Ammon, with a number of prisoners which he made at Mizpab, among whom were some princesses of Judab, whom the Babylonish general had left with Gedaliab; but was pursued by Jobanan, and some other Hebrew captains, who rescued all the prisoners, and forced him to fly for his life, with only c eight of his men.

THIS barbarous action made the Jewish officers, and the rest of the people, so afraid of the Chaldeans resentment, that they began to think of fleeing into Egypt for safety. They consulted Jeremiab about it, who gave them this answer from the Lord ten days after, that if they tarried in Judea, they should be protected from the Chaldeans; but that if they persisted in their design of going down into Egypt, they should all inevitably perish there, and share in the dreadful calamities of that perishing kingdom. This speech, however, was so far from deterring them, who d were always bent upon disobedience and contradiction, that, suspecting him to have been instigated by Baruc, rather than inspired by God, they both ventured to go down, and to force them two to go along with them. As soon as they had reached the city of Taphnes, Jeremiab began to foretel the taking of that place, and the desolation of that kingdom by Nebuchadnezzar<sup>a</sup>; which happened accordingly soon after, as we have seen elsewhere†, and shall have occasion again to mention in the next chapter. What became of Jeremiab is not known; some suppose him to have been stoned by his countrymen: but that is meer guess-work, and it is not material enough to enquire further about it.

AN APPENDIX,

Concerning the Rise and Progress of IDOLATRY and WITCHCRAFT:

WE hope our readers will not think it amiss, if we close this Jewish history with a short enquiry into the origin and progress of those two epidemic evils, idolatry and witchcraft, which had so long and so universally infected the e world, and more particularly the Israelites; and proved so obstinately rooted in the latter, as to bring a total excision of one of their kingdoms, and so long and severe a captivity upon the other.

WE shall, however, forbear descanting upon the manifold opinions of the learned about this matter, because we think that they have gone a great way for the causes of it, and overlooked those more natural ones which were just at their elbow. But here, with respect of the first of these evils, we would be far from rejecting that probable opinion of some judicious men<sup>a</sup>, which fetches its origin from the promise made to Adam, of the seed of the woman, or the Messiah and Mediator; from the the progenitorship of whom Ham and Canaan having been excluded, for their irreverent behaviour towards their naked father, our authors suppose Canaan might be induced to obliterate and revenge that loss and disgrace, by corrupting the true meaning of the prophecy; and instead of one mediator, to be born in alter-ages, of the line of Shem; to introduce the worship of a multiplicity of them, not of human race, but of some superior nature, among their posterity. And if it be at least a very probable opinion, that it was this very Messiah who appeared in some visible shape, and had frequent intercourses with Adam and the patriarchs; or though even these apparitions were, as others will have them, only those of angels, deputed by God, and speaking in his name †, but from whose intercourse he and his cursed posterity may be reasonably supposed to have been excluded; how natural was it for him to arrogate a superiority over his rival, as well in the number and frequency, as in the intimacy and excellence of those heavenly visitors, by rearing an infinite multitude of altars to them. Thus, for instance, Egypt was the place where Canaan, if not Ham, fixed his abode; and how thriving a soil it proved for them, needs not to be repeated here; whereas the holy patriarchs, who offered their sacrifices to the true God upon those altars only, which they occasionally reared in those places where he appeared to them, having but a very small number of them, appeared vastly inferior to them in this respect in the eyes of an ignorant world.

<sup>a</sup> 2 Kings xxv. 23, & seq. 2 Chron. ubi sup. ad fin. Jerem. xl. & seq. pass. p. 269. e. <sup>a</sup> Vid. inter al. ALIX. in Pentateuch.

† See before,

BUT though this accounts probably enough for the rise of polytheism, yet it leaves us wholly in the dark about the more absurd and unnatural worship of stocks and stones under various figures of the planets, and of several parts of the animal and vegetable creation; which is more particularly the subject of our present inquiry. For we cannot see which way these can be said in any sense to have been introduced in consequence of the former. As for those who derive them from the custom of deifying their heroes, and erecting statues and monuments to them, which came in time to be worshipped, instead of the prototypes, we can by no means agree to them; because it doth not appear to us that those Apotheoses began any thing so early as the times we are speaking of; they seem rather to have been introduced in consequence of the notion of polytheism; so that we must seek elsewhere for the source of idolatry. For as for what we have said on this head in the history of Egypt *, the reader may remember that we did not give it as our particular opinion, but either as the best account, which the priests of that nation could give for their various kinds of worship to Herodotus, or as the conjectures of that or other authors, concerning their superstitious and nonsensical mythology.

BUT as to us, we rather think that the origin and progress of idolatry is plainly pointed out to us, in the account which Moses gives us of Laban and Jacob's parting †. The reader may remember that these two, after a sharp contest, being ready to depart, the one into Mesopotamia, and the other into Canaan, agreed to bind themselves and their posterity, by a solemn oath on both sides, to live in peace and friendship with each other. Now the way they took to ratify and perpetuate the memory of this covenant, was the rearing up a heap of stones in the place; which seems, therefore to have been founded upon some antient and common custom of that nature, and well known to them both, and only differently interpreted by them, according to their different religions. Jacob, who was a worshipper of the true God, called this monument Galeed, or Gall-bed, a heap of witness, that is, an authentick record, of his having appealed to the God of heaven for the faithful performance of the agreement on his part: This was the pure original sense of this ceremony. Laban, on the other hand, interprets it according to the corrupt theology of his time and country, in terms to this effect; this heap be both a Galeed, or record of our mutual oath; בִּמְצָה Ve-bammitzpah, and also a watchman, or rather a watch-tower, from which the gods, that is, that of Abraham, and that, or those, of Nabor, may behold and punish the aggressor, when we come to be at such a distance from each other that there will be none else to see and judge between us.

IT is true, indeed, that Laban's words might be capable of a more figurative construction, did not the outcry which he made after his gods ‡ shew him to have been such a thorough-paced idolater, as to be incapable of being understood in any

† Vid. sup. p. 429. not. T. & 484. not. S.
44, & seq. ‡ Ibid. ver. 30, & seq. pass.

* Ibid. p. 209. f. & seq.

‡ Gen. xxi.

a any other sense. This made Jacob, who doubtless could best judge of his meaning, carefully avoid swearing by any other oath than by the dread, that is, by the God, of his father Isaac<sup>d</sup>.

HOWEVER, not to lay greater stress upon this than we need, it is plain, that if such a custom as this was once introduced, of erecting monuments in memory of any solemn covenants, the transition was easy into the notion that the godhead, or rather some deity, took its residence in it, in order to punish the first aggressors; and how soon this might be improved by an ignorant and degenerate world, till not only birds, beasts, stocks and stones, but sun, moon, and stars, were called into the same office; though used perhaps at first, by the designing part of mankind, as scare-crows, to over-awe the ignorant. This is indeed the most that it ever did, even whilst idolatry was at the height; whilst the more cunning sort laughed at it, and only made it to serve their own ends.

THE next improvement might be that of witchcraft, and the same kind of policy might oblige those Matchievel's to wink at, if not to encourage, a numerous herd of inferior knaves, as must naturally be bred out of the dregs of this corrupt theology, under the denominations of astrologers, enchanters, forcerers, teraphim-makers, retainers of familiar spirits, sooth-sayers, fortune-tellers, and many more of the same nature, who were all greedily resorted unto by the populace upon all occasions; though in matters of greater moment they were forced c to receive their directions from their principals. HITHERTO we have avoided meddling with the common opinion, which makes the devil the cause of all these mischiefs; if he was really so, what we have said will only shew how easy it was for him to compass his end. But tho' the scriptures seem plainly to intimate some kind of intercourse between some men and women, and some kind of spirits, as in the case of Egyptian conjurers, and the witch of Endor; yet we do not find that the devil is any where charged with having debauched mankind into idolatry or witchcraft, how glad and ready soever he might be to encourage them, after men had once introduced the notion of them into the world. This we purposely take notice of, because the hypothesis we are speaking against, supposes such an extent of power in him, as would be highly derogatory of the divine goodness, whilst it left the bulk of mankind under a kind of inevitable necessity of falling into all his snares, with those little assistances they had, either from the dim light of reason, or the book of nature.

THERE is, indeed, a great deal of difference between supposing that the devil first blinded mankind, and then led them into all manner of wickedness; and saying, that men having shamefully corrupted themselves, proceeded from one wickedness to another, till at length, being given up to their abominable lusts, they became the slaves of that evil spirit, and were easily enticed by him into this excess of impiety.

e WE may add, that mankind, if we except the families of a few patriarchs, carrying their views no farther than this life, their insatiable desire after wealth, their care of preserving it, an unaccountable itch to pry into futurity, and the like, did naturally lead them into all that variety of superstitious trash, we have been speaking of. Could any thing therefore more effectually cure the Israelites, too prone to imitate them in all these, than to make their worldly happiness rise and fall, according as they shewed the greater abhorrence or fondness for every thing that bordered upon idolatry and witchcraft.

f THUS then the antient and truly religious custom of ratifying oaths and contracts by such monuments, which was only an appeal to God's all-seeing eye, insensibly degenerated into the grossest and absurdest idolatry, under the multiform notion of guardian idols or gods, protectors of houses, lands, kingdoms, &c. thence sprung the trades of conjuring each respective deity to its particular idol, and use; of foretelling things by a pretended intimacy with those deities; the art of star-gazing and astrology; of making teraphims, idols, and other charms, offensive and defensive, under their proper constellations; with the whole train of heathenish superstition forbid under such severe penalties by the Jewish law-giver.

BUT if this should not sufficiently account for the origin of witchcraft, what we shall add concerning one branch of it, as yet unmention'd, may perhaps do it more effectually; we mean the heretofore so much boasted craft of enchanting of serpents, infomuch, that we read of whole nations that pretended to it; and some <sup>a</sup> learned fathers seem to exprefs such an admiration of it, as if they had really seen, or had been some other way fully convinced of it. But the notion must have been of much older date, since the psalmist, speaking according to the vulgar opinion, compares the sad mischiefs of an evil tongue to the poison of the deaf adder, that stoppeth her ears against the charms of the most cunning enchanter<sup>c</sup>. What pains hath it not cost some antient fathers<sup>d</sup>, and of late, especially, the learned Bobart<sup>e</sup>, to find out a serpent that answered the character given here by the psalmist. Deaf ones we need not be at a loss for; we have a sort in England, which, though not exactly of the same colour with those of our author, but rather of a reddish copper hue, seem to be quite deaf, and their bite is reckoned mortal: but David speaks of <sup>b</sup> one that stoppeth her ear to the charmer's voice; and this has given occasion to various conjectures, which may be best seen in the author himself. For our part, we see no reason to understand these words literally any more than if he had compared an evil tongue to the voice of a syren, the claws of a harpy, the eyes of a basilisk, or of any other fabulous creature; we hope that in neither case there is now any necessity, either for disproving the reality of such creatures, or for vindicating the sacred poet's allusion to them. All that we pretend here, is to enquire how the notion of this pretended art came to be introduced, and so universally received in the world; and this cannot, we think, be done, without fetching its origin from the old serpent in paradise<sup>h</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> Ibid. ver. 53.

AND here we need not observe, how much every circumstance in the history of his seducing the woman; his being, according to the common version, called the most subtle of all creatures, his being chosen by the devil, as the fittest instrument to deceive her, the curse pronounced against him by God, and the enmity entailed between his and her seed; might contribute to the notion of serpents being infected with some diabolical pestiferous quality, which made them thus strangely destructive to mankind. But what we would first of all take notice of, is, that though in our former account of our first parents seduction†, we followed the current of all versions which represent that reptile as the most subtle of all living creatures, yet the term חָרָם Harum, which Moses there makes use of, signifies <sup>d</sup> quite another thing, namely, in its primitive signification, naked; accordingly he says, in the preceding verse, that our first parents were חָרָם Harumim, naked; so that in a figurative sense, it may properly enough signify a harmless inoffensive creature. It seems even probable that the sacred historian takes notice of this circumstance, as one main reason of Eve's being so easily deceived by it; for what could be more fit for the devil's purpose than such a one, which was furnished with neither legs, claws, horns, or any one single part, even for its own defence? Had it indeed been really the craftiest of all animals, Adam could not but have known it, seeing he gave them all names according to their natures; and then Eve could not but have been particularly mistrustful of him, so that he would have been <sup>e</sup> the last that the devil would have pitched upon to tempt her. Hence we would observe, 1. That it was chiefly this naked defenceless and inoffensive, appearance, though adorned perhaps with all those beauties of shape, colour, and wings, which we mentioned before, under that head*, that gained credit with her; and, 2. That whenever the same term is used afterwards to signify cunning, as it sometimes doth; it is only the word Harum, naked or simple, ironically applied.

HERE was then a creature which, from being originally harmless and inoffensive, became the most dangerous and deadly one in the whole creation: a wonderful change of nature, to all outward appearance, without change of shape; a power to kill infused into it, without the addition of any offensive part; inflicting a sure and <sup>f</sup> speedy, a painful and unaccountable death, and yet not able to give the body a greater wound, than that of a seemingly slight prick. What could an infant world attribute all these surprising effects to, but to some deadly occult quality which the devil left behind him with it? or what could be more apt to cultivate that notion, if not to give the first rise to it, than the enmity intailed between mankind and the serpent, after the prophetic sense of it had once been obliterated with the far greatest part of the world? and whence should they expect a remedy against this supposed <sup>g</sup> preter-

<sup>a</sup> Psal. lvi. 4, 5. † ORIG. EUSEB. in Ps. lix. AUGUST. de Genes. ad litt. lib. ix. Respons. ad quest. 44. vid. & SCALIG. de Animal. lib. 1. <sup>h</sup> De Animal. sacr. lib. iii. c. 6. <sup>b</sup> Gen. iii. 1. † See before, p. 59. c. <sup>e</sup> Ibid. p. 61. d.

- a preternatural evil, but from pretended preternatural means? So that though we are far from thinking that it sent men to the devil for help, for charms and enchantments, yet it might easily induce those, who first found out a cure for the bite of those venomous creatures, to assume to themselves some supernatural skill, in order both to gain greater credit and admiration among the people, and to prevent their prying too narrowly into their secrets. How much farther these pretended enchanters improved this notion of a preternatural, or diabolical virtue in serpents, above all other creatures, is plain, from that vast variety of surprising tricks, which they attributed to them<sup>1</sup>; one of which, and that not by far the most extraordinary, was that of stopping their ears, that they might be proof against all enchantments;
- b and it is this, we shall now endeavour to account for.

- It is not to be doubted, but these cunning artists had acquainted themselves, as far as they could, with all the various kinds of serpents; some of which, such as our common snakes, being found to be perfectly harmless, might serve them to amuse the ignorant, by pretending that they had charmed them into that inoffensive familiarity, which they beheld with the utmost wonder; others, of a more dangerous nature, such as the viper or adder, but which only bite when hurt or provoked, might be either tamed by degrees, and by gentle usage, or rendered harmless by breaking those two teeth, through which they inject their poison; the latter therefore might be used as an amusement, and the former, to try experiments, to find
- c out remedies; and both together, to deceive the world, by shewing their pretended capacity, or incapacity, to hurt or kill, according as they were, or were not, enchanted. But as they found their remedies ineffectual in many cases, and against the bite of some kinds of serpents, they had no other way to save themselves, than by pretending, that those had a particular virtue, which was proof against their charms; and as the deaf kind is the most deadly, and hitherto found to be incurable, nothing could be more natural than for the pretended enchanters to affirm, that their charms consisted in the sound of certain words, pronounced in the hearing of those reptiles, which could therefore have no effect against them, because they had the skill of turning a deaf ear to them. Hence came the notion of their hearing
- d but with one ear, which they stopped either with the end of their tail, or by laying it close to the ground, whenever they found themselves in danger of being enchanted; and many others equally absurd, invented on purpose to account for the pretended superiority of skill in this creature, above that of the enchanter.

- Thus we hope that the history of Jacob and Laban makes it at least very probable, that idolatry, with all its long train of vain and absurd, of vile and abominable attendants, was at first foisted into the world from the primitive notion of God's omnipresence; which, through the degeneracy and ignorance of the world, which could not perhaps comprehend the possibility of the deity being present and attentive to every part of the creation, branched itself out into that
- e infinite multitude of deities, of various sizes and natures, as best suited with their corrupt notions and morals. We may add, that the righteous line of Shem is not the only people, who are recorded to have preserved this pure and primitive notion; since, as we observed formerly†, the inhabitants of Thebais, or upper Egypt, did worship none but the Cnef or supreme deity, whilst the lower part of the country was immersed in the grossest idolatry. How far the early notion of good and bad spirits might further contribute to corrupt this pure and primitive sense of God's omnipresence, and degenerate by degrees into a belief that they were, if we may be allowed the expression, the eyes and hands of the deity, and the instruments of his favour or justice, we need not say; and if this was the case, how easy was
- f it for the corrupt physiologists of those times to turn them all into deities, and even assign them their several provinces over every creature, according as they found it beneficial or hurtful to mankind. Hence proceeded, most likely, the worship of crocodiles, ibis, rats, onions, garlick, and many more among the Egyptians; and of the heavenly bodies, both by them and the rest of the world*.

Now there is nothing more plain, than that all this infinite variety of superstitions was owing to that insatiable desire after those various kinds of happiness, which their vitiated taste made them seek after, according to their different inclinations, from those imaginary dispensers of them. So that if the Israelites could but have serpents, inſomuch, that we read of whole nations that pretended to it; and ſome learned fathers ſeem to expreſs ſuch an admiration of it, as if they had really ſeen, or had been ſome other way fully convinced of it. But the notion muſt have been of much older date, ſince the pſalmiſt, ſpeaking according to the vulgar opinion, compares the ſad miſchiefs of an evil tongue to the poiſon of the deaf adder, that ſtoppeth her ears againſt the charms of the moſt cunning enchanter<sup>e</sup>. What pains hath it not coſt ſome antient fathers<sup>f</sup>, and of late, eſpecially, the learned Bochart<sup>g</sup>, to find out a ſerpent that answered the character given here by the pſalmiſt. Deaf ones we need not be at a loſs for; we have a ſort in England, which, though not exactly of the ſame colour with thoſe of our author, but rather of a reddiſh copper hue, ſeem to be quite deaf, and their bite is reckoned mortal: but David ſpeaks of one that ſtoppeth her ear to the charmer's voice; and this has given occaſion to various conjectures, which may be beſt ſeen in the author himſelf. For our part, we ſee no reaſon to underſtand theſe words literally any more than if he had compared an evil tongue to the voice of a ſyren, the claws of a harpy, the eyes of a baſiliſk, or of any other fabulous creature; we hope that in neither caſe there is now any neceſſity, either for diſproving the reality of ſuch creatures, or for vindicating the ſacred poet's alluſion to them. All that we pretend here, is to enquire how the notion of this pretended art came to be introduced, and ſo univerſally received in the world; and this cannot, we think, be done, without fetching its origin from the old ſerpent in paradise<sup>h</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Vid. Auct. sup. citat. & POMFONAC. de incant. TRITHEM. Steganogr. TEXIR. Hist. Pers. DEL-
RIO. Disquisit. magic. & al. mult. † See before, p. 14. b. * Ibid. p. 12. b. & not. 1.

AND here we need not obſerve, how much every circumſtance in the hiſtory of his ſeducing the woman; his being, according to the common verſion, called the moſt ſubtile of all creatures, his being choſen by the devil, as the fitteſt inſtrument to deceive her, the curſe pronounced againſt him by God, and the enmity entailed between his and her ſeed; might contribute to the notion of ſerpents being infected with ſome diabolical peſtiferous quality, which made them thus ſtrangeſt destructive to mankind. But what we would firſt of all take notice of, is, though in our former account of our firſt parents ſeduction†, we followed the current of all verſions which repreſent that reptile as the moſt ſubtile of all creatures, yet the term ערומ Harum, which Moses there makes uſe of, ſignifies quite another thing, namely, in its primitive ſignification, naked; according to what ſays, in the preceding verſe, that our firſt parents were ערומים Harumim. ſo that in a figurative ſenſe, it may properly enough ſignify a harmleſs creature. It ſeems even probable that the ſacred hiſtorian takes notice of this circumſtance, as one main reaſon of Eve's being ſo eaſily deceived by it: it could be more fit for the devil's purpoſe than ſuch a one, which was void of both with neither legs, claws, horns, or any one ſingle part, even for its ſhape. Had it indeed been really the craftieſt of all animals, Adam could not but have known it, ſeeing he gave them all names according to their nature; he could not but have been particularly miſtruſtful of him, ſo that it was not till the laſt that the devil would have pitched upon to tempt her. We obſerve, 1. That it was chiefly this naked defenceleſs and inoffenſive, though adorned perhaps with all thoſe beauties of ſhape, colour, and ſound, as we mentioned before, under that head*, that gained the victory. 2. That whenever the ſame term is uſed afterwards to ſignify a ſerpent, it ſometimes doth; it is only the word Harum, naked or ſimple.

HERE was then a creature which, from being originally innocent, became the moſt dangerous and deadly one in the world, by the change of nature, to all outward appearance, without any deadly ſtill kill inſufed into it, without the addition of any other quality. It ſeemeth ſpeedy, a painful and unaccountable death, and a greater wound, than that of a ſeemingly ſlight bite. We attribute all theſe ſurpriſing effects to, but to the ſerpent; the devil left behind him with it? or what could it be, if not to give the firſt riſe to it, than the enmity between the ſerpent, after the prophetic ſenſe of it had taken place in that part of the world? and whence ſhould it have been ſo ſoon introduced?

* Pſal. lviii. 4, 5. † ORIG. EUSEB ſponſ. ad quaſt. 44. vid. 10. de An
iii. 1. † See befor

1. NAME.

1 y
d one unhas ns of have hem :

ould be Extent:
e same and ex-r and the y, it lay ros, being undaries, as t extent we mpais of our of plenty (C), tunc which has been suppose, that owned sub-neweb. In conformity to us Pompeius (1), that the

, came to be called Syrians.
narchy, and its name grew time, even to those who had to power ; and hence, out of ong settled custom, the nations to call themselves Affyrians, or to call them so ; or, thirdly, they commanded so to denominate themconqueror. To disimiss this, we would seems to be nothing more uncert the Greeks and Latins mean by Af- rian ; they are of such comprehensive n these writers, as to take in all the nd people between the Mediterranean on , and the river Indus on the east.
land of plenty and pleasure it must un-ly have been ; but this may not have been untry designated in Scripture (6) by a land of and wine, a land of bread and vineyards, a land
of

(3) ARRIAN. Exped. Alexand. l. 7.
(1) JUST. l. 1. c. 2. See before, p. 360. (6)

have kept themselves wholly free from it, it would have proved the most effectual a means, perhaps, of recovering the rest of mankind, by setting before their eyes a whole nation, enjoying the height of grandeur and happiness, not from those fancied deities which engrossed the worship of other nations, from whom they were so far from expecting any blessings, that they had both them, and their stupid votaries, in greatest contempt and abhorrence; but under the influence of the only supreme creator of heaven and earth, whom alone they acknowledged to be the bountiful giver of all good. Here then was at once the source of their guilt and unhappiness, that they thwarted, instead of complying with, the designs of providence; and by their shameful imitation, confirmed other nations in their delusions and idolatry, whom they were designed to cure by their utter detestation of them. b

BUT there was still a farther aggravation of their guilt and impiety, the inhuman cruelties which were practised at the worship of some, and the filthy and unnatural ceremonies which were used at that of other of these false deities. All these may be reasonably supposed to have been invented by crafty and designing men, merely to gratify the depraved appetites of a senseless vulgar, in order to make it subservient to their more latent views; but when they came to be adopted by God's peculiar people in spite of all his most express prohibitions and threatnings, they carried a much higher degree of guilt in them, because they tended to cast a double dishonour upon him, among those wiser heathens, who were ignorant of his laws against them, and yet abhorred them, as being manifestly contrary to his nature. For what opinion could they have of the God of Israel, or how could they believe him to be the supreme being, and yet suffer his people to commit such abominations? What must even the very Israelites themselves think of him, if they could suppose that he would indulge them in those very impieties, for which he had so severely punished the nations, whose land they now inhabited?

To all this let us add their obstinate unbelief, which hardened them against the most pathetic remonstrances, and dreadful threatnings of their prophets, whom God still sent to them upon all such defections; and who never appeared in greater number, than they did towards the approaching captivity, which their multiplied impieties was hastening upon them, and proved at last the only effectual means of d curing them at once of their idolatry and unbelief. Whether the severity of their thralldom, the monstrous variety of superstition which they beheld among the Babylonians, or the continued exhortations of Ezekiel, and other prophets, who were with them in the captivity, contributed most to this extraordinary change, we will not pretend to say; but this is plain, that ever since their return from thence, they always expressed the greatest abhorrence to those two crimes. Yet even in these two respects, they seem rather to have gone into the other extreme, and to have strove only to atone for former faults, by running into others, if not equal in guilt, yet at least equally dangerous. For the truth of this, we need but refer the reader to what we have had frequent occasion to observe concerning them. Thus, e for instance, idolatry, once their most favourite vice, has been since had in such abhorrence among them, that they would not stoop before a statue, though it were to pluck a thorn out of their foot*; and may we not reasonably suppose, that it was in order to make amends for their former unbelief, that they so greedily swallowed down such a number of monstrous fables, of which, those we have quoted in this history out of their Talmud, are but a small scantling; and prefer that pretended oral law or tradition, wherein they find such plenty of materials to exercise their faith, to the sacred writings, wherein they find little or nothing like it? well might our Saviour charge those of his time with straining at a gnat, and swallowing a camel†; and an honest rabbi of theirs advise them to insert the decalogue in their Talmud, as the only means to prevent the shameful and almost universal breach of it amongst them.

HOWEVER, it behoves us to spare and pity them in this respect, since it was their unaccountable fondness for these traditions above the sacred writings, that inspired them with that bitterness and malice against the Messiah, the redeemer of mankind, which made them persecute him to that slavish death, from which we derive our freedom and assurance of a better life; especially, since their continuing to this day in unbelief, affords us so irrefragable an argument for the authority of the Old Testament, and consequently for the truth and divinity of the New; into which we are not without some sure hopes of their being admitted in God's good time ‖.

CHAP.

* See before, p. 598. not. F. † Matt. xxiii. 24. ‖ Vid. Rom. xi. pass.

C H A P. VIII.

The History of ASSYRIA.

S E C T. I.

The Description of ASSYRIA.

<sup>a</sup> W E have already accounted for the name of this country, and shown it to its name. have been derived from Asbur, its first planter after the flood<sup>a</sup>, and have observed<sup>b</sup>, that its name extended very far westward over the whole country of Aram, or Syria (A), which at this time gives appellation to most of the country between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean. Eastward, southward, and northward it must also have extended its name where-ever its monarchs had established themselves by the fortune of their arms (B).

If we consider the monarchy of Assyria geographically, we have already done much towards a description of it, in what we have formerly said of the several countries whose histories go before, and who may, in this light, be considered as <sup>b</sup> provinces of Assyria, and more we shall do towards this work in our descriptions of several other countries, whose histories are to follow, and which the order we have hitherto observed requires us to defer to the places naturally belonging to them; and the same order obliges us here to confine ourselves to the proper Assyria.

<sup>c</sup> THE precise extent of this country may not exactly be known, and it would be labour quite in vain to attempt to settle it; but taking it to have been the same with the province of Curdestân at this day, it lay eastward of the Tigris, and extended almost north-east, and south-west from the springs of that river and the lake Van, to the province of Kbuzstân in Persia; or, according to Ptolemy, it lay along the eastern banks of the Tigris, from mount Niphates to mount Zigros, being bounded on the east by mount Choatras. Such was its situation and boundaries, as should seem, and is agreed upon by geographers; but for its exact extent we chuse to pass that over, as a thing uncertain and not within the compass of our knowledge. Extent.

THIS country, which must in its happy times have been a land of plenty (C), has almost ever since the fall of its empire been decaying; a misfortune which has been

2

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 163.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. p. 360.

(A) Borhart (1) divides the Assyrians into two sorts, those, properly so called, beyond the Tigris, and derived from Asbur; and those on this side the Euphrates, who derived their name from Sur, or Tyre (2), by means of an article prefixed thereto, as in חַשְׁמִירִים Hushmirim; but whatever there may really be in this, it will, upon examination, be thought to be of no great weight. The descent of the two nations is so different, the one from Asbur, the other from Aram, and their distance from each other so wide, that we can never think so slight an accident as an article prefixed to Sur, should cause the potent and ancient nation of the Aramites or Syrians to be called by all the nations about Assyrians; and particularly when there is so much to be said against it, as may be found in the next note.

(B) Where-ever this monarchy extended itself, it is apparent, that it extended its name together with its dominion; so Mesopotamia, the Aram Nabaraim of the Jewish writers, is said (3) to have been called the Mid-Assyria; and so also Babylon and Chaldea were reckoned to be a part of that country (4) as well as the rest, we may suppose, that owed subjection to the kings of Nineveh. In conformity to this, we are told by Trogus Pompeius (5), that the Assyrians, by contraction, came to be called Syrians. It was the first great monarchy, and its name grew venerable in process of time, even to those who had formerly suffered by its power; and hence, out of vanity, or from a long settled custom, the nations round about affected to call themselves Assyrians, or else others affected to call them so; or, thirdly, they may have been commanded so to denominate themselves by the conqueror. To dismiss this, we would take notice, there seems to be nothing more uncertain than what the Greeks and Latins mean by Assyria and Assyrian; they are of such comprehensive latitude with these writers, as to take in all the country and people between the Mediterranean on the west, and the river Indus on the east.

(C) A land of plenty and pleasure it must undoubtedly have been; but this may not have been the country designated in Scripture (6) by a land of corn and wine, a land of bread and vineyards, a land of

(1) Phaleg. l. 4. c. 34.

(2) See before, p. 393.

(3) ARRIAN. Exped. Alexand. l. 7.

p. 453. (4) AMMIAN. MARCELL. l. 23. c. 20.

(5) JUST. l. 1. c. 2. See before, p. 360.

(6)

2 Kings xviii. 32.

been particularly incident to it, by the very nature of its situation, which has, at a times, made it the seat of war between potent empires and nations; and it is now become a wilderness, a desert, excepting some little land that may be cultivated about the few and inconsiderable towns which stand within its borders<sup>c</sup>, so that there is but little to be said of its productions and properties.

We have already said as much of the first postdiluvian state of this country and its ancient cities, Nineveh, and the rest, as we have been able to gather; so that we have here nothing to do, but to refer back the reader to what of that kind is in the former part of this work<sup>d</sup>, and proceed to the division and arrangement of it by the Greeks.

Ptolomy<sup>e</sup> divides Affyria, beginning from the north-west to the south-east, into b the several provinces of Arrapachitis, Adiabene (D), Arbelitis, Calacine, or Chalacene, Apolloniatis and Sittacene, but there is no pretending to set bounds to these several divisions, or assigning to each, the cities that may in former times have belonged thereto. Nor are these all the parts of Affyria mentioned by ancient geographers; we have the name of Aturia<sup>f</sup>, or Afyria (E), as a part of this country, as also Ar-tacene (F) and Chalonitis<sup>g</sup> (G).

AMONG the rivers of Affyria, we may justly reckon the Tigris (H), not only because it bathed all the western skirts of this country, but also because all the other rivers

<sup>c</sup> RAUWOLF'S Trav. p. ii. c. 9. incunt.

<sup>d</sup> See before, p. 126.

<sup>e</sup> Lib. 6. c. 1.

<sup>f</sup> STRAB. l. 16.

<sup>g</sup> PLIN. l. 6. c. 26.

of oil-olive, and of honey, as Bochart thinks (7), and Rauwolf (8); for Rabshakeb, who speaks of this (9), may, as is most likely, have understood his words, as of some of the new conquered provinces of Affyria, and not of Affyria itself, properly so called; so that this does not amount to a positive proof of what is asserted concerning the fertility and amenity of the proper Affyria; tho', indeed, it must be confessed to be a very strong circumstance to make us believe it was no ways inferior to the country or countries intended by the text above; we may easily conceive the conqueror would have seized on the best for himself, and not have bestowed it on the foreign captives he made and transplanted.

(D) The whole country has been sometimes called by the name of this part of it. So Pliny observes (10), that the country of Adiabene was, in former times, called Affyria; the same says Ammianus Marcellinus (11), who (12) derives the name from two rivers of the country, called Diaba and Adiaba, rejecting the common opinion, which derives it from the Greek word διαλαβειν transire, δια τὸ εἶναι πλεονὲς ποταμῶν ἐν αὐτῇ, καὶ δυσχερεῖς ποιεῖν τὴν διαλαβὴν, because of the many rivers which make it difficult to travel or pass (13). Thus is it also that Suidas (14) accounts for this name; to which he adds fabulously, that here is the mouth of Avernus, which sends up so pestiferous a vapour, that no bird or beast may take in the least scent of it, but death must be the unhappy consequence; and that hence, also, it was called Adiabene, or impassable. To pass over other obscurities concerning the derivation of this name (15), Bochart (16) gives it an Affyrian or Chaldean origin, forming it from the Chaldees הדבב or הדבב Hodjab, or Hadyab, as it is called by the Talmudists and the Chaldees interpreter; as also הדבב Hodjaba, or Hodjava; whence he deduces (17) Ammianus Marcellinus's (18) Adiavenna, which, whence it became the name of this part of Affyria, may be observed anon.

(E) This also, though apparently but a small district of this country, extended itself over the whole, and, according to Bochart (19), was a name synonymous with Affyria, allowing only for the difference of dialect; the former being the Hebrew, and the other the Chaldees way of writing this name; the Chaldees constantly converting the Hebrew ו sin into the ט tau; so that what the Hebrews pronounce Affyria, they pronounce Afyria. Whatever there may be in this, the Greeks plainly took Aturia, or Afyria, to be no more than a province or district of Affyria. Strabo (20) divides Aturia from Arbelitis by the river Lycus; whence it is plain it was, by the Greeks, reckoned as a part only of this country, however the name may have been common to all of it.

(F) This is supposed to have derived its name from the city of Erech (21), or Arec. This is the opinion both of Scaliger and Casaubon (22); and if so, we have nothing to do with it at present; for it was not in this country, but in the land of Shinar (23), on this side the Tigris.

(G) This may have been the same with Cale and Calacine, for which we must refer to what we have already said (24) before, only observing, that the Callenites of Polybius (25) may have been the same.

(H) Said to have borrowed this name from the number of tigers on its banks; and the rather, as there are two other rivers in this country, the Lycus and the Caprus, which seem to borrow their names from a cause of the same nature, the one being denominated from a wolf, the other from a goat (26); others derive it from a Persian word, signifying an arrow*; by this, and the former, importing it to be rapid and violent in its course: But this is contradicted by Petru de la Valle (27), who says it is a slower stream than the Euphrates; and Thevenot (28) seems to assign a reason why the Tigris should not be so very swift, saying, it is not only more crooked and full of meanders than ever he saw, but also choked up with islands and great banks a rivers of this kingdom fell into this; as also, because the great cities of this kingdom<sup>h</sup>, Nineveh, Ctesphobon, and others, were situated thereon. The other rivers of less note were, the Lycus, the Caprus, and the Gorgus (I), at almost an equal distance from each other, and supposed to have been all between the two cities of Ninus or Niniveh and Selucia.

(7) Phaleg. l. 4. c. 19. (8) In his travels, p. 11. c. 9. (9) 2 Kings ubi sup. (10) Hist. Nat. l. 5. c. 12. (11) Ubi sup. (12) Ibid. (13) Vid. BOCHART. Phaleg. l. 4. c. 19. (14) Ad vocem AdiaCmēn. (15) Vid. CELLAR. Geogr. Antiq. Vol. II. l. 3. c. 17. (16) Phaleg ubi sup. (17) Ibid. (18) Ubi sup. (19) Phaleg ubi sup. (20) Lib. 16. incunt. (21) Genes. x. 10. (22) Vid. CELLAR. Geogr. Antiq. ubi sup. (23) Genes. ubi sup. (24) See before, p. 127. in the notes. (25) Lib. 5. c. 54. (26) Vid. CELLAR. ubi sup. * Vid. GREGOR. postum. p. 189. (27) In his travels. (28) In his travels, part 2. c. 13.

CONCERNING the natural and artificial rarities of this once famous land, we have nothing material to say, and therefore must here close up this section.

S E C T. II.

Of the Antiquity, Government, Laws, Religion, Customs, Arts, Learning, and Trade, of the ASSYRIANS.

b ASSYRIA, which stands foremost of all in profane accounts; is in scripture Antiquit. the second most ancient kingdom after Babel, or Babylon. It was founded by Asbur, and not by Nimrod, as some have contended (K), who embrace the Ctesian banks of stone. Bochart derives it from its old Hebrew name Hiddekel; and the Arabs, at this day call it Dijlat. The inhabitants hereabouts call it Hiddekel to this day (29).

<sup>a</sup> Vid. CELLAR. Geogr. Antiq. Tom. II. l. 3. c. 17.

(I) The Lycus and the Caprus, according to Bochart (30), are the two rivers Diaba and Adiaba, or Diava and Adiava. דבא Diava, he observes, is lupus, or lupinus, wolf or wolfish; דיבא Diava, being Chaldee for a wolf; and hence he derives the Greek Lycus, which signifies the same. Hadiaba, the name of the other, he derives, or at least is ready so to do, from an Arabic word signifying swift; but this is a most obscure point; and therefore we proceed to take notice, that these two rivers are now called, or supposed to be so, the great Zab and little Zab. According to Bochart (31), this latter name is corrupted from Diaba, or derived from the Hebrew דבא Zeeb, which differ but in dialect. Thevenot (32) calls these rivers Zarb, but speaks as of but one, which he saw fall into the Tigris; he calls it a large river, makes it above half as broad as the Tigris, and observes that it is very rapid, that its water is whitish and very cold, which he would seemingly account for by its falling from the mountains of Curdistan, and being merely snow-water. This agrees very well with Bochart's thoughts of the smaller of the two rivers above; the Adiaba, which he would have to derive its name from the swiftness of its course; but for dimension, might, one would think, better agree with the larger. And here, by the way, our traveller illustrates, in some sort, a passage in the Nubian geographer (33), who, as he is translated, says, the two Zabs are great rivers, and when united, equal to above one half of the Tigris; tho' he says a little before, their mouths were six and thirty miles from each other. It is asked, how in this case these two rivers ever should unite? and whether or no the true meaning might not be, that both together would be above one half of the Tigris, or fill the same river one half fuller than it would be without them? Thevenot seems to answer this question by affirming they do.

Bochart (34) also seems to think the Gorgus and the Caprus are two names in Ptolemy for one and the same river; and particularly, because he finds none but the two above mentioned elsewhere; but De Lisle's maps have three, one to the northward of the two Zabs, which is the westernmost of the three, and therein differs from Ptolemy's, which make the Gorgus the easternmost; we leave the reader to make his choice. Hardouin would have this river to be the Zerbin of Pliny (35). Cellarius (36) knows not what to say to it, observing only that Topſſe is Velox, which might have tempted Bochart to think it the same with his Adiaba, which he would have to be denominated from its swiftness.

(K) The text (37) which mentions the first foundation of this kingdom is variously interpreted, either, out of that land went forth Asbur and builded Nineveh, as it stands in our Bibles, as well as in the best versions of the Greek, the old Latin, and the Dutch; or, he [meaning Nimrod] went out into Assur and builded Niniveh; as it stands in the margin of our Bibles, and as it is translated by Vatablus, Junius, Bochart, Coccejus, Scoban, Heidegger, Spanheim, and Le Clerc. Now the whole of the controversy (38) turns upon this, whether the word Asbur, in the text, signifies the son of Shem, or whether it signifies the country of Assyria; for both ways it is often assumed in scripture. Those who are for the last interpretation, are judged to force the text, being obliged to supply a defect in the Hebrew, by inserting a particle [into] to serve their purpose, while those who vindicate the other, follow the natural order and construction of the words of the original as they stand. But not to dwell on these grammatical niceties, we chuse to recur to such arguments as may be reasonably offered to set this matter in a clear light.

It is on all hands allowed, that the land of Asbur, or Assyria, derived its name from Asbur the son of Shem; and according to what we read in scripture (39), it must have been, that he went out of the land of Shinar, where all the descendants of Noah were at the time of the dispersion, in order to plant or take possession of the country since called by his name; and can any thing be more natural, than to suppose that the text before us is meant of this migration of his? And who so likely to have founded Nineveh, and the other cities, as himself; except we can imagine it likely, that Nimrod made a conquest of this country before Asbur had well settled himself in it. If this had been the case, the country, it is likely, would have been known by his name, rather than by that of his (29) RAUWOLF'S Travels, part 2. c. 9. (30) Phaleg. ubi supr. (31) Ibid. (32) In his travels to the Levant, part 2. c. 13. (33) Clim. 4. part 6. (34) Ubi sup. (35) Hist. Natur. l. 6. c. 26. (36) Geogr. Antiq. Vol. II. l. 3. c. 17. (37) Genes. x. 11. (38) Vid. PERIZON. Origin. Babylon. c. 4. p. 39. (39) Ubi supr.

Ctesian system; and was in the beginning a kingdom distinct from Babylon, though <sup>a</sup> in process of time they coalesced into one, in consequence of mutual conquests. Asbur departed from the land of Sbinar <sup>i</sup> upon Nimrod's usurpation, and built Niniveh and other cities, as Rebobo, Cala, and Resen; in <sup>k</sup> Niniveh it is likely he resided, and thus erected a new kingdom which, borrowing his name, was called Asbur, or Assyria. According therefore to our chronology, we have nothing to object against the antiquity of the Assyrian kingdom, though as delivered by Ctesias <sup>l</sup> and others who some how or other happen to exceed him, as, for example Syncellus <sup>m</sup>, if barely the antiquity of it be considered; which would not well stand by the Hebrew computation. But by the Samaritan, which we embrace, this boasted Assyrian monarchy, instead of running up too far, will fall short by about <sup>b</sup> 358 years, as will appear by this. The whole interval, according to us, between the flood and the birth of Christ is 2997 years: the beginning of Cyrus's reign is, by common consent, fixed to 559, or 560 years before Christ: if to this number 350 years be added for the duration of the empire of the Medes, according to Ctesias, and 1300 more for the duration of the Assyrian, according to the same historian and his followers, the first year of the reign of Ninus, the first pretended monarch, will coincide with the 2209th year before Christ, or 789 years after the flood; whereas according to us, Asbur built Niniveh, and founded the Assyrian kingdom about the year 431 after the flood, or 358 years earlier; so that with us, its defect, not its excess, in point of antiquity, may be made an objection to the prophane account of this monarchy. In a word, we have no objection to the antiquity of the Assyrian kingdom, which may claim place among the first; but then we make a wide distinction between this simple kingdom, and the grand monarchy which reared its head many ages afterwards, and that, for reasons to be found in the ensuing Section †.

Government.

BEING so destitute as we are of sufficient authorities and instruction, we can say nothing in particular of the government of this people, except what may be gathered from the conduct and deportment of their princes, in the very little we have of their history. That they were a small kingdom under hereditary chiefs for many ages is <sup>d</sup> not to be doubted, no more than that their government was very simple, in conformity to what has been observed and related of their neighbours the Syrians <sup>e</sup> and Meso- his great uncle. We elsewhere (40) read, indeed, that Asbur founded Babyl; but no where is it ever suggested, that Nimrod went into Assyria and founded Niniveh.

<sup>i</sup> Genes. x. 10. <sup>k</sup> Ibid. ver. 11. <sup>l</sup> Apud DIODOR. SICUL. <sup>m</sup> Chron. p. 165. † Vid. sup. p. 126. c. <sup>n</sup> See before, p. 371.

It is objected as an improbability, that Moses should introduce a passage relating to a branch of Shem, when he was professedly writing about that of Ham; but this is frivolous. Parentheses of this sort are common enough in Scripture, as in that concerning Ishbosheth (41), and in that concerning Hiram's heart (42), introduced in the midst of other discourse. A late author (43) affirms, the Scripture expressly calls the land of Assyria the land of Nimrod. Bochart shewed him the way, and this would go hard against us, if the thing really were so; though if it was really the case, we might cite the text in Isaiab in the note above, in opposition to the text in Micah, which seems to favour this notion. Micah expresses himself thus (44), They shall waste the land of Assyria with the sword; and the land of Nimrod in the entrance thereof. By this the land of Nimrod seems to be quite distinguished from the land of Assyria: So far is this text, as pretended, from proving they are but one and the same; for the and is sometimes taken disjunctively; but in the passage before us nothing requires it. Several expositors (45), both Jewish and Christian, understand thereby the two countries of Assyria and Babylon, which were both united in the Assyrian monarchy about the time of this prophecy; for Manasser, the son of Hezekiah, under whom Micah flourished, was carried away captive to Babylon by the army of Assyria, when Esar-haddon was king both of Assyria and Babylon, as will be seen in the course of this history.

The author (46) we have been contending with, resolving to wrest the thing his way, and citing the text in Isaiab, which we think makes for us, viz. Behold the land of Chaldeans; this people was not till the Assyrian founded it for them that dwell in the wilderness, take the liberty of inserting the word Nimrod after the word Assyrian, distinguishing it by an Italic letter, and a comma after it, as if it could be a part of the text. This is entirely inexcusable in him, who is quite angry (47) with Sir Isaac Newton for a little presumptive addition of the same sort (48). Sir Isaac Newton, indeed, had an hypothesis to serve, and so has our author; so that one would have thought he might have looked over a liberty in Sir Isaac, which he resolved to take himself; except he imagined Sir Isaac had not the right to do it he had, which he would be a little puzzled to make out.

(40) Isai. xxiii. 13. (41) 1 Sam. iv. 4. (42) 1 Kings x. (43) BEDFORD in his Script. Chron. demonstr. p. 773. (44) Ch. x. 6. (45) PERIZON. ub. sup. p. 47. (46) BEDFORD ub. sup. in his preface to the reader, p. 3. (47) Ibid. (48) In his Chronol. of anc. kingd. amended, p. 68, & 217.

<sup>a</sup> Mesopotamians * (L). When, in after-times, they rose up to the sublimity of empire, their government seems to have been truly despotic, and the empire to have been hereditary, which is all we can safely say of it.

We have nothing to build upon, or to say in particular of their laws. We would <sup>Laws.</sup> presume they were few and vague, depending upon the arbitrary will of the prince; for these emperors affecting even divine honours, as will be seen in their history, and setting themselves above all the gods of the people they vanquished†, and sometimes requiring, that none other under heaven should be worshipped but themselves‡, and even presuming to pass sentence on the whole world§ by the word of their own mouth; it cannot but be imagined there could be any settled form of law for the government of this people, except we suppose their kings to have approached so very near to the divinity they would have imperiously arrogated, as never to change, but to continue always the same, which cannot be supposed.

THEIR religion is also pretty much in the dark: in general we know they were <sup>Religion.</sup> idolaters, and that they had their idols and their temples. Nisroch is likely to have been their principal god, at least at one time; but Selden declares * he knows nothing at all of him (M), and therefore any enquiry after so palpable an obscurity may be needless. Nergal was not properly, as should seem, an Assyrian deity, and we shall resume him when we come to treat of the ancient Persian religion: Adramelech may perhaps be properly termed a god of this country, and is said to have <sup>c</sup> been represented as a mule, or a peacock * (N): Anamelech (O), in like manner, is said to have been represented as a horse, or a pheasant, or a quail†; but these are all Rabbinical dreams, and to be considered accordingly. For this small part of their religion, and something more which we shall recollect in the religion of Babylon, which may have been the very same, we are beholden to the scripture and the Jews, the rest we must more immediately trace out elsewhere, and accordingly look back to the superstitions of the Philistines, Syrians, and Phœnicians.

Derceto (P), who according to Ctesias †, must have been an Assyrian deity, has been supposed to be the Philistine dagon, but we have denied it‡, and already given the reasons for our rejection of this notion§; and though we have ventured to <sup>d</sup> call her the goddess of Ascalon¶, we considered the country then in subjection to the Assyrians. Derceto, as the Greeks call her, (what her Assyrian name may have been we cannot guess) is plainly an Assyrian deity, of an inferior order, and particularly in

* See before, p. 371.    † 2 Kings xviii. 33. &c.    ‡ Judith iii. 8.    § Ibid. ii. 2.    ¶ De Diis Syris Syntagm. ii. c. 10.    * Vid. eund. ibid. c. 9.    † Vid. eund. ibid.    ‡ Apud DIODOR. SIC. l. 2.    § See before, p. 343.    ¶ Ibid. in the notes.    † Ibid. in the text.

(L) There is a difficulty which offers itself with regard to Mesopotamia, which seems to have been very early united under one monarch, and to have affected to rule over its neighbours by the violent means of conquest, when Cushan-rishathaim came over the Euphrates, and made conquest of the children of Israel, exacting from them tribute for the space of eight years. (49) Who this Cushan-rishathaim was, and how he came to be so great a king as he seems to have been at first, is a great obscurity. But by the Scripture (50), it appears, this Mesopotamian kingdom, as formidable as it may have been at first, soon mouldered away, and, perhaps, became extinct, by the successes of Othniel against it (51.) Le Clerc (52) observes, there is no mention made of this Cushan-rishathaim, in the Ctesian series of Assyrian kings; and that, according to Eusebius's computation, he should have been contemporary with Belochus, the nineteenth Assyrian king according to him (53); and tho' Josephus (54) calls him Chusarh king of Assyria, misled by the Ctesian history, he does not see why we should depart from Scripture to pin our faith upon him. It is impossible even to suppose such an inaccuracy in the Scriptures, as the calling of this man an Aramite of Mesopotamia, if he had been an Assyrian. All we would add is, that this Mesopotamian kingdom or monarchy was a transitory thing, and that it, in all likelihood, soon broke into the many petty royalties we have observed there in the preceding part of this history many ages afterwards (55).

(M) All that can possibly be said of him, is mere conjecture. Bayer (56), who takes upon him to supply, in this respect, what is wanting in Selden, supposes he may have been Saturn or Belus, or, with Kircher (57), that he was represented in the form of a ship, in remembrance of the ark; but this is mere fancy, as we shall have occasion to shew in the course of this history and that of Babylon. He is in the Septuagint called Mesarach and Asarach.

(N) Hence he is thought to have been related to Juno (58).

(O) Both Adramelech and Anamelech are supposed to have been the same with Molech (59).

(P) She is called by other names, as Adergatis, Atargata, Atergatis, and the like; but we shall forbear saying any further of her, till we come to treat of the Babylonian Venus.

(49) See before, p. 742.    (50) Judg. iii.    (51) Ibid.    (52) In Judic. cap. 111. 8.    (53) See the series of the Assyrian kings in the following section.    (54) Antiq. Jud. l. 5. c. 3.    (55) See before, p. 383.    (56) In Aditam. SELD. Syntagm. 11. cap. 10.    (57) In Pantheon.    (58) BAYER Aditam. ubi sup. c. 9.    (59) SELDEN de Diis Syr. Syntagm. ii. c. 9.    See before, p. 293.

in subjection to a goddess our author<sup>a</sup> calls Venus, who may have been the Syrian <sup>a</sup> goddess at Hierapolis <sup>a</sup>, or the Phœnician Astarte on mount Aphac <sup>b</sup>. Thus we conjecture; but this Assyrian Venus will be more regularly spoken of, when we are to treat of the religion of Babylon, which was doubtless the same with that of Assyria, being derived from one origin, as the two nations were considered to have been by Ptolemy, who calls the kings of Babylon, in his astronomical canon, Assyrians. We shall therefore only for the present observe, that the Assyrians <sup>c</sup>, and Syrians <sup>d</sup> paid particular devotion to fishes, in memory, as we are told, of the goddess Der-ceto of Ascalon, who was wholly, or partly, metamorphosed into a creature of that sort <sup>e</sup>; and that they honoured Semiramis in the form of a dove, or pigeon, either because she was nursed by them when exposed after her birth <sup>f</sup>, or because they attended her at her death, when it is fabled, she was changed into a bird of that sort <sup>g</sup>, which is all we have to say of the Assyrian religion in this place, except we repeat, that Semiramis was sometimes represented, as supposed <sup>h</sup>, with a pigeon on her head, and called the Sign; as also, that she was represented without that distinction, and in a particular posture of pointing to the great goddess <sup>i</sup>, for a reason already given <sup>k</sup>; as also, that Sardanapalus was deified, and represented in a particular habit <sup>l</sup>; so that it may hence appear they deified all their kings in general, whence must have sprung a very multifarious idolatry, which is at present very much in the dark to us.

Their customs, arts, &c. THEIR customs, their arts, their learning, and their trade, must certainly have <sup>c</sup> differed but little, if at all, from what will be found of the same concerning the Babylonians, so that we shall suspend what might be gathered in relation thereto, till we come to the Babylonian affairs, only referring the reader back to the language of Syria, and the alphabet of the Syrian character, for the language and character of this people, which we have declared to have been the same <sup>m</sup>.

Their language and alphabet.

S E C T. III.

Of the ASSYRIAN Chronology, to the Fall of the Empire.

WE shall doubtless be excused, if we are very ample and even diffuse in <sup>d</sup> our researches after the Assyrian chronology, it being not only of the greatest importance towards the fixing the chronology of ancient kingdoms, but also for vindicating the authority of scripture, which is quite averse to the common prophane account.

The causes why the ancient profane history is so monstrously corrupt and false, in what regards Assyria, &c. BUT first we would premise, that the causes which may have induced or misled historians so to err, when they treat of the antiquities of nations, were apparently two, ignorance and vanity. Their ignorance must have principally proceeded from the loss of records, and the neglect of the earliest people of the more ancient nations, to keep any sort of register of what concerned them. The world was peopled by succession, and the progress of wealth, power, and learning was gradual; taking rise in the more early parts, so that nothing is more natural to assert, <sup>e</sup> than that some nations began to keep records before others were in being.

SOME nations there were who never kept any records at all, as may have been the case of the Scythians, and as appears by their contest with the Egyptians for antiquity <sup>n</sup>; and those who did, could not possibly do it at once, or from the beginning, for want of letters and other material conveniencies; and besides, supposing them to have been ever so early in a condition to register their affairs, they could for a long time have had nothing worth the preserving, and much less the reading. The first ages must have been employed in husbandry, and providing for the necessities of life; mankind increasing into multitudes, and nations growing populous, contests, it is likely, arose between them about property and dominion, and these broils may for ages have diverted their thoughts from any thing else. In short, we must suppose the world to have been in a calm of peace, and some nations to have made great progress in learning, before we can, with any reason, suppose

<sup>a</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. I. 2.

SICUL. ubi sup.

<sup>f</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>m</sup> Ibid. p. 377.

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 372.

<sup>d</sup> See before, p. 399.

<sup>h</sup> See before, p. 373.

<sup>n</sup> JUST. I. 1. c. 1.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. in the notes.

<sup>c</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi sup.

<sup>i</sup> Ibid. ibid.

<sup>k</sup> Ibid. ibid.

<sup>e</sup> DIODOR.

<sup>f</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>g</sup> Ibid. ibid.

a suppose any historical monuments, truly such, to have been taken in hand; and ere this, the traditions concerning the origin of the world, and the rise of themselves, may have been quite perverted, or totally lost.

But supposing there may have been other nations besides the Jews, who had preserved their primitive traditions entire, they may have perished by various means. These nations may have, as it were, become extinct, or their records may have been destroyed by the malice, or what is the same, the zeal of parties, whether religious or civil. Kings have been known to deface the memory of their predecessors, that they might, without a rival, be admired by posterity; of a humour with that Chinese emperor who reigned about 209 years before Christ †, b or perhaps, to establish an æra as Nabonassar ‡, who may also have had an ambition to appear the headmost of the Babylonish kings; but, by the way, this seems not to have been the case with him, as we must have occasion to observe, more than once, hereafter.

SUCH may have been the interruptions of the regular descent of history to us; though wars, whether foreign or domestic, must have been more particularly fatal to the archives of all nations in general. It has been almost ever the policy of conquerors to destroy them, to obliterate the remembrance of what the vanquished may formerly have been, as also to remove all monuments which, by the sight of them, might excite to rebellion and revolt. Conquerors also there have been, c who have been moved merely by ignorance or superstition to do the same; as may be observed of the Mohammedans, where-ever their arms have prevailed. And though it may be said, that the Romans were, in this respect, favourable to the Greeks, we do not understand that these last were over and above indulgent to those they conquered, the Egyptians excepted, whom they may have spared for the same reasons the Romans spared them; because they beheld them as their masters in literature and knowledge.

If then we call to mind the many revolutions which every nation has in its turn undergone, we need not wonder why the antiquities of the several parts of the world are so utterly unknown, or, what is next of kin to it, so deeply involved d in the mist of fable.

THE Babylonians, or Chaldees, are allowed once to have had a regular body of genuine history from the origin of things, and by the fragments of it, we understand it to have been agreeable to what we read in the mosaical writings, which perhaps may have been taken from the Chaldeans, from whom the Jews were descended. But this Babylonian account has been long since destroyed, and absurd traditions and ridiculous tales have taken its place; which is the more to be regretted, as we are assured by Josephus § it was a most valuable remain.

FOR us to have received any tolerable account of the origin and remote history of nations, they should, from the beginning, have communicated their records e with each other; and the historians of every country should have been as sedulous in collecting and digesting the affairs of the neighbouring kingdoms and states, and actions they knew, as of their own: and in this case, nothing but an universal ruin could have made the desolation their succeeding generations have beheld as well as we. But the nature of things would never allow of this, as may be observed by those who are conversant in very ancient transactions; and particularly that ridiculous vanity, which may be said to have begun with the world, and will, it is likely, end with it, has at all times rendered it impracticable.

A COUNTRY no sooner began to flourish and refine, than vanity, that darling folly of men and nations, took birth, and increased with its splendor and prosperity; and presently it could admit of no competitor, but must look on all its neighbours round with contempt; and this doctrine infused into the natives, a national pride is contracted, than which nothing is so unpardonable, nothing more repugnant to reason and good sense, and nothing, in the main, so destructive to the peace and happiness of mankind. And this vanity added to the compleat ignorance of what has past aforesaid, in the historians, for the most part, of antiquity, has been productive of the monstrous births which are a reproach to the science.

WE might point at many glaring instances of the ill effects of what we are here complaining of; but shall on this head just touch upon the Greeks, to whom

I

WE

† MARTIN. Hist. Sinic. l. 6. p. 239. COUPL. Tab. Chron. Sinic. p. 17. § SYNCBL. p. 207.
 § CONTR. APION.

we are chiefly indebted for the ancient prophane history, confining ourselves to a what at present is before us, till we shall have occasion to resume them hereafter. They, we may aver of them, were more infected with this folly of vanity, or at least as much as any nation that has ever subsisted under the sun. It is plain they despised the history of all other nations besides their own, never concerning themselves therewith any farther than it interfered with themselves; and even then they introduced it rather to adorn their own character than to preserve any thing to us by way of information.

AND this in nothing appears more plainly, than in their slighting, and even destroying the Persian records, when they became masters of that empire. No one of their historians, that we are aware of, ever consulting them to compleat b a series of the Persian affairs: Nor was there a nation they were solicitous about but the Egyptians, who affected a deep silence, and cared not to tell them any thing very much to the purpose. Some of the Greeks indeed, whose good sense got the better of their national pride and prejudices, as Erastus, Hecateus the Abderite, Menander the Ephesian, may be quoted, as exceptions to what we have been saying, as well as some foreigners, such as Berosus, Manetbo, and some others, who were encouraged to write the histories of their respective countries for the use of the Greeks. But all this does but add weight to the guilt of that assuming people. It is plain, they did not in the least regard them; for not one of them has reached our days, nor so much as one Greek that had made any large extracts c from them, if we except Josephus, and the Christian chronologers, Africanus, Eusebius, and Syncellus, if they may be allowed to have been of the number.

No polite nation has ever been more egregiously faulty, in mixing truth with fiction; and yet they seem to have thought no nation fit to meddle with history, though their own, but themselves; as may be seen by Diodorus Siculus, who, in writing of the Egyptians and Chaldeans, never mentions a word of Berosus and Manetbo, preferring his own crude indigestions, to any thing in them. And so with regard to Assyria, instead of resorting to such as might truly inform him, such as Polybistor may have sometimes been, for ought we know, he runs riot after Ctesias, a most fabulous writer, as will be amply demonstrated in the course of d this section: But being a Greek, he was preferred by the vain partiality of his countrymen, and his history has had the good fortune of reaching down to us, while others have suffered the fate which Ctesias and Diodorus had deserved; the fate which Trogus has undergone, who, by his epitomiser, is not much to be lamented.

THESE writers were like most of our moderns, who, for what concerns the Mohammedan history, consult the Byzantine historians; or by listening to the lame relations of ignorant travellers, give into endless errors they might have avoided, by looking into the translations and extracts the learned would furnish them, if they would be at the pains of inquiring after them.

AND now, to return more immediately to our point, there have been great and powerful nations, who have for many ages past been no more; of this number are, the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Lydians. Their records and their historians have long since been annihilated. The Greeks, by a vain negligence and insolent contempt of them, knew little or nothing concerning them; and no other nation, the Jews excepted, can tell us any thing about them. Hence, and for reasons to be hereafter subjoined, we make no account of the common histories of these nations, and particularly of the Assyrians. We are now to enter upon an obscure task, which has confounded some of the best chronologers, who have unwarily been driven to endless shifts, to make out what they adhere to. But as our design is f to shew they have been all missed, some few excepted, as Marsham, Newton, Celarius, Montfaucon, Du Pin, and some others, we shall take little or no notice of them.

A TABLE of the Succession of the ASSYRIAN Kings, according to Eusebius and Syncellus.

According to Eusebius.		According to Syncellus.
	Years.		Years.
1 Ninus reigned	52	1 Belus reigned	55
2 Semiramis	42	2 Ninus	52
3 Zameis, or Ninyas	38	3 Semiramis	42
4 Arius	30	4 Ninyas, or Zames	38
5 Aralius	40	5 Arius	30
6 Xerxes, or Baleus	30	6 Aralius	40
7 Armamitres	38	7 Xerxes	30
8 Bel-ocbus	35	8 Armamitres	38
9 Bal-eus	52	9 Belochus	35
10 Altadas	32	10 Baleus	52
11 Mamitus	30	11 Setbos	32
12 Manchaleus	32	12 Manythus	30
13 Spberus	20	13 Afcabalius	28
14 Mamitus	30	14 Spbarus	22
15 Sparetus	40	15 Mamylus	30
16 Aftacadis	40	16 Sparibæus	42
17 Amyntes	45	17 Aftatades	38
18 Bel-ocbus (Q)	25	18 Amyntes	45
	(R)	19 Belochus	25
19 Bellepares	30	20 Belatores	30
20 Lamprides	32	21 Lamprides	30
21 Sofares	20	22 Sofares	20
22 Lampares	30	23 Lampbraës	30
23 Panyas	45	24 Panyas	45
24 Sofarmus	19	25 Sofarmus	22
25 Mitreus	27	26 Mitbræus	27
26 Tautanes (S)	32	27 Teutamus, or Tautanes (T)	32
27 Teuteus	40	28 Teutæus	44
* * * * *		29 Arabclus	42
* * * * *		30 Chalaus	45
* * * * *		31 Anebus	38
* * * * *		32 Babios (V)	37
28 Thineus	30	33 * * * * *
29 Dercilus	40	34 Dercylus	40
30 Eupales	38	35 Enpacmes	48
31 Laoftbenes	45	36 Laoftbenes	45
32 Pyriatides	30	37 Pertiades	30
33 Opbrateus	20	38 Opbratæus	21
34 Opbratenes	50	39 Ephceres	52
35 Ocrzapas	42	40 Acraganes	42
36 Tonos Concoleros, by the } Greeks, Sardanapalus }	20	41 Tbonos Concoleros	15
Total	1240	Total	1460

(Q) Or Belochus; he had a daughter called Aroffa, as also Semiramis, who reigned with him twelve years (60).

(R) Bion and Alexander Polyhistor (61) divide this series of kings into two dynasties, which we have distinguished by this chasm. The Belochus, who finishes this dynasty, is called by the same authors (62) Belleus the Dercetad, and in him, say they, the race of Semiramis became extinct; when Beletaras, Belatores, or Bellepares, the king's gardener, in a most extraordinary manner, seized on the empire for himself, and transmitted it down to his successors, till it fell under Sardanapalus. The first dynasty of these kings then, ending with Belochus, must be called Dercetadæ, from Derceto, the mother of Semiramis (63).

(S) According to Eusebius (64), under this king Troy was taken.

(T) Syncellus (65) transcribes the same from Eusebius in the note above, observing it was in the year of the world 4124.

(V) Though Syncellus, in the note above, seems to agree with Eusebius, as to the reign of the king who

(60) EUSEB. PAMPH. Chronic. lib. poster. p. 80.

(63) DIODOR. SICUL. l. 2. (64) Ubi sup. p. 90.

(61) APUD AGATH. l. 2. p. 63.

(62) Ibid.

(65) Chronograph. p. 151.

A TABLE of the Successions of the ASSYRIAN Kings according to the Canon of Scripture, and as they stand in this History.

According to Scripture.

- 1 Pul.
  - 2 Tiglathpileser.
  - 3 Sbalmaneser.
  - 4 Senacherib.
  - 5 Assar-baddon.
- * * * * *
- * * * * *
- * * * * *

According to this History.

- 1 Pul.
- 2 Tiglathpileser.
- 3 Sbalmaneser.
- 4 Sennacherib.
- 5 Assar-baddon.
- 6 Saosducheus.
- 7 Nabuchadonosor, or Chyniladan.
- 8 Sarac, or Sardanapalus.

The first Table. IT is surprising how many sagacious and inquisitive men, historians and chronologers, both in ancient and modern times, have blindly given into the errors, and general forgery, of the first table. To reconcile it with scripture, to which it is quite repugnant, they have raised such hypotheses as are contradictory to all history sacred and prophane, though at the same time nothing is easier than to detect the whole imposture, so gross and palpable it seems to be. The two lists which form this first table are derived, notwithstanding the variations in them, from one formed by Ctesias, who concluded his history of the Assyrians with a list of kings from Ninus to Artaxerxes <sup>1</sup>. Castor copied him, who was again copied by Eusebius <sup>2</sup>; who, as Ctesias had taught his author, begins with Ninus, while Syncellus, on the other hand, begins with Belus, and assigns him a reign of 55 years, though Castor <sup>3</sup>, whom in this he follows, declares the length of Belus's reign to be uncertain. But this is not the only difference between them; Syncellus has in his list four kings which are wanting in that of Eusebius, and which are no where else to be met with; which whence it should come to pass, we shall forbear to enquire (W), and the rather as we shall endeavour, with the concurrence of several great men before-mentioned, to destroy the whole on both sides; but first we would observe, that Syncellus exceeds every body in the number of years he allows for the duration of the Assyrian monarchy, for while St. Augustin <sup>4</sup> allows it but 1305, Castor 1280, Eusebius 1240, Velleius 1070, Syncellus gives it 1460, therein greatly exceeding his original author Ctesias, and his two copyists Diodorus and Trogus, who mention but about 1300.

SINCE therefore these computations are primarily borrowed from Ctesias, and lengthened and shortened apparently to the fancy of the several writers his successors, it will be absolutely necessary for us to inquire into what foundation he builds upon, whether who was on the throne of Assyria when Troy was taken, he brings that event down to this reign. He observes (66), that this king was by the Greeks called Tisbon, the father of that Memnon, who was by his father sent an auxiliary against the Greeks, and fell by the hand of Achilles. He tells us the copy of a letter from Priam to him was handed about in his time; and also, that he was called Tautanes the Second. This story is borrowed from Ctesias (67), who calls this king Teutamus, with Syncellus, but makes him a distinct person, from Tisbon the father of Memnon. This romantick author [Ctesias] tells us, he sent 10,000 Ethiopians, with as many Susians, people widely distant from each other, together with 200 chariots, to the succour and assistance of king Priam, who was his tributary. Tisbon, according to this same author, was at that time governor of Persia, in highest favour with the king; and his son Memnon, who commanded these auxiliary forces, was then in the flower of his age, and had built a palace in the castle of Susa, which retained the name of Memmonia to the times of the Persians, and had paved a publick way, which retained his name many ages afterwards. But it seems (68) the Ethiopians next to Egypt denied all this story, and pretended Memnon was their countryman, and made shew of his palace, which, in our author's days, they continued to call Memmonia. More is said in contradiction to Ctesias's story; but we may perhaps have anticipated too much upon this head, and therefore drop the subject for the present.

<sup>1</sup> Phot. Biblioth. p. 134. Tmetat. 71. Vid. etiam DIODOR. SIC. l. 14. <sup>2</sup> Vid. MARSHAM, Can. Chron. secul. 17. De Regib. Assy. <sup>3</sup> Apud SYNC. p. 206. <sup>4</sup> De Civit. Dei. l. 18, c. 20.

(W) Though it may be in vain to inquire after this seeming interpolation of no less than four kings in Syncellus, we may offer it as an argument to prove the unsettledness of the whole series. It was certainly a vague period of history; and, from the variations of it, may be shrewdly suspected of being raised upon no sure foundation, upon no such solid basis as truth. As the whole must have been a fable, those who treated of it used it as such, by altering it as they saw good; or else, we cannot see why the several authors and transcribers should not agree together in essentials, which we find they do not.

(66) Ibid. p. 155. (67) DIODOR. SICUL. Bibliothec. Hist. l. 2. p. 77. (68) Ibid. und. ibid.

- a whether his superstructure be raised upon truth or falsehood. Aristotle, who was almost his contemporary, declares him a writer unworthy of credit, and whoever peruses his Indica, must immediately conclude him to have been a man of no sort of sincerity; nor is Aristotle the only one of the ancients that has declared against him, nor are his Indica the only proof we have that he was a fabulous writer, as may be gathered from what is to follow.

WERE his character better established by much than it is, his list of the Assyrian kings would be no proof of the duration of that empire, nothing being easier than to invent names, and to add what lengths of reign we please to them*, and especially for a man who pretends actually to have seen such things in India as never

- b were, and never can be. Upon this the question might naturally enough be asked, might not Ctesias as well forge his Assyrian history, as create the world of monsters he talks of in India? And might we not as justly suspect him of falsehood, when he pretends to have compiled his history from original records, as when he gravely avers to have been an eye-witness of what no mortal man alive can believe?

AND this question may be the more pertinently asked, as both his relation of the Indies and his history of the Assyrians are equally marvellous and equally impossible.

- c Who can see Ninus at the head of millions of men, at a time when the earth must have been but thinly inhabited, when mankind must have been a good deal in a state of simplicity and nature; who can read this and give credit to the historian? or who can read his story of Semiramis; her mighty valour and heroic deeds at the age of twenty, or thereabouts; her two millions of men employed in the building of Babylon, her 300,000 skins of black oxen, made up in the form of elephants, and other things of this nature, and not conclude, that the whole work favours more of a bare-faced romance, than genuine and exact history? In a word, his Assyrian history, as it stands in the next section, is most evidently calculated to astonish and amaze, and to strain credulity beyond all possible bounds.

WHAT particularly argues his list of the Assyrian kings of the grossest forgery is, that it is a medley of Greek, Persian, Egyptian, and other names. Sphærus, Lamprides, Laesthenes, Dercylus, are Greek names, and very common ones. Amyntas

- d is the name of a king of Macedon; Arius is the name of a king of Sparta. Priliades is regularly, as should seem, formed from Pyritus, a medicinal herb, which Ctesias, as a physician, must have been well acquainted with. Xerxes, Armamithres, Mithrans, are Persian names. Sosarmus, according to himself, is the name of a king of the Medes, which, how it should have come to pass, may not be so very unaccountable, considering the transition of the empire from the Assyrians to the Medes; but how Seibos, the name of an Egyptian king, should also have been the name of an Assyrian, is what we are wholly at a loss for. Nothing is more obvious to those who have dipped into genuine history, and especially the scripture, than the wide difference between the Assyrian names and the Persian, and the still wider between the same and the Greek; so that nothing can be said in his behalf, except that he translated some of the original names, but even this is absolutely false; nay, he is confessedly so ignorant in this particular, that he had even no notion at all of the Assyrian names, how they were pronounced or uttered; so far was he from knowing how they were compounded, and whence they were formed; a most glaring instance of which will be seen anon.

- e AGAIN, in all long lists of kings, the same names, or some such, are observed often to return; and this is no where more remarkable than in the five names of the Assyrian kings, which are all that are recorded in the canon of scripture. Pul, or Pbul, Tiglatb-pileser, or Tiglath-pul-assur, Shalmaneser, or Shalman-assur, Esaraddon, or Assur-baddon. For the Assyrians, to all appearance, borrowed their names from their own gods*, or from the gods of other nations in repute among them. These gods seem to have been Bel, or Pul, Chaddon, Hadon, Adon, or Adonis, Molech, or Moloch, Aisur, or Affur, Nebo, Nergal, Merodach; as for instance in the followings, besides the names above, Adra-melech, Shar-assur, Nabonassar, or Nebo-adon-assur, Bel-adon, Chyniladon, or Chen-el-adon, Nebo-pul-assur, Nebuchadnezzar, Nebushadonosor, or Nebo-chaddon-assur, Nebuzaradan, or Nebo-assur-adon, Evil-merodach, or Ivoradamus, and many more that might be brought to illustrate this point. After this, who must not reject the wild and arbitrary names in Ctesias? Who is so ignorantly extravagant, as to suppose Sardanapalus to have been the Greek name for the last * Du Pin's Hist. Biblioth. des Hist. p. 284.

† Vid. Selden de Diis. Syr.

last Assyrian King, though so naturally derivable from Assur-adon-pul, while he pretends his Assyrian name to have been Tonos Concoleros, a name which bears no manner of relation to the Assyrian language, or any other that we at present are aware of; a name most evidently coined to amuse and catch the ear.

If in seven Assyrian names, all that are mentioned in the canon of scripture, five of them belonging to so many kings, and two to the two sons of Sennacherib, there appears such similitude and near relation, would not the same, in all likelihood, have been often repeated, tho' perhaps with some variation, in a long list of 36 of them, according to Eusebius, or 41 according to Syncellus? but nothing of this kind is in either of them to be observed; the names of all of them are different and independent, except in an instance or two; and to crown all, in neither of them is there one name at all belonging to any of the Assyrian kings in scripture. To suppose these names to have been unknown to the Greeks, would be next to supposing they were perfect strangers to the Assyrian affairs; and so all that Ctesias has written, and others after him, would fall self-condemned to the ground. But this is what we can very safely contradict; they were actually known to the Greeks, or the most curious of them, and particularly to Herodotus, who, though he mentions but one king of Assyria, calls him exactly by his true name, the termination excepted, Sennacherib; and we may thence very fairly conclude, that, had he completed the history of Assyria he promised, we should have read the names of the rest of the Assyrian kings in him with as much accuracy; and the rather as we have the experience of his conforming with scripture, in the names of several of the Egyptian kings: In consideration of which, and the contradictory writings of Ctesias, it may be justly wondered, why Herodotus should labour under so much obloquy and contempt with men of great learning and judgment, while all the abominable untruths of Ctesias, though obvious to every sense, are swallowed and received for granted, even though he in every particular clashes with scripture, while the former confirms it, wherever he happens to speak of things there handed down to us. A monstrous partiality some of the best and most religious of us have been absurdly guilty of; a partiality never to be excused but in those who have nothing to plead in their behalf but ignorance and want of discernment. But this will be more properly discussed in the preface, and therefore we return to what more immediately concerns us.

THE names in Ctesias, and the number of them, are not alone what may prompt us to pronounce him guilty of forgery; the length of the reigns may be urged as another argument against him; except it be answered, that in those very early days, so nearly bordering on the times of the deluge, such length is not to be wondered at. But this would be no answer at all, especially for at least three fourths of them, who must have lived when the life of man was reduced to its present standard. And this remote antiquity is what must also be urged against Ctesias, and particularly, as he writes in direct opposition to the scripture. Ninus, according to him, must have reigned before the days of Abraham, and conquered Persia, Media, Egypt, Assyria, and all Asia; and his wife Semiramis, his immediate successor, have added Libya and Ethiopia thereto. But what trace do we find of all this in the book of Genesis? even none. The Canaanites were under their own kings or patriarchs, ages after Abraham; the Moabites, the Ammonites, the Midianites, the Edomites, the Amalekites, the Philistines, were subject to no foreign yoke, and free from strange lords, till they began to be conquered by the Israelites. Egypt seemingly enjoyed a constant peace, apprehensive of no danger from without, till Sennacherib, bent upon establishing and enlarging his empire, moved towards Egypt with design to invade it. In proof of all which, we need only to refer to the histories of all these nations in the former part of this work. It appears then that no Assyrian enemy was in these parts for many ages after the pretended dates of Ninus and Semiramis; and that all Syria and Mesopotamia were free also from any subjection to Assyria, will appear by the sequel.

THE Syrian monarchy was confessedly older than the Assyrian, and extended on both sides of the Euphrates, under Hadadezer king of Zobab, and rose afterwards to its meridian under the race of the Damascene kings, and particularly in the days of Ben-badad and Hazael: These ruled a mighty empire, where then were the Assyrian monarchs, so extensive in their command, and so jealous of their power?

a power? David, before these, was master of a considerable extent of all on this side the Euphrates <sup>a</sup>, and had no Assyrian to dispute the honour with him. The Phœnicians continued in independance and freedom, till the days of Sbalmaneser, who was set at defiance by the Tyrians <sup>a</sup>, though he was the third of that fortunate and conquering race. Consult the history of Judea, Syria, and Phœnice, and you will perceive no glimpse of an Assyrian monarchy till the days of Pul, who lived above 2200 years after the deluge, according to the Samaritan computation we profess to follow.

We have formerly <sup>b</sup> almost ventured to assert, that the Assyrians imposed their religion on the Phœnicians and Syrians; which, if it can any way be made to appear, must argue the Assyrian monarchy to have been posterior to the ancient Syrian empire. We have seen that the ancient gods of Syria were Rimmon, Adad, and other deities of mortal origin, their most renowned kings <sup>c</sup>. These were the gods of the Syrians; but they ceasing, as it were, to be a people by their captivity <sup>d</sup>, others were introduced into the country, as the custom was <sup>e</sup>; and accordingly in the temple of the great Syrian goddess at Hierapolis, we find the statues of Semiramis and Sardanapalus <sup>f</sup>. These, as Assyrians, must have been unknown to the old inhabitants of the country; and to confirm us in a certain and well-grounded belief, that they were both of them later than the kings of Damascus; we would urge, that Semiramis herself is said to have been a Philistine, to have been born in the neighbourhood of Ascalon, at a time when the whole land was in subjection to the Assyrian kings, and as should seem in the reign of Ninus <sup>g</sup>. When this can possibly have been, but after the subjugation of the Proper Palestine, together with the neighbouring countries, by the successors of Pul, we leave any one to judge; the scripture affords no materials towards even any conjecture of the kind, as may be easily seen by what hath been said in the history of the Philistines, in the former part of this work <sup>h</sup>.

THE father of Thammuz, or Alonis, is said to have been an Assyrian <sup>i</sup>; and it is thought the whole system almost of the Syrian and Phœnician superstition migrated from the banks of the Tigris <sup>j</sup>; and as this seems very natural, and may be supported by many powerful arguments, we should be apparently wrong in not rejecting of Ctesias, who, in opposition to scripture, Herodotus, and other more undoubted authorities, is guilty of a forgery of the most solemn and delusive kind.

HAVING endeavoured to destroy the credit of Ctesias, and therewith the first table of the Assyrian kings from Eusebius and Syncellus, we will proceed to settle the chronology of the Assyrian empire in the best manner we are able, by taking into consideration the second table. By the history of Syria and the neighbouring countries, it appears, that the Assyrians had no power in the western parts of Asia till the reign of Pul, who made his first appearance on this side the Euphrates, in the decline of the kingdom of Damascus: What they had before that time done in the east, does no where appear; but that the foundations of the monarchy were laid by Pul, or some near predecessor of his, by conquests nearer home, is a matter hardly to be doubted. We have elsewhere said <sup>k</sup>, that the Assyrian monarchy cannot be dated much backwarder than the days of Menabem; and this is not only to be demonstrated by scripture and Ptolemy's astronomical canon, but by several of the most ancient and unexceptionable profane writers.

Herodotus <sup>l</sup>; that venerable and much injured historian, observes, that the Assyrians had been masters of the Upper Asia 520 years, when the Medes threw off their yoke; and that the empire of the latter subsisted no longer than 150 years, inclusive of the 28 years, during which the Scythians ruled Asia. These two sums added together amount to 670 years, for the whole duration of the two monarchies of the Assyrians and Medes, which being added to the epoch of Cyrus before Christ, which is universally stated at 559 years before Christ, will make 1229, the whole interval between the first rise of the Assyrian monarchy and the birth of Christ; which cuts off about 1000 years from the common profane accounts; though it will

<sup>a</sup> See before 382. 777.

<sup>b</sup> MENAN. apud JOSEPH. Antiq. Judai. l. 9. c. 14.

<sup>c</sup> See before in the notes, p. 399.

<sup>d</sup> See before, p. 372.

<sup>e</sup> Ibid. p. 390.

<sup>f</sup> Ibid. p. 861.

<sup>g</sup> Ibid.

p. 237.

<sup>h</sup> Ctes. apud DIODOR. SICUL. l. 2. p. 65.

<sup>i</sup> See before, p. 338, & seq.

<sup>j</sup> See before in the notes, p. 400.

<sup>k</sup> Sir Is. NEWT. Chron. of Anc. Kingd. amended, p. 27.

<sup>l</sup> See before,

p. 173.

<sup>m</sup> l. 1. c. 99.

will exceed the æra of Nabonassar by 458 years; and therefore Herodotus's numbers, as they stand with us, are doubtless too long, though so much short of Ctesias and his followers. But, by the way, we would add, that Herodotus's computation is not above 200 years later than the days of Chusban-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, or Aram-Naharaim, who kept the children of Israel under for the space of eight years, till they were delivered from him by Othniel<sup>m</sup>. In what sense this Chusban-rishathaim may have been considered as an Assyrian, we take not upon us to say, or whether he was so or not, only this we are obliged to declare that he could not be of that nation*, seeing he is in scripture<sup>n</sup> called a Mesopotamian, and seeing we might with as much justice call Cbedorlaomer an Assyrian, though he is expressly said to have been an Elamite or Persian. And this care in the sacred pen-men, thus to distinguish the men, who from the beginning made inroads upon the Euphratenian region, expressly saying that the first was an Elamite, the second a Mesopotamian, and expressly calling Pul an Assyrian, leaves us no room to imagine that the two former could be kings of Assyria; but that Herodotus should be a little elder in his date, than was consistent with an exact chronology, will not perhaps be wondered at by those who rightly consider what we have urged in the former part of this section.

AGAIN, Herodotus tells us<sup>o</sup>, that Semiramis, who, according to Diodorus Siculus<sup>p</sup>, or Ctesias rather, was the wife of Ninus, was but five generations before Nitocris, the mother of Labyntus [Nabonadius] the last king of Babylon, which as, by the largest computation, it cannot exceed 200 years<sup>q</sup>, she may have been the wife of some one of the kings in Ptolemy's canon, and perhaps of Nabonassar himself.

FOR these reasons is Herodotus much to be relied on, and for the same are we much to regret the history of Assyria he promised: and for which he doubtless was furnished with very valuable materials. He actually travelled the country, and conversed with the natives; which though a late author<sup>r</sup> makes slight of, presuming the inhabitants might be mistaken themselves, and consequently lead him into errors; yet must it be acknowledged to make greatly in favour of Herodotus, since he could possibly have had no better means of information, except he had had an opportunity of consulting the national records themselves.

WE may add, that he is both supported and followed by some of the very weightiest of the ancients. Diogenes of Halicarnassus<sup>s</sup> takes notice, that the Assyrian antiquities are run up into fable; that though the monarchy was ancient it did not extend over a very great part of Asia, and that it was not so potent as the empire of the Medes, which arose upon its ruins. Appian<sup>t</sup> affirms the duration of the three empires, the Assyrian, the Median, and the Persian, to have made up no more in sum than 900 years, which being added to 336, the epoch of Alexander before Christ, will remove the rise of the Assyrian monarchy to the distance of 1236 years before Christ, which will exceed the chronology of Herodotus above-mentioned by no more than seven years; upon which, we cannot but wonder that St. Jerome<sup>u</sup>, who follows Ctesias, and roundly asserts, that Ninus was the first that ruled all over Asia, should add, that all the Greeks, as well as the Barbarians, were of the same mind.

SUCH are the sentiments of the most judicious of the profane historians; concerning the duration of the Assyrian monarchy; and they seem to have the concurrence of Homer on their side, who in recounting the most potent princes of the earth, at the time when Troy was besieged, is quite silent as to any Assyrian monarch, though, after the rate of Ctesias's reckoning, that ten years war was waged within the Assyrian dominions.

BY what we have said against the first table of the Assyrian kings, according to Eusebius and Syncellus, and the preparatory arguments we have been using in behalf of the second, according to scripture and this history, it must appear to an attentive reader, that the Assyrian monarchy is of late date, in comparison of what has been too much imagined, even by some of the most learned; as also, that it is in scripture that we have the nearest view of the rise of the monarchy before us; and more particularly since it is evident, by Ptolemy's canon, that there were really no kings of very extraordinary eminence before the reign of Nabonassar, who may have been a descendant of Pul's, the first Assyrian monarch mentioned in scripture,
a point

<sup>m</sup> Judg. c. iii. ver. 8.    <sup>n</sup> See before in the notes, p. 861.    <sup>o</sup> Judg. xi.    <sup>p</sup> Ubi Sup. Lib. 1. c. 184.
<sup>q</sup> 1. 2. p. 67.    <sup>r</sup> MARSH. Can. Chron. p. 522.    <sup>s</sup> BEFORE, in his Script. Chronol. p. 774.
<sup>t</sup> 1. 1.    <sup>u</sup> In Prefat. p. 5.    <sup>v</sup> In Holeam c. 2.

a a point which may be more properly discussed in the chronology of Babylon; though, by the way, Ptolemy calls all the kings in his canon Assyrians, which was a common practice *.

THE authority of this famous canon is not to be disputed, and it most remarkably reduces the Assyrian æra to the bounds of scripture history, or nearly so; for, though Pul himself will not fall within the compass, he will so little exceed it, that it may be offered as a very powerful argument, to evince he was the first considerable monarch in these parts: but, this being what we may have occasion to resume hereafter, we proceed to what we have more immediately under consideration.

To fix the exact æra of the Assyrian monarchy is what we cannot pretend to, b except we do it relatively to ourselves in the western parts; and in that case we must compute from the year of Pul's first appearance on this side of the Euphrates, which was about the second year of Menabem, 23 years before the æra of Nabonassar, 2228 years after the flood, and 771 years before Christ.

THUS far it is no difficult matter to ascertain the beginning of this empire. Its end may perhaps be more nearly fixed, though that is what we do not pretend to do beyond all possibility of dispute. The text of scripture which gives us so near a prospect of its beginning, and relates to us some of the remarkable transactions of five of its most potent princes, drops us on a sudden; so that we are obliged to have recourse to the Apocrypha, and Ptolemy's canon, for the successors of the great c Esfarbaddon. The book of Judith so very nicely corresponds with Herodotus, in what he says of the war between the declining Assyrians, and the rising Medes, that we have not been able to avoid giving credit to it; and seeing the reign of Nabuchodonosor most naturally coincides with that of Cbnyladon in the canon, we have ventured to pronounce them to have been one and the same king, the second in descent from Esfarbaddon, or Ajfaraddin: As for Sarac, whom we borrow from Polybistor †, and whom we also call Sardanapalus, from a similitude of his story and exit in the same historian, with what is related of him by Ctesias, we must confess ourselves considerably in the dark, as we may note hereafter in the body of our Assyrian history. In the mean time it may be objected to us, that Polybistor is a d follower of Ctesias, and as such we have considered him; but we would answer, with the assistance of Sir Isaac Newton ‡, That there may be something of truth in the bottom of the Ctesian history (as there commonly is in all romances); as that Niniveb was destroyed by the Medes and Babylonians, that Sardanapalus was the last king of the Assyrian empire, and that Astibares and Ashyages were kings of the Medes. But whence it is that we have no such name as Sarac in the Nabonassaran canon, we shall here forbear to enquire; seeing we may have a more convenient opportunity of offering our conjectures concerning him, when we come to the history of his reign; and therefore since nothing positive can be ascertained, as to this last stage of the Assyrian monarchy, we here conclude this Section.

S E C T. IV.

The History of ASSYRIA, according to Ctesias of Cnidos, and his Followers.

e ALTHOUGH we have condemned the greatest part of what is here to follow as forgery all and falsehood, yet as it has been so long received for truth, by most of the wisest and most sagacious historians and chronologers, and as we may say from all antiquity admitted into the body of history, we are under an indispensable obligation of producing it here in all its particulars, as it is with great solemnity and all possible confidence handed down to us. Ninus (X), a prince of martial genius and immense

* PERIZON. Antiq. Babylon. p. 10. † Apud SYNCCELL. ‡ Chronolog. of anc. kingd. amended, p. 267.

(X) We will not take upon us to say, that there never was such a king as Ninus, or such a king as his pretended predecessor Belus; but it is very likely these names were forged by the Greeks, or others, to account for the building of the two great cities,

Ninoveb and Babel or Babylon. However, thus far we are certain, that he cannot have been Nimrod, or Ashur rather, their ages not at all agreeing (69); and therefore it is impossible Ninus should have been the first king. We would do all we safely can to reconcile immense ambition, resolved to make a conquest of the nations round about, and erect an empire over them: to this purpose, he assembled together the robustest of the youth in his dominions, and diligently trained them up to the exercise of arms, and enured them to hardship and labour, and fitted them for war* (Y).

BEING now in a state to execute his purpose, but apprehending he might be stopped in his career by the Arabians, whom alone he dreaded, as a bold and resolute people, jealous and tenacious of their liberty, he entered into a league with Ariens their king; to the end that, if he did not obtain his immediate assistance, he might, at least, secure his neutrality and connivance (Z). However Ariens joined forces with him, and marched with him into Babylonia (A). The city of Babylon, so famous since, was not at that time in being; though the province itself was stored with cities, whose inhabitants, unknowing in the arts of defence (B), fell an easy prey<sup>b</sup> to concile the sacred history with the profane, and will allow, with several, that Nimrod may be Belus, and Affur, Ninus; or let Nimrod, as others (70) think, be the son of Belus (whom they will have to be Cush) and let Ninus be the son of Nimrod; but then let their works and exploits be suitable with the early times they lived in, not such as we read of in Diodorus Siculus (71); let the cities they build be plain, and without art and cost. Let them reign agreeably to the state of things in the first ages, without pomp, without luxury. Let them wage war, but let it be in their neighbourhood, not in far distant countries; with a few thousands at their heels, not with millions; with rude and undisciplined men, not with regular bodies of trained soldiers.

* Apud DIODOR. SICUL. Bibliot. Histor. l. 2.

(Y) We cannot forbear thinking, that the whole story of Ninus is, with some variation, a copy of that of the great Egyptian Sesostris (72), and the rather, as we actually find them confounded together as one and the same person; for Tizatus (73) expressly calls Sesostris king of Affyria, and observes, he is the same whom Diodorus Siculus calls Sesofus (74), that he was monarch of the Affyrians; that he ruled over all lands, and that he yoked kings to his chariot. In short, he at length relates the story we have upon the same occasion told of the Egyptian Sesostris (75), without the least variation, except that he calls him an Affyrian.

The parallel is plain; Aminophis trains up a number of youth to the fatigues and exercises of war, to serve under his son in the conquest foretold of him (76), the world being then unconscious of the havoc of the sword; Ninus does here the same, and with the same intent, except that those he trained were designed to serve under himself.

(Z) It is justly objected against the Ctesian history of Affyria, that it introduces a king of the Arabians, before the Arabians were a people; our author (77) supposing them originally descended of Ishmael the son of Abraham; but this cannot hold good, for the country was before planted by Joktan (78). But what is more material and unanswerable is, the question that might be asked concerning these ancient Arabians, how it was they were in Ninus's days so famed for war and love of liberty? How came Ninus to know this? We understand by this history, that Ninus was the first that invaded the rights of his neighbours; and tyranny and slavery seem by this history to have been at these times unknown. If then these Arabians had never been invaded, they never could have distinguished themselves in these respects from the rest of the nations; and if they had been invaded, it is plain, Ninus was not the first warrior or conqueror. We read, that Sesostris king of Egypt subdued the Arabians (79); and in this particular, indeed, our parallel between him and Ninus is interrupted. But is Sesostris older in these parts than Ninus? our author (80) insinuates no. According to profane authors, they must have been nearly of an age. Now if Sesostris conquered the Arabians, it is no great sign they were invincible. What other conqueror there should have been in these parts, before these two, we perceive not; Justin (81) reckons them two of the first that disturbed the peace of the world in Asia. If Asia had been free from war till the days of Ninus, and if he was the first that affected to rule over his neighbours, the Arabians must, to all appearance, have been as ignorant in martial affairs as other nations. On the other hand, if Ninus was later than Sesostris, and if this last actually subdued the Arabians, what had Ninus to fear from them, that he must court them after this rate, and lay himself under the obligations he afterwards does to their king? The inconsequence and forgery is palpable. It is wonderful that such stuff as this should ever have passed with men for history, when it is even too silly to be called good romance, which ought to be the shadow of truth and probability at least.

(A) If Ninus resided in the country we now call Affyria, and if this mighty Arabian Ariens ruled over the country we now call Arabia, he could not with more convenience at all have joined his Affyrian friend than by marching through the kingdom of Babylon. Now if these Babylonians had been so feeble as here represented, our warlike Arab might have subdued them in his march, and made a present of them and their country to Ninus, upon their first greeting; and the rather because it would not only have redounded to his honour, but have saved time and expence also.

(B) Why the Babylonians should have been so particularly ignorant in martial affairs beyond their neighbours, is what we can no more conceive, than why the Arabians should have been so particularly versed therein. If the Arabian had been what he is represented, it is very strange the Babylonian should not have dreaded so turbulent a neighbour, and provided for his own safety against him. And here we would observe, that according to our author (82), and by what is observed in the note next above, the Arabians must have been famous warriors, before the Affyrians themselves knew any thing of the matter; and if so, it would be but natural to suppose, a to the turbulent and aspiring Ninus, who imposed on them an annual tribute; and carried away their king and all his children, whom he afterwards put to death (C). He then fell upon Armenia with a mighty hand, bore down cities and all before him, and injected such a terror into the hearts of all the people there, that their king Barzanes himself waited on him with rich gifts, and made submission to him; which had this effect, that Ninus courteously left him in possession of his kingdom of Armenia; but upon this condition, that he should become his vassal, and serve him in his wars, whenever he should require it (D). Encouraged thus to proceed, he makes an attempt upon Media, and overthrew its king, Pharnus, though at the head of a mighty army. Most of the army of the Medes he slew, the king himself was taken prisoner, and with his wife and seven children inhumanly crucified<sup>a</sup> (E).

(70) PETAÏ. de Doctr. Tempor. (71) Bibliot. Histor. l. 2. (72) See before, p. 249. (73) Ctbl. 3. v. 83. ad calc. edit. Gal. HERODOT. p. 676. (74) See before, p. 249. (75) Ibid. p. 249. & seq. (76) Ibid. p. 258. (77) BERN. MONTFAUC. apud DU PIN. Bibliot. Univ. des Histor. p. 286. (78) See before, p. 169. (79) Ibid. p. 254. (80) DIODOR SICUL. l. 2. (81) Lib. 1. c. 1. (82) Ctes. apud DIODOR. SICUL. ubi sup.

b AND now nothing would serve him, but he must make himself master of all Asia, between the Tanais and the Nile; and that he might, with the more safety, enter upon this enterprise, he fixes an intimate friend of his in the government of his new conquest, Media, while he marched away against the other provinces of Asia, which, in seventeen years time, he reduced all but Bactria and India. The number of the nations he subjugated, it seems, are no where enumerated, or the battles he fought by any one described and reckoned; but thus far is affirmed by our fabulous author; that he made himself master of the sea-coasts, as well as of the inland parts, conquering Egypt, Phœnice, Cælo-Syria, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Caria, Perygia, Mysia, Lydia, His conquests.

<sup>a</sup> Apud eund. ibid.

suppose that the Babylonians, who lay between them, should have cultivated the use of the sword before the Assyrians, and that for several reasons, and particularly, as it so stood them upon, to be on their guard against such an enemy as the Arabian. But, as natural as this may seem, we are here told quite the reverse; the Babylonians knew nothing of the matter, and they were swept away at once. They, it seems, knew not the Arabians to be such a people as they proved, and contracted no jealousy from the extraordinary preparations and proceedings of their neighbour, the king of Assyria; and so neither took the field, nor walled their cities. How likely this is to have been, we leave the reader to judge, and shall only add, that this account clashes very remarkably with two very express and important passages of sacred history relating to the Babylonian kingdom, which represents this country to have been the first after the flood where any great buildings, as cities and the like, were erected, and particularly the tower of Babel (83); and the people to have been a warlike and enterprising nation, so early as the days of Abraham, when we read of a king of Shinar or Babylon (84); making excursions upon the Canaanites and others in company with the king of Elam (85). This Babylonian king was plainly a warrior; and, according to common computation, could not have been much, if at all, later than Ninus. The city of Babylon was, we find by our author, so strongly walled, as to be in a manner impregnable. But Babylon, it seems, was as yet not in being, and the whole province, and its more ancient cities, were swept away at once. How this agrees with the scripture, we leave the reader to judge; it is oto cælo distant from it; as may be more amply observed hereafter.

In the preceding note we have endeavoured to expose the absurdity of this position; but though the Babylonians should have been more ignorant in war than the nations round about; it must have been, because they had never known what war was. In this case, it must be supposed their neighbours, not excepting any, must have been as ignorant therein as themselves. One warlike nation always makes another, and so on.

(C) What this prince should have done, to provoke Ninus to use him in this cruel manner, may be very hard to guess; but it is plain he could give him no great offence; his weakness and inactivity seem to have been the only crimes that could make him obnoxious to the Assyrian; and, that these were the crimes he suffered for, may be unnatural to suppose. In a word, it seems to have been the first thing that came uppermost, and to have been said at a venture; perhaps for variety sake.

(D) This king of Armenia, it is plain, at first, made some resistance; but, finding himself unequal to his adversary, submits to be his vassal, and, in consideration of this, his life is spared. This looks as if he not only resisted at first, but made terms for himself afterwards; or we cannot possibly perceive why he should be suffered to live any more than the apparently innocent and inoffensive king of Babylon; whose case, if true, must have redounded much to the dishonour of this new conqueror; and, if not, must reflect highly on the judgment of the relater, who could make his hero so cruel and undistinguishing a man; so that here Ninus does not make the figure of even a common hero in a romance, who is commonly proposed for a pattern of true justice and magnanimous prowess.

(E) If there be any coherence in the narration thus far, it is in the gradation of resistance in these three nations that were first attacked, upon the supposition that the world in those days knew not what war was. The Babylonians, who were first attacked, make no resistance at all; the Armenians, whose turn was next, make some faint shew of resistance; and now the Medes, who come third in turn, resist indeed. For here we find they had regular armies in the field to cope with Ninus; and a most bloody battle is fought. Pharnus, according to this, must have made a very extraordinary progress in the art of war, and must have been a furious enemy; and might have been a rebellious vassal, and a turbulent neighbour, if he had been permitted to live; and so he is put to death, with all his family. But this Mede seems to have been as much too strong, as the Armenian and Babylonian are too weak; the whole has all the air of untruth and inconsistency one could wish.

(83) See before, p. 142.

(84) Ibid. p. 326. 424.

(85) Genes. xiv.

Lydia, Troas and Phrygia upon the Hellespont, the Propontis, Bithynia, Cappadocia, a together with the barbarous nations from Pontus to the Tanais: the Caddusians, Tapyrians, Hyrcanians, Dacians, Derbiciens, Carmanians, Choramneans, Borebanians, and Parthians, not excepting Persia, the Susiana, and what was called Caspiana, which he penetrated by the passes called the Caspian Straits (F). Other nations of less account he now subdued, but found it impracticable to make any notable impression on the Bactrians, who were secured by the difficulty of their passes, and the numbers of their hardy warriors (G), and therefore he defers his war with them, till he should be better assured of making his attempt with success<sup>b</sup>.

Returns into his own country.

Dismisses the king of Arabia.

Nivineh built, and described.

LEADING his army back again into his own country [Syria, as it is called] (H), he determined to raise himself as great a name for his magnificence at home, as he hoped he should enjoy for his warlike exploits abroad; and, with this design, marked out a spot of ground whereon to erect a city, which, for its extent and stateliness, should not only far surpass all that had ever before been in the world, but also be such as should, with the greatest difficulty, be equalled by any other prince in ages to come (I). Having dismissed the Arabian king, who had followed him in his wars, with high honours and noble gifts (K); and having got a multitude of hands about him, and amassed a treasure proportionable to his undertaking, he laid the foundations of his intended city, which rose to that stupendous degree, as was never after beheld in any city whatsoever. It stood on, or near, the Euphrates (L), surrounded with lofty walls and towers; the former being 100 feet in height, the latter 200, and 1500 in number; for this city was an oblong square, no less than 480 stades in circumference, or 74 miles; the walls were so very broad, that three chariots might drive thereon a-breast. This city which he honoured with his name, Ninus [Niniveh], he gave for a possession to the most eminent of the

Assyrians

<sup>b</sup> Apud eund. ibid.

(F) Such was the extent of this youthful monarchy according to our author. All these conquests were made, with uninterrupted success, by Ninus; and these numerous nations, and others, were ever after considered as parts of the Assyrian monarchy, till its dissolution; a falsehood which may be proved by what we know of the history of every of these nations; who if they were in very early days conquered by any ancient Assyrian king Ninus, or any other, their subjection can have been but for the time. We know, by the history of the several nations that precede in this work, that they were free from any Assyrian yoke, from the first times we know of, down to the days of Pul; an interval of many ages, during which no Assyrian monarchy existed on this side the Euphrates. So that if any such there had been, and if its duration was such as Ctesias and his followers report, it must, according to the Hebrew computation, or the Samaritan, have taken rise many ages before the deluge, and have ended about the time these nations, and particularly all on this side the Euphrates, began to have any being that we know of; for, from the days of Abraham down to Pul, there is no footstep of an Assyrian power extended over the western part of Asia. This is plain, and is enough to prove this monarchy took birth in the person of Pul, the first Assyrian king, according to scripture; after him, these nations, or many of them, and particularly those on this side the Euphrates, did confessedly pay obedience to the Assyrian throne; which before that time they certainly never did, at least for any continuance; so that there could have been nothing of this pretended Assyrian monarchy from Abraham to Pul, which is an interval of about 1150 years, and which, being added to the years of the interval between Abraham and the flood, will remove the rise of this monarchy so near to us, in comparison of what profane authors tell us, that we may reckon it to have been of late origin.

(G) How these Bactrians came to be such very hardy warriors is perfectly in the dark to us; they must never have had the experience of a single campaign before they had to do with the ambitious Ninus. The same arguments may be brought to prove, that Ninus could not possibly know what kind of soldiers they were, as we have, a few notes above, offered to demonstrate, he could know nothing particular of the martial capacity of the Arabians; for we suppose, with our author, and Trogus (86), that Ninus was the first real warrior, we cannot allow there can have been any nation famous for arms till after his conquests; and though some nations, during his progress, may have put themselves in a posture of defence, and gathered together in the nature of an army, Ninus could know nothing particular of them till he had tried them; and could have nothing to apprehend from them, except he judged by their stature and strength of body; which may, it is most likely, have been the same in all these neighbouring nations. In short, considering the advantage he had of numbers and experience, as also the torrent of his victories, it were ridiculous to suppose he could dread any one of these nations more than another.

(H) We have already (87) observed, that Syria and Assyria are promiscuously used for each other, and that this is the cause of much confusion in geography (88).

(I) This is Sesostris exactly: Thus he, returning from the conquest of Asia, applied his mind to such stupendous works, as might immortalize his name, and everlastingly contribute to the public good (89).

(K) Thus also did Sesostris to his army (90).

(L) This is point-blank opposite to the real situation of this city (91), an inaccuracy which is more than once repeated by our author (92), and has been noted by several geographers and others; but whether he borrowed the mistake from his admired Ctesias, or whether he struck it out of himself, is to no purpose to enquire.

(86) JUSTIN. l. i. c. i. (87) See before, p. 857.
(90) Ibid. (91) Ibid. in the notes, p. 126.

(88) Ibid. in the notes. (89) See before, p. 257.
(92) DIONOR. SICUL. Biblioth. Histor. l. 2.

a Assyrians (M), with liberty at the same time, for those of any other nation to settle there, and added to it a large territory to be dependant thereon<sup>c</sup>.

THIS work dispatched, but in what space of time they are not so good as to tell us, Ninus takes the field again to subdue the Babylonians, whom he had left unconquered; and though in this expedition success and triumph crowned his endeavours, it is for nothing more remarkable, than for his marriage with Semiramis; which leads us to say something of the obscurity of her birth, and the sublimity of her elevation. Her birth and extraction were, to be sure, more than merely mortal, for she sprung from a goddess, Decreto by name, who had a temple erected to her near a fishy lake, not far from Ascalon in Syria (N), and who was afterwards represented b by a woman upwards and a fish downwards (O), upon the following remarkable occasion; This goddess, some how or other, laboured under the displeasure of Venus, who, to punish her, caused her to fall desperately in love with a youth, who, among others, happened to be paying sacrifice to her, and, unfortunately conceiving by him, she was delivered of a daughter; but ashamed of her guilt, and desirous to conceal it, she murdered the youth, and exposed the infant among the rocks of a desert, and, overwhelmed with grief and dishonour, threw herself headlong into the lake, and became a fish (O*). Mean while the unhappy infant was miraculously sustained and nourished by a flock of doves or pigeons (P) which frequented near, and kept her warm with their wings. These at first fed her with milk from the c neighbouring cottages; and when, at a year old she began to require a more substantial food, they picked pieces of cheese, and conveyed it to her; which being observed by the neighbouring shepherds, who had their cheeses thus served, they made search after the cause, and in the end found this beautiful child, which they took home with them, and

Ninus again makes war with the Babylonians. Semiramis; her birth;

<sup>c</sup> Agud eund. ibid.

(M) This again is almost the very story of Sesoftris, who settled certain portions, by lot, of the most fertile land in Egypt, on his whole army (93.)

(N) As much as this city was in Syria, it was a city of the Proper Palestine, and belonging to the Philistines (94); so that by this account, as we have observed elsewhere (95), Semiramis was a Philistine by birth, and consequently could have no manner of relation to the king of Assyria, either as his subject or his vassal, till after the conquest of that country by the successors of Pul, many ages after this pretended time.

(O) Hence she is supposed to have been the same with the Philistine Dagon, who is commonly supposed to have been pictured in some such shape but this we have formerly, endeavoured to confute (96). Besides, Dagon was not the peculiar god of Ascalon, but of Ashdod or Azotus (97); and therefore very unlikely to have been the Decreto of Ascalon.

(O*) Hence perhaps the worship of fishes at Hierapolis in Syria (98), where near the temple of the great Syrian goddess was a lake for the preservation and adoration of that watery creature, which we have at length described already (99). But whether Ascalon or Hierapolis was the original seat of this fable, or any other place, is a most uncertain matter.

(P) Hence it should be, that Ascalon was so remarkable for flocks of pigeons (100), not only in the roads and fields, but about every house; which the people here religiously abtained from, on account of an old tradition concerning the unlawfulness of hurting them (1).

There are those who are ready to believe Semi- ramis may have borrowed her name, as Diodorus insinuates (2), from a word in the Syrian tongue, signifying a dove (3); but others (4), finding no such word in that language, reject the notion as groundless. And these are most likely to be right, whatever may be offered to the contrary, upon a supposition that the word may, in length of time, have been obliterated (5). From all this, and more, it is asserted, that the ensign armorial of Assyria was a dove (6); they have even ventured to blazon the Assyrian shield in these terms; The field Sol, a dove volant proper (7). So that Semiramis is reckoned to have been the origin of coats and crests. Hence it is supposed (8), that in the Vulgate we read (9), quia facta est terra eorum in desolationem a facie ira columbe; where, in our translation, instead of the anger of the dove, we read the fierceness of the oppressor; and, in the Septuagint, από προσώπου τῆς μαχαίρας, the face of the sword; which in a very ancient Saxon translation in the library of Christ-Church in Oxford (10), was thus rendered, from the face of the sword of the kuhver. That the dove was a peculiar symbol of Assyria, may be collected from Hosea's (11) dove out of the land of Assyria. In fine, it is by Cornelius à Lapide, and others who follow the interpretation of St. Jerome, related, that God calls Nebuchadnezzar a dove (12). Whatever there may have been in all this, others have thought the Syrian dove was hieroglyphical only (13), and expressive of the lascivious nature of this queen; and this may appear by the nameless figure of her, in the temple of the great Syrian goddess Hierapolis, with a dove on its head (14): All which is at best but extremely dark.

- (93) See before, p. 255. (94) Ibid. p. 340. (95) Ibid. p. 869. (96) Ibid. p. 343.
 (97) Ibid. ibid. (98) Ibid. p. 373. (99) Ibid. (100) Ibid. p. 340. (1) PHILO.
apud EUSEB. Præpar. Evangelic. l. 8. p. 398. (2) Biblioth. Hist. l. 2. (3) GREGOR. in Posthum.
p. 235. (4) JOSEPH. SCALIG. in Not. ad Fragm. p. 43. (5) Vid. GREGOR. ubi sup. (6) Vid.
Eund. ibidem. (7) Ibid. (8) Ibid. (9) Jerem. xxv. 38.
 (10) Vid. GREGOR. ubi sup. (11) Ch. xi. 2. (12) Vid. GREGOR. ubi sup. (13) PLIN.
apud eund. (14) See before, p. 373.

and sent to the chief of the king's shepherds, Simma by name (Q), who being childless adopted her his own, and called her Semiramis, borrowed from a word in the Syriac tongue, that signifies doves or pigeons (R), which the Syrians ever afterwards adored as divinities<sup>d</sup>.

As married, and carried to Niniveh.

SHE grew up, and by far exceeded all of her sex for wit and beauty, and, no wonder, captivated the heart of one Menon, who was sent to survey the king's cattle, though at the same time no less than chief of his master's council, and governor of all Syria. Menon had sight of the divine Semiramis at Simma's house, and, not without great difficulty, obtaining her to himself, conducted her to Niniveh, where he married her, and had two sons by her, Hypates and Hydaspes (S). In short, she governed her husband, who did nothing but by her advice, and with her participation, and grew into great fame for wisdom<sup>e</sup>.

*Ninus's extraordinary preparations for the conquest of the Bactrians.
Why not incredible.*

HAVING said thus much, preparatorily to what is to follow, we must leave her for a while, to follow Ninus in his Bactrian war. Sensible he had a task of the greatest difficulty to surmount, he made choice of the ablest and stoutest men in all his dominions, and resolving not to miscarry this time, as he either did or thought he should before, he mustered together 1,700,000 foot, above 110,000 horse, and no less than 10,600 scythed chariots. Our author tells us, these numbers may seem incredible, but that we shall think them nothing, if we do but consider a little the vast extent of Asia; and especially if we, at the same time, call to mind the 800,000 men Darius led against the Scythians, and the numberless army that followed Xerxes into Greece; things of late transaction, and what every body in his time, in a manner, knew<sup>f</sup>.

HAVING by this, and other arguments and examples of the same kind, endeavoured to get the better of the incredibility that might start up to the disadvantage of this part of his history, he proceeds to tell us, that Ninus, as he advanced towards the straits and passes into Bactria, was obliged to divide his army into two or three columns; and so made his way into the enemies country<sup>g</sup>.

Bactria a populous and well fortified country.

BUT, before we proceed, we must, by the way, take notice, that Bactria was, in those days, adorned with many large and noble cities, that the capital was called by the name of Bactra, that one Oxyartes was at this time king there, that he called in all his subjects that were able to bear arms, and that, in consequence of this, he gathered together an army of 400,000 men. With these he marched towards the passes which gave admission into his country, and quietly suffered Ninus to enter with a part of his army; but, perceiving their numbers to swell considerably, he fell on them in the plain, routed them, forced the Assyrians into the mountains, and killed 100,000 of them. Thus was Ninus repulsed by the Bactrians; but he had his turn of conquest, overpowered the Bactrians with numbers, and broke and dispersed his army, which ran to the cities to defend them against the invader. Ninus with ease enough reduced all the cities and strong holds, but the<sup>h</sup> city and fortress of Bactra itself, which had like to have been too many for him, and held him out a long and tedious siege (T).

Semiramis goes to the camp before Bactra.

DURING this interval Semiramis's fond husband, then attending the king, was taken with an impatient desire to see his wife, and sending for her, she, as desirous to display the superiority of her understanding and other excellencies, as her husband was of her company, set out for the camp, in a habit so prudently contrived, as at once

<sup>d</sup> Apud eund. ibid.

<sup>e</sup> Ibid.

<sup>f</sup> Ibid.

<sup>g</sup> Ibid.

<sup>h</sup> Ibid.

(Q) The name of this man, Simma, has made some mistake him for no less than Sem or Shem; and so, according to them, Semiramis must be the daughter of that son of Noah (15.) This is giving her antiquity enough, and allowing her to have been born before any body who is, by the various authors, supposed to have laid the foundations, either of the kingdom of Assyria, or of that of Babylon.

(R) This was particularly the practice at Assenon, as may be gathered from what we have cited, a note or two above; though it is certain to have been a custom, more or less, with all the people within the limits of the Assyrian empire.

(S) These are Greek names, void of all affinity with any names, either Assyrian or Babylonian. Hydaspes was, according to the LXX, the name of a river, not far from the Tigris and Euphrates (16).

(T) This, according to our author, must have been the first warfare these Bactrians were engaged in; and yet, by this story, one would think they had been old and experienced in all the branches of that destructive trade. Here you have a vast army of well-disciplined troops, a wife and prudent king at the head of them, a country well defended by nature, and a city impregnable by art. All this is purely said to exalt the valour and might of Ninus; though if it had been asked, how in nature it could be possible for the Bactrians to be so extremely well prepared to withstand the enemy, it had been a question Ctesias could never have answered with any propriety or consistency.

(15) Vid. GREGOR. Postb. p. 235.

(16) Vid. ORTEL. Thesaur. Geograph. ad vocem.

- a once to preserve her beauty and conceal her sex, and at the same time to be fit for agility and action; a mode of dress which proved so taking, that both the Medes and the Persians are said to have assumed it when they came to the empire <sup>1</sup>.

SHE no sooner arrived before Babtra, than she made remarks on their manner of conducting the siege, and particularly took notice, that they amused themselves with assaulting the weakest places, and never so much as thought of making an effort upon the citadel, and other parts of more strength; and that for this reason the besieged neglected them, to defend the places more defenceless. Observing this, she took with her some who had a particular faculty of climbing up rocks, She is the cause the city is taken. and with these she, with unspeakable toil and dexterity, got possession of part of the citadel, and immediately made signal to the Assyrians to assault in that quarter, which being done, and the city thrown into the wildest consternation, the whole place was immediately reduced <sup>2</sup> (V).

- b Ninus, astonished at this action, at first rewarded her as she deserved, and presently after fell a slave to her irresistible beauty, endeavouring by all means to persuade her husband to surrender her up to him, and particularly tempting him with the promise of giving him his daughter Sesana in marriage; but, this making no impression on him, Ninus changed his note, and threatened to pull out his eyes; which threw poor Menon into such a fit of rage and despair, that he immediately went and hung himself. Thus was it that Ninus became possessed of the incomparable Semiramis (W), Ninus first smitten with her; marries her; who was now advanced to the imperial dignity <sup>3</sup>.

Ninus, now lord of Babtra, returned with immense spoil; particularly of gold and silver, and some time afterwards had a son by Semiramis, called Ninyas, whom (dying soon after) he left to the care of his wife, whom he constituted regent of the empire (X). has a son by her. She deposited her husband in the palace, and raised over him a mount of earth of surprizing

<sup>1</sup> Apud eund. ibid.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid.

(V) Whoever reflects on the history of this woman hitherto, must at once conclude the writer of it to have been no better than a fabulist, and an awkward one too. Her extraordinary birth, her miraculous preservation by doves, and now her behaviour at this siege, are all circumstances completely and self-evidently romantic. But the story had been imperfect without a woman. Thus, in the tale of Sesoftris, his daughter Athyra is the adviser of his conquests, and assures him success would attend him in his wars (17), and has, as it were, the honour of all his conquests. So is it now with Semiramis; she here, by her sagacity and intrepidity, performs what without her perhaps had never been brought to pass. Where is the difference between Athyra and Semiramis? The one advises, the other executes. They look very much like the same person in different employments; nor must we wonder that Taxartes talks, after this, of an Assyrian Sesoftris (18), or that any other should write of an Egyptian Ninus. We would now add, that the Babtrian king, who is here called Oxyartes, is by others (19) called Zoroastres; concerning whom, or the name at least, we shall have so much to say in a more proper place, that we shall not here anticipate any thing concerning him.

(W) Scaliger (20) will have it, that Semiramis was married to Ahur the son of Sbem, which is much the same as making her the daughter of Sbem, as we have observed some would have her to have been, a note or two above. His reason for it is (21), because the name of her son Ninyas better agrees with the Hebrew way of writing the name of the city of Niniveb, than that of her pretended husband Ninus; a name he will have to have been imposed by the Greeks upon the patriarch Ahur, the grandson of Noah (22). According to this notion, Sbem himself must have been the vulgar Belus, the supposed father of Ninus, and not Nimrod, who was three generations later, and descended from Ham. The absurdity of all this, though our author exults much upon it (23), we hope we have demonstrated by a great variety of arguments, and it would be repetition to say more of it in this place.

(X) Thus it was according to our author that she became queen of Assyria; but from another (24) we understand, that, as great as we are taught she must have been in the eyes of the people, she was afraid they should know who ruled them; though in right of her minor her son. That, to conceal this, she clothed herself so as not to be known from him with a long robe on her body, and a tiara on her head; that, to cover the deceit, she commanded the people to dress after the same fashion; and that thenceforward they retained the habit. This account of the dress, she is said by Diodorus (25) to have brought into fashion, is much more likely to be true, than what the same author (26) afterwards relates concerning it, that she assumed it to preserve her beauty, and to qualify her for action, which requires a succinct dress, rather than that which may be seen to have been the mode of these parts afterwards in Babylon and Persopolis; for the former of which, we, for the present, refer the reader to Herodotus (27); for the latter, to the sculptures of the ruins of Persopolis (28).

The story, of her pretending to pass with the people for her son Ninyas, is exploded by Sir Walter Raleigh <sup>4</sup>; since, according to the historian, Ninyas must have been but a child when his father Ninus died, and nothing near to the stature of his mother; who, being supposed to have been a comely personage, could never by any arts of concealment have passed for a child.

(17) See before, p. 254. (18) Ibid. in the notes, p. 872. (19) JUST. l. 1. c. 1. (20) Not. in Fragm. ad calc. Emend. Temp. p. 43. (21) Ibid. (22) Ibid. (23) Ibid. (24) JUST. l. 1. c. 2. (25) Biblioth. Histor. l. 2. p. 67. (26) Ibid. (27) Lib. 1. c. 195. (28) See CHARDIN'S and LE BRUYN'S Travels. <sup>4</sup> Hist. of the World, c. 12. §. 2.

surprising dimension, no less than nine stades in height, and ten in breadth (X), conspicuous and very remarkably so, over all the plain, where the city of Niniveh stood, which it long survived, remaining a stupendous monument many ages after the subversion of the empire <sup>m</sup>.

Semiramis's
character;

resolves to build Babylon.

The manner
she contrived to have the city built in a short time.

Semiramis, as may be gathered from what has been said before, was a woman of an aspiring mind and immense ambition, and now thought of nothing less than eclipsing her husband's glory (Y), to which end she determined to erect a city in the province of Babylon; making incredible preparation for the work, and assembling together two millions of men to assist therein. This city, as she contrived it, was divided by the Euphrates, and she surrounded it with a wall of 360 stades in circuit (Z) of such thickness, that six chariots might drive a-breast thereon, and of height beyond imagination, no less than fifty orgyas, or fathoms, and adorned with 250 turrets, in due and proper proportion thereto, the whole a solid body of brick cemented together with bitumen, and between this wall and the houses, there was left a space of two plethra, or 200 feet <sup>n</sup>.

THAT this enormous city might be erected with the dispatch her impatience required, she allotted a spot of a furlong, to as many of her trustiest friends as the greatness of the surface required, allotting to each every thing that was necessary for the undertaking; by which means, though she allowed no more than the short space of a year for the completion of the whole, her commands were punctually obeyed. She highly approved of the work, and, to join the divided parts of the city, she ordered a bridge, which was as substantially built, as artfully contrived, and as beautifully adorned as any that since then has ever appeared in the world. The stones of it were firmly clamped together with iron, and the passage over was on a floor of cedar and cypress, and palm-trees. The breadth of it was indeed no ways proportionable to its length, which was five stades, it amounting to no more than thirty feet. On each side of the river she raised a wharf, or key, of the breadth of the walls, and an hundred stades in length; and at each end of the bridge she erected two palaces, whence she might reciprocally survey and awe both parts of the city. The Euphrates passing through the midst of Babylon, from north to south, these two palaces stood, the one to the east, the other to the west; both of them sumptuous and magnificent to the utmost. The western was surrounded by a lofty wall of brick, full sixty stades in circuit, within which was a second, wrought and adorned with figures, as it were from the very life, so curiously were they formed, and so naturally coloured. This magnificent wall was 40 stades in circum-

<sup>m</sup> Apud eund. ibid.

<sup>n</sup> Ibid.

(X) Or a mile and a quarter, allowing eight stades or furlongs to the mile; and by this same rule it must have been a mile and half quarter in height. This seems so incredible to Monf. Rollin in particular, who has unaccountably adopted the absurdities of the several profane authors in his history, and rejected most of, if not all, the improvements that have been made in history and geography, by the assiduous researches of later days, that he is willing to think the stade made but little more than the sixteenth of our mile, and that fifteen of them might be reckoned to the mile, as some have imagined (29). This allowed, this funeral monument would very far exceed any thing that perhaps ever was in the world.

(Y) Rollin supposes she wanted to cover the meanness of her extraction, by the greatness of her deeds and enterprises (30). Thus is it his translator expresses himself in English, which we are, for this once, obliged to use for want of the original French. But this thought seems to be a little too refined for the early times he supposes her to have lived in: besides, his historian (31) warrants him in nothing of that kind that we can perceive. Thus her ambition puts us in mind of a story told of her, That she was a Syrian by birth, a servant-maid to one of the king's servants, and the king's concubine; and that at length she got such an ascendant over the great Ninus, that she obtained of him to let her sit on the throne and command for one day; and that, perceiving all her orders to be most exactly executed, she at last ordered her guards to seize on Ninus himself, bind him, and put him to death; and that thus it was she became queen of Asia (32). This same story, with some variation, is also told by others. If the former part of this be true, she had some reason to be ashamed of her extraction; and if the latter, it was but policy in her to endeavour to outdo her fond predecessor; who, according to this, must have been such a Ninus as is described by Phœnix Colophonius (33), who is represented exactly as another Sardanapalus, and may, it is likely, have been meant for the same; for we cannot conceive how so very effeminate a character can suit with the great Ninus the conqueror. A mean and scandalous prince she might have outdone, and kept her ground after she had destroyed him; but for such a prince as Ninus is on all sides allowed to have been, we cannot apprehend it could have been in her power, either to have pacified her new subjects, or to have eclipsed him.

(Z) We shall have occasion hereafter to describe this city in form, so that we here confine ourselves to what Ctesias relates of it, regardless whether true or false, which we reserve for a particular inquiry in the history of the Babylonian kingdom.

(29) Hist. of the Assy. vol. II. p. 8. in a note at the bottom. (30) Ibid. p. 9. (31) Diodor. Sic. l. 2. p. 95. (32) PLUTARCH. EPMITHOS, p. 75. (33) Apud ATHENÆ. Deipnosoph. l. 12. p. 530.

a circumference, 300 bricks thick, 50 fathom high, and thereon were raised 70 towers of the same measure in height. Within this there was a third wall, or inclosure, far surpassing the second in height and breadth, on which, and its towers, were represented all manner of living creatures as before; and more especially a great hunting of all kinds of wild beasts, each four cubits in height and upwards; in the midst of which appeared Semiramis herself, mounted on a steed, darting through a leopard, and her husband Ninus near, in close combat with a lion, whom he pierced with his lance; this wall was 30 stades about. To this palace she had three gates, under which were rooms of brass, for the celebration of festivals, which were opened by a mechanical contrivance *.

b THIS palace far exceeded that on the other side of the river, both for dimension and magnificence; for the outermost wall of this was no more in circumference than the innermost wall of the former, and for decoration, the whole was much inferior to what we have described. So our author tells us, though with some seeming inconsistency, when in the same breath he informs us, that besides the brazen statues of Ninus, Semiramis, and their great officers, and that of Jupiter, whom the Babylonians called Belus, there were not only whole armies drawn up in battalia, but likewise the representation of various kinds of hunting, to the great surprize and recreation of the beholder †.

ALL this being compleated, Semiramis sunk a vast lake, vast considering it was sunk by the labour of man. This lake, for so we may well call it, was four square; each side of it was 300 stades in length, the whole lined with brick strongly cemented with bitumen, and no less than 35 foot in depth. This lake was sunk on purpose to receive the waters of Euphrates, which she diverted, while she erected a covered passage, or vault, across the bottom of the river, whereby to have communication between her two opposite palaces. This vault was 20 bricks thick, 12 foot high, and 15 broad; a work finished within the space of 260 days, when the river was again restored to its ancient course and liberty. At the ends of this vault she had brazen gates, which continued, say they, to the time of the Persian conquest ‡.

IN the midst of the city, though on which side is not said, she built a temple to Jupiter Belus, concerning which our author has nothing particular to relate, except that it must have been of exceeding height (A); that, like the rest of the city, it was built of brick and bitumen; and that, on the top of it, Semiramis placed three statues of beaten gold, viz. that of Jupiter, Juno, and Rhea. The statue of Jupiter was upright, and, as it were, walking; forty foot high, and weighing 1000 talents of Babylon: The statue of Rhea was of the same weight, and sat in a golden throne, with a lion standing at each knee, and near them, two very great serpents of silver, weighing 30 talents apiece: The statue of Juno was erect, and weighed 800 talents; she with her right hand grasped a serpent by the head, and with her left she held a scepter enriched with gems. These deities had a table, or altar, common to the three, made of beaten gold, 40 foot in length, 15 foot in breadth, and weighing 500 talents. On this table stood two flagons, or goblets, of 30 talents weight, and near them two cankers, but these weighed 300 talents each; as also three drinking bowls, or vases, of which particularly that dedicated to Jupiter weighed 1200 talents of Babylon, the other two 600 † (B).

ALL this is attributed to Semiramis, and much more there is to come. Babylon Builds several was not the only city she raised; she built several others on the banks of the Tigris and Euphrates, for the sake of commerce and communication with the remote parts of her empire, and to exalt the majesty of the great capital; which she farther distinguished by a most extraordinary obelisk, hewn out of the mountains of Armenia, 125 foot high, five foot broad, and five deep. This she removed from its native place, by multitudes of oxen and asses, and, thence shipping it on the river, conveyed it to Babylon, and erected it in a remarkable part of the neighbourhood

* Apud eund. ibid.

† Ibid.

‡ Ibid.

* Ibid.

(A) We have, as well as we have been able, determined the height of this tower, which was raised long after these pretended times by Nebuchadnezzar, and must refer the reader back to what we have formerly said about it (34).

(B) Pliny (35) takes notice of Semiramis's bowl, or goblet, which weighed no less than fifteen talents.

(34) See before, p. 145.

(35) Hist. Nat. l. 34. c. 3. p. 584. Edit. Froben, neighbourhood of this city; and it is by our author reckoned as one of the seven wonders of the world <sup>1</sup>.

Wars upon the Medes.

WHEN Semiramis had done all this, she put herself at the head of a vast army, and marched away into Media, and there incamp'd near a mountain called Bagistan, where she made a pleasant garden, of 12 stades in circumference: It was in an open champaign country, and plentifully supplied with water from a neighbouring spring. This mountain was dedicated to Jupiter, or Belus, and towards this same garden, its craggy precipice was 17 stades from top to bottom, which she is said to have ascended from the plain to the top of it, on the packs and loads carried by the beasts of burthen that followed her. At the bottom of this rock, she caused a statue of herself to be hewn out, as attended by 100 of her choicest guards <sup>2</sup>.

FROM hence she marched till she came to Cbaon, a city of the Medes, and there encamping on an eminence, she took notice of a very lofty rock, on the top of which also she formed a very fine garden, and erected stately edifices, whence she might command a view of the beauties of the spot, the wide extension of the place, and the whole camp of her army. Here she is said to have wasted much of her time, and to have given herself up to wanton dalliances and prostitution (C); for, jealous of her power and high command, she would take no partner to her bed; but chose rather to admit the comeliest men of her army to her embraces, which were fatal to all that enjoyed them, for all such she immediately doomed to death <sup>3</sup> (D).

MOVING from this place, she advanced towards Ecbatan, and in her way levelled the mountain Zarcæum, which was many stades in extent, and for its frequent precipices impassable but by much labour and loss of way. This she did to add to the glory of her name, and to facilitate the passage to all that should have occasion to travel that way (E). An undertaking which cost her infinite labour and expence, and hence the work came to be called SEMIRAMIS'S ROAD or WAY. When she came to Ecbatan, she there built a most magnificent palace, and did more than she had any where else done. The city, till then, had laboured under a want of water, a defect which she amply supplied with her usual toil and expence <sup>4</sup>.

FROM Media she continued her progress through Persia, and the rest of her Asiatic provinces, levelling both rocks and mountains before her as she went, in all the parts she found obstructed by such eminences; and on the contrary, in plain and champaign tracks, raising a number of hills to vary and adorn them, and at the same time to serve for monuments to her captains and chief commanders. Sometimes she would build towns and cities, and it was her constant custom to raise some eminence near it, whereon to erect her own pavilion, that so she might have a prospect of her whole army. Many of these things are said to have remained a long time after her in Asia, and to have been commonly called SEMIRAMIS'S WORKS <sup>5</sup>.

HAVING thus visited her dominions in Asia, she next went to Egypt, surveyed that kingdom, and added the greatest part of Libya to what belonged to her before; and paying a visit to the temple of Jupiter Ammon, and enquiring how long she had to live, the oracle made answer, She should vanish from the sight of men, and obtain immortal honour and worship from some of the Asiatic nations, at such time as her son Ninyas should plot against her life. How she took this, we are not told; but from hence she made war upon Ethiopia, and having settled things there, and taken a view of the rarities of that strange country, she marched back into Asia, and reposed herself at Babtra <sup>6</sup>.

Resolves to invade India.

HERE she for some years enjoyed herself in peace; but at length, impatient of so quiet and calm a way of life, she meditated a war against the king of India. She had been informed of the transcendent amenity of the country, its double fertility, its immense riches, and matchless elephants; and resolved upon nothing less than the conquest of that most extensive part of the old world. But knowing well what a task she should have of it, she ordered all her governors in general to select a proportion of the choicest of the youth in their provinces, and to furnish

<sup>1</sup> Apud eund. ibid.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid.

<sup>5</sup> Ibid.

<sup>6</sup> Ibid.

(C) Authors are divided in their opinions of her chastity, as may be remarked hereafter.

(D) This is of a piece with the story five notes above, of her circumventing her husband Ninus, and putting him cruelly and ungratefully to death.

(E) Plutarch, as we shall observe a little farther, compares her with Scythris, for valour and magnificence.

a furnish them with compleat accoutrements for war, and to take care they rendezvoused at a place appointed in Bactria, within the space of three years. She sent for shipwrights out of Phenice, Syria, and Cyprus, and other maritime places, and preparing a store of timber answerable to her designs, she ordered, that they should frame her a certain number of vessels, to be transported in pieces by land, wherewith to cross the Indus, whole adjacencies were destitute of wood <sup>a</sup>.

SHE in the next place considered, that she laboured under a great disadvantage <sup>Her mock-</sup> by the want of elephants, in which Strabrobates, the king of India, at that time was mighty and strong. How to get any she knew not; art therefore must be used, and she ordered a number of counterfeit elephants to be contrived, thinking particularly <sup>elephants.</sup> b to terrify the Indians by this stratagem, they being possessed with assurance the elephant was no where a native but in their country. The thing is resolved on, 300,000 black oxen are slaughtered, and their flesh distributed to poor people, who were to make up their hides in the form of elephants, which were to be stuffed out, and carried by a camel within, and guided each by a man without. The people who wrought at this were surrounded by a lofty inclosure, and no body suffered to go in or out, that none might know what they were about, and convey the news to the Indian king <sup>a</sup>.

HER vessels and her elephants ready, and all in two years, she, in the third, rendezvoused her army in the kingdom of Bactria, to the amount of three millions <sup>c</sup> of foot, 200,000 horse, 100,000 chariots, and 100,000 men on camels, who wielded swords four cubits long. Her transports were 2000 in number, and carried by camels (F), as were also the mock-elephants, which the horsemen endeavoured to familiarise to their steeds, that they might not take fright at them when they came to battle <sup>b</sup>.

Strabrobates heard of this, and prepared for the storm; and first he built him 4000 <sup>Strabrobates,</sup> boats of the great canes [Bamboo's] which grew in the rivers and fens of India; and <sup>king of India,</sup> with great diligence got together a far greater army than that of Semiramis. He <sup>prepares to receive her-</sup> added to the number of elephants he had before, causing great quantities of those animals to be caught for that purpose, and to be apparelled with every thing that might <sup>d</sup> make them dreadful to an enemy; that by their number and armour they might be invincible by any human force. Thus prepared, he sends ambassadors to Semiramis, then on her march towards him, with complaints and reproaches for offering to make war upon him, without any offence at all given on his part; by a private letter, at the same time, upbraiding her with her infamous life, and vowing by heaven, that, if he conquered her, he would crucify her. She perused this letter, smiled at the contents, and answered, The Indian should e're long be better acquainted with her by her carriage and actions <sup>e</sup>.

WHEN she came to the banks of the Indus, she discovered the enemy's fleet <sup>Semiramis on</sup> drawn up against her; whereupon she prepared and launched her own, which she <sup>the banks of</sup> manned with the bravest of her people, and gave battle, ordering it so that those <sup>the Indus.</sup> e ashore might be aiding and assisting upon occasion. The fight was obstinate, but Semiramis, in the end, came off victorious, sunk 1000 of the Indian barks, and took a multitude of prisoners. Elated with this, she fell on the cities and islands of the river, and made 100,000 captives <sup>d</sup>.

UPON

<sup>a</sup> Apud eund. ibid.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid.

<sup>d</sup> Ibid.

<sup>e</sup> Ibid.

(F) These numbers, says Suidas (35), she levied by her lieutenant Dercetæus, who, by his name, should have been her kinsman. The same author (36) exaggerates these numbers most monstrously, writing, that she thus gave orders to the said Dercetæus, 'Go to, and prepare for an expedition in three years, beginning from the Hellespont and Libya to Bactra, and levy three millions of foot, one million of horse, 100,000 scythed chariots, and the like number of men to fight upon camels; 200,000 camels for other uses; and let there be 300,000 ox hides prepared, and 3000 ships built in Bactria, with brazen prows, and manned by Syrians, Phœnicians, Cypriots, Cilicians, and others on the sea coasts, quite to the Hellespont.' This is a notable addition to the Ctesian story, and a great instance of credulity or presumption in the writer, and tempts us to say, that the Greek historians seem to have been particularly fond of the marvellous, and to have made a greater merit of magnifying things, even beyond all bounds, than of representing them as they really were. For here it is observed (37), that no spot on the face of the earth could have sustained these multitudes, though every man and beast had fed upon nothing but grass.

(35) Ad vocem Σευπηρίης.

(36) Ibid.

(37) Raleigh's Hist. of the World, ub. sup.

Strabrobates feigns a retreat.

UPON this, Strabrobates draws off his army, as if afraid, but in truth to decoy Semiramis over the river; and she, ignorant of his meaning, no sooner perceived his retreat, than she ordered a broad bridge of boats to be stretched across the river, and marched over her army, leaving only 60,000 men to guard the bridge, while she went in pursuit of the flying Indians. She marched with her mock-elephants in the front, thereby to deceive and intimidate the enemy, and it seems that herein she did not contrive amiss; for the Indian scouts, mistaking them for real, gave a dreadful account of their multitudes, and injected a terror into their astonished countrymen, who could not conceive whence the Assyrians should have furnished themselves with such a prodigious number of those creatures: But the deceit did not trouble them long, for some of Semiramis's people deserting over to the Indians, for fear of punishment they expected for neglect of duty, revealed to them the whole fallacy, and Strabrobates immediately ordered proclamation thereof to be made throughout his whole camp.

Semiramis on the other side of the Indus.

Her fight with the king of India.

Semiramis, in the mean time, advanced towards the Indian army, continuing with her false elephants in the front, which came up with the Indian horse and chariots, which had been disposed at some distance before the gross of the foot and the elephants. They charge, and an unexpected fright seizes the Indian horse, who, being accustomed to the sight of elephants, advanced at first with great fury; but, being come in scent of these ox hides, it was so strange and offensive to them, that they broke into the wildest disorder, throwing their riders, or running away with them into the midst of the Assyrians. Semiramis, perceiving the advantage, with a choice body of men attacked the disordered Indians, put them to the rout, and drove them back again to the gross of their army. Strabrobates, in some degree of consternation at this partial defeat, charges with his foot, sustained by his elephants, himself mounted on a stately one in his right wing, and opposite to Semiramis then in her left. The shock was violent and soon decided the contest, and great was the slaughter of the Assyrians, caused particularly by the elephants. Semiramis's mock elephants now proved useless and cumbersome, and her army betook them to a precipitate flight. In the midst of this battle, the Assyrian queen and Indian king fought hand to hand. She was first wounded in the arm with an arrow, and then with a dart in her shoulder, as she was turning about to get from him, and at length, trusting to the fleetness of her horse, she fled with the rest of her army.

*Her overthrow,
and flight.*

WHEN they came to the bridge, the throng was so great that many who had escaped the hand of the enemy were miserably pressed to death, or crushed under foot, being thrown down and trampled upon, or shoved into the river from the sides of the bridge. Semiramis, when the body of her army had crossed the river, ordered the bridge to be cut away and destroyed, while chiefly laden with Indians, the greatest part of whom perished by that means. And now she was safe from farther danger; the river was now between her and the enemy; whilst, on the other hand, the Indian monarch was terrified by some intervening prodigies from pursuing farther after her. In fine, both parties having made an exchange of prisoners, Semiramis returned to Babylon with scarce a third part of the army she had carried out (G).

Her end.

AND now, under this eclipse of her glory, she approaches towards her end; the predicted time is come, she is attempted to be assassinated by an eunuch, subdoloously and unnaturally employed by her son (H), and thereupon, calling to mind the answer

* Apud eund. ibid.

† Ibid.

‡ Ibid.

(G) Arrian (38) and Strabo (39) say she died in the midst of this expedition, and never returned out of India, though by this last * she should have made her escape, tho' with no more than 20 men at her heels; but Sir Walter Raleigh thinks this number to be too small a remnant of so infinite a multitude.

(H) Having thus conducted this famous woman through a long course of incredible undertakings and exploits, which we have forbore to animadvert on, apprehending we have said more than enough in the former part of this section to prepare the reader for a disbelief of what was to follow (which indeed were a needless task, had not this piece of history received the sanction of some of the greatest men in all ages) we come now to enquire into her end, and particularly how it should come to pass that her son Ninyas sought her life. We are told (40), that she had once unnaturally tempted him to commit incest with her, and that thereupon he conceived such an aversion to her, that he could not suffer her to live any longer, and therefore caused her to be murdered. Diodorus, or his author Cleinas rather, here tells us her son employed an eunuch to dispatch her, but that she escaped and vanished from sight. We have seen, by the same author, that she gave herself up to wanton dalliances in the plains of Media, (38) In Lib. Rev. Indicar.

supra.

(40) Japh. l. 1. c. 2.

(39) Geograph. p. 15. l. 686, 722.

* Ibid. Hist. of the World, ubi

an answer she had received from Jupiter Ammon, she suppressed all thoughts of revenge for what had been caused, as it were, by a divine fatality; she forgave her son, surrendered up every thing to him, commanded all her subjects to pay him duty and homage as their king, and was translated from the sight of men, as the oracle had foretold. It was fabled she made her exit in the form of a dove or pigeon, accompanied with a flock of those birds, which settled upon her palace just at that time. Hence it is pretended that the Assyrians became addicted to the worship of a dove (I). In fine, she was queen of all Asia, India excepted, and continued in the sight of men 62 years, 42 of which she reigned <sup>b</sup>.

Ninyas (K) succeeded his mother Semiramis, but neither took after father nor mother, but chose to enjoy himself in peace; and, indeed, there seems to have been a necessity

<sup>b</sup> Apud eund. ibid.

Media, and cruelly sacrificed her gallants to her furious lust; but no mention at all is by him made of any attempts of hers to seduce her son. Now, according to the course of this history, there seem to have been two provocations that may have stirred up Ninyas to get rid of her: the one, her scandalous way of life; and the other, her usurpation of his right as king and sovereign; which, how he should so long have submitted to, is past our solution; though we may just touch on it anon, and dismiss it for the present. It is here somewhat to our purpose that Conon (41) calls her not the wife but the mother of Ninus, and that, lying with him by accident, she afterwards acknowledged him publicly for her husband. According to this reading (42) Ninyas should be the person meant; but Sir Walter Raleigh clears her from all imputations of this kind, and ascribes them, as his words run, to the envious and lying Grecians (43); and St. Gregory (44) offers it as an argument of her chastity, that she, as Ammianus relates, first instituted eunuchs to attend her in her bed-chamber.

(I) Concerning the Semiramidan dove, we have treated largely already (45), and may have occasion to resume the subject hereafter, when we are to speak of the Babylonish religion; and the rather as Semiramis is more likely to have been a Babylonian than an Assyrian, appellations confessedly synonymous. And now that there was such a woman as Semiramis we doubt not in the least, but that there ever was a woman of that or any other name, that performed such prodigious feats as are here reported, is impossible to believe. Her birth, her elevation, her reign, and her death are all extraordinary, and unnatural, and impossible, as related by the bulk of historians; but above all, her antiquity, which is exaggerated so monstrously by Joseph Scaliger (46) and Renecius (47), is a matter so easily disproved by the circumstances of her birth and country, that it were sufficient to destroy whatever other extravagance is advanced of her. Conon (48) makes her to have been the same with the Atossa or Semiramis who reigned 12 years with her father Belochus, the 18th king of Assyria, according to Eusebius (49), and in the same place calls her the daughter and not the wife of Ninus, though copies, it must be confessed, differ in the reading, and have sometimes (50) mother instead of daughter. But this latter is to be preferred, because of its congruity with the author's meaning, who makes her the Atossa of Belochus, for these two were confessedly daughter and father (51). Belochus then must have been the Ninus of Ctesias, and he, instead of being the first or the second king of Assyria, is, according to Eusebius, (52), the eighteenth king; this takes much from the antiquity of both, and we are ready to subscribe the same, and the rather, as it may be observed hereafter, to quadrate with Herodotus, and is much more conformable to our notices of the true and more certain history of this monarchy. To conclude, had this queen done but half what is reported of her (53), or even a tenth part, she would have been worthy of the greatest fame, and even, according to the genius of those times, of deification itself. A most extraordinary personage she must have been, nor do we wonder, considering the romantic humour of the times, that she should be reckoned to have discovered and invented the use of metals, to have been the first queen and tyranness, and in short, to have been called the goddess Rhea (54). She may be compared with the Egyptian Isis, and the Phœnician Asarte, as her husband Ninus may with the Egyptian Osiris, Sesestris, and the like.

(K) He is also called Zames (55), the German writers will have him to have been called Trebeta, and to have built the city of Treves (56); he is also called Thaurias (57), or Thouras (58), or Ares [Mars]; and is said to have had the first statue erected to him, which they called Βασις Ὀσόν, Lord God. In short, he is said to have waged war, and to have slain the tyrant Caucasus of the tribe of Japhet, or Japetus, and to have been consecrated into the planet Mars (59). How different is this character from that of the slothful Ninyas in most other authors? No extremes can be at a greater distance from each other. The authors we have cited make him the successor of Ninus, without any mention of Semiramis. This seems in some measure to agree with what we have from Eusebius observed in the note above, that she was the very Atossa, the daughter of Belochus, and that she reigned with her father, as his colleague and assistant, for the space of 12 years only (60). And this seems the rather to have been the truth of the case, as we cannot help wondering with Sir Walter Raleigh (61), how she should have been able to keep the reins in her own hands, in prejudice of her son who was her lawful sovereign. There is indeed no way to account for this, but by supposing he was incapable of minding any thing but his pleasures, and cared not how much trouble his mother eased his shoulders of (62). But that he was not so poor a wretch as this amounts to will, among other things, be observed in the next note.

(41) Apud PHOT. Biblioth. p. 427.

World, chap. 12. § 4.

(42) In Posthum. ubi sup.

(43) See before p. 875. (P).

(44) Apud GREGOR. Posthum. See before, in the notes, p. 877.

(45) See before, p. 865.

(46) Apud PHOT. Biblioth. p. 427.

(47) See before, p. 865.

(48) Apud PHOT. Biblioth. p. 427.

(49) See before, p. 865.

(50) See before, p. 865.

(51) See before, p. 865.

(52) See before, p. 865.

(53) See before, p. 865.

(54) See before, p. 865.

(55) See before, p. 865.

(56) See before, p. 865.

(57) See before, p. 865.

(58) See before, p. 865.

(59) See before, p. 865.

(60) See before, p. 865.

(61) See before, p. 865.

(62) See before, p. 865.

Ninyas's sloth.

His policy.

necessity for it, if his parents had already done all that report says of them. For he could make no war upon any that were not either his subjects or vassals<sup>1</sup>; and as for India, which alone was free from his yoke, a war there had been sufficiently experienced to be very difficult and dangerous, if not absolutely impracticable. Having therefore nothing to do abroad, he locked himself up in his palace, unseen by any but his eunuchs and concubines, and there contracted such a habit of sloth and vice, as has tainted his memory to all succeeding generations. However, he was not so supinely negligent, as totally to neglect his interest and security. It was a custom with him, every year, to levy an army, by a certain proportion of men out of each province, under their respective generals, and to make choice of such governors over the several parts of his dominions as he could most safely confide in. This army served a year<sup>b</sup> in the city, and parts adjacent, we may suppose, and was afterwards relieved by another, raised in the same manner; and the former, having taken an oath of fidelity to him, were permitted to depart each to the place of his abode. This piece of policy he thought it seems the most effectual means to keep his subjects in awe and order; and, at the same time, prevent any disturbance from his officers, who, having scarce time to be at all known to their soldiers, could have it the less in their power to attempt any thing to his prejudice (L). All this was concerted to secure himself from insults and rebellions, while he wallowed in lasciviousness within the walls of his palace: in which he was an unworthy example to his successors, who learn'd from him to seclude themselves from the eyes of men, that they might be thought something more than mortal<sup>c</sup>.

AFTER this rate was it that all his successors reigned in the great empire of Assyria; so that they it seems have left little or nothing to be recorded of them, except that they lived and died in their palace at Niniveh (L<sup>a</sup>); and hence it is we must abruptly proceed to the very last of them<sup>d</sup>.

Sardanapalus

<sup>1</sup> Vid. JUST. I. i. c. 2.<sup>a</sup> Apud eund. ibid.<sup>b</sup> Ibid.

(L) Diodorus, Athenæus, Justin, and others, represent him, as we have seen, a slothful, inactive, and lascivious king; to have locked himself up in his palace; to have sequestered himself from the eyes of his subjects, and to have had communication with them but by messengers; to have even turned woman, and to have conversed with none but that sex; and yet we see him here consulting and contriving to preserve the empire his parents had left him, and which, in the nature of things, he could not possibly enlarge. We see him here acting the part of a resolute tyrant and consummate politician, and may thence conclude, that, if there had been any possible work of the sort left for him to do, he would have turned out a conqueror. Upon the whole we would remark, that, according to this, he must have been a haughty and a politic prince by nature, and one that, to all appearance, would not have suffered his mother to rule for him, or rather over him, for the space of 42 years. His retirement may be offered as an argument of his pride and policy; and his politic regulation, for the service and relief of his armies, may be thought to favor strongly of absolute sway and love of power, in the person that instituted it. All this we have insisted on to prove, that he did not succeed Semiramis in the manner our historian writes; which must appear even by the inconsistent character our author here gives of him. To which we would add, that if the same method of restraining the empire were the practice of Ninyas and his successors, as by our author it appears, what is the meaning we perceive no footsteps of it any where within our knowledge, in the very long interval of 1200 years at least between Ninyas and Sardanapalus? we apprehend that no body can give us a satisfactory answer to this. And here we cannot but wonder how Sir Walter Raleigh should ever take it into his head, that this Ninyas, this mighty Assyrian monarch, might be the petty king of Shinar, Amraphel in Genesis (63), or that he should, if he reposed any confidence at all in prophane writers, imagine the monarchy had, even in Abraham's time, even in its very infancy, received a downright fall as he calls it (64).

(L<sup>a</sup>) This vast chasm of inaction in the Assyrian monarchs, from Ninyas to Sardanapalus, a vacancy as we may call it of at least 1200 years, is as strong a proof that the prophane accounts are fabulous as any of the many we have offered to prove them so. Is it probable that in so long a succession of princes there should have been one only that did any thing worth the recording? Or is it possible, that in so very long a succession of years there should have arisen no man at all, who had ambition and courage enough to take advantage of the sloth and supineness of these kings at Niniveh? Where were the other kings of the world all this time, and especially such as were vassals to this throne? Did they one and all glory in their chains, and the burthen of their tribute? Or did they all sink into a lethargy with their master? Was there no king of Babylonia, no king of India to rouse them from their silken slumbers? Or had Ninus destroyed the race of mankind, so numerous in his time, to that degree, as not to be able to recruit again, in all that length of years, to take vengeance on his successors for his sake? More, many more queries of this kind may be made, but we desist. So many pacific ages, such a series of the calmest peace, both from within and from without, may shock the easiest credulity. The monarchies which succeeded this were of very short duration in comparison of this, and why the Assyrian should have the sole privilege of standing so long, and under such a long race of effeminate Ninyas we are at a loss for. Great monarchies have been always objects of common hatred among men, and subject to such sudden and violent subversions as this monarchy certainly underwent.

(63) See his Hist. of the World, c. 1. § 9. l. 2.

(64) Ibid.

<sup>a</sup> Sardanapalus (M) exceeded all his predecessors in sloth and luxury. He sunk into such a depth of depravity, that, as far as he could, he changed his very sex and nature; he clothed himself like a woman; he spun amidst the companies of his concubines; he painted his face, and decked himself out with all manner of enticements, and every way behaved more lewdly than the most lascivious harlot; he imitated the voice of a woman, and buried himself in the filth of an unbounded sensuality, quite regardless of sex and the dictates of nature <sup>m</sup> (N).

UNDER this wretch, thus represented (O), it was the Assyrian monarchy came to ruin. He grew odious to his subjects about him, and, as should seem, particularly to Arbaces the Mede, and Belshis the Babylonian. Belshis was not only a captain, but a famous priest and a great astrologer, and by the rules of his art he took on him, as is said, to assure Arbaces, a man of valour and prudence, That he should dethrone Sardanapalus, and become lord of all his dominions. Arbaces hearkened to his friend, and promised him the chief place over Babylon, if things should happen to answer his prediction; and fully possessed that he was to be as Belshis had foretold of him, he began to cultivate particular intimacies with the other governors of the provinces then at Niniveh, and to make himself popular among them, all which succeeded to his wish. But above all, he endeavoured to get sight of the emperor, that he might behold his course and manner of life, and describe him accordingly. This he easily compassed by the prevalence of a golden cup he presented to an eunuch, who introduced him into the presence. Arbaces saw him, and conceiving the highest contempt of him, became more and more encouraged to rely on his Chaldean friend, and more impatient to effect

<sup>m</sup> Apud eund. libid.

(M) This name is not the only one said to belong to him, he is also called Tonos Concoleros, Concoleros, Makroleros, and by other such names (65).

(N) Dis Coecilius (66) has taken much pains to let us know he was the most libidinous and abandoned wretch the sun ever shone on; and says, That no one could tell what he did and suffered to be done to him, and that no body would bear to hear it; though he descends to several particulars bad enough of all conscience; but as they may be built upon no solid foundation, merely traditionary, and besides unfit for us to relate, we pass them over. Nicolas of Damascus (67) is more moderate, and accuses him chiefly of passing his time with his women, and contending with them about dress and ornament, in the very words used to the same purpose in Suidas (68). Trogus (69) also seems to have described his way of life much to the same purpose. Duris (70) says, he turned woman, dressed as such, painted himself and spun; all to the same purpose, and therefore we need say no more about it.

(O) A man of pleasure and lewdness he may have been, and doubtless was, it being impossible to think otherwise of monarchs of this sort, as experience teacheth us, and for the proof of which we need go no farther than Constantinople to take a view of the great Turk; but nevertheless he may have been a man who, at some intervals, minded business; such a man we are told he was, for he is said to have built Tarsus and Anchiale in one day (71); in testimony of which he had this inscription on his tomb, ΣΑΡΔΑΝΑΠΑΛΟΣ ΑΝΑΚΤΝΔΑΡΑΞΕΩ ΑΓΧΙΑΑΗΝ ΕΒΕΙΜΕ ΚΑΙ ΤΑΡΣΟΝ ΜΗ ΗΜΕΡΗ. ΑΛΛΑ ΝΥΝ ΤΕΘΗΚΕΝ, Sardanapalus, the son of Anacrydaraxis, built Tarsus and Anchiale in one day, but now is dead. This is a grave epitaph, and might besit any prince, but we find it varied a little to disadvantage; for, instead of the three last words, we have this addition to his magnificent exploit of having built these two cities in a day, ΕΣΘΙΕ, ΠΙΝΕ, ΠΑΙΖΕ ΩΣΤ' ΑΛΛΑ ΤΟΤΤΟΤ ΟΥΚ ΑΞΙΑ. Eat, drink, and be merry, for the rest is not worth the snap of a finger; which was signified by his statue here, in act of snapping its fingers (72); This monument and statue is said to have been not far from Anchiale. A modern author (73) supposes the same inscription and statue to have been at the other city, Tarsus, where St. Paul was born, and thinks the apostle alludes thereto, when he writes, Let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die. However, there seems to be such incoherence between the former part of this last inscription and the latter, that we know not what to think of it; there is no manner of relation between the action recorded and reflection that insues. In the first, indeed, there is a becoming gravity throughout, and a persuasive to virtue and humility, by representing, that even the mighty king, who could build two cities in a day, was equally mortal with the rest of his kind; but the latter is merely calculated to encourage idleness and vice, eat, drink, and be merry, the rest is not worth caring for. If this was any where the genuine inscription, it must have been in derision of him after his death, and upon a presumption that he was the idle effeminate creature he is painted. Callisthenes (74) writes there were two Sardanapalus's, the one a bold, the other an effeminate man. Others do the same, as we shall have occasion to observe hereafter. Suidas (75), who gives this inscription according to the last of the two copies above, thinks it may belong to the masculine Sardanapalus, though with what propriety we may consider a little farther.

(65) Vid. GEOR. SYNC. & EUSEB. PAMPH.

Excerpt. ejusd. p. 424.

Apud ATHEN. Deipnosoph. l. 12. p. 529.

GEOR. SYNC. Chronograph. p. 165. & EUSEB. PAMPH. Chron. Can. p. 110.

Apud ATHEN. ubi sup. p. 530.

ΣΑΡΔΑΝΑΠΑΛΟΣ.

(66) In Excerpt. VALES. p. 762.

(68) Ad vocem ΣΑΡΔΑΝΑΠΑΛΟΣ.

(69) JUSTIN. l. 1. c. 2.

(70) Vid. etiam

(71) ATHEN. Deipnosoph. l. 12. p. 529.

(72) ARISTOTEL.

(73) GREGOR. in Posthum. p. 243.

(74) Apud SUID. ad vocem

The Medes
Babylonians, and Persians revolt.

effect what had been resolved between them. Accordingly Arbaces disposes the Medes and, a Persians to an open revolt, whilst Belefsis does the same with the Babylonians; soon after which they disclosed their whole design to the king of Arabia<sup>a</sup>.

Sardanapalus
takes the field against them, and beats
them.

A second battle, the revolt
are again routed.

THE year of duty being now expired, fresh troops arrived to relieve those who had served it; but the Persians, Medes, and Babylonians, assisted by the Arabians, came not with design to guard Sardanapalus; their intent was to subvert the empire. Their number altogether amounted to 400,000 men, and being all combined together, in one camp, a council of war was called, to deliberate upon what was best to be done. Sardanapalus, apprized of this revolt, resolved to stifle it in its infancy, and leads out the troops of the other provinces against the confederated rebels, and coming to a battle with them, he entirely routed them, and with great slaughter pursued them to certain mountains about 70 stades from the city of Nineveh. The rebels, however, drew out again to fight the emperor, who, just before the action began, caused proclamation to be made of a reward of 200 talents of gold for the man who should kill Arbaces the Mede, and twice that sum, together with the government of Media, to the man who should produce him alive; and the same was proclaimed concerning Belefsis the Babylonian. This proclamation having proved ineffectual, a second battle was fought, in which the rebels were again slaughtered, and put to flight towards the hills. This victory had assured Sardanapalus in his throne, had it not been for the obstinacy of Belefsis, who persisted in it, that the gods would certainly smile on them, and crown their labours and perseverance with success in the end; and thereby revive their drooping spirits, who in despair had already called a council, the result of which was, that they should disperse, and every man return to his home. They fight a third battle, and Sardanapalus, victor, as twice before, drives them into the mountains of Babylon, though Arbaces did that day all that man could do, and was now forced to retreat considerably wounded<sup>c</sup>.

A third battle;
the revolt
beaten again.

They held out still.

Sardanapalus had now certainly put an end to the war (P), if Belefsis, who had been all night in deep consult with the stars, had not with all imaginable assurance persuaded them the next morning, that, if they kept together but five days longer, they would be joined and supported by unexpected assistance; for that the gods had so signified to him by the aspect of the heavens: He intreated them, therefore, to stay but so many days, and in the mean time to place a confidence in the gods. Wrought on to wait the event, and the time expired, sudden advice was brought of a mighty power at hand, sent to the king from Bactria. Arbaces, upon this, dispatched the most resolute and expeditious men in his army, with orders to prevail on the Bactrians to revolt, either by fair means or foul. Liberty was the bait to allure them, and by degrees, from officer to soldier, it prevailed, and the Bactrians joined Arbaces. This defection was unknown to Sardanapalus, who, presuming he had now nothing to fear, was returned to his usual way of life (Q), and was preparing for an extraordinary sacrifice, and an high festival for the entertainment of his victorious army<sup>e</sup>.

They attack the imperial camp
by surprise.

IN the mean time the negligence and riot in the imperial camp was conveyed to the ears of Arbaces, who, upon the first news of it, fell suddenly on them in the night, made his way into the camp, and drove out Sardanapalus, and all his army, with a great slaughter, which continued almost to the gates of the city. This obliged the king to commit the care and conduct of his army to Salemeneus, his brother-in-law, whilst he went to defend the city in person. His forces were twice defeated, once at some distance from, and once under the walls of the city. In the last Salemeneus fell, and almost all his army was cut off, and forced into the river, which was tinged with the gore of the slain for a long while<sup>f</sup>.

Nineveh

<sup>a</sup> Apud eund. ibid.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid.

<sup>e</sup> Ibid.

<sup>f</sup> Ibid.

(P) It must be confessed a little strange, that so degenerated a creature should have the courage and ability thus to defend himself against these revolters, who should have been of much greater experience and capacity than himself. Indeed, according to what this author and most others say of him, he could have understood nothing in the world relating to war, or almost any thing else peculiar to men; and yet being forced into the field, we find him behaving and defending himself as well as if he had been Ninus, or even Semiramis herself. From this dissimilitude of Sardanapalus from himself it is likely we have the two mentioned by Calisthenes in the note above, Sardanapalus the warrior, and Sardanapalus the woman. This, as every thing of our own, we offer as conjecture only.

(Q) There is seemingly some inconsistency between this, and what follows immediately after. Here he resumes his scandalous life, and presently after takes on him the part of a pious and grateful votary, and beneficent prince, sacrifices to the gods, and rewards his army for his late victories. But such inconsistencies are too frequent to deserve a note.

- a Niniveh was now closely besieged, whilst other nations, now eager for liberty, revolted to the confederates. The king perceiving things at so desperate a pass, he sent away his three sons and two daughters, with a very great treasure, into Papblagania, where one Cotta, a particular friend of his, was governor (R), and issued out orders to all parts of his empire (S) to come in to his assistance, against the rebellious besiegers (T). But though his situation may seem to have been quite deplorable, he, it seems, did not sink under it, but upheld his hopes with the notion of a prophecy, That Niniveh could never be taken, till the river became her enemy, which, according to his conclusion, amounting to an impossibility, he looked upon himself as secure, how great and imminent soever the dangers might be that threatened him<sup>r</sup>.
- b WHILE Sardanapalus pleased himself with this imagination, the confederates, elated by what they had done, considered their work as compleated, though they, in those early days, could make no impression on such walls, ignorant as they were of the engines afterwards invented to expedite undertakings of this sort. Sardanapalus having taken care to be well stored with what was necessary to enable him to hold out a long time; the confederates sat two years before the city without any visible progress; but in the third year the river, swelled by unusual rains, came up to the city, and overflowed a great length, no less than 20 stades of the wall. The unfortunate Sardanapalus, now sensible of the completion of what had been foretold of the river's enmity to the city, had no farther room for hope, and, dreading to fall into the hands of the enemy, retired into his palace, in a court of which he caused a vast pile of wood to be raised, and heaping upon it all his gold, and silver, and royal apparel, and at the same time inclosing his eunuchs and concubines in an apartment within the pile, he set fire to it, and so destroyed himself and them (V); which

They besiege
Sardanapalus
in Niniveh,

They take the city.

<sup>r</sup> Apud eund. ibid.

(R) Where this Papblagania should have been situated, and who this Cotta, a modern name, should have been, we forbear to enquire, as favouring too grossly of fable; but by the way, we cannot help asking how this Cotta should have been so particularly his friend and faithful servant, when no one governor had ever seen his face, before Arbaces the Mede bribed his way to a fight of him; this does not hang at all with the other parts, all inconsistent within themselves, of this story of this last king of Niniveh; nor is it even easy to conceive how he should have sent away any part of his family and treasure: the enemy had certainly secured the passes; the magical art, in those simple days, consisted of little else. To mend the matter, another author (who mentions our Ctesias as if he quoted him) tells us (76), that Sardanapalus perceiving himself oppressed, and rain coming with hasty strides upon him, sent three sons and two daughters, together with 3000 talents of gold, to the king of Niniveh. What city of Niniveh this can have been, besides the city he himself was besieged in, we are quite at a loss for, and so we leave this palpable obscurity as we find it, except we infer, that through this seeming mistake the error sprang of making two Sardanapalus's as well as two Niniveh's, which we meet with no were else.

(S) How he could do this, closely besieged as he was, is hard to conceive; and what need he had of doing it, will be as difficult, if we consider what follows.

(T) Why should he have been so solicitous about his family, himself, or the city, if what follows be true, that he was persuaded the place could never be taken? Why in this case should he have exposed his children and treasure by sending them away, when according to his belief they could no where have been in more safety? And why should he be so busy with his orders and calling in his people to his assistance in the siege? They could have been of no use to such an impregnable place as was proof against even famine itself, and every thing but the waters of the river.

(V) This was the end of the unfortunate Sardanapalus; but the circumstances are most prodigiously exaggerated by Athenæus, who seems (77) to borrow what he says from Ctesias, whom Diodorus, perhaps, abridged, and Athenæus transcribed at length. He [Sardanapalus] says he, erected in the heart of his palace a pile of four Jugera, or acres in demension, that thereon he laid 150 golden beds, and as many golden tables; that in the midst of it he built a hall or room of 100 foot, in which he had beds for his wife and himself, and others for his concubines; that the pile was all a solid piece of timber-work, and that it was so fenced about with large beams that no body could get out; that within this were no less than a thousand myriads of talents of gold, and ten thousand myriads of silver, together with an unspeakable quantity of costly apparel and furniture; that he ordered this pile to be set on fire; and that it burned no less than fifteen days together, that by the smoke those without thought he had been sacrificing, and that during the time, the whole was kept a secret to every body but his eunuchs. Suidas (78) seems to intimate, that he was accidentally burnt in his palace. Amyntas (79) relates there was a great mount in Niniveh, raised, as tradition went, as a sepulchral monument to Sardanapalus; the same we may safely suppose that is said to have been erected by Semiramis in honour of Ninus (80); and that on stone pillars the following epitaph was engraven in Chaldee characters; why not Assyrian? which were thus rendered into Greek by Charilus the poet (81), ΕΓΩ ΔΕ ΕΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣΑ, ΚΑΙ ΑΧΡΙ ΕΝΘ' ΟΝ ΤΟΤ' ΗΛΙΟΥ ΘΩΣ, ΕΠΙΟΝ, ΕΦΑΓΟΝ ΗΠΟΔΙΣΙΑΣΑ, ΕΙΔΩΣ, ΤΟΝ ΤΕ ΧΡΟΝΟΝ ΟΝΤΑ ΒΡΑΧΥΤΗ, ΟΝ ΖΩΣΙΝ ΟΙ ΑΝΘΡΩΠΟΙ, ΚΑΙ ΠΟΛΛΑΣ ΕΧΟΝΤΑ ΜΕΤΑΒΟΛΑΣ, ΚΑΙ ΚΑΚΟΠΑΘΙΑΣ, ΚΑΙ ΟΝ ΑΝ ΚΑΤΑΛΙΠΩ ΑΓΑΘΩΝ, ΑΛΛΟΙ, ΕΞΟΥΣΙ ΤΑΣ ΑΠΟΛΑΥΣΕΙΣ, ΔΙΟ ΚΑΙ Ο ΗΜΕΡΑΝ ΟΥΔΕΜΙΑΝ ΠΑΡΕΛΑΒΟΝ ΤΟΤΟ ΠΟΙΩΝ.

I reigned

(76) ATHENÆ. Deipnosoph. l. 12. p. 529.

(77) Apud ATHEN. ubi sup.

(80) See before p. 877.

(77) Ibid.

(78) Ad vocem Σαρδανάπατος.

(81) Apud ATHEN. ubi sup.

which being perceived by the besiegers they entered the city by the breach, and became a lords of the place. The inhabitants were treated with great humanity, though the great and mighty city of Niniveh itself was laid level with the ground. And thus ended the Assyrian empire, subverted by the Medes and Babylonians, after it had, according to our author Ctesias, subsisted no less than 1400 years*.

S E C T. V.

The History of ASSYRIA, according to Scripture, and the more approved Authorities.

Year of the
Flood, 2228.
Year before
CHRIST, 771.

WE now come to the true and only history of Assyria that may be depended upon. Pul (W), the seeming founder of this monarchy, makes his first appearance in scripture in the reign of Menabem<sup>1</sup>, king of Israel, who just about the same time had forced his way to the throne of that kingdom, by the murder of Siallum

* Apud eund. ibid.

* See before, p. 828.

I reigned, and while I enjoyed the light of the sun, I drank, I ate, and gave myself up to women, knowing how short a time man has to live, how full of cares and trouble; and that the joys I leave behind pass on to others; knowing of this I never missed a day from pleasures. This inscription or epitaph, if any such there ever was, is very likely to have been the parent of the second we have given some notes above, and may be confounded with the same, which is also said to have been erected at Niniveh (82); but we may fairly suppose there never was any such as either of them erected at that city: For this antient metropolis was confessedly destroyed, whatever place else may have risen and been known under the the same name afterwards; and secondly, Sardanapalus having been reduced to ashes, we can suppose no monument to have been raised professedly over him; nor would any remembrance of this sort have been, it is likely, propagated of him at an immense expence on the spot where Niniveh was to stand no more; and besides this mount, or whatever else it may be called, is not only said to have been erected in honour of a former king, at least some generations before him (83), but also to have been destroyed by Cyrus (84), who, so far as we can apprehend, had never any thing to do in the demolition of Niniveh. This may be enough to create a disbelief in us, of so extraordinary and unusual a method to spread the shame of this dubious prince; dubious we say, the rather because we find him deified in the temple of Hierapolis in Syria (85), an honour which it is not likely they would ever have bestowed on a man that really was so much the object of contempt as he is represented to have been. Perhaps his whole crime was, that the Assyrian empire was dissolved in his time; and this we say not without ground; for we are given to understand, that though he was dispossessed of the empire of Syria, or Assyria, he died of a good old age (86). From these very different accounts of the death of this famous, or, as the vulgar opinion has it, infamous prince, it may be that we have another reason why it should be mistakenly imagined there were two kings of Assyria of this same name (87).

Suidas (88) talks of a Sardanapalus slain by one Perseus; he has two of the name; and though he endeavours to make them different men, he plainly means the same. To conclude, whatever the bulk of prophane authors tell us, concerning the reign of Sardanapalus, and the rest of the Assyrian history, is too gross to deserve the name of a romance or even to be called tradition, though certainly built upon very true history, as we shall endeavour to prove in what is to follow.

(W) He is also called Phul, and mistakenly in the LXX version Phua, an inaccuracy in the transcription, and owing to the very near resemblance of the Greek  $\Lambda$  lambda, and  $\alpha$  alpha, so that it is no great wonder this name should, in the Greek character, have been written  $\Phi\Omega\Upsilon\alpha$  Phua, instead of  $\Phi\Upsilon\Upsilon\alpha$  Phul (89). He is the first king of Assyria mentioned in scripture from the time that land was planted by Abur, and not to be confounded with the kings of the Medes and the Babylonians, as the custom usually is (90). This Phul was by his name a pure Assyrian, and not a Chaldean or Babylonian (91), as he is mistaken to have been by some (92) who are fond of making him the same with the Belus of Ctesias, who, in conjunction with Arbaces, overthrew the Assyrian power, than which no position can be more gross. That he was the first king of Assyria, appears by his name, which is simple and not compounded as the rest we read of are. The Assyrian names are for the most part compounded of the simple names of their gods (93); and the name of this king we find a primitive, as we may call it, compounded in the names of other princes in those parts, as in Tig-lath-Pul-Affur, Nabo-Pul-Affur, and the like. From this circumstance, and the affinity of the name itself, he is with seeming certainty said to have been the Assyrian, Syrian, or Syrian Belus (94). Pul is pronounced Pol, and Pal (95), whence, without any straining of the point, we may derive the Bal, Bel, or Belus of the Greeks and Latins. That he should have been the Belus of Syria, Phœnicia, and other places, will not be wondered at by those who consider, as will be seen in the course of this section,

cl. 2

(82) SUID. ad vocem Σαρδανάπαλος. (83) See before, p. 377. (84) AMYNT. apud ATHEN. Deipnosoph. ubi sup. (85) See before, p. 373. (86) CLEITARCH. apud ATHEN. ubi sup. (87) See before in the notes, p. 885, 886, 887. (88) Ad vocem Σαρδανάπαλος. (89) Vid. CLERIC. in 2 Reg. cap. xv. ver. 19. (90) Vid. eund. ibid. (91) Vid. SCALIG. de emend. temp. l. 6. p. 577. (92) See PATRICK upon 2 Kings xv. 19. (93) Vid. SCALIG. ubi sup. SELD. de Diis Syri. (94) Sir Is. NEWT. Chron. of Anc. Kings, amend. p. 279. See before, p. 399. (K) & seq. (95) BEAR. MONTAUC. apud Du PIN. Biblioth. Univers. des Hist. p. 285.

<sup>a</sup> Shallum°. His march into the country struck the tottering usurper with such dread, that, to prevent the hostilities he may have meditated, Pul received from him 1000 talents of silver. Hereupon he seems to have taken the kingdom of Israel into his protection (X), and returns from out of the land °. What else this king did in particular, is no where, that we know of, expressly recorded (Y). But from hence we may venture to infer, as we have already *, that he either conquered or received voluntary homage from Syria, and the other nations in his march, as he did now from Israel, and that he became supreme over a very great empire.

Tiglath-

* 2 Kings xv.

° Ibid.

* See before p. 389. a. (C).

that the Assyrians imposed their own idolatry and religion on all the nations they conquered, as also that they consecrated all their kings (96) into deities. It was the custom of the ancient Syrians long before them to deify their kings (97), we have seen their Adad, King of Gods, was no more than their dead king Ben-hadad II. (98), or perhaps his fortunate successor Hazael, who, as a king of Syria, was also called Adad, or Hadad (99). We have already asserted (100), that Adad, and Cronus, and Astarte, are of late date in comparison of what the learned have generally thought; and we now say the same of Belus, who was no other than the Pul before us, and consequently later than the ancient gods of the proper Syria. Thus it is natural to conclude from all circumstances, nor can we refuse to subscribe to it without rejecting the plain evidence of scripture, for the idle tales of prophane authors, who confound rather than inform us. It were odd that we should rely on what are confessedly fables, in contempt of what can be so self-evidently gathered from the text of scripture history (1). To dwell on the various opinions of chronologers and historians, concerning this man, would draw us into a tedious length; we shall therefore pass them over with this bare observation, that by embracing the Ctesian table, and endeavouring to connect it with the history of scripture, and by their scrupulous adoption of each others hypotheses, they have run themselves into intricate mazes, and endless errors. Our business then is to prove this man to have been the first founder of the Assyrian monarchy, which having been done to our hands by a late chronologer (2), we shall have nothing to do but to borrow his own words. To the numerous arguments we have already exhibited to evince there never was what might be called an Assyrian monarchy before the days of Pul, it may be added, 1. Jonah prophesied when Israel was in affliction under the king of Syria ° about 60 years before the reign of Pul (3). 2. Niniveh, though then a city of large extent, was full of pastures for cattle, so that it contained but about 120000 persons (4). [These are indeed commonly taken to have been children, because it is said, they could not discern between their right hand and their left (5); but why it may not be as well understood of their blindness and ignorance in a religious sense, we know not; so that it is as likely as not, that the grown persons were also included into the number]. 3. Niniveh was not yet grown so potent as not to be terrified at the preaching of Jonah, and to fear being invaded by its neighbours, and ruined within 40 days (6). Its king was not yet called king of Assyria, but king of Niniveh, [Jonah iii. 6, 7.]

and his proclamation for a fast was not published in several nations, nor in all Assyria, but only in Niniveh, and perhaps in the villages thereof (7). But when Niniveh . . . was exalted over all Assyria, properly so called, and this kingdom began to make war upon the neighbouring nations, its kings were no longer called kings of Niniveh, but began to be called kings of Assyria (8). Our author then observes that Amos, who prophesied soon after Jeroboam, had subdued the kingdoms of Damascus and Hamath, about 10 or 20 years before the reign of Pul, never once names the Assyrians, though he foretold, [vi. 13, 14.] that Israel should be afflicted from the entering in of Hamath to the river of the wilderness; meaning by the Assyrians, whose monarchy, growing up afterwards, is upon all occasions named in the prophecies of Isaiab, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hoshea, Micah, Nabum, Zephaniab, and Zechariab, which were penned after his (9). These, and other arguments of the same demonstrative kind, he uses to prove what is here asserted: but these shall serve our purpose; and in all this he is supported by the concurrence of several eminent chronologers and historians we have had occasion to mention elsewhere (10).

Our author (11) concludes Pul to have been the first Assyrian that was a conqueror, that he was the first that advanced that kingdom on this side the Tigris, that he was a great warrior, that he might have founded or enlarged the city of Babylon and built the old palace, that he may have left that city and the province of Chaldea to a younger son, who may have been Nabonassar, and that the famed Semiramis may have been his daughter-in-law, and the wife of the same Nabonassar (12); but, these points being such as will more naturally fall under consideration in the history of Babylon, we desist from further notice of them for the present.

(X) Here we may perceive the first progress of this monarchy. It was now in its infancy, and seems rather to have aim'd at injecting a fear of itself into the nations by barely shewing itself, than by a sudden and violent irruption upon them, or at once pretending to over-run the world by dint of force. How much more natural is this than what we read concerning the pretended conquests of Ninus? Pul seems rather to have laid the foundations of the Assyrian monarchy than to have erected it; which last it is most likely he left to his successors.

(Y) Some Jews think he began to transport the children of Israel; but this they believe upon a very slight foundation (13).

(96) See before, p. 862. and in the notes, p. 833.

in the notes. (100) See before in the notes, p. 399.

(1) See Sir Is. NEWT. Chronol. of Anc. Kingd. amend. pass. (2) Idem, ibid. (3) Sir Is. NEWT. Chronol. of Anc. Kingd. amend. p. 270. (4) Idem, ibid.

(5) Vid. GREGOR. Poësb. p. 194. (6) Sir Is. NEWT. ubi sup. (7) Idem, ibid. (8) Idem, ibid.

(9) Idem, ibid. p. 271. (10) See before, p. 864. (11) Ubi sup. p. 277. (12) Idem, ibid. p. 277.

279. (13) See PATRICK'S Comment. upon 2 Kings xv. 19. and upon 1 Chron. v. 26.

Tiglath-pile-sar.

Year of the
Flood, 2259.
Year before
CHRIST, 740.

Tiglath-pileasar succeeded him (Z), and is supposed to have been his son, but upon a no certain authority (A). Upon what particular motive, we know not, he fell upon the kingdom of Israel, and took Ijon, and Abel-beth-maachab, and Janoab, and Kedesh, and Hazor, and Gilead, and Galilee, and all the land of Naphtali, and carried them captive to Assyria<sup>1</sup>, thereby, as we may suppose, the better to secure these distant parts of the empire in their allegiance (B). For such a captivity must naturally have weakened them, and was rightly calculated to deter the remainder from incurring so hard a fate; and, on the other hand, may have contributed to the increase of his power, by peopling some tract more immediately under his eye. But whatever may have been his views at this time, he thought himself obliged to do much more of the kind soon after. For receiving an embassy from Abaz, king<sup>b</sup> of Juaab<sup>a</sup>, with a tender from him of homage, and a present of all he had, to deliver him from the hands of Rezin, king of Damascus, and Pekab, king of Israel, who were joined in confederacy against him; upon this prayer, and present, and acknowledgment from the king of Judab†, Tiglath-pileasar marched against Damascus, took that city, transplanted the people of it to Kir (C), slew Rezin, and so put an end to that antient kingdom<sup>a</sup> (D).

He

† 2 Kings xv.

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 389. b.

† 832. b. (L).

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. Kings, c. xvi. 9.

(Z) He is also called Tiglath-pileasar, Theglath-phalasar, Theglath-phellasar, Tilgamas (14) as supposed, and also Ninus junior, according to Cassor (15). Prideaux (16), by an unaccountable inadvertency, takes him for Arbaces the Mede. Some (17) are willing to derive the first part of his name from Diglis, one way of pronouncing a name belonging to the river Tigris (18); others (19) declare, that nothing but conjecture can be offered about it, and that it is quite uncertain.

(A) Some are so far from thinking him to have been the son of Pul, that they make him a stranger to his line, a Mede, as we have seen in the note above. Rollin, misled by that great and otherwise learned guide archbishop Usher (20), makes Pul to have been the father of Sardanapalus (21), by an extraordinary inattention in the archbishop, who thought it must have been so, because in the name Sardanapalus, or Sardan-Pul, he could perceive a relation between this last and this first Assyrian king, forgetting that for the same reason Tiglath-pul-assur might have more naturally appeared his son, especially as he is the king of Assyria, who is expressly said to have succeeded him in scripture. By what biased him above to make this mistake, he might also, and very naturally have concluded, that Tiglath-pul-assur and Sardan-pul were one and the same person, and so have put an end to the monarchy, ere it had well a beginning. The first and second monarchy, according to the scheme of archbishop Usher, (22), adopted by Prideaux and Rollin, so entirely repugnant to all history, sacred or profane, may serve to shew how irreconcilable the latter is with the former in what concerns this empire. A late commentator (23) is so sensible of this, that he declares (when he comes to the text of scripture (24) which first makes mention of Tiglath-pileasar) that if the common accounts of the Babylonians and Medes are true, of their having held the east under subjection one after another, there can be no knowing how to understand the sacred historian. To which he adds, that the learned are now sensible there were several sorts of independant kingdoms in those days to the eastward of the Euphrates; (see before, p. 382.) that sometimes one of them was uppermost, and sometimes another; and that at this time it happened that the Assyrians were most powerful; who, now crossing the Tigris, had carried their arms thro' Mesopotamia, and from thence over the Euphrates into Syria and Palestine (25). In a word, we cannot but reckon Tiglath-pileasar to have been the son of Pul. Since from the first appearance of the one, to the first appearance of the other, the interval is according to Usher himself (26), of but about 24 years; so that they very naturally succeed one another. It is therefore an eye-sore to see them so disjoined as they are in Rollin (27), from whose judgment and converse with the labours and improvements of the later writers, we might have hoped for better things; but as we have been hitherto cautious of passing any censure upon him, we shall for the future avoid it, especially as he is a gentleman who does not so professedly write to instruct the mind as to the reality and consistence of facts, as to form it to virtue and a good life.

(B) Tiglath-pileasar here executes what his father had projected, and only sketched out. This was the most extraordinary method that could be possibly taken to secure the empire under due subjection, and was the constant practice of his successors we may suppose for the same reasons. These repeated emigrations are in all their circumstances so affecting, and must have caused such utter oblivion of the original nations in those parts, that, if Ctesias had known any thing perfectly of the Assyrian affairs, he could never have omitted them, or forborn to have improved them after his manner, which we too where find that he did.

(C) There are printed copies of the Septuagint, which say not whither the people of Damascus were transplanted to; others have it the place was Kapruu or Cyrene, in Africa, deceived by some similitude of the names; but it is impossible to suppose the king of Assyria could send them into those parts, when he was not yet master even of Egypt (28). Josephus (29) makes it a place in the Upper Media. Bochart (30) labours the point a little, but to no fixed purpose. It will be in vain for us to think of settling the site of this, and many other places hereafter to be mentioned, equally and more obscure than this; so that we shall touch on them only by the way.

(D) So that the race of the ancient Syrians became, as it were, extinct in this country, which gives us room to assert what we have only surmised formerly

(14) ÆLIAN. Hist. Anim. l. 12. c. 21. (15) Apud EUSEB. Chron. (16) Connell. of the Old and New Test. Book 1. part 1. at the beginning. (17) See PATRICK, ubi sup. ver. 29. (18) See before in the notes, p. 859. (19) CLERIC. ubi sup. Com. 29. (20) Annal. Ves. Testam. Æt. Mund. Quin. p. 83. (21) Hist. of the Assy. in the English transl. p. 25. (22) Ubi sup. (23) JOAN. CLERIC. (24) 2 Reg. xv. 29. (25) JOAN. CLERIC. in 2 Reg. ibid. (26) Ubi sup. (27) Ubi sup. (28) Ibid. JOAN. CLERIC. in Æc. ubi sup. (29) Antiq. Jud. l. 9. c. 13. (30) PHALEG. l. 4. c. 32.

- a He was succeeded by Shalmaneser (E), who seems to have made war upon Hoshea, king of Israel, in consequence of his predecessor's engagements to Abaz, king of Judab (F). Tiglath-pileser had but half fulfilled his promise to Abaz, who had besought him to avenge him of the king of Damascus and the king of Israel equally, whereas he seemingly concerned himself with the king of Damascus only. It is likely then that Shalmaneser made this a pretence to attack the kingdom of Israel under Hoshea. But whatever his pretence may have been, or on whatsoever it may have been founded, he reduced Samaria, and made Hoshea his tributary<sup>b</sup>, as it is apparent his predecessors, from Menabem, had been to the Assyrian power before him. Some years afterwards Shalmaneser came to understand that Hoshea, having a mind to shake off his yoke, had entered into a league with So, king of Egypt; and this was confirmed to him by Hoshea's neglect to send him his annual tribute. At this he marches up throughout all the land, and at length lays siege to Samaria, with such obstinacy, that he continued it for the space of three years, resolved, once for all, to make an end of the kingdom of that metropolis. At the end of three years he became master of the place, took the king of Hoshea alive (G), kept him a prisoner†, made captives of all the inhabitants, and transplanted them into Assyria (H), placing them in Halab and in Habor, by the river of Gozan (I), and in the cities of the Medes; replacing them by strangers from Babylon (K), Cutba, Ava, Hamath, and Sephervain; and thus did he put an end to the kingdom of Israel<sup>c</sup>. But he was obliged to send back one of the priests of the country to instruct the people in the worship of the God of the land, who for their ignorance in that particular plagued them so sorely with lions, that they were necessitated to apply to the king of Assyria for this redress<sup>d</sup> (L).

Shalmaneser.
Year of the
Flood, 2271.
Year before
CHRIST 728.

Year of the
Flood, 2274.
Year before
CHRIST, 725.

Year of the
Flood, 2278.
Year before
CHRIST, 721.

BUT

<sup>b</sup> 2 Kings xvii. † See before, p. 835.
before, p. 842. 2 Kings xvii. ver. 25, 28.

<sup>c</sup> See before, Ibid. 2 Kings xvii. 18.

<sup>d</sup> See

formerly concerning the alteration which the old religion of this country must have undergone when conquered by the Assyrians (31). For it is scarcely to be imagined that the strangers, who were brought to take possession of this country, should continue the ancient rites and superstitions of its first inhabitants? Well may we say then that Adad now gave way to Belus and other Assyrian gods (32), unknown on this side of the Euphrates till now.

(E) His name also is variously written, as Salmaneser, Salmanassar; he is called Enemassar, by Tobit (33), and is supposed to (34) be the Salman or Shalman of Hosea (35). It has been the common practice of chronologers to make him to have been the same with Nabonassar (36); which we shall not here discuss.

(F) We here speak only as the thing may seem, for between Tiglath-pileser's last expedition in these parts, and this of Shalmaneser, there is a distance of twelve years; so that the engagements to Abaz may by this time have been as good as forgot.

(G) In the first of these expeditions he carried off with him the Golden Calf, which Jeroboam had set up in Bethel (37); and, previously to the siege of Samaria, he subdued Moab (38).

(H) He did not quite transplant them, he left some behind him for Ezar-baddon to remove, as will be seen in due place.

(I) There is a town called Chabor or Habor in Mesopotamia, according to Ptolemy (39), and a river Chaboras or Haboras; and a region in the same country, called Gauzonitis or Gozan, between the above-mentioned river and another called Sacoras, one of which may have been also called the river of Gozan (40); so that in Mesopotamia it must be that we must look for these two places; as for Halab we have declared what we know of that long ago (41).

(K) Those who follow the common current are at a loss to conceive, how Shalmaneser should be so free with the Babylonians; supposing them to have been not only a collateral, but also an independent kingdom, when nothing is more unlikely. Can it with reason be imagined the kings of Assyria, as Shalmaneser and his two predecessors, would have roamed so far from home after conquests, when such prey as Babylon was so near at hand? Is it not more natural to think the Assyrians began with those who were next to them? Or is it possible to imagine the kings of Assyria would straggle so far from home, if they had so dangerous a rival as a considerable kingdom of Babylon on their skirts, who never, it is certain, could have been quiet or easy in their absence. It must be impossible to think after this rate; a greater inconsistency can never be. The monarchy of Assyria was now in the vigour of its youth, and the passage before us plainly informs us, that Babylon was now under Assyria, and so were the Medes, as may not only appear by the western nations, said to have been transplanted to the cities of that country by these three first kings; but the same will most evidently appear in the next reign, when the Medes, taking advantage of this king's successor, actually revolted from him, and from thence forward began to make the figure they afterwards did. Nothing of equal antiquity and importance is clearer than what concerns these three monarchies or empires, if we do not blend the sacred writings with prophane romance; which last has been so unaccountably preferred by the learned Christians, that in favour of that they have obscured what would otherwise appear as bright as day in holy writ.

(L) This transplantation, this complaint of the lions, and this mission of the priest, is put off to the days of Ezarbaddon (42); because in Ptolemy's canon

(31) See before, p. 372. (32) Ibid. (33) c. i. 13. (34) See Sir Is. NEWT. Chronol. of Anc. Kingd. amend. p. 277. (35) c. x. 14. (36) Vid. GREGOR. Posthum. p. 246. &c. GEORG. SYNCCELL. Chron. p. 204. † Vid. sup. 832. (L). (37) SEDER OLAM Rabba c. xxii. (38) See before, p. 292. (39) Abas Tabul. 4ta. (40) Ibid. (41) See before, p. 127. sub (B). (42) See PRIDEAUX's Connex. PATRICK's Comment. &c.

Year of the
Flood, 2282.
Year before
CHRIST, 717.

BUT how effectually soever he triumphed over Samaria and other neighbouring states, he had the mortification to be set at defiance by Hezekiah, king of Judab, who, as it is said, rebelled against him, and refused to send him any further tribute (M). But Samaria and its territory did not alone feel the effects of his power, he also lorded it over all Syria and Phenice; and made war upon Tyre, where Elulais then reigned<sup>c</sup>. He at first made war upon the whole country of Phenice, but upon the conclusion of a peace marched out of the country. Shortly after the cities of Sydon, Arce, Pala-Tyrus, and others, revolting from the Tyrians, went over to Sbalmaneser, who, disdaining the Tyrians (N) should dare to dispute his supremacy, dispatched a fleet of 60 sail, and 800 rowers, under the conduct of Phanicians, to attack the Tyrians, but they were shamefully routed by a small number of Tyrian ships<sup>f</sup>, and the project most completely defeated. Sbalmaneser therefore, convinced it was to no purpose to contend with the Tyrians at sea, blocks them up by land; and, by diverting the waters which furnished the city, doubted not but to reduce that haughty people; but these, supplying themselves by wells they dug within the city, obliged the Assyrians to waste five years in this fruitless attempt<sup>g</sup> (O).

Year of the
Flood, 2286.
Year before
CHRIST, 713.

Sennacherib (P) succeeded Sbalmaneser, and resolved to reduce the kingdom of Judab to the homage and tribute it had professed to the Assyrian throne in the person of king Abaz<sup>h</sup>. He appeared on a sudden at the head of an army, and bore down all before him<sup>i</sup>, and at length laid siege to Lachysh, intending in the next place to invest Jerusalem itself. As he was laying siege to that place, he received a most submissive message from Hezekiah, asking his pardon, begging he would not pursue him to destruction, and offering him to pay him what tribute he should think fit to impose on him. Sennacherib seemed satisfied with this, and ordered Hezekiah immediately to send him 300 talents of silver, and 30 talents of gold, as if that would pacify him for the present, and stop his further resentment. This sum, it seems, was with great difficulty sent to him<sup>k</sup>; but, instead of granting the king of Judab the truce and rest he expected, the treacherous monarch behaved towards him as if nothing of the kind had been transacted, and apparently broke his word with Hezekiah, seemingly with no manner of cause<sup>l</sup>; and, instead of withdrawing with his forces, sent three of his officers, Tartan, Rabsaris (Q), and Rabsakeb (R), at the head of a great army, to invest Jerusalem, insult Hezekiah, intimidate his people, and, in a word, to blaspheme against God. Rabsakeb was the spokesman, and, in an insulting speech, vented himself to the officers whom Hezekiah had sent out to treat with them<sup>m</sup>, and to know what

<sup>c</sup> See before, p. 416.
before, p. 832.

<sup>f</sup> Ibid.

<sup>g</sup> MENAND. apud JOSEPH. Antiq. Jud. l. ix. c. 14.

<sup>h</sup> See

JOSEPH. Antiq. Jud. l. x. c. 1.

<sup>i</sup> See before, p. 835. <sup>2</sup> Kings xviii. <sup>2</sup> Chron. xxxii.

<sup>k</sup> <sup>2</sup> Kings xviii.

<sup>l</sup> <sup>2</sup> Kings, ubi sup. JOSEPH. ubi sup.

<sup>m</sup> See before, p. 838.

canon they find, that he sat in the throne of Babylon as well as of Nineveh, and consequently was the only Assyrian king of the second race, as they fondly dream, who could send people from Babylon to inhabit the land of Israel; but this is sufficiently answered in the note above. Nothing is more plainly a part of Sbalmaneser's history than all that is here said, and no greater violence can be offered to the text, than to remove it hence into the midst of a reign which was third after this. All these needless shifts, these turnings and windings, we owe to the tenacious credulity of some great, though mistaken, men, who have turned their thoughts towards the illustration of these very evident matters.

(M) This monarchy, or the strength of it at least, was not yet sufficiently known; it seems as if it was not yet arrived at its summit, but had still difficulties to struggle with; it was not seemingly so strong as not to be set at defiance, and contemned by the Jewish king. Prideaux (43) thinks he was diverted from relenting this, by his war with the Tyrians.

(N) The Tyrians had as yet never known any thing of an Assyrian yoke, and now defied this new monarchy, trusting in their own strength and riches; though it is somewhat difficult to conceive that they were not in some shape or other tributary to the

Assyrian, who must have had it very much in his power to hurt their trade at land, if he could not affect them by sea. Their situation (44) may have protected their persons from immediate slavery; but it is not to be thought their purses were as free from expropriation and loss: In a word, they could not have traded almost any where in the inland places of this part of the continent without the king of Assyria's leave, and must have been quite cut off from any of the benefits and conveniences of the rivers, if they had not been upon some sort of terms with him: so that this seems to be a very obscure piece of history.

(O) His army, or at least part of his army, continued the blockade thus long; as for himself he seems to have retired to the other side of the Euphrates, leaving affairs on this side in a very unsettled state.

(P) His Hebrew name is Sancherib, and it is seldom or never that we recollect ever writ with any greater variation, except that he may, by contraction, have been called Jarb (45).

(Q) This is thought to have been rather the name of an office, though commonly taken for the proper name of the person, signifying, The Chief of the Eunuchs (46).

(R) The same is observed of this, as in the name above, it signifying, The Chief Cup-bearer (47).

(43) Ubi sup. l. 1. p. 19.
in loc. (47) Vid. eund. ibid.

(44) See before, p. 393.

(45) Hof. v. 13.

(46) Vid. JOAN. CLERIC.

- a what further was expected from him, he vaunted his master's mighty power, styling him the great king, the king of Affyria, set at nought Hezekiah, and spoke contemptuously of the king of Egypt (S), in whom he supposed Hezekiah to have placed a confidence, as if he could save him from the Affyrian arm; and to crown all pretended, speaking in his master's name, as he all along does, that God had sent him on purpose to destroy the city and the land. This he uttered with great violence in the Hebrew tongue, that all might hear and understand him; and being by the king's officers entreated to be more moderate, and to deliver himself in the Syriac tongue, which they well understood<sup>a</sup>, that he might not dishearten their people on the walls of the city; he, far from complying, raised his voice higher than before, and in the Jewish tongue particularly addressed himself to the inhabitants of the city, who were beholding the interview; told them their king, Hezekiah, would obstinately deceive them to their destruction, and that it was in vain he trusted in the Lord: He then exhorted them to send him immediate hostages of their submission, promising them the free and full enjoyment of their present possessions, until there should be a convenient opportunity to transplant them to a country every way equal, if not superior, to their own. He then again admonished them, not to let their king deceive them with false hopes of deliverance from the hand of the Lord; and reminded them that as the gods of the nations they had already conquered, the gods of Hamath and of Arpad, the gods of Seppharvaim, Henah, and Ivab (T), had not been able to withstand the Affyrian power, or to save Samaria from captivity, so neither should theirs: This he aggravated still farther; but all his oratory procured him no answer, and so he returned to his master, who had left Lachish and was now at Libnah, which he was besieging. Here as he lay, he had advice, that Tirbakah (V), king of Ethiopia, intended to give him battle, at which, taking the alarm, he seems to

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 838. a. 6.

(S) It is thought this was done more out of mere rage than any thing else, Sennacherib disdaining to have been disappointed and baffled in his attempts upon Egypt, according to the story we have of it in Herodotus (48); but however plausible this may seem (49) at first sight, it is seemingly contradictory to the text, which supposes him, if we understand it right, for this place is somewhat obscure †, to be busied in the siege of Lachish. He had not made his attempt upon Egypt yet. We think we have a more natural account to give of the contempt here expressed against the Egyptian, for Sethon was then king of Egypt, who being recorded to have been a priest, and to have minded nothing but the functions of that office, and to have hated all military men (50), it can be no wonder Sennacherib, or his servant for him, should ridicule and despise both him and those who relied on his friendship.

(T) Sir Isaac Newton (51) justly urges this boast concerning the nations and their gods, as an argument for the novelty of the Affyrian monarchy in these days, observing that this defolation is recited as fresh in memory, and to terrify the Jews (52). All the above-cited nations had, till now, their several gods, and each accounted his god the god of his own land, and the defender thereof, against the gods of the neighbouring countries, and particularly the gods of Affyria; and therefore they were never till now united under the Affyrian monarchy, especially since the king of Affyria doth not boast of their being conquered by the Affyrians oftener than once; but, these being small kingdoms, the king of Affyria easily overflowed them: Know ye not, saith Sennacherib to the Jews, [2 Chr. xxxii. 13, 15.] what I and my fathers have done unto all the people of other lands? . . . for no god of any nation or kingdom was able to deliver his people out of mine hand, and out of the hand of my fathers: how much less shall your god deliver you out of mine hand? He and his fathers therefore, Pul, Tiglath-pileser, and Salmancser, were great conquerors, and with a current of victories had newly overflowed all nations round about Affyria, and thereby set up this monarchy (53). This is a just remark, tending to prove what we have hitherto contended for, concerning the lateness of the Affyrian monarchy, in comparison of the common computation, and may account for what we have as good as asserted (54). That the religion of the Phœnicians and Syrians, as known to the Greeks, or even to themselves, to all appearance, was of Affyrian origin; which may not only be amply proved by the strange nations who were transplanted thither (55), but from this way of proving the god of the prevailing nation to be stronger than the gods of the vanquished, which, as fallacious an argument as it may be to us (56), did, in those days of idolatry and superstition, pass for sound and indisputable doctrine: So Belus or Pul, the Affyrian god, having proved himself too strong for Adad the Syrian god, the former gives place to the latter of course; and Belus thenceforward becomes the god of the Syrians, instead of the unfortunate Adad (57).

(V) According to the course of the Egyptian history, this Tirbakah can have been no other than the Sabbazo (58) of Herodotus, who was an Ethiopian, a great warrior, and had some time before conquered Egypt, and held it 50 years (59): He retired from Egypt at the expiration of that term (60), and returned into Ethiopia, and by that means Sethon the priest of Vulkan, as he is called (61), came to be king of Egypt. Sethon being more strictly a priest than a king,

(48) See before, p. 264.

before, p. 264.

p. 276, 277.

(56) Ibid. J. LE CLERC comment. in loc.

(59) Ibid.

(49) Ibid. J. LE CLERC in loc.

(51) Chronol. of Anc. Kingd. amended, p. 273, 276.

(54) See before, p. 372. (W) and p. 888.

(57) See before, p. 372.

(61) Ibid.

† Ibid. sup. p. 838. b.

(52) Ibid. p. 274.

(53) Ibid.

(55) See before, p. 890. (A. B.)

(58) See before, p. 261, f. 262.

to have marched towards Egypt (W) to meet him, and to have sent Rabshakeb back again to Jerusalem, to block up that city and to prevent Hezekiah from joining his friends against him. Rabshakeb returned to his post before Jerusalem, and would have insulted Hezekiah in person, as should seem; but, not being able to do that, he sent him a letter as from Sennacherib, fraught with the same words almost he had used before in his boasting and vain speech to the Jewish commissioners, adding to the nations he formerly mentioned to have been conquered by Affyria Rexeph, and the children of Eden which were in Tbelasar * (X). His former insolent and blasphemous message had drawn on him the fearful prophecy of Isaiab, That he should fall by the sword in his own land *; and for this second, it was denounced against him by the same prophet, That he should not come into the city nor shoot an arrow there, nor come before it with a shield, nor cast a bank about it †: The meaning of which seems to be, that he was gone, whence he should return so disabled, that he should neither be able to besiege the city in form, nor barely assault it. This is seemingly the import of the text, and if Herodotus may be introduced upon this occasion, who makes express mention of his name, though he mistakenly calls him king of Arabia (Y) instead of Affyria, he will tell us, that, as Sennacherib lay before Pelusium, there one night came such swarms of field rats and mice into the Affyrian camp as destroyed all their shield-strings and bow strings ‡. How little truth soever there may be (Y*) in this, it must be owned in some measure to correspond with at least, if not to confirm the completion of the prophecy above. But to wave this, it appears that he was very unfortunate (Y†) in this expedition, and that his fun from henceforwards lies apace. His army is said to have

* 2 Kings xix. ver. 8. 12.

* Ibid. ver. 7.

† Ibid. ver. 32.

‡ HERODOT. I. 2. c. 41.

king, and Tirbakah, or Sabbaco, the great Ethiopian, conscious Setbon could not pretend to make head against so formidable a conqueror as Sennacherib, and perceiving Egypt to be in imminent danger of subjection, puts himself at the head of his army to protect Egypt, and at the same time secure his own country Ethiopia. Sabbaco, though an Ethiopian, must have had a great concern on him for the liberties of Egypt, not only as it was his barrier and next neighbour, but also as he had resided so long in it as lord or king. He may have been still alive, though he must have been a man in years, for he did not die in the throne of Egypt, but left it of his own accord (62). We do not pretend to give this for certainty, but it has such an air of probability, or at least corresponds so nicely with what we read of the history of Egypt in scripture, that we fancy the reader may be tempted to think this transaction may have been as we have here suggested, if he would give himself the trouble of comparing what we here say therewith.

(W) The history of this his war in these parts is very cloudy; we only know in general, that he took several cities belonging to the king of Judah, and perhaps some others; that he besieged Lachish; sent to insult Jerusalem and its king, after he had accepted his tribute and homage in seeming good part; that he was under some apprehensions about Tirbakah, king of Ethiopia; and finally, that the grofs of his army was miraculously destroyed. But Prideaux (63), supported by nothing besides a supposition that he was the Sargon of Isaiab (64), writes, that he conquered Egypt, miserably waited it for three years together, and carried away multitudes into captivity; as also that he took Asdod or Azotus (65) by his general Tartan. Sargon was not Sennacherib, but his son Afar-baddon; and if it be answered he must have been the former, because his general's name was Tartan, we say Tartan was general to both of them. Nor was, as he says, Sevechus the son of Sabbaco the Ethiopian, at that time king of Egypt; nor were, it is likely, Sevechus and Sabbaco two persons, the father and son; they are one and the same name, with a very trifle of variation. Herodotus has no such king as this Sevechus, nor Diodorus: This is sufficient to justify us in what we say; nor was Sevechus or Setbon, whom Prideaux (67) supposes to have been the same, the son of the Ethiopian Sabbaco, as may appear by Herodotus, who calls him priest of Vulcan, and plainly insinuates that he was an Egyptian, and a stranger to Sabbaco's line, and one who was chosen to succeed after some seemingly great disturbance in the state (68). Besides, it might be asked, where the dreadful Tirbakah can have been, during the three long years Sennacherib must have ravaged and lorded it over Egypt? or, what he was about all that time, that he should not come to the relief of the country till it had been, as it were, undone? In short, nothing is plainer than that Sennacherib not only did not conquer Egypt, but even suffered some notable loss or repulse in so much as offering to invade that land; in which attempt he must have erred against the rules of common prudence and policy, considering that Syria and Palestine, which should have been his first work, were not as yet fully subdued.

(X) The most probable opinion is, that these places where somewhere in Syria. There is a city called Reseph in Mesopotamia, near the mouth of the river Saacoras (69); and a city called Resaph, in the Palmyrene of Syria: which of these may have been Rexeph we decide not; the other cities are not so easy to be found.

(Y) This may not originally have been the fault of Herodotus himself; it may have been owing to transcribers.

(Y*) True it certainly is not; bishop Patrick (70), with some seeming passion, calls it a horrible lye; but as much a lye as it may be, it may be said to confirm what is written in scripture concerning the sudden destruction of the Affyrian army, and therefore may be borne with. The Egyptians ascribe the honour of it to their God (71), than which there is nothing more natural.

(Y†) Herodotus declares as much (72), and so does Josephus (73).

(62) See before, p. 262. & seq.

(63) Connell. ubi sup.

(64) xx. 1. PRID. Connell. ubi sup. p.

262. e.

(65) Idem. ibid.

(67) Ubi sup.

(68) See before, c. 1.

(69) PROLEM. Tab.

As. Geograph. iv. of the Old and New Test. l. 1. p. 22. Edit.

(70) Comment upon 2 Kings xix.

(71) See before, in 8vo.

(72) Ibid.

(73) Antiq. Jud. l. 10.

- a have been destroyed by the angel of the Lord (Z), who smote 185,000 Affyrians in their camp (A), and Sennacherib departed for Affyria, and took up his abode at Niniveb*; where, finding himself fallen in the esteem of his people (B), he grew sullen and tyrannical; particularly venting his rage against the captive Hebrews in his dominions, many of whom he unmercifully put to death†, in revenge for his great downfall, which he doubtless attributed to them. In short he behaved in such a manner, that he was grown odious in the eyes of his own sons, two of whom, Adrammelech and Sharazer (C), slew him as he was at his devotions in the temple of his god Nisroch, in a short time after his precipitate return from Judea; immediately after which, they fled into the land of Armenia, fearful, without doubt, of the revenge that was like to fall on them for their parricide (D); thus was he slain in the temple of his favourite god (E), and his third son Efar-baddon reigned in his stead‡.

Efar-baddon (F) may be said to have succeeded to the ruins, as it were, of the Affyrian monarchy founded by Pul, and enlarged and established by Tiglath-pileser. Under Sennacherib it fell into decay, either by his imprudence or ill fortune, or a mixture of both. The Medes taking advantage, it is likely, of his long and distant absence, or, perhaps, upon the news of the sudden and general destruction of his army, revolted, and were never after, as should seem, reduced to the Affyrian yoke though Efar-baddon, in the course of his reign, seems to have been both a valorous and fortunate prince, as well as ambitious of supporting and enlarging the empire.

- c He was, to all appearance, a mild and gracious personage, and particularly kind to the Jews, who had been so cruelly abused by his father after his hasty return to Niniveb. He, in the beginning of his reign, seems to have continued quiet in his capital, and perhaps had enough to do to support his dignity at home; till after some years, his kindred race of the Babylonish kings becoming extinct, or some other cause producing an inter-reign in that kingdom, he either by art or violence seated himself on the throne of Babylon (G), thereby retrieving the lustre of the Affyrian name, which had been sullied by the defection of the Medes.

- d GROWN potent by this union, he proceeds to establish his tottering power over the more distant parts of his empire, and marches into Syria, and against the remnant of Israel, and the kingdom of Judab. The remnant of Israel he transplanted, as he may have done by the remnant that may have been left of Syria, so that

* 2 Kings xix. 36. See before, p. 838. c. d. † Tobit c. i. 18. ‡ 2 Kings ubi sup. ver. 37.
 † Tobit ubi sup. ver. 15. † PTOLEM. Can. Astronom.

(Z) This is a figurative expression common with the Jews. Some suppose this havock to have been made "by a plague or perhaps by lightning, or a fiery wind, which blows sometimes in the neighbourhood of deserts. The Egyptians ascribe the glory of this defeat to Sethon and Tirhakah; in memory of which they erected a statue to Sethon, holding in his hand a moutie, the Egyptian symbol "of destruction" (74).

(A) Where his camp was at this time is no very clear matter; whether at Libnah, or Pelusium, or Jerusalem. It is also uncertain whether his army was all in one body at this time, or divided, part under himself elsewhere, and part under Rabshakeh before Jerusalem (75), as we have supposed; and consequently whether it was the army under his command, or that under Rabshakeh, that was thus swept away, or whether they both suffered. After what we have already said, we leave the reader to satisfy himself about this obscurity.

(B) Returning so baffled, with such shame and dishonour, his people could not but think meanly of him, in comparison of his predecessors; though Shabnauser, his father, does not seem to have been very fortunate in the latter part of his life. We have seen him shamefully beaten by the Tyrians in a sea fight, and his army five years before their city without any effect †.

(C) It is supposed he had, in the midst of his danger, threatened to sacrifice them to his god, and that they took this opportunity of assassinating him, that they might not be sacrificed themselves (76): what grounds there is for this conjecture we are at a loss. We nowhere read, the Affyrians had any such unnatural superstition in vogue with them; as we shall take occasion to shew when we come to treat of the Babylonian religion, which must at least have included that of Affyria.

(D) This slight seems totally to destroy the supposition mentioned in the last note. Self-preservation against a superstitious and unnatural tyrant, now become odious to gods and men, might have sufficiently justified the deed and screened them from further punishment, so that there would have been no occasion for their retiring into a foreign country, and leaving the empire to be peaceably enjoyed by a younger brother.

(E) We have it from Josephus (77), that Nisroch or Araeus, as he calls him (78), was his most esteemed god. Concerning his deity, we have said all we thought necessary in the former part of this history (79).

(F) He is also called Afar-baddon, Afordan by the Septuagint, Affaradin in Ptolemy's canon, Sarchedon by Tobit (80), Sargon by Isaiah (81), and Asnapper by Ezra ‡.

(G) It is very unlikely that he obtained the immediate possession of the kingdom of Babylon by violence; but that is what we may enquire into when we come to consider him as king of it.

(74) Str Is. Newt. Chron. of Ant. Kingd. amend. p. 282. See also PRIDEAUX's Connect. of the Old and New Test. Book 1. part. 1. p. 24. (75) See PATRICK ubi sup. † Vid. sup. p. 416. f. 892. a.

(76) PATRICK, ibid. (77) Antiq. Jud. l. 10. c. 2. (78) Ibid. (79) See before, p. 861.
 (80) Tobit i. 21. (81) Isaiah xx. * Ezra iv. 10.

that they now utterly ceased to be nations; and in their stead he introduced a supply of foreigners (H), according to the policy of his predecessors. Having thus quite expunged Israel and Syria from the list of nations, he proceeded to the reduction of the kingdom of Judab, to the same tributary state to which we supposed it elsewhere † to have been reduced by Tiglatb-pileser in Abaz's reign, and took Manasseb their king, and bound him in chains, and sent him captive to Babylon.*

Year of the
Flood, 2326.
Year before
CHRIST, 673.

ELATED by this flow of success, and nothing discouraged by the unfortunate attempt of his father, he continues his march, resolving to invade Egypt and Ethiopia (I). He succeeded so well that he subdued, transplanted (K), and held them in subjection to him three years †, which is probably as long as he afterwards lived. In the course of this war, he particularly took, by his general Tartan, the city of Asdod or Azotus ‡, which cost Psammeticus so much time to wrest from his successors §. Thus did he extend his dominions (L), and once more spread the terror of the Assyrian name far and near. After a reign of many years, glorious especially in the latter part of it, he died, and seemingly left a character behind him equal to the rank he had held while living; upon which account, and for other reasons (M),

Year of the
Flood, 2331.
Year before
CHRIST, 668.

† See before, p. 832. b. c. (L).

‡ Chron. xxxiii. 11. See before, p. 840. b. c.

§ Isaiah xx.

* Idem, ibid.

¶ See before, p. 267.

(H) His being now called king of Babylon has been the cause that commentators have postponed the transplantation of Israel, recorded in the reign of Shalmaneser, to his time; concerning which we have declared our mind already (82).

(I) Having, as we have seen, subdued all Syria and Palestine in a more effectual manner than any of his predecessors ever had; he was the better qualified to invade Egypt and Ethiopia. Besides, Tirhakah, or Sabbaco, may have been now dead, for, according to the history of Egypt (83), he must, by this time, have been a very old man. He had nothing then to fear from that warlike prince, and very little from Setbon (84), who was now unsupported, and whose kingdom, as it is represented to us, seems to have been, at this time, in the most proper condition to be conquered.

(K) This subduction and captivity was foretold by Isaiah (85); In that day shall there be a high-way out of Egypt into Assyria, and the Assyrian shall come into Egypt, and the Egyptian into Assyria, and the Egyptians shall serve the Assyrians. In this war the city of Diospolis, No-ammon, or Thebes, which had till then flourished in great glory, is thought (86) to have been miserably wasted and led into captivity, according to the same prophet and another, the former adding (87) to what is above; So shall the king of Assyria lead away the Egyptians prisoners, and the Ethiopians captives, young and old, naked and barefoot . . . to the shame of Egypt. And they [they Jews] shall be afraid and ashamed of Ethiopia their exprobration, and of Egypt their glory: And the latter (88) who, prophesying the destruction of Niniveh, speaks of the calamity of Egypt as a transaction of late date, Art thou better than the populous No [No-ammon] that was situate among the rivers, that had the waters round about it, whose rampart was the sea, and her wall was from the sea (89)? All this can have been effected by no king of Assyria, Assar-baddon excepted, and we shall not need to prove this to the reader who shall think it worth his while to turn back to the history of Egypt at this time. For though the Egyptians were too proud to acknowledge this conquest of them, yet their history, though silent about it, seems to confirm what is here said. For after Setbon, in the latter part of whose reign, or immediately upon whose death, this invasion must have happened, we find the nation to have been in some very violent disorder, and to have sunk under the power of 12 men who divided the whole kingdom between them, in a kind of aristocracy (90). How this alteration could have been wrought in the constitution of so regular and precise a kingdom as Egypt, but by some such means, and by this most likely, we leave to the reader.

(L) The extent of his dominion at this time, which must, one would think, have been more than that of any of his predecessors, is not a little uncertain; though Sir Isaac Newton, in a manner, ventures to describe it in these words, "In the reign of Sennacherib and Afferbaddon, the Assyrian empire seems arrived at its greatness, being united under one monarch, and containing Assyria, Media, Apolloniatis, Sufiana, Chaldæa, Mejopotamia, Cilicia, Syria, Phœnicia, Egypt, Ethiopia, and part of Arabia, and reaching eastward into Elymais and Paratæcens, a province of the Medes; and if Calarch and Chaber be Cœchis and Iberia, as some think, and as may seem probable from the circumcision, used by those nations till the days of Herodotus, we are also to add these two provinces, with the two Armenia's, Pontus and Cappadocia, as far as the river Habys; for Herodotus tells us, that the people of Cappadocia, as far as to that river, were called Syrians by the Greeks both before and after the days of Cyrus, and that the Assyrians were also called Syrians by the Greeks" (91). Of all this extent there may be some doubt whether or no the Medes were in subjection to him; they had thrown off the yoke in his father's time, who left the empire, as great as it may have been under him, in a crazy condition; though it is somewhat difficult to suppose that Assar-baddon did not reduce them to their former obedience before he crossed the Euphrates, to confirm himself in Syria and Palestine: After all, he may have reserved them for his last work, not fearing any damage from them in his absence, being perhaps possessed of some of the most important parts of their country, which he did not live long enough to regain throughout. This may be resumed in the reign of his grandson.

(M) He is styled the great and noble Asnappar (92). It is impossible he should have been represented as a slothful and effeminate prince, whose life seems to have been a life of the most unwearied action. He may, it is possible, have been known to the ancient Greeks

(82) See before, p. 891. (H) & (K).

(83) See before, p. 262. & seq.

(84) See before, ibid.

(85) Isaiah xix. 23.

(86) See PRID. Connect. of the Old and New Test. Book 1. Part 1. p. 22. 800.

(87) xx. 4, 5.

(88) Nabum iii. 8. 10.

(89) Ibid.

(90) See before, p. 26.

(91) Chronol. of Anc. Kingd. amend. p. 283.

(92) Extra iv. 10.

a we could mention, we cannot be induced to think he can be, in any respect, the Sardanapalus of Ctesias, there being no likeness or analogy at all between the reigns and characters of these two monarchs.

He was succeeded by his son Saosduchinus *, or Saosducheus (N), concerning whom we have nothing particular, except that he reigned 20 years, that it was probably under him that Manasseh was restored to his kingdom (O), and that Egypt recovered her liberty (P); that he seems otherwise to have kept full possession of the empire his father left him, and that, dying, he was succeeded by his son Chyniladan. Saosduchinus.
Year of the
Flood, 2331.
Year before
CHRIST, 668.

Chyniladan is supposed, and upon good grounds, to be the Nabuchodonosor of scripture (Q), † an active and a warlike prince, and particularly remarkable for his invasion of the rebellious and now independant Medes, who had formed themselves into a separate state, as may be seen in the following history of that nation. In order to subdue this warlike people, he summons, as it were, the whole force of his wide spreading Chyniladan.
Year of the
Flood, 2351.
Year before
CHRIST, 648.

* Ptolem. Can. Astron.

† Judith i. pass.

Greeks by the name of Sardanapalus, or Affur-baddon-Pul (93), but then he must have been the great one who is called a warrior (94), and is said to have built Tarus and Anchiale in one day, and to have died peaceably in his bed (95). He may have been one of the princes called Sardanapalus; for we have seen they had two, very different from one another, as we have noted in the story of the Sardanapalus of profane authors, in the section before this. The other we may discover hereafter.

(N) Prideaux (96) reckons him to have been the Nabuchodonosor of the book of Judith; but, that he is therein most egregiously mistaken, will be proved anon.

(O) Prideaux (97) supposes him not only to have been set at liberty by Affur-baddon himself, but also to have been invetted, by the same monarch, with an addition to his own kingdom, to enable him to support himself against Pjanmetichus, who had now got the dominion of all Egypt into his hands, and began to war upon the Assyrians in Palestine (98); but he has most strangely disturbed the history of Assyria by that unaccountable mistake of writing Sargon the same with Sennacherib.

(P) It is not in nature to suppose it did, before the death of Affur-baddon, who, it is most certain, died by the time he had well subdued this kingdom.

(Q) That Chyniladan, and no other king in Ptolemy's canon, can have been the Nabuchodonosor of the book of Judith, is what we are now to endeavour to prove; in the doing of which we shall also settle some other points, and especially the three which are the subject of the three notes above, and which Prideaux has involved in great darkness. From the death of Affur-baddon to the first year of the reign of Chyniladan is 20 years, and from the first year of the reign of Chyniladan to the twelfth, that he undertook to reduce the Medes, is 32 years. Manasseh, king of Judah, was taken into captivity by Affur-baddon in the 21st year of his reign, after which, he reigned 34 years. His son Amon reigned after him over Judah two years, which, being added to the former number, make 36 years, when Josiab began to reign, who was but eight years old when he first came to the throne. Hence, by the canon, it may appear, that Chyniladan began his reign about the 41st year of Manasseh, and that warring against the Medes in his 12th year, according to the number in the vulgate, or St. Jerom's translation, it happened in the 53d year of the said Manasseh; Chyniladan reigned after this 10 years, or to the sixth year of king Josiab; for Manasseh reigned full 55 years, and his son Amon reigned barely two; so that Chyniladan may have died about the beginning of the reign of Josiab. This king, as we have observed above, was but eight years old when he came to the throne, and in his reign it must have been, if ever, that Bethulia was beleagued by Holofernes for the king of Assyria; and here it seems to be most naturally placed by Sir Isaac Newton (99). To suppose with Prideaux (100), that Holofernes invaded the Jews in the days of Manasseh, is contradicting, in good measure, himself; for it is expressly said, that the Jews were then lately returned from captivity (1), which can be meant of no other than the Assyrian captivity, when Manasseh was carry'd away to Babylon; and to suppose this war under Holofernes to have been undertaken after the return of Manasseh to Jerusalem, is undoing what the same historian mentions of the kindness of the kings of Assyria to the kings of Jerusalem, and the perfect good understanding between them, till Josiab was killed in the service of his Assyrian sovereign, as he mistakenly writes (2). If he supposes the people returned from captivity without their king, and if they were attacked while he was in prison; then must he also say, that Affur-baddon himself was the Nabuchodonosor of the book of Judith, since he declares Manasseh to have been set at liberty by the said Affur-baddon; but this he says not. If this transaction happened in the reign of Saosduchinus, it must follow, either that Manasseh was not delivered out of prison by Affur-baddon, but detained many years a prisoner at Babylon by Saosduchinus, which he denies (3), or that there was not that great and constant harmony between the kings at Niniveh and their homagers at Jerusalem, as he asserts (4), down to the day Josiab was slain in battle by the Egyptian king Necho (5). Josiab reigned 31 years, which being added to the interval between the first year of his reign and the year of his grandfather's captivity, which is 36, it will make 67 years. Now by Ptolemy's canon it appears, that Josiab was slain in the fourth year of Nabopolassar, or the great Nebuchadnezzar, the second king of Babylon, and this was after Niniveh had been destroyed, and the old race of the proper kings of Assyria were no more. In sum, it appears from all this, that Affur-baddon must have died much about

(93) See before, p. 885. (94) See before in the notes, p. 885. (95) Ibid. p. 888. (96) Connect. of the Old and New Test. Book 1. Part 1. p. 35. 8vo. (97) Ibid. p. 34. (98) See before, p. 264. b. (99) Chronol. of Anc. King. amend. p. 290. (100) Ubi sup. (1) Judith iv. 3. (2) Connect. of the Old and New Test. Book 1. Part. 1. p. 35. (3) Ibid. (4) Ibid. (5) See before, p. 265. b.

Call, in all the nations, spreading dominions, calling in "all that dwelt in the hill country, and all that a "dwelt by Euphrates, and Tigris, and Hydaspes, and the plain of Arioch, the king of the Elymeans, and very many nations of the sons of Cbelod;" all these easterns rendezvoused under his banner. But issuing out his orders, at the same time, to the Persians, and the western people in Cilicia, Damascus, Libanus, Antilibanus, and the inhabitants on the sea-coasts, as well as to the nations of Carmel, Gilead, the Upper Galilee, and the great plain of Esdraelon; as also to all Samaria, Jerusalem, Betane, Cbellus, Kades, the borderers on the river of Egypt, Taphnes, Rameses, and all the land of Gefem, beyond Tanis and Memphis, and in general, to all the inhabitants of Egypt to the borders of Ethiopia; all these received his ambassadors with contempt, and, fearing him not, refused one and all to obey his orders (R).<sup>b</sup> Upon so general a defection, it may be wondered he should have persisted in his resolution to invade the Medes, who had defied some of the most potent of his predecessors; but having numbers sufficient, and relying on his own strength, he seems to have made as slight of their disobedience as they had of his orders; vowing in the most solemn manner to take ample vengeance on them, as soon as he had chastised the insolent and rebellious Medes *.

Wars with the Medes.

Year of the Flood, 2363.
Year before CHRIST, 636.

IN the twelfth year of his reign, then, he moved with his army against Arphaxad, king of the Medes, and joining battle with him in the great plain of Ragau, he overthrew him horse and chariot, put Arphaxad to flight, who made the best of his way to the mountains; got possession of all his cities, and Echatan, in particular, the capital of Media, a sumptuous city, newly erected and decorated to be the seat of this new kingdom, and demolished it without mercy; and to crown all, he caught Arphaxad in the mountains of Ragau, where he thought to have sheltered himself, and coming there to a skirmish with him and his followers, he shot Arphaxad so often with darts that he killed him, and put an end to his life, and as it were to his kingdom. Flushed beyond measure with this more than, perhaps, expected success, he returns in triumph to Niniveh, he and all his company of nations, a multitude of warriors, and reposing with them after the fatigues of their victorious expedition (S), they feast and revel with him for the space of 120 days †.

AND now being fated with excess and riot, and confident of being invincible (T), he and his servants resume their martial fury, and talk of no less than being avenged about the time Manasseh was carried to Babylon, or, at most, two or three years afterwards; for we cannot pretend to be quite exact, and that it is likely he had his liberty from Saosduchinus rather than Affar-baddon, who could not have had the time either to think much of him or to settle with him; for it must have been something extraordinary that procured him his freedom and kingdom again, when the kings of Israel and Syria shared so different a fate. Again, it must appear that Affar-baddon died immediately after he left Egypt, and that his death inspired the chiefs of that nation with courage to lift up their heads, and appoint the 12 kings (6); and finally, that Chyniladan, and no other, was the Nabuchadonofor of the book of Judith.

* Judith i. 5. & seq.

† Ibid. vers. 15. & seq.

(R) Herodotus confirms this very plainly, telling us, that the Assyrians, those I mean, says he (7), who lived at Niniveh, who had formerly been the chief of all, but were now deserted by their friends or vassals, though nevertheless in a good state to defend themselves; against these, says he, did Pbraortes the Mede make war. This Pbraortes is the Arphaxad above, as we shall have occasion to observe in the history of the Medes. Saosduchinus, it appears, then had led a quiet and peaceable life for the space of 20 years, the whole duration of his reign; and Chyniladan had done the same for the first 12 years of his, till finding the Medes had conquered the Persians, as Herodotus writes, and as appears in the text of Judith, which says, that the Persians of all the orientals refused to obey his summons; and that, not contented with that, they were going to attack Assyria also; hearing of this it roused him; perceiving himself and kingdom in such danger, he takes the alarm, and, in haste, sends to all the nations who had bowed to the Assyrian throne, to come in immediately to his aid. No two historical pieces can, so far as they are concerned together, more illustrate each other than Herodotus and this book of Judith. And here, by the way, we may, in this distress of Nabuchadonofor, perceive some likeness of the case of Sardanapalus, who, when he was besieged in Niniveh, is said to have sent out to all the nations to come to his succour (8); though thereupon we have noted, that in his case it must have been quite impracticable, if not impossible, for him to do it (9). He should have done it before he was blocked up in his city; upon the whole, this must be the story which is there told by the heedless and romantic historian Ctesias.

(S) This successful war of Chyniladan, or Nabuchadonofor, against the Medes, is exactly almost what Ctesias writes of Sardanapalus (10), it is the same story most carelessly told; and this feast is certainly the same Sardanapalus is said to have given his victorious army (11).

(T) This is Sardanapalus again, or rather Sardanapalus is the shadow of this king; who, as we have seen, imagined his city of Niniveh could never be taken (12).

(6) See before, p. 262. f. & seq. (7) I. i. c. 102. (8) See before, p. 887. (9) Ibid. (5) a.
(10) See before, p. 886. c. (11) Ibid. d. (12) Ibid. p. 887. a.

a on the whole earth; meaning the nations who had so contemptuously refused to attend him in his war intended against Media. He therefore calls together his nobles and officers, with whom he conferred, concerning this matter, in private council, and the result was, to affix the whole earth out of his own mouth, and that all flesh should be destroyed that did not obey the commandment of his mouth. In consequence of this vain resolution, Nabuchadonisor calls for his chief captain Holofernes, and gives him in charge, as lord of the whole earth, to take with him 120,000 of his choicest foot, and 12,000 chosen archers on horseback, and with them to invade all the west, for that they had dared to withstand his will and pleasure, and to command them to prepare water and earth for him, against he should, in his wrath, come b against them, and cover the whole earth with the feet of his army, and give them up a prey thereto; threatening, that their slain should fill their vallies and their brooks, and make the river swell over its banks, and that he would lead them away captives to the uttermost parts of the earth: He commanded him to go forth before him and possess himself of all their coasts for him; that, if they submitted to him, he should let them alone for him to punish them in person; but that, if they presumed to make head against him, he should utterly destroy them without favour or distinction; swearing by his own life and the might of his kingdom, that he would, with his own hand, perform what he had so presumptuously vented forth; and warning him, at his peril, not to transgress any of the commands c he had enjoined him, but to execute them with rigour and without delay * (V).

Holofernes, having received his orders to this effect, departed from before Nabu- He takes the chadonisor, and calling together all the governors, captains, and officers of the army of Ajur [Affyria], he selected the numbers, both of horse and foot, the king had commanded; and, attended with asses and camels in great numbers, for the conveyance of necessaries, and goats, sheep, and oxen more than can be said, with plenty of every thing to sustain the army, and gold and silver in great abundance from the king's treasury, he marched off from Nineveh; followed, besides his army, by innumerable multitudes from several nations, who like locusts joined him, or like d the sand of the sea; so that, by the help of hyperbole, they may be properly enough said to cover all the face of the earth westward with their chariots, and horsemen, and their chosen footmen *.

Holofernes, in this his march westward, destroyed Pbud and Lud, spoiled all the children of Rasses, and the children of Ijmael toward the wilderness, southward of the land of the Cbellians. He then crossed the Euphrates, and passed through Mesopotamia, and destroyed all the high cities upon the river Arbonai quite to the sea: He took the borders of Cilicia, killed all that resisted him, and came to the borders of Japhet, southward, opposite to Arabia; and falling upon the children of Madian (W), he burnt their tents, and threw down their sheep-cotes. From hence he went to the e plain of Damascus, where he arrived at the time of wheat-harvest, burnt up all their fields, destroyed their flocks and herds, ransacked and demolished their cities, quite laid the whole country waste, and slew all the young men with the edge of the sword; which struck such a terror into all the sea-coasts, that Tyre, Sidon, Azotus, Ascalon, and others trembled and sued for mercy; sending, in all haste, ambassadors * Ibid. c. 11. 1. &amp; seq.

* Ibid. vers. 15. &amp; seq.

(V) It would have been very difficult to account for this insolent degree of fury and revenge in this prince, were it not for the good assistance of Herodotus, who tells (13) us, as we have observed before, that the Medes were grown to that pitch as to pretend to subdue Affyria; which, considering this king as he was, must have been a most violent provocation and must have highly inflamed him, when he found himself so deserted by his tributaries and homagers, who could unconcernedly look on while he was in danger of being subdued by a rebellious nation, who must for many years, ever since the days of Sennacherib, have been at greatest enmity with Affyria, though probably at the hazard of their own welfare, seeing they might feel the blow that staggered his kingdom. Upon the consideration therefore that they would not assist him, though to preserve even themselves, he resolves to execute such vengeance, as their ingratitude, as he might call it, and stupidity would well deserve. The vulgate, indeed, seems to explode this solution, by representing Nabuchadonisor victorious over the Medes, before he called in the nations mentioned; but why he should call them in when his work was done, or how they dared to have disobeyed him, when he had so lately given so extraordinary an instance of his might and power, is more than we can conceive. The Greek version and our own is doubtless here to be preferred, though both, in other respects, very faulty.

(W) We forbear to enquire into the particular site of these nations; such of them as we can fix will be found in the proper maps.

to him to treat of peace, who, prostrating themselves before him, acknowledged themselves the servants of the mighty Nabuchadonosor, his master, and making a most humble tender of all that in the world belonged to them, to be disposed of by him, as to him should seem best <sup>b</sup>.

UPON this, Holofernes drew down towards the sea coast, where he filled the chief cities with garrisons of his own, whence he, at the same time, picked out the choicest men to supply the place of such as he thus detached from his army; and all this tyranny he exercised amidst the joyful acclamations of all the people he thus enthralled, who every where received the Assyrian general and his army with garlands and dances, and the sound of timbrels; but this welcome could no where save their frontiers, their groves, or their gods; Holofernes having determined to demolish the former, and to destroy all the gods of the land wheresoever he should come, that all nations might worship Nabuchadonosor only, and all tongues and tribes call upon him, and upon him only as god (X). And having, without opposition, wrought his pleasure in these parts, he moved off towards the plain of Esdraelon, and advancing towards Judea, he encamped between Geba and Scythopolis, where he halted a whole month for the rendezvous of his baggage and scattered parts of his army <sup>c</sup>.

IN this situation he redoubled the alarm he had before given to the inhabitants of Judea, who thereupon took what measures they could to obstruct his passage and defend themselves. Holofernes indeed intended to deal by them as he had dealt by others, and, we may be sure, was highly exasperated when he heard the Jews were resolved upon an obstinate resistance. The news and confirmation of this stirred him up to anger; and convening the chiefs of Ammon, Moab, and the sea coast, he required them to inform him what nation this was that thus pretended to withstand his progress; and how it was that they alone, of all the people of the west, should presume to stand out against the Assyrian power? To this, Achior the chief of the sons of Ammon gave him a full and impartial answer, and, reciting to him the history of the Jews from Abraham, assured him upon the whole, that, if they were in favour with their God, it would be in vain for him to think of subduing them; and that it would, in that case, be dangerous for him to hazard his honour against them; but that, if indeed they had committed any great sin against him, they might be as easily reduced as any other nation. This diffident and ambiguous counsel was not only displeasing to Holofernes, but raised a tumult among the chiefs of Phenice and Moab, who were there present, and who would have persuaded him to put Achior to death for his insolence, vaunting against the children of Israel, and setting them at nought <sup>d</sup>.

WHEN the tumult was ceased, Holofernes called out to Achior, and treated him as a wretch who had on set purpose prophesied against him, and, blaspheming against God, spoke of Nabuchadonosor as above him; he then ordered him out of his presence, dooming him to death with the Jews, whom he intended shortly to cut off. Hereupon he ordered his servants to guard him to a strong place belonging to the Jews,<sup>e</sup> that he might there wait till his appointed hour was come. Betbulia was the place named, and thither he was accordingly carried; an<sup>d</sup>, being got into the city, he informed them of whatever he knew in relation to Holofernes and his designs <sup>e</sup>.

Beseges Betbulia.

THE next day Holofernes ordered, that motion should in general be made to invest Betbulia; the vast multitude obeyed and incamped upon a wide extent of ground from Dotbaim to Belmaim, and from Betbulia to Cyamon, over-against Esdraelon. The day after this, Holofernes, at the head of all his horsemen, and in the sight of all the people of Betbulia, took a view of the passages to the city, and, seizing upon and setting a guard over their springs of water, returned again to the gross of his army. Upon his return, the chiefs of the Edomites advised him not to think of assaulting the besieged, because of their situation, but rather to keep the waters that supplied the city under a strong guard, and so destroy the people by thirst, while he sat quietly in his camp, and saved himself and army the trouble of putting those to death, who must of necessity die for want of water; and so be sufficiently

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. & c. iii.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid.

<sup>d</sup> Ibid. c. iv. v.

<sup>e</sup> Ibid. c. xii.

(X) He here seems to have assumed beyond any of his predecessors. This may serve as an instance, that the Assyrians abolished the religion of the countries where-ever they came, to introduce the worship of their own princes, dead or living; to keep the nations the more in awe, and the more to exalt the majesty of their own kingdom. This may be added to what we have already observed of the same kind on several passages of the history and practice of this people.

a sufficiently avenged on them for their rebellious behaviour. Holofernes approved the advice, and ordered the necessary dispositions to put it effectually in execution <sup>f</sup>.

HAVING continued in this inactive state about 35 days, and waiting the miserable end of the besieged, who, for want of water, were indeed ready to expire; word was brought him of a beautiful and comely woman from Bethulia, who was without Judith his tent. He was then repoling himself under a rich canopy of purple, gold, emeralds, and other precious stones, and hearing of Judith, that was the woman's name, he went out to see her in great state, with silver lamps carried before him. Judith fell prostrate on her face before him, and being taken up from the ground, he desired her in the most obliging terms, to cast off all fear, and to be assured of his kind intention towards all those who willingly submitted to the great Nabuchodonosor. Judith on her side failed not to assure him, that this was the very motive that brought her at his feet, being conscious, as she added, that her rebellious nation were given up by her God as a sacrifice to that great monarch. This and much more she said concerning herself and nation, all which was artfully devised to encourage him in his hopes against the people of Bethulia; so that in the end with her words she deceived him, and with her beauty she ensnared his heart. For four days he left her mistress of herself, unattended and unconfined, little dreaming that her actions and behaviour were entirely calculated to deprive him of life. At the end of this term he could refrain no longer, but ordered his chief eunuch Bagoas, to persuade her to his bed; which she dissembling a readiness to comply with, Holofernes gave himself up to an excess of wine, and being left alone with her, she took her opportunity in the dead of the night, and severed his head from his body, with his own sword, and carried it off with her to the besieged <sup>g</sup> (Y).

THE Assyrians, ignorant of what had been transacted in the recesses of their general's tent that night, and perceiving the besieged in motion the next morning, as if they intended an assault, sent notice of it to Holofernes, who was found headless in his bed, to the unspeakable surprize of all that beheld or heard of it. At this the Assyrians lost all courage, and, seized with a panic, betook them to the most precipitate flight, as if in the tragical end of their general they foresaw their down. They left all their treasure and baggage behind them, and were pursued with a great slaughter to Chobai <sup>h</sup>.

Thus ended this insolent expedition; but whether exactly after this manner we dare not affirm; but that it was unfortunate, and highly, so may be plainly inferred from what in a few years after followed, meaning no less than the fall of the Assyrian empire. What farther relates to this emperor we are at a loss to know, except that we are told he was succeeded by a king called

Sarab.

<sup>f</sup> Ibid. c. vi. vii.

<sup>g</sup> Ibid. c. viii. ix, x, xi, &c.

<sup>h</sup> Ibid. c. xv.

(Y) This story may meet with very little credit, and indeed we should be far from thinking it authentic in every part, especially considering that the author of it does plainly own himself to have lived at some distance from it; it may be clearly inferred from what he says of Belshazzar's long continuance in the commonwealth of Babylonia, and of the peace they enjoyed a long time after her death †, were it not so directly contradicted to us by Hoseditas, as well as by Ctesias and all his followers, as we have observed in some parallel places. The heroine herself, Judith, may indeed be a fictitious character, calculated more for example than any thing else, and visibly meant to inculcate an heroic love of our country and readiness to sacrifice ourselves in its defence; or it may have been meant as a compliment to the Jews, by representing them to have had the honour of a share in pulling down the proud towers of Nineveh. Whatever may have been intended by what is told of Judith herself the substance of the book in other respects is undoubtedly true, as may be made to appear not only by the concurrence of the authors we have mentioned, but also by the time it was wrote in, which it is perfectly consistent with.

One of the greatest difficulties to be surmounted, in the vindicating of this Apocryphal book, is, that, throughout the whole, there is no mention made of a king in the land; whereupon Prideaux (14) observes, that if we could put this history so far back as the minority of Manasseh, it would be a most important point gained; for that then there would be reason enough not to mention the minor king; but only the chief minister and guardian of the kingdom in the transacting of the whole affair. To put this history so far back as he would have it, he confesses impossible, but we have proved, that if the years of the reign of Manasseh and his son Amon are right, and if Ptolemy's canon is to be depended on, this story may stand most naturally in the first years of Josiah, who was a minor of but eight years of age; so that, according to him, it is no wonder there is no mention made of so very young a king throughout this whole book of Judith. Those, who would know more of this, may consult the same learned author who has professedly treated on this subject (15), which is somewhat foreign to our design, and would besides draw us into too great a length.

† Vid. Jud. xiv. 10. xvi. ult.
(15) Ibid.

(14) Connect. of the Old and New Test. Book 1. Part. 1. p. 41. 8vo.

Sarac (Z), who committing his forces in Chaldea to Nabopallassar<sup>i</sup>, he rebelled against him, and seized on the kingdom of Babylon for himself (A), and in that kingdom therefore may be said to have been the immediate successor of Chyniladan, or Nabuchadonosor (B), as he stands in the canon of Ptolemy. The two revolted kingdoms of the Medes and Babylonians conspired together against the emperor at Niniveh, entered into alliances with each other, Nabopallassar particularly sending to Astyages the Mede, to demand his daughter Amyle, or Arote, in marriage for his son Nebuchadnezzar<sup>k</sup>, (C). The families, thus united, make war upon Sarac, who, dreading the calamities ready to befall him, waited not for the event, but burnt his palace, and himself<sup>l</sup>, and may, with greater probability, have been the Sardanapalus talked of by prophane historians (D). Thus fell the empire of Assyria, or in some such manner, (E).

<sup>i</sup> POLYHIST. apud SYNCCELL. Chron. p. 210.

<sup>k</sup> Idem, apud eand. ibid.

<sup>l</sup> Idem, ibid.

(Z) This name may have been contracted from Sarchodon, as this was from Afferbadon, Afferbadon-pul, or Sardanapalus (16). Here we seemingly see then whence we are to derive the two Sardanapalus's in profane authors (17), and particularly those in Suidas (18) distinguished, the one as a warrior, the other as an effeminate creature (19). The great Afferbadon (20) was the former, and this king, who according to our supposition must have been the second of the name, was the latter.

(A) This Nabopallassar was confessedly an Assyrian by his name, which must have been derived from Nebopul-assur, and sufficiently declares the nation he was of, but is further confirmed by Polyhistor (21), who calls him, upon what authority we cannot conceive, Sardanapalus. So that according to this there must have been two Sardanapalus's existing together, the one rising into prosperity, the other falling into the pit of adversity. From some such notion it must have been that we read also of another city of Niniveh, to which the unfortunate Sardanapalus went in his distress (22). But he was then actually blocked up in his capital, by the united force of the Medes and Babylonians, and this man, according to our historian (23), was the Babylonian that actually joined with the Medes to destroy Niniveh; so that there is no manner of congruity in the two facts as related. The apparent truth of this man's accession to the throne of Babylon seems to have been this; as he was confessedly an Assyrian, he may have laid claim to the throne of Babylon in right of succession, as of the younger branch of the Assyrians descended from the great Nabonassar, who seems to have had the kingdom of Babylon allotted to him by his father, or grandfather, Pul, the first Assyrian conqueror, while he left Assyria to his eldest son. He may, it is likely, have made this claim, and the seemingly unfortunate end of the reign of Chyniladan (24) may, upon the death of that emperor, and the unsettled state he must have left things in, have tempted him to seize on Babylon immediately for himself, and in his own right; which, it is probable, he had never dared to attempt before. Hence it must seemingly have been that we have no mention of Sarac, or whatever else he may have been called, in Ptolemy's canon.

(B) The note above makes this sufficiently appear, and what we have there already said seems to have been really the case. The Medes were at open war with the Assyrians (25), the rest of the nations were partly ready to shake off the yoke which had been re-imposed on them by Chyniladan (26), if they did not really shake it off upon the defeat of his army under Hobfernes (27); and partly in an actual state of independence, having shaken off the yoke even in the days of Afferbadon, and perhaps before (28); and this seizure on Babylon must have been such a blow to the Assyrian monarchy as it never after could recover; and when the two potent and enterprising kings of the Medes and of the Babylonians came to unite their forces together, it is no wonder the Assyrian, who was deserted on all hands, could not long withstand such a conjunction, and immediately began to dwindle till he became quite extinct, and afterwards obliterated.

(C) Here we see the new prince of Babylon making the most effectual court to the king of the Medes, and contracting the most intimate of alliances with him, for their mutual support. These two are then the Belshazzar and Arbaces of Ctesias (29) under different names; but more rationally employed towards the subversion of the Assyrian empire. We see them here contracting with each other as considerable princes, who could no longer brook subjection, rather than as two obscure revolters and conspirators, secretly combining together at Niniveh. It is to our purpose that Polyhistor (30) calls this Babylonian, Nabopallassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, or Nabuchadonosor, the first Babylonian monarch that makes his appearance in scripture, which so exactly agrees with it throughout the whole system of the Assyrian and Babylonian history, as there recorded, as to settle the rise of the Babylonian empire, and pretty nearly also the fall of the Assyrian, beyond any possibility of dispute. Nor can Ctesias's Belshazzar (31) have been any other than this Nabopallassar, and the rather as Polyhistor (32) says, he was no more than governor of Chaldea or Babylon, while he calls Astyages the Mede, his friend, the satrapa or lord of Media, and thereby makes the distinction of superiority between them which Ctesias asserts; so that, in the main, Ctesias may be said to agree with this author, and to have had his accounts imperfectly delivered to him, if he did not indeed make it his choice to imbelish this part of his Assyrian history, as well as the rest, with the glaring tinsel of romance.

(D) He dreaded perhaps the fury of such implacable enemies as these may have been, and particularly of Cyaxares, the son of Phraortes (33), who was determined to avenge the death of his father Phraortes (34), who must have been the same with the Astyages of Polyhistor (35), and the displaced of the Apurpala (36). Or perhaps the excess of his

page

(16) Sir Is. NEWT. Chron. of Anc. Kingd. amend. p. 293. See before in the notes, p. 895. (17) See before in the notes, p. 885, 886. (18) Ad vocem Σαρδανάπαλος. (19) See before in the notes, p. 887.

(20) See before, p. 895. (21) Apud SYNCCELL. Chronogr. p. 210. (22) See before in the notes, p. 287. (23) ALEXAND. POLYHIST. apud SYNCCELL. ubi sup. (24) See before, p. 901. (25) HERODOT. l. 1. c. 102. (26) See before, p. 900. (27) Ibid. 901. (28) See before in the notes, p. 895. (29) See before, p. 885. (30) Apud SYNCCELL. ubi sup. (31) See before, ubi sup. (32) Apud SYNCCELL. ubi sup. (33) HERODOT. l. 1. c. 102. (34) Idem, ibid. (35) Apud SYNCCELL. ubi sup. (36) JUDITH c. 1. ver. 5.

a (E) whilst the Medes and Babylonians triumphed over its ruins (F), pursuant to the prophets (G): . . . Wo to the Assyrian, the rod of mine anger . . . I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria, and the glory of his high looks. For he saith, By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom; for I am prudent: and I have removed the bounds of the people, and rebbed their treasures, and I have put down the inhabitants like a valiant man. And my hand hath found as a nest the riches of the people:

pride was such that he could not bear the thoughts of captivity or deprivation, but chose rather to undergo the most cruel of deaths, even that of burning himself. It is observed (37) to be very extraordinary, that so many have voluntarily undergone this most exquisite torment, when they had it in their choice to put an end to life so many other ways. In the case of those who have burned themselves merely to put an end to their days, without any sort of constraint, after the manner of the Indians, religion or superstition may be urged in their behalf, than which, nothing has a more powerful effect upon the minds and tempers of men. But in the case of Sardanapalus and others, who may have dreaded the severe confinement of a prison, or some more dreadful death, by the hand of a remorseless enemy; it is no such great wonder that they should take the most effectual way to destroy both themselves and every valuable thing they had, that the enemy might not quench the thirst of his rage with their blood, or enrich himself with their spoils. The motive to this, in those that have suffered it, may be ascribed to the highest sort of revenge; it being the only method they could take to disappoint the enemy, and make him, what he might call, a sufferer even by their destruction.

(E) We have made it our business in several preceding notes in this section, and in some at the latter end of the former, to shew that there are two Sardanapalus's in the profane writers, and that these two can have been no other than the great Afferbadon and this last king of Assyria (38), who may have been the second of the name, as the contraction of his name, which is all we have of it, seems to imply. The profane accounts, as we have seen, represent the one to have been a great and magnificent prince, and to have built even two cities in one day, as Tarsus and Anchiale, and to have died peaceably and quietly in his bed (39); the other a sluggard, who perished in the flames that consumed his palace, his servants, and his treasures (40). The former then must have been the great Afferbadon, or Sardan-pul, of scripture, and the latter must have been this obscure prince Sarac, Sarchedon, or Sardou-pul; for that the empire did not fall under the former is most evident, and that it fell under the latter is almost as plain, by the obscurity of what is related concerning him. For by Herodotus (41) it is clear, it had dwindled away apace after the death of the great Afferbadon, and languished greatly under the inactive reign of Sasoduchinus, who gave the turbulent Medes an opportunity of recollecting that strength that may have been impaired by the successes of his fortunate predecessor, who was certainly the greatest of all the Assyrian monarchs; inasmuch that Chyniladan, who succeeded Sasoduchinus, with all his resolution and valour had much ado to curb them (42); but he dying under some misfortune, as should seem by his history, and his successor Sarac perhaps proving to be an effeminate and slothful man, the Assyrian throne sunk still deeper than it had ever been, and those, who had professed obedience to it hitherto, began to desert it and to conspire against it. Whilst therefore it was under this threatening cloud, or, perhaps, just on the brink of utter ruin, it is no wonder we have no certain notice of what particularly befel it at its final dissolution; and the rather, as all these parts were at the same time disturbed by a violent irruption of the Sythians, who kept things in suspense, or rather in subjection to them during 28 years, during which time the Assyrians at Niniveh must have grown less and less considerable, or have been but gasping till the fatal blow was given. Hence it is that we know so little of Sarac, the last king of Niniveh, and the exact time of the fall of this empire.

(F) After this manner it certainly came to destruction, for besides what Ctesias (43) writes, and Polybistor (44), even Herodotus (45) intimates that it was subverted by the Medes and Babylonians; by saying, that the Medes conquered all Assyria, excepting a part of the province of Babylonia. Whereby he seems to understand, that the Babylonian was a dependant on the Mede, though he did not deserve the honour of being accounted his ally and confederate, as if the Mede would have been powerful enough of himself, without such assistance as the Babylonian could afford him. In this he tacitly agrees both with Ctesias and Polybistor; for the former represents the Babylonian rather as a client than an assistant to the Mede (46); and the latter tells us, the Babylonian had no sooner seized on his portion than he applied to the Mede for protection, and, to secure himself and dependants in his new possessions, sued to him for a marriage between the families (47); and that there was this difference of rank between them, may be pretty clearly understood by a prophecy in Isaiah, which we shall not fail to take notice of presently. Upon the whole, though Ctesias is to be condemned for having made a romance of the Assyrian affairs, and for the many inconsistencies and falsehoods he has interspersed throughout the whole, it is plain he must have had some true kind of information concerning the fall of this monarchy. We have already seen some passages in him parallel with others in the book of Judith, as forerunning the subversion of this empire (48); though he has misapplied his facts to Chyniladan, or Nabuchadonisor, the last king but one, instead of Sarac, or Sardanapalus, the last king of all.

(G) The exact time of this great event may perhaps be settled pretty nearly. If Chyniladan, or Nabuchadonisor, died in the sixth year of Josiah, as we have as good as proved (49), it must follow, that the same Josiah, being slain by Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, when there was a king of Assyria still in being (50), that kingdom continued many years after the death of Chyniladan; for Josiah reigned 31 years (51), the last of which may coincide with the fourth year of Nabopolassar, or Nebuchadnezzar, so that his father Nabopallassar, who immediately seized upon the kingdom of Babylon upon the decease of Chyniladan, or Nabuchadonisor, did not live to see the destruction of Niniveh, which may have

flood

(37) IS. CASAUB. in not. ad ATHEN. l. 12. c. 7. (38) See before in the notes, p. 901. (39) ATHEN. Deipn. l. 12. p. 529. (40) See before, p. 887. (41) l. 1. c. 102. (42) See before, p. 899. (43) Ibid. p. 887. (44) Apud SYNC. ubi sup. (45) Ubi sup. (46) See before, p. 885. (47) Apud SYNC. Chronogr. p. 210. (48) See before in the notes, p. 899. 900. (49) Ibid. (50) See before, p. 267. (51) Ibid. p. 841.

people: and as one gathereth eggs that are left, haze I gathered all the earth, and there was none that moved the wing, or opened the mouth, or peeped. Shall the ax boast itself against him that bewrith therewith? or shall the saw magnify itself against him that shaketh it? as if the rod should shake itself against them that lift it up, or as if the staff should lift up itself as if it were no wood. Therefore shall the Lord, the Lord of Hosts, send among his fat ones leanness, and under his glory he shall kindle a burning like the burning of a fire (H). And the light of Israel shall be for a fire, and his holy One for a flame: and it shall burn and devour his thorns and his briars in one day; and shall consume the glory of his forest, and of his fruitful field, both soul and body; and they shall be as when a standard-bearer fainteth. And the rest of the trees of his forest shall be few, that a child may write them<sup>m</sup>. . . . I will break the Assyrian in my land, and upon my mountains tread him under foot: then shall his yoke depart from off them, and his burden depart from off their shoulders<sup>n</sup>. . . . Through the voice of the Lord shall the Assyrian be beaten down which smote with a rod<sup>p</sup>. . . . Then shall the Assyrian fall with the sword, not of a mighty man; and the sword not of a mean man shall devour him (I): but he shall flee from the sword, and his young men shall be discomfited. And he shall pass over to his strong hold for fear (K), and his princes shall be afraid of the ensign, saith the Lord, whose fire is in Zion, and his furnace in Jerusalem<sup>p</sup>. . . . Behold, the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon, with fair branches, and a shadowing bround, and of an high stature, and his top was among the thick boughs. The waters made him great, the deep set him up on high with her rivers running round about his plants, and sent out her little rivers unto all the trees of the field. Therefore his height was exalted above all the trees of the field, and his boughs were multiplied, and his branches became long, because of the multitude of his waters, when he shot forth. All the fowls of heaven made their nests in his boughs, and under his branches did all the beasts of the field bring forth their young, and under his shadow dwelt all great nations. Thus was he fair in his greatness, in the length of his branches; for his root was by great waters. The cedars in the garden of God could not bide him: The fir-trees were not like his boughs, and the chestnut-trees were not like his branches; not any tree in the garden of God was like unto him in his beauty. I have made him fair by the multitude of his branches: so that all the trees of Eden, that were in the garden of God, envied him. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Because thou hast lifted up thyself in height, and he hath shot up his top among the thick boughs, and his heart is lifted up in his height; I have delivered him into the hand of the mighty one of the heathen: he shall surely deal with him, I have driven

<sup>m</sup> Isa. x. 5. ——— 20.

<sup>n</sup> Idem, xiv. 25.

<sup>p</sup> Idem, xxx. 31.

<sup>p</sup> Idem, xxvi. 8, 9.

flood some years after his death. Now that it came to pass, that Ninveh stood so long after the combination of the Medes and Babylonians against it, was owing to a stop put to their designs by an irruption of the Scythians (52), who can have been no other than the Bactrians mentioned before (53), to have come upon the Medes and Babylonians, while they were besieging that city. These Scythians held dominion over Asia, as it is called (54), for the space of 28 years; during which the confederates were so far from being able to act against the king of Assyria, that they must have been under considerable constraint and tribute, as well as the other kings and princes in these parts. The Scythians then were lords in these parts about six or seven years after the death of Nabopolassar, and the work of destroying the kingdom of Assyria could not be completed till the Scythians had been driven out of this part of Asia, which happened at the expiration of the term of 28 years, above-mentioned. They then proceeded against Ninveh, and destroyed it about the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim, king of Judah; but whether in the second, third, or fourth year of his reign, we shall leave the reader to determine; but it is certain, almost to a demonstration, that in one of those years Ninveh received its final overthrow.

(13) There may be those who may imagine these words to be predictive of the manner of Sardanapalus's death, as related by propiatic authors (55).

(1) These two, the one not a mighty man, the other not a mean man, seem plainly to allude to the mighty M.D., and the dependant Babylonian, as we have distinguished them a note or two above; so that this prophecy seems very naturally applicable to the two men that destroyed the kingdom of Assyria, as they are represented by the bulk of authors.

(K) We cannot help doing Ctesias the justice of observing, 'That this flight from the sword, this discomfiture of the young men, and this retreat to the strong hold for fear, seem exactly to quadrate with the circumstances he relates concerning the latter end of Sardanapalus (56). The flight for fear may allude to his flight when surprised in his camp (57); the discomfiture of his young men, to the slaughter of his army under Sabonarus (58); and his passing over to his strong hold, to his betaking himself to his city of Ninveh (59). We leave this matter to the reader's fancy or determination, and have taken notice of it chiefly to shew that it is not from any prejudice conceived particularly against Ctesias, that we have laboured so much against him, or because we are fond of erecting or sustaining an hypothesis; and that we should have been as ready to have followed him as any other, could we safely have done it. In a word, he meant no Assyrian monarchy but that in scripture, which was either strangely distorted for him, or he must have studiously and most unparadonably have disguised it himself.

(52) HERODOT. l. i. c. 103.

(53) p. 886.

(54) Vid HERODOT. ubi sup.

(55) See before, p.

887.

(56) See before, ibid.

(57) See before, p. 886.

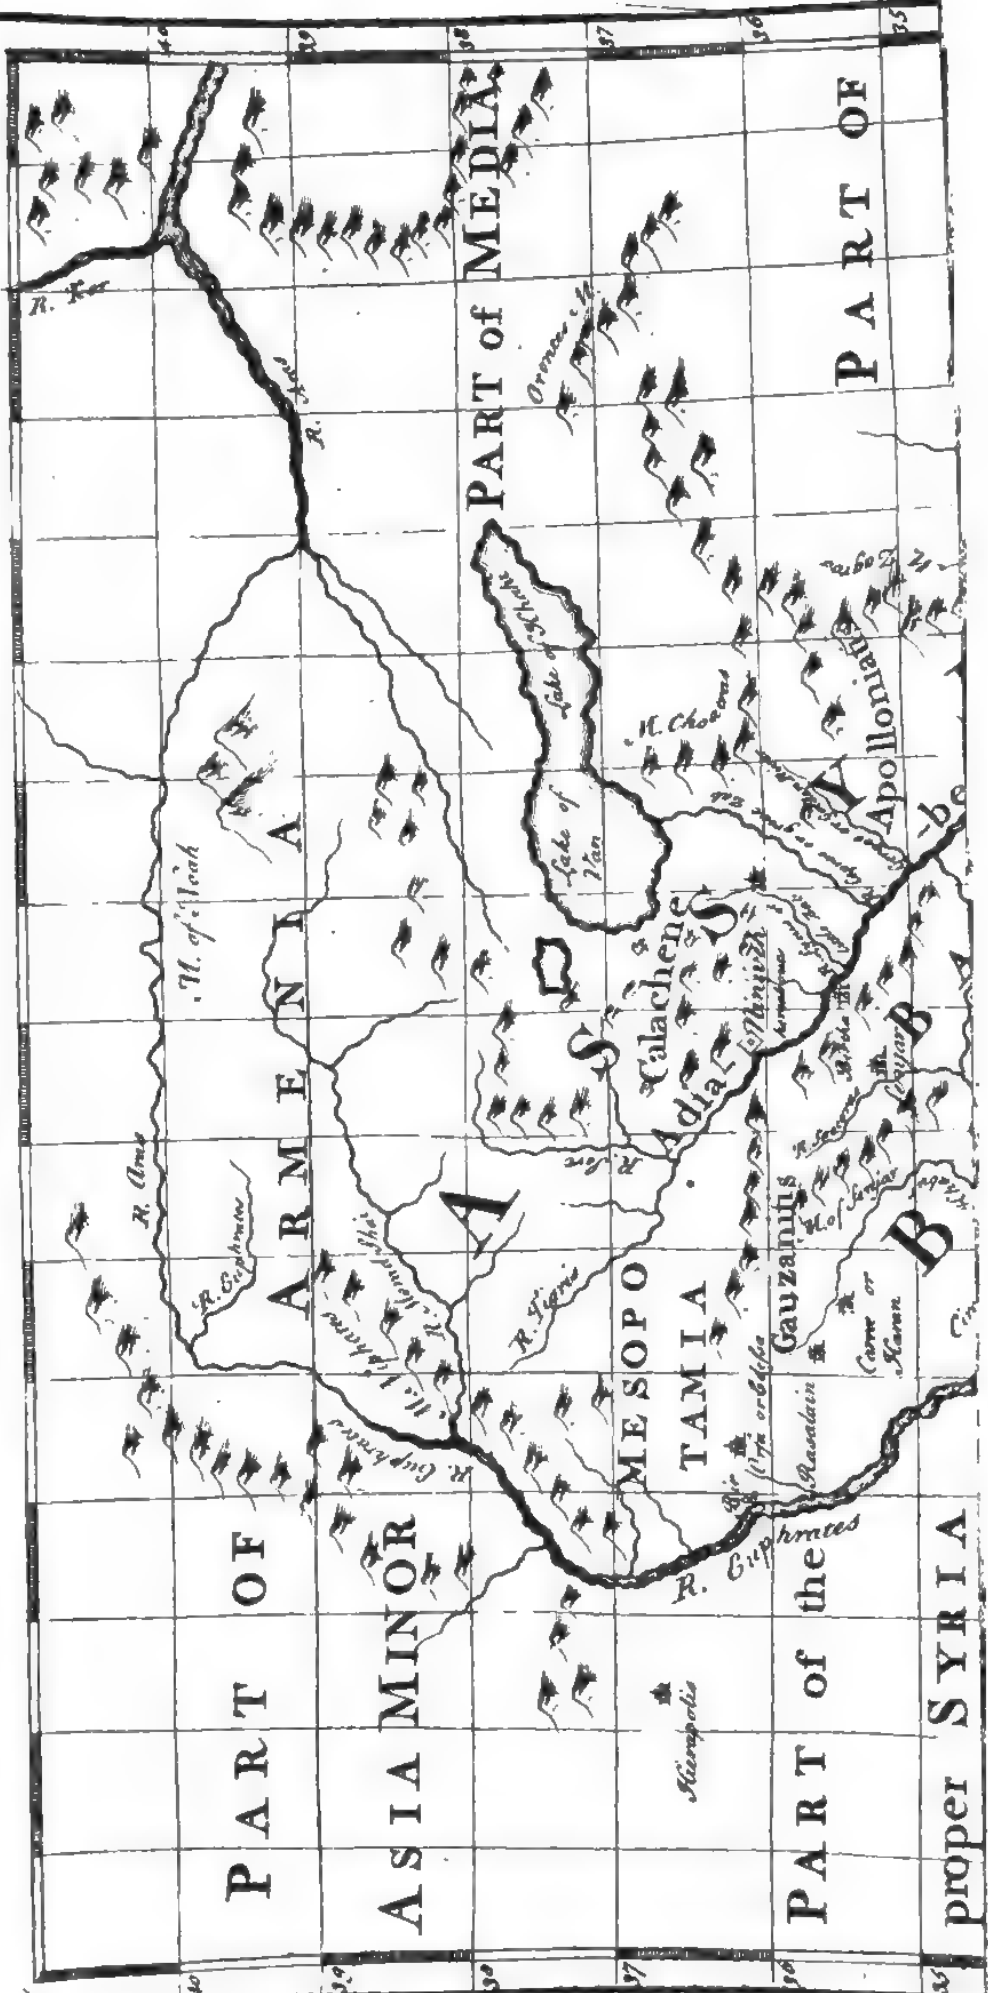

(58) Ibid.

(59) Ibid.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO LIBRARY
1100 EAST 58TH STREET
CHICAGO, ILL. 60637
U.S.A.

Plate 15 Vol. 1.

A MAP of ASSYRIA & BABYLONIA according to this History

- a driven him out for his wickedness. And strangers, the terrible of the nations, have cut him off, and have left him: upon the mountains and in all the vallies his branches are fallen, and his boughs are broken by all the rivers of the land, and all the people of the earth are gone down from his shadow, and have left him. Upon his ruin shall all the fowls of the heaven remain, and all the beasts of the field shall be upon his branches. To the end that none of all the trees by the waters exalt themselves for their height, neither shoot up their top among the thick boughs, neither their trees stand up in their height, all that drink water: for they are all delivered unto death, to the nether parts of the earth in the midst of the children of men, with them that go down to the pit. Thus saith the Lord God, In the day when he went down to the grave, I caused a mourning, I covered
- b the deep for him, and I restrained the floods thereof, and the great waters were stayed; and I caused Lebanon to mourn for him, and all the trees of the field fainted for him. I made the nations to shake at the sound of his fall; when I cast him down to hell with them that descend into the pit: and all the trees of Eden, the choice and best of Lebanon, all that drink water, shall be comforted in the nether parts of the earth. They also went down into hell with him unto them that be slain with the sword, and they that were his arm, that dwelt under his shadow in the beaten<sup>9</sup>. . . . Thy shepherds slumber, O king of Assyria, thy nobles shall dwell in the dust: thy people is scattered upon the mountains, and no man gathereth them. There is no healing of thy bruise: thy wound is grievous: all that hear the bruit of thee, shall clap the hands over thee; for upon whom
- c hath not thy wickedness past continually? Such was the great empire of Assyria, such her glory, as to be accounted, even by God himself, the first and supreme of nations, and such her fearful fall. Nor is all this meant of any other than the monarchy founded by Pul, who first began to afflict Israel and Judah, and the neighbouring nations; and whose successors were the first that attempted to extirpate the great nations on this side of the Euphrates, who extended their dominion over all lands, and who fell to nought in the person of Sarac Asserbaddon II. or Sardanapalus<sup>1</sup>; so that Assyria being expunged from the book of nations, and her records long since destroyed; falsehood has been invented and propagated to preserve her the honour which truth was not able to pay her, and concerning which we should have had
- d next to nothing of genuine to relate, but for the plain assistance of scripture and the inestimable concurrence of Ptolemy's Astronomical Canon.

C H A P. IX.

The History of the BABYLONIANS.

S E C T. I.

The Description of the Country of BABYLON, or CHALDEA.

- e WE have already made some considerable progress towards the geography of this kingdom, and particularly with regard to the times immediately succeeding the deluge<sup>1</sup>. Its most antient name was Senjâr, Sbinar, Sennaar, Singara, and the like<sup>2</sup>, but whether or no it extended to what has been since known more peculiarly for the dominions of Babylon, we have already declared<sup>3</sup> we know not; nor is it possible to raise it to any great degree of satisfaction, though there is some reason to think it did, because it is used to denote this whole kingdom when in the meridian of power<sup>4</sup>. Babylon is a name universally supposed to have been borrowed from that of the tower and city of Babel; and Chaldea from the Chaldeans or Chasdim<sup>5</sup>.
- f THESE two last names sometimes extend themselves over the whole territory, being indifferently taken for each other; but are sometimes limited to certain parts of

<sup>1</sup> Ezek. xxxi. 3, 17.<sup>2</sup> Nahum iii. 18, 19.<sup>3</sup> See before in the notes, p. 902.<sup>4</sup> See before, particularly in the notes, p. 123, 142.

<sup>5</sup> See before, p. 122, 142.<sup>6</sup> See before, in the places of the two foregoing citations.

<sup>7</sup> Dan. i. 2.<sup>8</sup> See before, p. 163.

of it, Babylon being used for the parts between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, and <sup>a</sup> the country more immediately in the neighbourhood of the city itself of Babylon; and Chaldea for the parts more immediately conterminous with Arabia, and stretching south-eastward to the shore of the Persian gulf. These two great names were also used in distinction of each other upon another account, which is foreign to our present purpose; and finally, they were both sometimes swallowed up by that of Assyria <sup>7</sup>.

Divisions.

By this means this kingdom came to be divided into two principal parts, together, it is likely, making up a considerable extent, and including a very great portion of Mesopotamia, and a good and valuable tract of what may be properly enough called Arabia; whence it may be distinguished into the Mesopotamian and the <sup>b</sup> Arabian.

Extent uncertain.

Situation and boundaries.

How far this country extended northward is past our determination, but for its limits westward, southward, and eastward, we cannot be very much at a loss, seeing it was to the eastward bounded by the Tigris, which divided it from Assyria; to the southward, by the conflux of the two rivers and the Persian gulf, and to the westward by the Desart Arabia; to the northward it must have been bounded by some part of Mesopotamia, but by what part of it we shall never be able to tell, till we know how far they incoached upon each other, and were considered as distinct countries. Hence it is sometimes a practice with geographers to treat of Babylonia and Mesopotamia at the same time, and once for all <sup>c</sup>, as being properly one and the same country.

This ample region may very naturally suit with the majesty of the Babylonian kings; but the name must certainly have prevailed, in ancient days, beyond its proper limits (L); and that it did not become even more universal, must have been owing to its being second to the Assyrian, which had rooted itself firmly over all the kingdoms about, and for which the Babylonians must have had too much veneration to attempt to change it, seeing it may have been by them deemed their greatest glory that they were of Assyrian origin themselves, as will be seen hereafter. But it is certain, that the proper Babylon, in later times, was confined to the very southernmost parts of Mesopotamia, which our maps sometimes represent as a peninsula, or rather, as it is, a cluster of islands; this small territory, together with the proper Chaldea already mentioned, is now described for this country, which, in ancient days, obtained as far to the northward, as should seem, as Senjâr <sup>d</sup> at least.

Climate and fertility.

This country, lying within the fifth north climate, enjoys an air very temperate and wholesome for the most part, though at certain seasons of the year no air can be

<sup>7</sup> STRABO, l. 16. p. 736. HERODOT. &c. &c. &c. c. 16. p. 451.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. CELLAR. Notit. Orb. Antiq. Vol. II.

(L) The limits of the Babylonian empire were much the same with those of the Assyrian empire after the revolt of the Medes, and hence the Babylonian name was almost as widely extended as the Assyrian, and indeed they are frequently used the one for the other, though this latter seems the most generally to have had the ascendant and pre-eminence, as being prior, and, in some respects, superior to the former. "Herodotus saith, That Nebuchadnezzar held Egypt, Syria, Phœnicia, and Arabia; and Strabo adds Arbela to the territories of Babylon; and tells us, that Babylon was antiently the metropolis of Assyria. He thus describes the limits of the Assyrian empire, [or more properly the Babylonian]. Contiguous, saith he, [l. 16.] to Persia and Susiana are the Assyrians; for so they call Babylonia, and the greatest part of the region about it; part of which is Atturia, ubersin Ninus, [or Niniveh] and Appolloniatis, and the Elymans, and the Paratace, and Chalonitis by the mountain Zagrus, and the fields near Ninus, and Dolomene, and Chalachene, and Chazene, and Adiabene, and the nations of Mesopotamia near the Gordyzans, and the Mygdones about Nisibis, unto Zeugma upon Euphrates; and a large region on this side the Euphrates, inhabited by the Arabians and Syrians, properly so called, as far as Cilicia and Phœnicia and Libya, and the sea of Egypt, and the Sinus Ificus:" And a little after, describing the extent of the Babylonian region, he "bounds it on the north, with the Armenians and Medes, unto the mountain Zagrus; on the east side, with Susa, and Elymais and Paratacene, inclusively; on the south with the Persian gulf, and Chaldea; and on the west, with the Arabes Scenite as far as Adiabene and Gordyene:" Afterwards, speaking of Susiana and Sittacene, a region between Babylon and Susa, and of Paratacene and Cossea, and Elymais, and of the Sagapeni and Sihceni, two little adjoining provinces; he concludes, [l. 16. p. 745.] "And these are the nations which inhabit Babylonia eastward: to the north are Media and Armenia, exclusively, and westward are Adiabene and Mesopotamia, inclusively: the greatest part of Adiabene is plain, the same being part of Babylonia: in some places it borders on Armenia; for the Medes, Armenians, and Babylonians warred frequently on one another (60)." We here see Assyria and Babylonia most remarkably confounded together, not only as the same empire, but as the same country.

(60) Sir Is. NEWT. Chron. of Anc. Kingd. amend. p. 324, 325.

a be possibly more dangerous to breathe in. The heats are so extraordinary here that the richer sort were used to sleep in tubs and cisterns of water *, nor could bear to live without this pernicious practice, which still continues, as every body that has been in these parts very well knows; and at certain seasons they are commonly plagued with dreadful pestilential wind, much talked of by modern travellers, and which we shall be more particular about in the geography of Persia. It seldom or never rains here for certain months of the year; so that the inhabitants in the northernmost parts of this country, and generally all over it, are at great labour and trouble in watering their lands, when the convenience of waters will allow them to do it; and especially along the banks of the Euphrates, where their engines and b wheels are so frequent, as sometimes to hurt the navigation of the river†. This drought continues commonly eight months of the year‡; nay, it has been sometimes known not to have rained here for two years and a half together, and the inhabitants, reckon that, if it does but rain twice or thrice in the year, it is enough for their purpose§: this is remarked by Herodotus¶, who says, that in the land of the Assyrians it seldom rained; and that though the country was quite like Egypt, its fertility was not caused by the inundations of the river, as in that country, but by the painful labour of the inhabitants, who either actually watered it by hand, or dug trenches, and other conveyances of that kind, for the refreshment and fecundation of this country, though, however, the same sort of labour is necessary even in Egypt‡. The c soil being rich, the climate in general excellent, and the industry of the inhabitants what it ought to be, this country for fertility used to vie with any other spot on the face of the earth. We have seen it compared to Egypt, as above, and the southernmost parts of it between the rivers may be particularly compared with the Delta of that country, it being, like that, made up of endless islands, some formed by nature, and some formed by art, and is besides almost under the same parallel of latitude. Nor is the other part of it, Chaldea properly so called, between the Euphrates and the mountains of Babylon, as they are commonly termed, much less watered by rivers and canals conducted from the Euphrates, and large reservoirs or lakes seemingly borrowed from the same river. And hence it is that * Herodotus
 d compares this country with Egypt, and hence, together with the excellence of its soil, it was so fruitful, that the same venerable author † imagines it impossible any one should believe what he could say about it, that had not, like himself, been an eye-witness of the same; though he ventures to assert, that, for the plenty of its productions, it was reckoned to be a third part of Asia, that is, of the Persian empire, and that, when it exceeded even itself, it would yield 300 fold, but 200 most commonly.

BEING a country of such plenty of waters, and being for the most part low and flat, it may chiefly, of trees, have abounded with the willow, whence it came to be called The Valley of Willows, as Prideaux * among others, after Bochart, rightly enough e renders the text †. The palm also flourished naturally all over this land, and chiefly that of the date kind, as we understand our author ‡, which afforded them, as he expresses himself §, meat, and wine, and honey, though the vine, the olive, and the fig were what this otherwise happy country could not boast of ¶, no more than her sister Egypt. But for grain it exceeded every other land; the millet and the sesame shot up here to the size of trees, and the leaves of the barley and wheat were usually four good fingers broad †. The sesame afforded them oil instead of the olive, and the palm afforded them wine instead of the grape ‡. In short, for vegetable productions it may be justly compared with Egypt; and to dwell on them would be little better than repeating what we have already said about that country *.

f ALL this fertility must have been greatly owing to the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, which were wont in the months of June, July and August, to overflow Rivers, canals, &c. their banks, and lay this country under water; the snow in those months melting away in great quantities from the mountains of Armenia. But, this being found detrimental and destructive to the inhabitants, these inundations were guarded against by numbers of artificial rivers and canals, whereby the waters were distributed and abated, * PLUTAR. Sympos. l. 3. p. 640. † See LEON. RAUWOLF'S Travels into the Eastern Country, part 2. c. 6. p. 160. ‡ Vid. PURCH. Pilgr. vol. 1. c. 12. p. 62. § RAUWOLF ubi sup. p. 152.

¶ I. 1. c. 193. Vid. & STRAB. l. 15. p. 692. * See before, p. 179. † Ubi sup.

‡ Ibidem. § Connect. of the Hist. of the Old and New Test. part 1. book 2. p. 105. in 8vo.

¶ ISAI. xv. 7. compar'd with Ps. cxxxvii. 2. † HERODOT. ubi sup. ‡ Ibid. § Ibid. ¶ Ibid.

* Idem ibid. † See before, p. 182.

abated, the country in general benefited, and an easy communication effected between the inhabitants. Some of these canals were so large as to be navigable in the winter months<sup>p</sup>, but the chief of them all seems to have been the Nabar-Maleka, or Royal River<sup>q</sup>. Concerning this, and the rest of its kind, we must always be a good deal in the dark; for till of late years we have known next to nothing of the face of this country, from the experience of our own travellers, or the assistance of the eastern geographers, without which it is next to impossible to fix any thing certain about it in the ancient western geographers. Nor have we as yet, it is to be feared, sufficient instructions with regard to the particulars of this intricate country, which can never be properly delineated but by an actual and accurate survey, which is what we have no ground so much as to hope for. We shall therefore only observe, that the Nabar-Maleka, which, as it is represented by the antients, must have been a vast work, is not now easily distinguishable from the other branches and canals of this country. There is some difficulty to make the ancient geographers, in this particular, consistent with the best of our present maps, nor are the same geographers in this case very consistent with themselves; so that in a point of this obscurity we shall be as brief as possible, despairing, with all the lights and assistances we have, to be able to fix this Royal River quite to the satisfaction either of the reader or of ourselves. The Nabar-Maleka is then by some<sup>r</sup> supposed to have been the same with the river of Cútba, now called Couti, or Cúti, which seems to have been an artificial branch conducted from the Euphrates into the inland of Arabia, where it falls into some lakes or waters, called the lake of Rabema, or Al Bateyeh, in De Lisle's maps, and must have been, together with some overflowed lands farther eastward in the proper Chaldea, the Paludes Babylonice of the antients. This river is said to have been dug by Cútba, or Cush, king of Babel, but it is more usually by the oriental writers attributed to his son Nimrod<sup>s</sup>. This Nabar-Maleka is called a branch of the Euphrates, and is said to have emptied itself into the lakes, and upon the overflowed lands, to have divided the country, and to have washed the towns of Irúk, and is said to have been the same called the river Súd, the river of the Black Country, or of the Black Towns<sup>t</sup>. By this it should have been no more than a branch of the Euphrates, by labour and art conducted into the inland of Arabia. The river of Nebardea, or River of Knowledge (supposed to be the same with the Naarda of Ptolemy, and to have run not above 20 miles above Sora, or at least the city itself of Nebardea, once a famous university belonging to the Jews) is said to have been no farther distant from Sora, and to have been seated on the eastern banks of the Euphrates, and to have been many miles above the place from whence the Royal River, or Nabar-Maleka, was derived on the opposite shore, by which it is to be concluded that it ran westward or southward of the Euphrates, and consequently that it could not possibly have had any communication with the Tigris, whereas by all the antients we understand that it was a very large canal, navigable by ships, between the Tigris and Euphrates, and that it was cut for that very purpose. It seems very plain from Ptolemy, that it did not only communicate with the two rivers, but also discharged itself into the above-mentioned Paludes, or standing waters and overflowed grounds; and moreover that it was derived more properly from the Tigris, that it washed the walls of Babylon, or at least ran not very far from that city, and that thence, mixing with the Euphrates, the canal was immediately continued away to the Paludes. It is not to be doubted but that this Nabar-Maleka was contrived more particularly for the great city of Babylon, that so it might have the immediate advantage of both the great rivers at once; and accordingly we have in De Lisle's maps a cut or canal represented from the Tigris to the Euphrates, just by what are now called the ruins of Babylon; and exactly in a line with the river of Cútba, or Cúti, as it is now called and represented, which continues itself to the waters in the inland of Arabia; and thus we seem to have the true situation and extent of this river, which must certainly have been the same, and the rather as it is to this day called Al-Malek, the King, or Royal. It is in the same maps represented as imperfect, and as not reaching quite to the Euphrates, and therefore, as much as it may have been formerly considered as a branch of the Euphrates, it is now most properly a branch of the Tigris. It appears then

<sup>p</sup> HERODOT. ubi supr.<sup>q</sup> See before, p. 57<sup>r</sup> AL TABARI in c1p. de Morte Sarz.<sup>s</sup> Idem ibid.<sup>t</sup> Vid. HYDR. & HIST. Relig. Vet. Per'ar. p. 40.

- a then that it is partly choaked up, as it was in the days of Trajan <sup>a</sup>, who restored it to its pristine state, after it had been for many ages dug by the great Nebuchadnezzar <sup>b</sup>. Thus, by comparing of Ptolemy with the best of our modern geographers, it seems that we have in general marked out the canal of the Nabar Mulka, which may at first have included no more than the cut between the two rivers, though it came afterwards to be nominally extended to the inclusion of the river of Cūba, which in all probability was a distinct work. At some distance to the westward of the Nabar Mulka was another river, corruptedly in Ptolemy called the Maar-fares, for the Naarfares, or the Nabar Sare, the Stinking River; this also he derives from the Tigris, and continues to the Paludes; but our best maps have no sign of such
- b a river or canal at present in these parts; nor can we thereby fix the place of the Nehardea or Naarda of Ptolemy above, which, though he mentions it as a town only, must by its name have been a river also, and, as we are told, to the westward of the Nabar Sare <sup>c</sup>. It may be labour in vain to attempt to trace out these and the other numerous branches and canals which watered the antient country of Babylon, though by the best helps we have. Many of them, that have been formerly considerable, may be now no more, and others may have been formed since, that were not in antient days; for a country so prodigiously watered, so low withal, and so subject to the violence of extraordinary inundations from two such great rivers as the Tigris and Euphrates, and so neglected as it must for ages past have been, may
- c be fairly concluded to have changed face considerably, and frequently since the time Ptolemy flourished; and it must be next to impossible to delineate the exact face of this country, when it was the seat of empire, or when it had strength and riches sufficient to take care of its numerous banks, and to keep them in repair.

THE Euphrates, thus branched out and divided, may now claim to be considered separately. The name of this river we have already spoken to <sup>d</sup>, and have now to add, that it takes its rise from the mountains of Armenia, and that it continues its course southward, washing the eastern skirts of Syria, and south eastward dividing Arabia from Mesopotamia, till, mixing with its fellow-traveller the Tigris, it falls at length into the Persian gulf. This considerable river is slow, for the most part, in d its course <sup>e</sup>, and not very well adapted throughout for navigation, because of some parts of it which are shoal, and some parts of it that are rocky. We are told it is not navigable, for the larger sort of barks, any lower from Bir or Beer in Mesopotamia, than a place called Roufvaine <sup>f</sup>, which should be the Rasaine in some of De Lisle's maps, but that the smaller craft may go down quite to Bassora; for beyond this Roufvaine it seems there are rocks which are dangerous for the larger vessels <sup>g</sup>. However our author seems here to be doubly mistaken, for Roufvaine or Rasaine is an inland place, at a distance from the banks of this river; and a judicious traveller <sup>h</sup> who actually went down this river, and seems to have had as great a sense of the dangers of his voyage as any man could well have, makes no mention of rocks

e in this river till he comes down a great way below, to a place he calls Deer <sup>i</sup>, and which is considerably beyond Racka, or Racca, where they were obliged to use the skill and assistance of pilots <sup>j</sup>. At Bir in Mesopotamia, which was the common place of embarkation from the western parts, this river is compared to the Thames at London, but was then observed to have been considerably fallen <sup>k</sup>; and indeed the breadth of this river must be very uncertain, and, as the case usually is, depend upon the seasons and the weather. In many places it divides itself into several shallow branches, and forms several islands <sup>l</sup>; in some parts it is broad and shallow, in others, wide and deep, like a little sea <sup>m</sup>, and, upon the whole, is not near so convenient as the Tigris <sup>n</sup>. Though the Euphrates is, as we f observed above, moderate in its course, its water is so continually foul, that there is no drinking it till it has settled for a time, or been passed through a cloth or a strainer <sup>o</sup>; though, when in proper order, it is justly preferred to any in these parts, and said to be lighter than any other, whence the river is known, with the neighbouring neighbouring people, by a name which signifies the water of desire<sup>1</sup>. The fish of <sup>a</sup> this river is also reported to be excellent in kind, and particular notice is taken of one somewhat like a carp, which sometimes weighs 17 or 18 pounds<sup>m</sup>, which is all that may be necessary to say on this subject.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. AMM. MARCEL. p. 498. <sup>b</sup> MEGASTHEN. EX ABYDEN. apud EUSEB. PRÆPAR. EVANG. l. 9. c. 41. p. 456. <sup>c</sup> Vid. HYDE ubi supr. p. 71. <sup>d</sup> See before, p. 57. <sup>e</sup> RAUWOLF ubi supr. part. 2. c. 1. p. 126. <sup>f</sup> THEVENOT. Voy. au Lev. part 1. c. 9. p. 46. <sup>g</sup> THEVENOT. ibid. <sup>h</sup> RAUWOLF. <sup>i</sup> Idem ibid. p. 152. <sup>j</sup> Ibid. <sup>k</sup> MAUND. Jour. from Alepp. to the river Euphrat. p. 3. See also THEVENOT. ubi supr. <sup>l</sup> RAUWOLF ubi supr. p. 126. <sup>m</sup> Idem ibid. & p. 162. <sup>n</sup> Idem ibid. & THEVENOT. ubi supr. <sup>o</sup> RAUWOLF ubi supr. p. 126.

THE antient way of navigating this river has something very singular and extraordinary in it. The vessels they used were round, without distinction of head or stern, and were no better than great wicker baskets coated over with hides, which they guided along with two oars, or paddles. These vessels were of different sizes, and would some of them carry a burthen of palm wine, or other merchandise, to the weight of 5000 talents, and, according to their size, had live asses on board of them. Having thus fallen down the river to Babylon, and unloaded their <sup>b</sup> cargoe, they stripped off their hides, and filling the rest of their vessel, with the straw and whatever else might have served them for the convenience of stowage, and putting their hides upon the back of their asses, they returned by land to the place whence they came, where they wrought up another frame, or basket, to repeat their voyage; it being impossible for them to stem the stream up again by water<sup>n</sup>.

Natural and artificial rarities.

THIS country is more than ordinarily remarkable for the seat of Paradise, which is most rationally supposed to have been partly, if not all, within the limits of it<sup>o</sup>; as also for the great plain of Shinar, now Senjar, where the whole race of mankind were gathered together in one body after the flood, and whence they dispersed them-<sup>c</sup> selves over the face of the earth<sup>p</sup>. The bitumen of this country we have already<sup>q</sup> spoken of at large, as well as of the place where it more remarkably abounded<sup>r</sup>. The ruins of Babylon, and what remains of the tower, as supposed, of Babel, might here claim a place, had not a more proper one occurred in the former part of this work<sup>s</sup>.

SECT. II.

The Antiquity, Government, Laws, Religion, Customs, Arts, Learning, and Trade of the Babylonians.

Antiquity.

Babel is the first kingdom we find erected in scripture, and claims an origin<sup>d</sup> prior to that of Assur, though according to the common course of history it must appear after it. Nimrod was the founder of it<sup>t</sup>, but for many ages it enlarged not its bounds, and evidently appears to have remained a petty royalty, till the Assyrians paved the way to the empire it attained to. Or on the other hand, if it be granted that even under Nimrod himself it attained a height of power, nothing seems more natural than to conclude that it in time fell down to a level with its neighbours, and even below some of them, and particularly the famous and antient kingdom of Elam, or Persia; for so early as the days of Abraham we meet with a king of Shinar, the antient Babylon, in the army of Chedorlaomer king of Elam<sup>u</sup>, as a vassal, seemingly, and a tributary. The arguments we have formerly used,<sup>e</sup> to destroy the boasted antiquity of Alyria<sup>w</sup>, may be exhibited here to destroy that of this empire; but not to repeat what we have so fully urged, and which must of course affect this empire, as it confessedly rose upon the ruins of the former; we would only take notice, that scripture knows nothing of any king of Babylon from the king of Shinar above in the army of Elam, till the days of Berodach Baladan, who was cotemporary with Hazekiah<sup>x</sup>; as also that by the several histories of the nations that precede in this work, it is plain that, no Babylonian scepter awed any one of them, till many years after the said Berodach Baladan. So that though we confess this to have been the most antient kingdom of the world, we deny it to have reached the imperial dignity till what we may call very lately, in comparison<sup>f</sup> of what has been vainly boasted, and unwarily believed.

THE Babylonians, or Chaldeans, however, laid claim to a most enormous antiquity, unwilling to be behind-hand with the Egyptians, or any nation else, pretending to have registred the transactions of 150,000 years<sup>y</sup>, according to some,

or

<sup>1</sup> THEVENOT. ubi supr.

<sup>2</sup> See before, p. 141, 156.

<sup>3</sup> See before, p. 165.

<sup>4</sup> 2 KING. XX. 12.

<sup>m</sup> RAUWOLF ubi supr.

<sup>n</sup> See before in the notes, p. 144.

<sup>o</sup> GENES. XIV. 9.

<sup>p</sup> Vid. SYNCHELL. Chronogr.

<sup>q</sup> HERODOT. I. 1. c. 194.

<sup>r</sup> Ibid.

<sup>s</sup> See before, p. 145, 146.

<sup>t</sup> See before in the preceding chapter passim.

a or 473,000 years, according to others *, reckoning from the time they first began to observe the stars down to the time of Alexander the Great, a most monstrous fable, which needs no refutation, though it may deserve some animadversion (M).

THE government of this nation, if the character which generally prevails concerning its founder Nimrod † may be relied on, was in its very infancy tyrannical and despotic; but that it continued so is not to be supposed, except at the same time it be conceived that first prince was succeeded by kings exactly of his own sort. After him it certainly became on a foot with the petty kingdoms of these parts, till the Assyrians, in process of time, laid the foundation whereon it afterwards exalted itself as the Queen of the East. And as from the former it derived its lustre and majesty, nothing is more likely, or indeed more certain, than that it adhered to the maxims and practices of its founder; and the rather, as these Babylonians themselves were Assyrians, descended from Pul the great Assyrian, who immediately gave rise to both the empires, as will be amply made to appear in the sequel. The government therefore of Babylon, like that of Alyria ‡, was haughty and despotic, and the scepter, as should seem, hereditary. The whole centered in the person of the king, all decrees issued from his mouth †; and how could it be less, when he affected even deity and divine worship, as the custom was with these princes? And here, by the way, it may be observed, that this political, not to say * Diodor. Sicul. Bibl. Hist. l. 2. p. 81.

 † See DAN. iii. 29. iv. 6.

‡ See before, p. 172.

§ See before, p. 860.

(M) This extravagant and senseless desire of several nations to be the antient, has not only been in good part the destruction of history, but has, to all appearance, also been considerably hurtful to religion. Vanity, as we have shewn (61), first introduced the forging of record to supply the want of truth: and as antiquity was thought the best method of distinction of a people, when nations, as the Babylonians,  Egyptians, or others, came to be great and powerful, and to remark how mean a figure their predecessors made, in comparison, but a few years before, if they had any certain tradition about it, and that they had cannot very well be doubted; and to perceive that perhaps some other nation set a great value upon themselves for their antiquity, they were ashamed of their deficiencies, scorned in any degree to be inferior to any other nation under the sun, and so not only ran up their antiquities they knew not whither, but removed some of their eminent princes, who had lived as yesterday, into ages far beyond the day of creation, and made gods of them; in their glory exalting themselves above their fellows, and claiming a right of superiority over them, which perhaps could never have been accounted for but by this method. We have in great measure given a glaring instance of this in the latter Syrians, who, as Josephus observes of them, celebrated the memory of their kings, Hadad and Huzael, in his time, and, carrying their statues about in procession, vaunted their great antiquity, though they had not been dead above 1100 years; but by this they certainly meant no more than to set off the gods of their own country; for though they were strangers in Syria at first, and introduced to supply the place of the natives, who were carried away captive, they had then been in the country many ages, and reckoned themselves as the original proprietors; just like the High at this day, who, though really descended from colonies of English and Irish, and not very antient ones neither, disown both their name, and glory in what they find peculiar to that kingdom, true or false; and thus these latter Syrians, though they had no manner of relation to the antient kings of their country, meant by this vaunting of their gods, Hadad and Huzael, to reflect a dishonour upon the Assyrians and Babylonians, whose gods they knew by tradition or history to have been younger; and hence you have Hadad, the first of gods (62).

If the want of regular history was not in some measure the support of idolatry, which it certainly must have been, it was doubtless what gave birth to the notion of the world's being eternal. Philosophers, at a loss for the origin of things, and destitute of a guide to direct them thereto, presently grounded themselves upon false principles, and thence proceeded to subtilise themselves into errors without end, and fancies infinitely absurd, which were soon propagated among the studious men in all branches of literature; so that historians and antiquaries, thinking there was room enough to range in, and some of them being more greedy of it than others, though they were all desirous of it, you have by this means the disorder and disagreement among antient authors never to be reconciled to one another, either with respect to affairs at home or abroad. Upon the whole, hence it is you have the variety of accounts given in by nations, one endeavouring to exceed another, as they have been partly collected (63) to our hands, and as they here follow:

	Years.
Zoroaster lived before Plato's death	6000
Before the Trojan war	5000
Chaldees had accounts of	470000
From the first Chaldean astronomer to Alexander	43000
Sais in Egypt had chronicles of	8000
Athens built before Sais	1000
From Vulkan to Alexander	48863
Kings of Egypt before Amasis , reigned	13000
From Osiris to Alexander	10000
	or 13000
Men reigned in Egypt after the gods	15000

(61) See before, p. 862. (62) See before in the notes, p. 399. (63) LUDOV. VIV. in not. ad August. de Civit. Dei xii. 10. See the Appendix to WHISTON's Essay towards restoring the true text of scripture, p. 233.

say blasphemous, arrogance, was but natural to men who had such wide and unwarrantable views of lording it over the whole bulk of mankind. It was one of the most effectual means they could think of, to intimidate the nations who had not yet owned their power, and to restrain those who did, from asserting their right to be governed by whom and in what manner they pleased. For, without some such bridle upon the superstitious minds of men, it had been next to impossible to maintain dominion over parts far remote from the seat of the imperial residence; and no doubt the argument they used of having prevailed against all the gods of the nations, and of being mightier far than they<sup>c</sup>, carried a conviction with it, which not only served all purposes for the present, but for the future also. And hence it must have been, or upon some such politic views, that great conquerors, b especially those of the east, have always affected retirement from the immediate commerce of others, as too glorious to be beheld by vulgar eyes; a kind of arrogance which implies a superiority not much inferior to what was claimed by these first monarchs of the Assyrian race, as well on the throne of Niniveh, as on that of Babylon; and is, as we have said, one of the most effectual means of keeping in subjection a number of nations of different languages, complexions, and manners, to a man who must be a stranger to almost all of them. These proud potentates committed the care of their government to officers of several sorts, civil and military, and accordingly we find them divided into three classes, and supposed to be chosen from among the gravest and most noble personages in all the empire<sup>d</sup>; the first had the charge of virgins, and their disposal in marriage, and were to judge in matters of adultery, and the like; the second took cognizance of thefts, and the third of the rest<sup>e</sup>. We find the subordinate powers under this mighty emperor divided into princes, governors, captains, judges, treasurers, counsellors, and sheriffs<sup>f</sup>, so that it is plain nothing was wanting to keep peace and good order in the empire, and that the civil and military oeconomy was under strict regulations; as for what relates to religion and superstitious matters, that will fall under another head.

His officers, civil and military.

His household.

THIS great King of Kings<sup>g</sup> had a household equal to the sublimity of his station; the chief officers of which seem to have been the captain of his guard<sup>h</sup>, the prince of his eunuchs<sup>i</sup>, and the prime minister<sup>k</sup>, in the nature of the Turkish vizier, who more immediately represented the person of his great master. The first of these had the execution of his arbitrary and sanguinary commands<sup>l</sup>; the second had charge of the education and subsistence of the youth of the palace<sup>m</sup>; and the latter sat in the king's gate, as it is called<sup>n</sup>, to hear complaints, and to administer justice. Besides these, there seems to have been a master of the magicians always at hand<sup>o</sup> to satisfy the king upon any thing he might want to know, with regard to futurity and prognostication. None were allowed the honour of serving in his presence that was not remarkable for beauty of person<sup>p</sup>, and excellence of parts (N); and his wives and concubines, which were, doubtless, the most exquisite of their sex, seem to have been in very great number<sup>q</sup>.

BUT though these kings seem to have claimed such high honour, and to have placed themselves at such a distance from the greatest even of their officers and subjects, and in short to have considered the whole world as created for their use and service, and to have consulted nothing but their own glory and majesty; yet

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 893. <sup>b</sup> STRAB. l. 16. p. 745. <sup>c</sup> Vid. eund. ibid. <sup>d</sup> DAN. iii. 2, 3.
<sup>e</sup> DAN. ii. 37. <sup>f</sup> Idem, ibid. ver. 14. <sup>g</sup> Idem, i. 20. <sup>h</sup> Idem, ii. 48, 49. <sup>i</sup> Idem, ibid. 14. <sup>j</sup> Idem, i. 7, 8, 9, 10, &c. <sup>k</sup> Idem, ii. 49. <sup>l</sup> Idem, iv. 9. <sup>m</sup> Idem, i. 4, 10, 20. <sup>n</sup> Idem, v. 2, 3.

(N) This has always been the custom in the eastern countries, and at this day, "The youths that are designed for the great offices of the empire, [in Turkey] . . . must be of admirable features, and pleasing looks, well shaped in their bodies, and without any defect of nature; for it is conceived that a corrupt and sordid soul can scarce inhabit in a serene and ingenious aspect; and I have observed, not only in the seraglio, but also in the courts of great men, their personal attendants have been of comely lusty youths, well habited, deporting themselves with singular modesty and respect in the presence of their master. So "that when a pasha, aga, or spahie travels, he is always attended with a comely equipage, followed by flourishing youths, well clothed and mounted, in great numbers, that one may guess at the greatness of this empire, by the retinue, pomp, and number of servants which accompany persons of quality in their journeys; whereas in the parts of Christendom where I have travelled, I have not observed (no not in attendance of princes) such ostentation in servants as is amongst the Turks, which is the life and ornament of a court (64).

(64) Sir PAUL RICAUT's Pref. State of the Ottoman Empire, c. 5. p. 46.

a yet we understand that they would sometimes deign to banquet and revel with their lords and chief men of their dominions, of whom we read that a thousand of them were at one time entertained by Belshazzar *. The common stile of accosting this mighty sovereign was, O king, live for ever †; and the man, who was so happy as in a particular manner to gain his favour, was clothed in purple or scarlet, adorned with a chain of gold about his neck, and invested with some high place in the government ‡.

THE laws of this empire, as we have hinted above, must have been quite vague Laws; and uncertain; yet there was one which seems to have been irrevocably fixed, and to have been very politically contrived to keep up and increase the number of the inhabitants, it being calculated in such manner, that it was almost impossible for b any man to live single, and designed particularly to encourage the poorer sort to engage themselves in wedlock, which is generally a great burden to them the world over. By this law no man had it in his power to bestow his own daughters in marriage §, but they were to be disposed of by the king or his officers, in the manner we shall relate hereafter.

As the laws were vague and changeable, the punishments seem also to have been Punishments; unfixed, and to have been arbitrary and rigorous to the utmost, and such as might best suit with the degree of rage, which for the time happened to agitate the tyrant's breast. Beheading ¶, and cutting to pieces **, and turning the criminal's house into a dunghill †, and burning in a fiery furnace ‡, are punishments we understand to c have been executed by the order of the kings of Babylon.

THE religion and boasted learning of the Babylonians are so blended together, Their religion; that we hardly know how to separate them into distinct heads; for the Chaldees, Chaldees their properly so called, were not only their priests, but also their learned men; whose priests. whole science seems to have been subservient to the purposes of superstition and insatiation. These Chaldeans, as distinguished from the Babylonians, were in some sort distinct from the people, and rather more so, than the clergy are from the laity with us. These Chaldeans were as much revered in their country, as the Egyptian priests were in theirs; and are said to have enjoyed the same rank and degree in the kingdom §. They were wholly devoted to the business of their superstitious religion, and pretended to prophecy, and to the gift of prediction by d the rules of augury, the flight of birds, and the inspection of victims; and professed the interpretation of dreams, and to explain all the extraordinary accidents and phenomena of nature, as portending good or evil to men or nations, and were thought by their incantments and invocations to affect mankind either with happiness or with misery ¶. Having by their situation been early addicted to celestial observations, they, instead of conceiving as they ought to have done concerning the omnipotence of the creator and mover of the heavenly bodies, and of being confirmed in a due belief and practice of what had been handed by tradition down to men by Noah and his sons, fell into the impious error of esteeming them e as gods, and the immediate governors of the world, in subordination, however, to the Deity who was invisible, but by his works and the effects of his power §. They concluded, then that God had created the stars and great luminaries for the governance of the world, that he had accordingly placed them on high, and made them partakers with him, and substituted them his ministers; and that it was but just and natural they should be praised, and honoured, and extolled; and that it was even the will of God they should be magnified, and feared, and worshipped; just as a king desires his servants should be respected in honour of himself ¶.

PERSUADED of this, they began to build temples, or Sacella, to the stars, to sacrifice to them, to praise them, and to bow down before them, that through their means f they might obtain the favour and good-will of God §, so that they esteemed them as mediators between God and them. For that there was a necessity for a mediatory office between God and man, is observed ¶ to have been a notion that generally obtained among mankind from the beginning; "Conscious of their own meanness, vileness, and impurity, they could not conceive how it was possible " for

* DAN. v. 1.    † Idem, ii. 4. v. 10.    ‡ Idem, v. 7.    § Vid. HERODOT. l. 1. c. 196. & STRAB. l. 16. p. 745.    ¶ DAN. i. 10.    ** Idem, ii. 5.    † Idem, ibid.    ‡ Idem, iii. 19.    § DIODOR. SICUL. Biblioth. Hist. l. 2. p. 1.    ¶ Idem, ibid.    † Vid. eund. ibid.    ‡ RAB. MOS. MAIM. in More Nevoch.    § Idem, ibid.    ¶ See PRIDEAUX, and the authors he cites, POCCOK, GOLIUS, HOTTING. HYDE, &c.

“ for them of themselves alone to have any access to the all-holy, all-glorious, and a “ supreme Governor of all things. They considered him as too high, and too “ pure, and themselves as too low and polluted for such a converse ; and therefore “ concluded that there must be a mediator, by whose means only they could make “ any address unto him, and by whose intercession alone any of their petitions “ could be accepted of. But no clear revelation being then made of the me“ diator, whom God had appointed, because as yet he had not been manifested “ unto the world, they took upon them to address themselves unto him by “ mediators of their own chusing ; and their notion of the sun, moon, and stars “ being, that they were the tabernacles or habitations of intelligences, which “ animated those orbs in the same manner as the soul of man animates his body, b
 “ and were the causes of all their motions, and that those intelligences were of a “ middle nature between God and them, they thought these the properest beings
 “ to become the mediators between God and them ; and therefore the planets “ being the nearest to them of all these heavenly bodies, and generally looked on “ to have the greatest influence on this world, they made choice of them in the “ first place for their Gods Mediators, who were to mediate for them with the “ supreme God, and procure from him the mercies and favours which they prayed “ for, and accordingly they directed divine worship to them as such ; and here “ began all the idolatry that hath been practised in the world *.” For persuading themselves of this doctrine, they became anxious about the most effectual means of c making their worship acceptable to the several deities, whence they first began to build temples or tabernacles to them, as we have seen, dedicated to their service, and to be as places of abode for them ; but as in matters of this kind there can be no stable form, where there is no immediate revelation, and men actuated either by fear or avarice, or ambition, or aught else, had liberty to pretend to what they knew nothing of ; in process of time impostors arose, and gave out, that they had had it enjoined and commanded them from God himself, That this star or that, or all of them should be worshipped in this or that manner, and represented under this or that form, and that none of any age or degree should be exempt from the worship thereof ; and this they impudently gave out, in a solemn manner, for revela- d tion. Upon this it was that men began to furnish the Sacella, tabernacles or temples, with images, and to erect the same under trees, and upon the tops of hills or mountains ; and from hence-forward they assembled themselves together to pay them worship, and began to hope for all good, and to dread all evil, as proceeding from them, and to honour them with the deepest reverence and fear *. Their priests likewise, sensible of the sweets of the trade, began to think of forms of duty and practice to be observed by the credulous and deluded multitude †. Other impostors there were who improved upon the first, and pretended to have been honoured with particular instructions from particular stars, concerning the exact mode of the worship due or peculiar to them, and what ought, and what ought not, to be done to please them ; so that, e in process of time, the name of God became obliterated among men, and the most stupid idolatry possessed the whole place of the true religion <sup>h</sup>.

Second stage of idolatry.

SUCH was the rise of idolatry and the first steps of its progress, than which, nothing can be more natural to conceive, and such were the original Sabian doctrines, which, taking root first among the Chaldeans, did afterwards spread their branches so far as to overshadow, at one time, all the nations of the east with their profane obscurity. For it must be difficult to conceive how men could have been deceived into so gross an absurdity, as to worship wood, stone, or metal, formed and fashioned by their own hands ; if it be not at the same time allowed, that they must have imagined their images to have been, some how or other, animated or informed f with a supernatural power, by some supernatural means. A late author <sup>i</sup> thinks it more natural to suppose, that their loss to know how to address themselves to the planets, when they were beneath the horizon, was what first suggested to them the use of images ; for that, whenever they paid their devotions to any of them in their tabernacles, or Sacella, they directed their worship towards the planet, which they may have thought of none effect, when he was absent and hidden from sight ; and that therefore they thought to supply his absence by a representation : Thus
 it

* PRIDEAUX's Connect. of the Hist. of the Old and New Test. Part I. Book III. p. 177. in 8vo.
 • Rab. MOS. MAIMONID. More Nevoch. † Vid. eund. ibid. <sup>h</sup> Idem ubi sup. <sup>i</sup> PRIDEAUX, a it may have been, though it may be as natural to suppose, that as their priests observed the stars as their gods, and made them the chief subject of their study, and persuaded themselves that each star or planet was actuated by an intelligence, they gave out to the people, from time to time, that those superior beings had revealed their will to them, just as their crazy imaginations, or designing craft, may have suggested to them †.
 ubi sup. HOTTINGER Hist. Orient. l. iv. c. 8.

LET this have been either this way or that way, it is certain that the first image-worshippers did not pretend to pay adoration to the uninformed wood, stone, or metal, and that the Sabians, in their transition from planet-worship to image-worship, pretended to have infused the virtues of the planet into the image that was meant to represent it; which they thought to effect by forms of consecration, and by various incantations, whereby to draw down from the stars their several intelligences into their respective idols; and hence came all the foolery of Telefins <sup>k</sup>, or Talismans, and upon these pretended principles of communicative operation, all the branches of magic and sorcery must have had their foundation.

THAT this was the first origin of image-worship is evident, and that the same was first derived from the heavenly bodies, the most conspicuous and glorious to sight, is evident by the primary gods of the heathen in general, which are Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, Mercury, Venus, and Diana; by which we can understand no other than the sun and moon, and the five greatest luminaries next to them <sup>l</sup>.

c THIS was the religion of the Babylonians, Affyrians, and Mesopotamians, even before the days of Abrabam; nay, in the days of Enos, the son of Seth <sup>m</sup>, whose descendants are said to have been the first that cultivated astronomy and astrology <sup>n</sup>; the Sabians themselves boasting the origin of their religion from Seth, and pretending to have been denominated from a son of his called Sabius, as also to have among them what they call the book of Seth, written by that same patriarch <sup>o</sup>.

THIS was the state of the old Babylonian religion, till they came to deify mortal men as well as the celestial bodies. In this we are apt to think they were not the first, and that the Syrians, whose empire was confessedly older than either the Affyrian or Babylonian <sup>p</sup>, shewed them the way, by deifying their great kings, d Bonbadad the second and Hazaël <sup>q</sup>. A late learned author <sup>r</sup> is inclined to think, that the first Sabians or idolaters, desirous to have all the mediation possible with the supreme God, took it into their heads, that good men had a power with him to intercede for them, and that they deified many of those they thought to be such, and that thus they added to their polytheism: This is allowing much in favour of them, and is reflecting not a little upon the purity of the Roman church which teaches the same doctrine, and allows of the same practice; and calls to our mind how frequently Rome is supposed to be signified under the type of Babylon; and, perhaps, there may not be so wide a difference between some parts of the two religions, as may be generally imagined. But to wave this, as foreign to our purpose, we should rather choose to think that they deified their greatest and most powerful men, and that, however they may have paid the same honour to men of virtue, their most conspicuous gods of this class were their greatest warriors and most potent kings.

ACCORDING to this we are told <sup>s</sup>, That, by the vain-glory of men, idols entered into the world . . . That, in process of time, an ungodly custom, grown strong, was kept, as a law, and graven images were worshipped by the commandment of kings, or [as it is in the margin] tyrants. That whom men could not honour in presence, because they dwell far off, they took the counterfeit of his visage from far, and made an express image of a king, whom they honoured, to the end, that, by their forwardness, they might f flatter him that was absent, as if he was present. This was most certainly the case, with regard to the deification of kings, who could not be contented with being less than gods. The same author assigns <sup>t</sup> two other reasons for this practice, which must strongly co-operate with the former; first, "The grief of a parent for his child untimely snatched away, whose image he may have been tempted to honour as God when dead, and to deliver to those beneath, or in subjection to him, ceremonies and sacrifices of duty and commemoration;" and secondly, "The skill of the workman, who, by his art, might contribute greatly to the deception

Third stage of idolatry.

† See the Append. to the Jewish Hist. p. 852. and seq. * See PRIDEAUX, ubi sup. † Vid. eund. ibid. <sup>u</sup> Rab. Mos. MAIMONID. ubi sup. <sup>v</sup> See before, p. 81. <sup>w</sup> See PRIDEAUX, ubi sup. p. 178. et seq. <sup>x</sup> P. Before, ibid. pass. <sup>y</sup> See before in the notes, p. 372. <sup>z</sup> PRIDEAUX, ubi sup. <sup>aa</sup> Wild. of SOLOMON, xiv 14, 16, 17. <sup>ab</sup> Ibid. ver. 15, 18, 19, 20, 21.

"tion of the ignorant; for that, ambitious to flatter some great man, he may a "have exerted all in his power to represent him beyond what he truly was, and
 "so, by the beauty of his work, captivate and delude the unwary multitude, who "took him now for a god, whom a little before they honoured but as man; and "that thus men, subject either to calamity or tyranny, did ascribe unto stones and
 "stocks the incommunicable name of God."

SUCH were the causes of idolizing dead men, tyranny to compel to it, immoderate affection to consent to it, and the exquisite skill of the workman to allure to it. That the Affyrians and Babylonians were, in a particular manner, obnoxious to the first of these, must appear by the histories of their several kings, who seem, at least, to have been as absolute tyrants as were ever suffered to live; and that they b did give into this error is plain, both by sacred authors and profane writers; these last, for the most part, asserting, That the Affyrians were the people that first shewed the example of it to others; though that this was false we have seen in the history of the Syrians, who, before them, deified their great kings.

Pul meant by Belus.

HOWEVER, it was an opinion that Ninus was the first that set up images to be worshipped, and particularly one to his father Belus w, and granted privileges and pardons to those who resorted to it. Who this Ninus should have been, but Tiglaib-pilezar, the son of Pul or Belus in scripture, we know not, and therefore we must conclude that Pul, and none other, was the first that was worshipped in these parts as a god z, and that consequently he who was the undoubted founder of the empires c both of the Affyrians and Babylonians, and none other, was the boasted Belus of the latter Babylonians, Phœnicians, and others, where the descendants of his family extended the dominion he had founded.

His temple.

THIS Belus had a temple erected to him in the city of Babylon, and was revered as their primary god, he being the first founder of all the Affyrian and Babylonian grandeur, and source of all the reverence and adoration claimed by his successors both at Babylon and Niniveh. To him they erected the tower we have formerly described, so famous in all ages since; though it should seem, that the honour of this tower or temple was meant to be divided between him and the true God. This building, as we have observed before, consisted of eight towers raised upon d one another, and in the uppermost was a bed magnificently set forth, and a golden table near it, but no image was here y; nor was any body suffered to be here in the night but a particular woman, who, as the priests gave out, was in an especial manner preferred by the god before all others (O). In this place they taught, that he was wont to come and repose himself z; so that, according to this, they must have held him to have been the supreme over all, the living and self-subsisting, who either could not be represented, or would not bear such presumption in them as to offer at it. But, beneath this, there was another temple where there was a gigantic image of Jupiter [Belus] all of gold, with a table before him, all of the same metal; his throne was gold also, as was all the furniture about him; insomuch, that the whole e work was valued at 800 talents of gold z. This, it seems, was not the only statue in this temple; for we think we read of another all of solid gold, and twelve cubits in height b; but whether our author really designs to describe two distinct idols, by giving the weight of the one, and the dimensions of the other, or whether he gives the weight and dimensions above, as belonging to one and the same, is not quite clear.

Partly erected to him, and partly to the true God.

HOWEVER, this great Jupiter, who we think cannot possibly be any other than the great Pul or Belus, by being thus placed in subordination, as should seem, to the great and supreme God, was exalted to the utmost height they could raise him; for by this they must, to all appearance, have implied, that Belus, or Pul, divided f the empire of the universe with him, and that, as he was Lord above, the other was lord below; that, as the former was the God of heaven, the other was at least delegated god on earth, and invested with all power here, by the immediate appointment of the invisible ruler of all things. Thus the thing seems to have been, by z See before, p. 372.

 y HERODOT. l. i. c. 180.

w AMBR. in Epist. ad. Roman. c. 1.
 z Idem ibid. c. 182.

x See before in the notes, p. 888.
 b Idem ibid. c. 183.

(O) The Babylonians, it is plain, must have taught something of this invisible God, and attributed to him what the Egyptians did to their God Cneph (65).

(65) See before, p. 204.

a by this account of the temple at Babylon (P), and as it is perfectly of a piece with their superstitious persuasions, and agreeable to what we may safely conceive concerning this their first warrior, we know not how to think otherwise; and wonder not at what has been since exaggerated concerning the age and pre-eminence of this great Belus.

As there were two gods in this temple and tower, there belonged to it also two altars; they stood without, one of gold, of a moderate size, and another much larger; upon the golden altar none but sucking victims might be sacrificed<sup>c</sup>; and on the great one, none that were not full grown<sup>d</sup>; concerning which, we leave the reader to make his own conjectures, only observing, that, as these were doubtless two distinct gods they sacrificed to, the golden altar seems to have been devoted to the supreme God, and the other to his subordinate Jupiter; for by the sucking victims they seem to have meant, that they peculiarly belonged to him as the nourisher of all things, and that the full-grown ones, being brought to the perfection he designed them, he committed them to the care and government of his vice-gerent below, who therefore had none but full-grown creatures sacrificed to him. But as here they plainly sacrificed to them in distinction of each, they at other times seem to have sacrificed to them in common; for the priests reckoned that they, every year, upon the great altar, burnt 100,000 talents of fragrant libanotus<sup>e</sup>; and this, by some, is thought to have been intended for them both, but that it may as likely have been intended, as an acknowledgment from Belus to the God above him, might be as probably insisted on, so far as it is possible to be certain in things of such an ambiguous nature, were we a little fonder than we are of building upon conjecture.

SUCH was the god Belus among the Babylonians, and such his temple and the rank he held in it; but that he was the inventor of the sidereal science, or of astrology, as some would<sup>f</sup> have it, must not be wondered at, after what has been attributed to his daughter-in-law Semiramis, as we have partly seen already<sup>g</sup>, and as we shall see farther in a more proper place. Nor must this same Belus, or Baal, be confounded with the others we read of in scripture, before the rise of the Assyrian empire, as the Baal-peor of the Moabites<sup>h</sup>, the Baal, or Moloch, of the Ammonites<sup>i</sup>; the title signifies lord with all these people, who, and particularly all such as are said to have passed their seed through fire, meant thereby the sun, whose heat being, as it were, the life of all things, they accounted the heat of fire to be sacred; which must have been one of the first doctrines of the Sabians in Chaldea (Q), who, as we have said, first broached this error, and communicated the same, by degrees, to the nations round about. This appears by what we read of Abraham, who left his country, on the other side of the Euphrates, on account of the idolatries of its inhabitants<sup>k</sup>, and came into the land of Canaan, where he found the sentiments and practices of men more conformable to religion and the duties we owe to God; for Melchisedec was then alive in Canaan, and styled the priest of the most high God<sup>l</sup>, and the people there were, for the most part, in a state of purity in matters of religion, as all the nations about must also have been<sup>m</sup>; nay, in these days we do not find that even Egypt was much, if at all, infected with idolatry; so that whatever the Greeks may pretend of the Egyptians, that they brought idols and false gods into fashion<sup>n</sup>, the contrary appears by the book of Genesis, which sufficiently informs

<sup>c</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>d</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>e</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>f</sup> PLIN. Hist. Natur. l. 6. c. 26. <sup>g</sup> See before in the notes, p. 883. <sup>h</sup> See before, p. 285. <sup>i</sup> Ibid. p. 293. <sup>k</sup> Ibid. p. 422. and in the notes, p. 132.

<sup>l</sup> See before, p. 327. <sup>m</sup> See before, in the religions of the Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Edomites, &c.

<sup>n</sup> See before, p. 204.

(P) It may be disputed, whether or no the Babylonians did not actually mean the sun, rather than God himself. We are told, they never represented the sun, or, at least, that the Syrians never did (66), who derived their religion from these people, concluding it ridiculous to represent what was so gloriously conspicuous (67), and we have supposed that they sometimes paid adoration to the sun and moon immediately (68); but it does not seem likely that these Babylonians should ever give it out, that the sun himself was wont to come and repose himself upon the top of this tower, as we have seen; they never could have persuaded the people to that absurdity; so that if they had not an immediate view to the great God, in thus leaving his temple free from images, they must have designed it for the intelligence of the sun, and that may, with them, have amounted pretty much to the same thing.

(Q) The religion of the Magians, who worshipped fire, was derived from the Sabians, as we shall observe a little farther on in this section.

(66) See before, p. 373.

(67) Ibid.

(68) See before, p. 401.

informs us, that, while the country on the other side of the Euphrates was thoroughly a polluted with all abominations, the countries on this side were, as yet, strangers to them. Nothing then is plainer than that all we have said concerning the religion of the Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Edomites, Amalekites, Canaanites, and Philistines, is only the old Sabian religion of the Chaldees; so that we shall not here need to repeat what we have so fully exhibited in the histories of those several nations.

BUT, upon the building of Babylon by the Affyrians, the old religion, it seems, fell into some discredit, and especially the more inferior branches of it; nor can it well be doubted, but that if ever they had, before the days of Pul, deified any heroes, he must have soared above them all, who could not properly be called the gods of the Babylonians before the city itself was built; for thus much is granted by all authors, who suppose Belus to have been the immediate founder of the Affyrian greatness, and therefore deified; but, who this Belus was, we may read in scripture<sup>o</sup>, and be confirmed in a certainty thereof by Ptolemy's canon, and therefore we are not to look so far back as Nimrod, or any man else that lived a thousand years or more after him. Hence it may appear, that by Bel, or Baal, the Babylonians understood either the sun, or their founder Pul; but whether or no they translated him into the sun, or whether they kept their planet-worship and their hero-worship so distinct as never to confound them with each other, may be past our solution, and a point which might draw us into a needless length.

Succoth Benoth, the Affyrian Venus.

THE deity, next in order to this, seems to have been the Venus of latter days in the west, and that she was no other than the goddess Astarte, of the Phœnicians, may, with no small probability, be gathered from what is to follow. Succoth Benoth is mentioned as an idol of the Babylonians<sup>p</sup>, though it was apparently rather the shrine, or shrines of an idol belonging to some deity we have since translated into the lascivious goddess Venus, for the import of the word is, the tabernacles of Benoth, or, the tabernacles of the daughters<sup>q</sup>, though there are those who render them, a tabernacle of wings<sup>r</sup>, and suppose the idol itself to have been represented as a hen brooding over her chickens, and that she was designed in honour of the constellation, called vulgarly the hen and chickens, but more learnedly, the Pleiades; but this is a meer dream. It is more likely, that these tabernacles of the daughters were for Venus, whom the Babylonians called Mylitta, signifying Genetrix, or Mother, or Urania, as the Greeks will have it, and to this goddess the daughters of the country, or the women, were, once in their life-time, bound to make a sacrifice of their modesty and virtue, a practice which will be found among the customs of this people. And hence it is that a very learned author<sup>s</sup> gathers her not only to have been our Venus, but hence it is also that he derives the very name itself from Benoth, by changing the B for a V, and the Tbeta for the Sigma, whence you will have Venos (R). This is in some measure confirmed by an author, who seems to call her Binos<sup>t</sup>; but particularly by what we are told of a city in Africa, called Sicca Venerea<sup>u</sup>, a name which may have been transported from Phœnice, and is evidently formed from this Siccotb, or Succoth Benoth; and where there was a temple, where women were obliged to purchase their marriage-money by the prostitution of their bodies<sup>v</sup>. Her temples seem to have been fixed at this place, and at Apbac<sup>y</sup>, and at Babylon<sup>z</sup>, and may likewise have been erected at other places. As for those which had not yet any such buildings dedicated to this end, the priests seem to have supplied that defect, by the old way of portable tabernacles, which they carried about upon their shoulders, for the convenience of the public, and their own gain. The prophet charges the Jews with having imitated some such heathenish custom in the wilderness†.

The derivation of the name of Venus.

Both masculine and feminine.

THIS god, or goddess, for she is understood to have been both Mars and Venus, though here placed second to Belus, is generally understood to have been of much greater antiquity than the times we are sure he lived in; but this is upon a supposition

<sup>o</sup> See before in the notes, p. 858. <sup>p</sup> 2 Kings xvii. 30. <sup>q</sup> Vid. SELDEN de Diis Syr. Syntagm. 2. c. 7. <sup>r</sup> KIMCHI & JARCHI, apud eund. ibid. <sup>s</sup> HERODOT. l. 1. c. 131. <sup>t</sup> SELDEN de Diis Syr. Syntagm. 2. c. 7. <sup>u</sup> SUIDAS, ad vocem. <sup>v</sup> VALER. MAXIM. l. 2. c. 6. <sup>z</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>y</sup> See before in the notes, p. 399. † HERODOT. l. 1. c. 199. † Amos v. 26. Acts vii. 43.

(R) Vossius (69) subscribes to this. Beyer, in his additamenta to Selden, disputes it, though with no great strength of argument.

a sition that the profane historians, poets, and mythologists are not out in the length of their computations, and hence you have an argument of her antiquity deduced from the words of Æschylus<sup>a</sup>, who calls Phœnicia the land of Aphrodite, or Venus, to which the scholiast subjoins, that so it was called, because it was sacred to her on account of the Byblus and Libanus, where stood her temple at Aphac<sup>b</sup>; but this may be no very great argument to prove it, for if the Affyrians, whence the Phœnicians had her, are not so very antient as pretended, this deity must be deprived of the veneration conceived for it, on account of its years. Though the date of this idol will not much depend upon the rise of the Affyrian, or Babylonian empire, if it was a star they meant by this Venus; for we have already b observed, that the Chaldees, as they are called, worshipped the stars by images before they consecrated the Affyrian Belus, or perhaps any other mortal man; so that it may be worth the while just to enquire, whether or no this idol was really designed to represent some star from among the host of heaven, or some woman who may have been deified for reasons, in those days, thought meritorious? or whether, as in the case of Baal, both a planet and a person may have been intended, and reciprocally translated into each other?

We have seen, by some parallel circumstances, that she was, to all appearance, the same with the Phœnician Astarte, and we shall produce several others, to confirm the same, in the course of this subject. In the mean time, to begin with c this Benoth, from whom the whole tribe of great goddesses seem to be derived; She is called the celestial Venus, and said to have been first of all worshipped by the Affyrians<sup>c</sup>, whereby, though our author it is most likely means the Syrians properly so called, we shall plainly discover, that the former were the first authors of this worship, and transmitted it to the latter. This goddess was of both sexes, and accordingly it was the custom to worship her sometimes in the habit of a man, and sometimes in the habit of a woman<sup>d</sup>, the men and women mutually changing dresses with each other<sup>e</sup>, whence it is supposed, that Moses forbids<sup>f</sup> the woman to wear what pertaineth to the man, or a man to put on a woman's garment. According to this, the worship of this planet, or idol, must have been of very ancient date; and that d the words of the text before us are meant of this mode of worshipping, is understood by Maimonides<sup>g</sup>, who observes, that in the book of magic, composed by one Centir, as he is corruptly<sup>h</sup> called, it is written, that a man should put on the flowered garments of a woman, when he stood before the star called Venus, and that a woman should put on the arms and armour of a man, when she stood before the star called Mars<sup>i</sup>; and hence the Affyrian priests are said<sup>k</sup> to have been unfit to wait on the goddess Venus, except they effeminated their countenance, and assumed all the softness and dress of a woman. And hence a Greek author<sup>l</sup>, who calls her the moon, says, that the men sacrificed to her in the habit of a woman, and the women in the habit of a man, and the reason, because she was both masculine and feminine;
e whereby it is plain, that it is this Affyrian Venus that is here implied, though, being translated into Greece, he may not exactly have meant the same. That this Uranian or celestial Venus of the Affyrians was the moon cannot be doubted, by the rank she holds next to Bel, or the sun; and that she was so will be immediately seen by what we certainly know of her under other names; and that she was of both sexes will appear as plain by the same evidence. For, to bring her still nearer to us, we shall find she was the same with the Syrian goddess.

This Syrian goddess, as we have her described to us, as well as by the rites performed to her, was no other than the celestial Venus of the Affyrians. She was called Juno, and the statue of her was contrived so as to partake of Minerva, Venus, Luna, Rhea, Diana, f Nemesis, and the Destinies, as if she included them all, and that so she did has been sufficiently proved by very great men<sup>m</sup>. She was drawn, or supported, by lions, she had rays on her head, and a tower, and was girt with the cestus, or girdle of the celestial Venus<sup>n</sup>, and, as she was contrived to be the source of all idolatry, in honour of the female sex; so we find her to have been equally honoured by Egyptians, Indians, Ethiopians, Medes, Armenians, and Babylonians<sup>o</sup>, who all came
in

A Rite in the worship of the Affyrian or Babylonian
Venus.

She is the same with the great
Syrian goddess.

<sup>a</sup> In Supplicib. <sup>b</sup> See before in the notes, p. 399. <sup>c</sup> PAUSAN. in Attic. <sup>d</sup> Vid. SELDEN de Diis Syr. Syntagm. 2. c. 4. <sup>e</sup> Vid. eund. ibid. <sup>f</sup> Deuteron. xxii. 5. <sup>g</sup> In More Nevech. part III. c. 38. <sup>h</sup> Vid. SELDEN, ubi sup. <sup>i</sup> MAIMONID. ubi sup. <sup>j</sup> JUL. FIRMIC. c. 4. <sup>k</sup> PHILOCHOR. apud MACROB. Saturnal. 3. c. 8. <sup>l</sup> Vid. LIL. GYRALD. de Diis Gent. SELDEN, de Diis Syr. Voss. de Idololat. <sup>m</sup> See before, p. 373. <sup>n</sup> Ibid. p. 374.

in pilgrimage to this mighty goddess of Hierapolis, or the Holy City, which, in this respect, seems to have succeeded the city of Babylon; whence she had been chased by the Persians. Her eunuch priests, who took on them the habit and offices of women<sup>a</sup>, declare her to have been one and the same with the Affyrian Mylitta; and the Babylonians, who, among others, are said to have paid liberal contributions to her, abundantly confirm it.

She is the same with the Astarte of the Phœnicians.

If then it appears, that this great Syrian goddess was no other than the celestial Venus of the Affyrians, the same will as evidently appear of the Phœnician Astarte. We have seen her the Queen of Heaven<sup>a</sup>, the moon, Lucifer, Juno, Venus, Minerva, and Io<sup>a</sup>, and married to an Affyrian<sup>a</sup>. We have seen her the lustful goddess<sup>a</sup>, and the warlike deity<sup>a</sup>, and accordingly addressed to under both sexes; nor need we cite the monstrous effeminacies of the men at Apbac<sup>a</sup>, or the impudent and mercenary prostitution of the women at Byblus<sup>a</sup>, to prove that the one is in general a very faithful copy of the other; for, as to the prostitution of the women in particular, it must be confessed to owe its origin to an infamous custom among the Affyrians and Babylonians, which shall be mentioned hereafter.

She is the same with Derceto of Ascalon.

NOR do we find, that the Atargatis, or Derceto<sup>a</sup> of the proper Palestine in general, or of Ascalon in particular, was any other than the Babylonian or Affyrian Venus. For although she is made distinct from the great Venus, and is said to have undergone her displeasure, and in consequence of that to have been metamorphosed into a fish<sup>a</sup>; the worship that was paid to that animal, under the eye of the great goddess at Hierapolis, declares her to have been the same; and this is not conjecture only, for Atargatis is said to have been worshipped at Hierapolis, by a very judicious author<sup>a</sup>, who, in so saying, most evidently confounds her with the Syrian goddess, and makes them one and the same. Nor is he single in this, for others<sup>b</sup> do the same, and particularly one<sup>c</sup>, who calls her the mother of the gods, and Astarte, and the Hierapolitan, or Affyrian goddess. In short, Atargatis was also Venus, and Juno, and Minerva, and the Syrian goddess<sup>d</sup>, and consequently the celestial Venus of the Affyrians. That she must, at the same time, have been Astarte, our reader will scarcely doubt, when he calls to mind that we have an authentic author<sup>e</sup> who says, that the Syrians abstained from fish, in regard to the rites of Astarte; so that we see her the same goddess transported from the banks of the Euphrates, into which she is said first to have plunged herself, to escape the fury of the<sup>f</sup> inexorable Typhon (S); and but just varied so as to give each particular country the honour of having an original of its own. So the Syrians, who seem to have adopted her first, and were nearest to the place of her native abode, preserved her, it is likely, in the most genuine form; the Phœnicians, who were next, altered her no farther than to make her a Phœnician; and the Philistines, or Ascalonites, who were a little farther off, that they might make her their own also, turn her into a monster, woman upwards and fish downwards<sup>g</sup>, and, rather than not have her their own, are willing to allow her to have been in subordination to some other goddess, who had power over her to the degree of chastising her by a change from her first shape<sup>h</sup>.

It appears then, that all this adoration, to this various goddess, came from Affyria and Babylonia, and that it was established, in these countries, by the prevailing might of those two potent empires, who successively subjugated all their parts; and while they flourished, it is likely, they maintained a strict uniformity of worship and tradition among them; but these empires being abolished by the Persians, who had an aversion to all this Sabianism; each nation, forgetful of the source whence they derived their superstitions, claimed them as peculiar to themselves, and new modelled them accordingly.

Is worshipped as Semiramis.

AND now it may not be amiss to inquire, how far the tradition of Semiramis quadrates with what we are told of this goddess; as also, whether or no we cannot from

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 373. & seq.

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. ibid.

<sup>a</sup> See before in the notes, p. 401.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid.

<sup>c</sup> See before in the notes, p. 401.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid.

<sup>c</sup> See before, p. 398, 399.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid. p. 399

<sup>d</sup> Ibid. p. 875.

<sup>d</sup> Ibid.

<sup>d</sup> STRABO, l. 16. p. 748.

<sup>d</sup> PLIN. Hist. Natur. l. 5. c. 23.

<sup>e</sup> MACROB. in Saturn. 1. c. 23.

<sup>e</sup> Vid. SELDEN, ubi sup.

<sup>e</sup> ARTEMIDOR apud eund. ibid.

<sup>f</sup> MANIL. Astronom. iv.

<sup>f</sup> See before, p. 875. and in the notes, p. ibid.

<sup>f</sup> See before, p. ibid.

(S) We see here Typhon introduced into the Babylonian mythology, though he was an Egyptian; but we may perceive, by some parallel circumstances, that there was no very wide difference between the religions of the two nations.

- a from thence make it out, that she, as well as the moon, the earth, or any other subject, may have been adored as the celestial Venus, or Syrian goddess. Her presence in the temple at Hierapolis<sup>1</sup> is as strong an argument as any, that the superstition there migrated from Babylon. Her inferior degree<sup>k</sup> there will, it must be owned, in some measure clash with her original superiority; but to that it is answered, this temple was rebuilt by Stratonice<sup>l</sup>, the wife of Antiochus Soter, who may have had some pique to the memory of Semiramis, whom she may have remembered with envy, and therefore resolved to degrade her; if it may not rather be attributed to the senseless caprice, or some strange inconsistency with relation to this Affyrian heroine, whom they might some how or other, and in some cases, make inferior to herself. But these
- b are points which we neither pretend to reconcile nor dive further into.

Thus much is certain, we shall in the tradition of Semiramis find so many circumstances to make us believe she was worshipped as the supreme goddess of the Babylonians, that few will hesitate perhaps a moment to be of this opinion. We have seen her born of a goddess at Ascalon<sup>m</sup>, who, for the shame of conceiving her, plunged herself into a lake, and became a fish<sup>n</sup>; and hence fish are said to have been worshipped, though indeed not so much upon her own account, as should seem, as on account of her mother Derceto, or Atargatis, who underwent this transformation. We have seen her miraculously fed by doves or pigeons in a desert<sup>o</sup>, and hence that bird became sacred; hence probably, and from other fabulous circumstances it is, that you have the dove from the land of Affyria<sup>p</sup>. We have seen it predicted, that she should not die, but vanish from the sight of men, and obtain divine honours from the Asiatic nations<sup>q</sup>. We have seen it was pretended she made her exit in the form of a dove, and that she went off attended by a flight of those birds<sup>r</sup>; and hence another reason is given why the dove became sacred. We have seen her the abandoned prostitute<sup>s</sup>, and the martial heroine<sup>t</sup>; and hence she may have been the celestial Venus adored under both sexes, and the Phœnician Astarte, now painted in arms<sup>u</sup>, and now represented as the patroness of lewdness and effeminacy<sup>v</sup>. In short, we have seen her the first that made eunuchs<sup>w</sup>; and hence we may have the origin of the eunuch priests, or Galli, who attended upon the Syrian goddess<sup>y</sup>; which was certainly more the case than what is pretended in the idle story of Combabus, and Stratonice<sup>z</sup>, who, being wife to one of the Seleucide, lived some hundreds of years after Semiramis, and who, as we have suggested above, may have affected to raise herself upon the depression of this great Babylonian queen, who is said even to have first built the temple at Hierapolis<sup>2</sup>, which, though certainly false, may yet argue the tradition to have been, that she was meant by the celestial Venus or the Syrian goddess, and that she was really so might easily be made appear still farther, by her being directly called Rhea<sup>b</sup>, Nemesis<sup>c</sup>, and the like, if there could be any necessity farther to evince this opinion, after such variety of corroborating evidence.

- c UPON the whole we shall make no difficulty to conclude, that the celestial Venus of the Affyrians, the Astarte of the Phœnicians, and the Derceto or Atargatis of the latter Philistines, were all derived from Semiramis, or whatever else her true name was, the first Babylonian foundress; who seems to have been translated into the bright and various Queen of Heaven, the moon, as Belus, or Pul, the first Affyrian monarch, was into the sun; and that whatever the mythologists and allegoricians may pretend by explaining all this worship into an adoration of the universe, or nature, or the earth, or any other element, which is what we are very ready to grant them, and what we shall more particularly treat in the history of the Celtes and Scythians, and the mythology of the Greeks, as we have partly already in the theology of the Egyptians<sup>d</sup>; yet nothing seems
- f now more universally allowed, than that all the Jupiters and Juno's, and the rest who are supposed to have been once mortal, or conversant here on earth, are all derived from this source, and that on this Affyrian or Babylonian foundation the whole superstructure of the Greek polytheism and idolatry was raised. For the Greeks had their religion from

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 373.<sup>k</sup> See before, ibid.<sup>l</sup> See before, p. 374.<sup>m</sup> See before, p. 875.<sup>n</sup> See before, ibid.<sup>o</sup> See before, ibid.<sup>p</sup> See before in the notes, p. 875.<sup>q</sup> See before, p. 887.<sup>r</sup> See before, p. 180.<sup>s</sup> See before, p. 883.<sup>t</sup> See before, p. 880.<sup>u</sup> See before, p. 883.<sup>v</sup> See before in the notes, p. 399.<sup>w</sup> Ibid.<sup>x</sup> See before in the notes, p. 883.<sup>y</sup> See before, p. 374.<sup>z</sup> See before, ibid.<sup>2</sup> Vid. Voss. de Idololatr. l. 2. p. 308.<sup>b</sup> See<sup>2</sup> See before, p. 883.<sup>c</sup> Vid. Jos. SCALIG in animadvers.<sup>d</sup> See before, p. 204, 205, & seq.

from the Phenicians partly, and partly from the Egyptians, who, had theirs originally from the banks of the Euphrates and Tigris, as may be pretty clearly gathered from the apparent religious state of the countries on this and that side of the Euphrates in the days of Abraham, as we have hinted before. The Egyptians seem in time, indeed, to have erected a system of their own, though not very widely different from the Babylonian, as any body that will compare them together will at the first glance perceive. The Phenicians, who had equally communication with the two nations, seem to have mixed the variations in each together, and we have plainly seen that they worshipped what the Babylonians worshipped, what had been imposed on them by the tyranny of that empire; in short, Astarte, who, as we have proved as plain as things of this nature can be proved, <sup>b</sup> was the celestial Venus of the Babylonians, was also as plain the Egyptian goddess Isis. And indeed there was hardly any difference as to the main points between the religion of those two great and ancient nations, who being in constant rivalry with each other, and emulous of surpassing each other, you thence have the seeming differences between them in religious matters, the Egyptians particularly contending for the honour of antiquity * and sanctity with the Babylonians, though by the Mosaic history they must yield to these last; nor is there any discrepancy between their great and favourite gods, but barely in the names they have conferred on them, to evince them reciprocally their own. Nor is any thing plainer than that there was, in the main, a perfect uniformity, between all the nations on both sides of the Euphrates, as to the fundamentals of their religion; and consequently, if we fix <sup>c</sup> the place whence they were branched, which we think we have done, we have, at the same time, a clue at hand to guide us through the immense labyrinth of heathenism and idolatry: But for want of this certain stand to take the survey from; for want of a due attention to the natural progress of idolatry, but especially by not accommodating the fabulous writings of profane writers to the tenour of scripture, which plainly points out to us, who were the first great Affrians or Babylonians that were deified and translated; our mythologists have rambled backwards to Noah and Nimrod, and the whole tribe of the postdiluvian patriarchs, to discover in them what is designed more particularly for other mortals, who lived many and many ages <sup>d</sup> after them; whereby they have most strangely perplexed this part of learning, which would be full intricate enough without this help towards making it the more so: What is still worse, they have cast an impenetrable mist upon the first days of profane history, which most certainly is fabulous, and quite so, if we make a very few exceptions, till about the first rise of the Babylonian empire, in the reign of Josiah king of Judah. For not only the art or method of writing a regular history was not discovered, or at least practised, as should seem, till the days of Herodotus, who lived in about the middle of the Persian empire; but the gods of all these nations being supposed to have been once meer men, and no more, the priests and others had no way to derive a depth of veneration for them, but by making them ancient and fabulous, and by that means removing them as far as possible from the then race of mankind. If we had no other instance of this than Sanchoniatho's Phenician History <sup>e</sup>, it would be abundantly sufficiently to justify us in what we say; and if we had no other example of this affectation than that of the Syrians in the days of Josephus, who, in those days, boasted of the antiquity of their great god Adad, who was one of their deified kings <sup>f</sup>, who, at most, did not live above 901 years before Christ <sup>g</sup>; it might be deemed enough for our purpose. And here we cannot but note a common inaccuracy, even in the most learned, who, inattentive to the history of the ancient empire of Syria, suppose this Adad to have been an Affrian or Babylonian deity <sup>h</sup>, and only, as should seem, because he is in profane authors called an Affrian, forgetting that <sup>f</sup> the name of Affria extended itself over all Syria, and the adjacent parts <sup>k</sup>. He was then, to all appearance, no Babylonian deity, but one who had been translated into the heavens by the ancient Syrians; and, as is most likely, revived again after the destruction of the Babylonian empire, whose new gods must have brought him into discredit <sup>l</sup>, not only as having proved too weak for the gods of the Affrians and Babylonians, but also as being unknown to the people transplanted into these parts <sup>m</sup> in

Adad not properly a Babylonian deity.

* See before in the notes, p. 398.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. p. 90, 93.

<sup>c</sup> See before, p. 86.

<sup>d</sup> See before.

In the notes, p. 388, 399.

<sup>e</sup> See before in the margin, p. 383.

<sup>f</sup> Vid. LVI. GYRALD. Hist.

Deor. Selden, de Diis Syris. Vossius, de Idolatr.

<sup>g</sup> See before in the notes, p. 857.

<sup>h</sup> Ibid. p. 888.

<sup>i</sup> Ibid. p. 890.

- a in the room of the first inhabitants, by the successors of Pul; though some flow or other received again into veneration; as we have observed before<sup>n</sup>. However, Adad was also the sun as well as Bel or Baal, Osiris, and others. And this is what we have thought necessary to premise preparatorily to what we shall hereafter have to say of the Greek mythology, and which we have on purpose deferred; till we came to this place, as the most proper for a research of this nature.

To return to our celestial Venus, or Syrian goddess, or Astarte, or Derceto, of Fishes and doves worshipped, and whence this superstition took birth, we have partly seen in the metamorphosis of Derceto<sup>o</sup>; and the birth, education, and apotheosis of Semiramis<sup>r</sup>; and we have

- b seen, that both at Astalon<sup>s</sup> and Hierapolis<sup>t</sup> they were equally revered; so that they may well deserve to be considered as deities with this people, and are seemingly so allied to this great and multiplied goddess; that though we have some other deities of this nation, who may deserve to take place of them, we have not been able to separate them from their great mistress. As for fishes in particular, they are said to have been revered by the Syrians, or the Assyrians rather, not only on account of the metamorphosis above<sup>u</sup>; but also because they were said to have saved one Derceto, [Derteto] a daughter to Venus, who happened to fall into the sea<sup>v</sup>, or because she took refuge among the fish when she fled from Typhon<sup>w</sup>. It is said, that, Venus and Cupid being in Syria on the banks of the Euphrates, the giant Typhon came suddenly upon them, and made them jump into the river, and take on them the form of fishes to save themselves<sup>x</sup>; in short, Venus and Cupid are said to have been translated into the zodiacal sign called Pisces<sup>y</sup>; such were the reasons given why they not only abstained from fish, but worshipped them likewise. As for doves, they seem to have been worshipped as symbols only of lust and fondness, which made up part of their goddess's character (T); but of these we have said enough in this place<sup>z</sup>.

- c Salambo, as she is called<sup>b</sup>, was also a goddess of the Assyrians, or Babylonians, Salambo. and is plainly Astarte, or any other of the goddesses whom we have shewn to have been the same with her; but we particularly mention Astarte, because this Salambo, or Salambas, is said to have been a demon, or goddess, who was eternally roaming up and down, and mourning her lost Adonis<sup>c</sup>, so that we need add nothing farther concerning her.

- Shach*, Saca, or Sheshach, is another god or goddess of the Babylonians, as usually Sheshach reckoned<sup>d</sup>, and supposed to have been the earth, and to have been the same the Romans afterwards worshipped under the name of Tellus and Ops<sup>e</sup>; and if so, she was partly the same with Nylitta, or the Syrian goddess, whom we have already seen under the title of Rhea, and the mother of the gods<sup>f</sup>, in whom all these titles and imaginary deities are said plainly to have centered. However there is some doubt, whether or no she may not be more properly a Persian goddess<sup>g</sup>, than a Babylonian; though that she was the latter may appear to satisfaction from the prophet<sup>h</sup>; who calls Babylon the land of Sheshach, before the Persians arose to any thing like the height they afterwards did; and at a time when Babylon, to all appearance, had disdained to have received any thing of this nature from them. In commemoration of this goddess, the Babylonians were wont to celebrate a festival for several days together, which we shall take notice of among the customs of this people, and which confessedly gave birth to the Saturnalia at Rome.

Nebo,

<sup>a</sup> See before in the notes, p. 912.

<sup>b</sup> See before, p. 862.

<sup>c</sup> See before, p. 862.

<sup>d</sup> See before, p. 875.

<sup>e</sup> before, p. 875.

<sup>f</sup> See before, p. 883.

<sup>g</sup> See before in the notes, p. 875.

<sup>h</sup> See before, p. 373.

<sup>i</sup> See before, p. 875.

<sup>j</sup> THEON. apud GYRALD. Hist. Deor. Syntagm. 1. p. 85.

<sup>k</sup> MANIL. ubi sup.

<sup>l</sup> DIODOR. apud HYGIN. in Astronom.

<sup>m</sup> VID. Voss. de Idolol. 1. 2. p. 254.

<sup>n</sup> See before, p. 862, and in the notes, p. 875, 883.

<sup>o</sup> HESEYCH. apud SELDEN. & ALIO. Etymol.

<sup>p</sup> Magn. ad vocem.

<sup>q</sup> Etymol. Magn. ibid.

<sup>r</sup> VID. Voss. SELDEN. &c.

<sup>s</sup> WILLET upon

<sup>t</sup> Dan. 1. 16.

<sup>u</sup> See before, p. 919.

<sup>v</sup> VID. SELDEN. de Diis Syr. Syntagm. 2.

<sup>w</sup> Jerem. xxv. 26. to i. 41.

(T) This goddess is said to have been produced from a vast egg, which being rolled out of the water, by the fish of the Euphrates, was hatched by a dove, who sat thereon (70). This must be the primigenial egg, mentioned by Helladius (71); and, according to this, our great goddess must have been the fabulous Oannes (72), concerning which we have nothing to repeat. To animadvert upon so strange an inconsistency as this seems to have been, or to attempt to reconcile the Assyrian goddess into the same with Oannes, may be a fruitless task.

(70) NIGID. apud Voss. de Idolol. 1. 2. p. 254.

(71) See before, p. 90.

(72) Ibid.

Nebo.

Nebo, or Nabo, was also an Affyrian or Babylonian deity<sup>1</sup>, and his name is often compounded in those of the Affyrian and Babylonian kings<sup>2</sup>: he therefore may be concluded to have once been in high account with them; and bids fair to have been one of their most antient gods. He is thought to have been the Chemosh, or the Baal-peor of the Moabites, and accordingly we have formerly mentioned him in the religion of Moab<sup>3</sup>, and said almost as much of him as we know. We shall only add, that by the prophet he is joined with Bel<sup>4</sup>, and supposed generally to have been the sun; and therefore may have been prior to this latter, whom we have asserted to have been the deified Pul, the first Affyrian<sup>5</sup> who may, by the vicissitude of things, have taken place of him; though there are others who are of another mind, and conceive, that, by their being joined together, we are rather to understand him to have been designed for the moon<sup>6</sup>, Bel being, for certain, known to have stood for the sun. These therefore think it a senseless tautology to mention the same deity, at the same time, under different names; so that, instead of supposing him to have been one with Bel, we are rather according to them to conclude him to have been the same with Mylitta, the great goddess. But this will appear a weak argument to those who perceive how apt these people, and all that followed them, were to multiply one and the same god into many; and especially if it be recollected by what steps Sabianism or idolatry advanced among these apparently first founders of it, and how, by degrees, it began from the host of heaven till it degenerated, if we may use the expression, into the adoration of men; till a full stop seems to have been put to this practice, in honour of the great Affyrian and Babylonian family, who must, for very strong reasons suggested formerly<sup>7</sup>, have eclipsed all that went before them; so that nothing need prevent our supposing Nebo to have been worshipped as the sun before the rise of Pul, to whom he may, according to the fantastick theology of this people, have been accounted inferior afterwards. This Nebo seems to have been famous as an oracle, his name being interpreted as signifying prophecy or divination<sup>8</sup>; but all this, and whatever else may be advanced concerning him, is too palpably obscure for us to dilate on; all we know, for certain, is, that he was some god of the Babylonians.

Sardanapalus.

HOWEVER, if true it be that he was the same with Chemosh, or Baal-peor, or Pbegor, and if what is said of the obscene rites of this god<sup>9</sup> be just, we have a seeming reason to assert, that the famous, or as the common tradition goes, infamous Sardanapalus took the place of this shameless idol, in the latter days of the Affyrian family; and that, to all appearance, the Babylonians converted him into this god when they destroyed the city of Nimveh, and extirpated the kings there. For that he was a god of theirs is evident enough, by the place given him in the same temple with the Babylonian Venus at Hierapolis, the Holy City<sup>10</sup>. We find him there in a particular habit and attitude<sup>11</sup>, but, whether or no this attitude was the same we have formerly mentioned<sup>12</sup>, it is certain, that by the traditionary character of him<sup>13</sup> (and as it is likely, that all the kings of Affyria to a man were deified after their death)<sup>14</sup> he may have served well enough for a god of sensuality and beastliness. And this is plainly inferred from the common way of spelling his name, for the most part, in antient manuscripts, which write him Sardanapallus with a double L<sup>15</sup>, and seemingly with an obscene intention, for Pballus, or Pallus, signifies the privities of a man; and hence Cicero pronounces<sup>16</sup> he was not more odious for his character than his name; and the Priap which stood near him<sup>17</sup>, in the temple at Hierapolis, may have been intended for him; for, as there were confessedly two statues of Semiramis in this temple<sup>18</sup>, the same may have been with regard to Sardanapallus, as we will for this once write him.

Rach.

OTHER gods the Babylonians and Affyrians had, as Rach<sup>19</sup>, who is generally thought to have been intended for the sun, and therefore we may class him under the great Pul or Belus, who, as we have seen, was substituted for the same. But a dispute may here arise, whether or no he was a deified man, or some intelligence, as for example, that of the sun; and, if this latter be the case, he must be removed higher

<sup>1</sup> Isai. xlv. 1.<sup>2</sup> See before, p. 867.<sup>3</sup> See before, p. 286.<sup>4</sup> Isai. ubi sup.<sup>5</sup> See

before in the notes, p. 888.

<sup>6</sup> Vid. Voss. de Idololat.<sup>7</sup> See before in the precedingchapter, passim.<sup>8</sup> HIERONYM. in Esai. in loc. supr. citat.<sup>9</sup> See before, p. 285.<sup>10</sup> See

before, p. 373.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid.<sup>12</sup> See before in the notes, p. 885.<sup>13</sup> See before, p. ibid.<sup>14</sup> Vid. Jos. Scalig. Animadvers. ad Græc. EUSEB. p. 64.<sup>15</sup> De Republ. iii.<sup>16</sup> See before, p. 373.<sup>17</sup> Ibid.<sup>18</sup> Vid. WILLET ubi sup. SELD. de Diis Syr. Syntagm. II. c. 17.

- a higher up, as he must have been much more ancient than Belus. This we leave to the reader, for there is nothing particular besides related of him.

Nego<sup>c</sup> and Nergal<sup>d</sup> were also gods of this people, if they were not one and the same; but as they are generally agreed to have been worshipped as fire, we forbear Nergal farther mention of them, till we come to the religion of the Magians.

Merodach<sup>e</sup> also was a god at Babylon; but who, or what he was, is quite in the Merodach dark to us.

- In a word, we may call in the gods of the several nations, whose histories precede in this work to compleat the list of the Babylonian idols; for they are confessedly sprung from the city of Babylon; and hence it is that Maimonides, in speaking of the death of Thammuz, who was slain a martyr to the Sabian religion, relates, That all the idols of the world flew to the great temple of the sun, at Babylon, and there mourned the death of Thammuz<sup>f</sup>; so that we shall not here need to repeat what we have spoken so largely to already.

Thus far then we have shewed it highly probable, that the great Jupiters, and other gods and goddesses of mortal origin, are to be derived from the banks of the Euphrates and Tigris, and that, instead of being so ancient as mythologists and historians make them, they began not above 771 years before the birth of Christ, among the Affyrians, who first erected themselves into what we call a monarchy; as is generally confessed, though falsely, for the most part, related.

- c THE Sabians, as well as the Magians, had a veneration for fire, and therefore we might here consider them in that light, did we not reserve that subject for the section where we shall speak of the Magian religion, in the history of the Persians.

- THE story of Bel and the Dragon<sup>g</sup> might here claim to be considered, were we not well assured that the whole is spurious. We shall therefore only add, that by the Dragon here is generally understood a kind of Serpent or Asp<sup>h</sup>, which the Babylonians used as the symbol of God, for which they gave several reasons, as that this creature, without the assistance of limbs, and, by a kind of virtue or power latent within himself, could not only move<sup>i</sup> at a considerable rate, but also wind and turn himself into various forms; that he lived to a great age, and, as it were, renewed his life with his coat every year; and that the acuteness of his sight might aptly enough qualify him to represent divine providence, or deity<sup>k</sup>. Other reasons were given for this serpent-worship both by the Babylonians and the Egyptians, but we waive them, and shall only observe, that these same people revered the same reptile as the symbol of health and of prudence, not forgetting also, that they made him the emblem of fraud<sup>l</sup>.

- As the Babylonians were hardly at all different in religion from the Egyptians, but in many articles concurred with them, and particularly in the adoration they paid to fishes<sup>m</sup>, so in other points of worship they were the same with each other. The goat<sup>n</sup> they worshipped as well as the Mendesians<sup>o</sup> in Egypt, and for the same reason; and the onion, as mean an object as it may seem, was considered with a religious esteem by both the nations<sup>p</sup>, and for a reason, it is most likely, we have already given<sup>q</sup>.

- Their god Thurral, Thourias, or Mars, we have spoken to already<sup>r</sup>; and now refer the reader for the religious rites and ceremonies of this people, besides what we have observed there, and shall relate hereafter, to what we have said of the kind in the religion of the Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Canaanites, Syrians, Phenicians, and Affyrians.

- We have a general view given us of their temples, their idols, and their priests, in the epistle of Jeremiab<sup>s</sup>. Their idols were of gold, and silver, and wood, and carried about in procession, with multitudes attending them before and behind, and worshipping them. They were crowned and cloathed in purple, and besmeared with the smoke of incense, though they were carefully wiped and cloathed as they wanted it. Their temples were full of smoke and dust, raised and caused by the numerous resort of votaries; and the care of them committed to their avaricious priests, who would sometimes make free with the gold and silver presented to their gods, and either

<sup>c</sup> Vid. eod. ibid.

<sup>d</sup> See before, p. 861.

<sup>e</sup> Ibid. p. 867.

<sup>f</sup> Ibid. p. 402.

<sup>g</sup> In the Apocrypha.

<sup>h</sup> See before, p. 210.

<sup>i</sup> Ibid.

<sup>j</sup> Vid. Voss. de Idololatr. l. 9. p. 233.

<sup>k</sup> Vid. eund. ibid. See before, 855. & seq.

<sup>l</sup> See before, p. 205.

<sup>m</sup> See before, p. 209.

<sup>n</sup> ALEX.

AND. ab ALEXAND. l. 6.

<sup>o</sup> See before, p. 211.

<sup>p</sup> See before in the notes, p. 883.

<sup>q</sup> BARUCH vi. passim.

keep it for themselves, or bestow it upon lewd prostitutes, who were accounted sacred. <sup>a</sup> Whatever was offered a sacrifice to their gods they were wont to embezzle, and appropriate to themselves; and cloath their wives and children with the garments that had been given to adorn their idols. In return for this, their business was to light up numbers of lamps and tapers to their images, and to sit in the temples with their beards and heads close shaven, and uncovered, and with garments rent and torn, and roaring and crying out before their gods as for the lamentation of some person deceased; and finally, that their gods and temples might be in no danger of the spoiler, they were sure to lock and bar them up with great care. Such was the corruption and degeneracy of this people, and such their practice, which must have had a very bad effect on their morals, as will appear in the sequel. <sup>b</sup> In the mean time;

Human victims.

THE Babylonians having given rise to all the idolatries and superstitions in vogue among the neighbouring nations, we must charge them with the horrible custom of sacrificing human victims to appease or conciliate their god or gods. That this must have been an ancient custom with all these people, we have already as good as asserted, in what we have said of their religions; and have elsewhere endeavoured to trace it to its original, namely, the readiness which Abraham express'd to sacrifice his only son at the divine command, and the approbation which that patriarch received for his intended obedience <sup>c</sup>. Hence those, who believe that Jephthah did really sacrifice his own daughter, suppose him to have fetched, if not his warrant, at least his main encouragement for executing that rash and bloody vow <sup>d</sup>. But we have already taken occasion to confute that notion, and to set that matter in a clear light. But, with respect to the heathen nations who adopted this in human rite, it is likely that it grew in time so shocking to human nature, that the priests seem to have been unable to maintain it long in credit, and by degrees it came to be disused, and seems, in the latter days, at least, of the Babylonians, to have been confined to a particular sect or tribe. For the Sepharvites are said, by way of distinction from the other Babylonians, to have burnt their children in fire to Adramelech and Anammelech, the gods of Sepharvaim <sup>e</sup>. Who these two gods were, we have seen already <sup>f</sup>, and that these Sepharvites were Babylonians, properly so called, appears very plainly, if we can, <sup>g</sup> with the most learned geographers, agree that their city was that of Sippara in Ptolemy. However, there are traces of this antient cruelty to be discerned in the worship and rites of the Syrian, or rather Assyrian goddesses, at Hierapolis, to whom they without remorse made away with their children, by precipitating them down a steep at her temple <sup>h</sup>; which is all we need say about it.

To enter into the allegory of all this worship and deification is what we have above professed to avoid, for the present, and indeed, for the future, we shall have no great matter to add to the subject which we have in general treated already. In the history of the Egyptians, we have already declared almost as much as is known, as to the intent and meaning of all this idolatry in a physical or natural way; <sup>e</sup> nor could we expatiate thereon here without a direct repetition of what goes before. We need only observe, that if the Babylonians, and others, after them, made gods of the sun, the moon, or any other luminary; if they extended their view to the whole system of nature in the worship they paid to their great deities, or if by them they meant the earth itself, the air, or any other element or created being of any sort or degree, the whole must be attributed to a kind of mistaken gratitude at first for the benefits they received from them (V), which at length degenerated into every thing

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 472. d. e. before, p. 293, 861.

<sup>b</sup> See before, p. 751. a. b. and (O). <sup>c</sup> See before, p. 375.

<sup>d</sup> 2 Kings xvii. 31.

<sup>e</sup> See before, p. 204.

(V) Sir John Maundeville (73) has so judiciously summed up the history and progress of idolatry, that, for the curiosity of it, we cannot, though somewhat long, but present it to the reader, in his own words: speaking of a people in India, he says, " Summe of hem worshiþe the sonne, summe the " mone, summe the fuyr, summe trees, summe " serpentes, or the first thing that thei meten at

" morwen; and summe worshiþe symulacres, and " summe ydoles. But betwene symulacres and " ydoles is a gret difference. For symulacres ben " ymages made afre lyknesse of men, or of wom- " men, or of the sonne or of the mone, or of any " best, or of any kyndely thing: and ydoles, is an " ymage made of lewed wille of man, that a man " may not finden among kyndely things: as an " ymage

- a thing that was bad and stupid; and this shall suffice for the present to have said concerning idolatry, and less than this we could not have said in this place, where the whole seems to center, and where the whole, or at least a great part of it, may be fixed to a chronological æra, which may be of use to us hereafter, in speaking of these deities, or some borrowed from them in climes far remote from this.

It may be now time to speak of the customs of the Affyrians and Babylonians; Their customs. and of these one of the chief seems to have been their method of disposing of all their young women in marriage. No man seems to have had a right to dispose of his own daughters, but as soon as they were of age fit to marry, they, with others, were

- b exposed in some public place appointed for the purpose, where, in the midst of a crowd of men, who attended upon these occasions, they were sold one by one. The most beautiful of them were first put up, and delivered to the highest bidder, and so on. When all that were valuable for their charms were thus disposed of, the money, that was raised by this sale, was applied in behalf of some of them to whom nature had not been so lavish of her exterior gifts. The homely ones were then offered to such as would take the least money with them; and the poorer sort, to whom the use of a little money was more precious than all the beauty of a wife, were as eager in underbidding each other, as the wealthy men had before been in vying for the fair ones. The consequence of this was, that their young women were
- c all disposed of in marriage; the poorer sort of the men only labouring under this particular restriction, that they should give security to take the girls they had consented to, before they were in proper possession of the money they had agreed to take with them*.

WHEN a Babylonian had lain with his wife, they both sat by hot perfumes, and Purification. took care to wash themselves about twilight, accounting themselves unclean till they had performed this ceremonious office, and unfit to touch any thing*.

EVERY Babylonian woman was once in her life-time bound to prostitute herself to P. prostitution. strange men, at the temple of Venus. A number of them sat crowned with knots and garlands * HERODOT. I. 1. c. 196. STRAB. 16. l. p. 745.

* HERODOT. I. ibid. c. 198. STRAB. ibid.

" ymage, that hathe four hedes, on of a man, another of an hors, or of an ox, or of sum other best, that no man hathe seyn afre kyndely disposicion. And thei that worschipen symulacres, thei worschipen hem for sum worthi man, that was sum tyme, as Hercules and many othere, that diden many marvayles in here tyme. For thei seyn wel, that this be not goddes: for thei knowen wel, that there is a God of kynde, that made all thinges; the whiche is in hevene. But thei knowen wel, that this may not do the marvayles that he made, but zif it had ben be the speccyalle zifte of God: and therefore thei seyn that he was wel with God. And for be cause that he was so wel with God, therefore thei worschipe him. And so seyn thei of the sonne; be cause that he chaungethe the tyme, and zewethe hete and norischethe alle thinges upon erthe; and for it is of so gret profite, thei knowe wel, that that myghte not be, but that God loveth it more than any other thing. And for that skylle, God hath zeven it more gret vertue in the world: therefore it is gode resoun, as thei seyn, to don it worschipe and reverence. And so seyn thei, that maken here resounes, of othere planetes; and of the suyrr also, be cause it is so profitable. And of ydoles, thei seyn also, that the ox is the most holy best, that is in erthe, and most pacyent and more profitable than any other. For he dothe good ynow, and he dothe non evylle. And thei knowen wel, that it may not be with outen speccyalle grace of God: and therefore maken thei here god, of an ox, the on part, and the other halfondelle of a man; be cause that man is the most noble creature in erthe; and also for he hathe lordschipe aboven all bestes; therefore make

" thei the halfendel of ydole, of a man upwardes, and the tother half of an ox downwardes: And of serpentes, and of other bestes, and dyvers thinges, that thei worschipen, that thei meten first at morwe. And thei worschipen also speccyally alle tho that thei han gode meetynge of; and whan thei speden wel in here jorneye, afre here meetynge; and namely such as thei han proved and assayed be experience of longe tyme. For thei seyn, that thilke gode meetynge ei may not come, but of the grace of God. And therefore thei maken ymages lyche to tho thinges, that thei han beleve inne, for to beholden hem and worschipen hem first at morwe, or thei meeten any contrarious thinges. And there ben also summe cristene men, that seyn, that summe bestes han gode meetynge, that is to seyn, for to meete with hem first at morwe; and summe bestes wykked meetynge: and that thei han proved ofte tyme, that the hare hath fulle evylle meetynge, and swyn, and many othere bestes. And the sparhawk, and other foules of raveyne, whan thei seen afre here praye, and take it before men of armes, it is a gode signe: and zif he sayle of takynge his praye, it is an evylle signe. And also to suche folk, it is an evylle meetynge of ravenes. In theise thinges, and in suche othere, ther ben many folk, that beleven, be cause it happeneth so often tyme to falle, afre here fantasyes. And also there ben men ynow that han no beleve in hem. And sithe, that cristene men han such beleve, that ben informed and taughte alle-day, be holy doctryne where inane thei schold beleve, it is no marvayle thanne, that the Paganes, that han no gode doctryne, but only of here nature, beleven more largely, for here symplencesse (74)."

garlands at the door of the temple, while some were continually going and others <sup>a</sup> coming. They were so ranged between lengths of line, and parted by the same in such manner, that the men had passage among them, and the convenience of getting at those they best liked. The women having once set down before the temple, it was unlawful for any one of them to return home, till some stranger had thrown money into her lap, or bosom, and taken her aside; the man, as he threw the money to her, saying, I implore the goddess Mylitta for thee. The money, how little soever it might have been, was by no means to be rejected, being accounted sacred; nor had the woman the power of rejecting any man that had accosted her in the form prescribed, but she was absolutely to retire with him without delay; and having suffered his embraces, and performed the accustomed rites to the goddess, <sup>b</sup> she returned home; after which no temptation, though ever so great, could procure the enjoyment of her. Those who were handsome were soon dispatched, but those, who were not so happy, lingered a long time before they could fulfil the law; so that they sometimes waited two or three years in a wretched expectation (W). Those who were rich, and scorned to sit with the meaner sort, were conveyed thither in some covered vehicle, and seated therein <sup>b</sup>, while their servants waited their return at some distance.

Festival of Sacca.

FOR five days in one month of every year they celebrated a festival they called Sacea, or Sacca, during which, the servants commanded their masters, one of them being, for the time, constituted chief over the house, and wearing a kind of royal garment they called Zogana <sup>c</sup>.

Manner of treating the sick and burials.

THEIR manner of treating their sick was very extraordinary. Having no physicians among them, it was their custom to expose them publicly in the most frequented places, that so every body might see them, and offer their advice, if they had any knowledge of the case, either from their own experience, or from the experience of others; nor was it lawful for any that passed by to omit this office. Their dead they buried in honey and wax, and mourned for them much after the manner of the Egyptians <sup>d</sup>.

The Babylonians; their character.

THE Babylonians were excessively credulous, superstitious to the utmost, and as lewd and as debauched as a nation well could be. Their credulity must appear by <sup>d</sup> the esteem their Chaldeans, priests, or jugglers were in among them, and their superstition must appear by the same, and what we have said of their religion; and so excessively were they prone to idolatry, that we even find an instance of their great Nebuchadnezzar falling down before Daniel to worship him <sup>e</sup>. Debauchery ran high among them, in which they were justified by the example of their princes, who lived beyond all the bounds of decency and moderation; as we may gather by the banquet Belsazzar was giving when he saw the fatal inscription on the wall <sup>f</sup>. Nor was the king's example all, their religion as inculcated by their priests, and, as we have seen, in the rites of their great goddess, and others, together with the reverence paid to prostitutes <sup>e</sup>, compleated them the most sensual and abandoned race that can be imagined. Parents and husbands would, for money, expose their wives and children to the embraces of their guests. Drunkards they are particularly said to have been, and their women were admitted to their debaucheries. The women, upon these occasions, first appeared modest and reserved, till, putting off their cloaths by degrees, they at length appeared quite naked; and this was the practice even with the married women and the maids, who thought it good breeding thus to reveal what modesty obliges to conceal <sup>h</sup>. Such is the character given of the Babylonians, and it seems exactly to agree with their religion, which encouraged such monstrous impudence in the women and shameflessness in the men; though it cannot be supposed, that in the beginning of their empire they were quite so dissolute as here represented. <sup>f</sup>

THEY

<sup>a</sup> HERODOT. c. 199. STRABO; ibid. <sup>c</sup> BEROS. apud ATHEN. Deipnosoph. l. 14. p. 639.
<sup>d</sup> HERODOT. ibid. l. 198. STRABO l. 16. ibid. <sup>e</sup> DAN. ii. towards the end. <sup>f</sup> ibid. c. v.
<sup>h</sup> See before, p. 926. <sup>h</sup> QUINT. CURT. l. 5. c. 1.

(W) We have this custom, with some additional circumstances, in Baruch (75); The women, says he, also, with cords about them, sitting in the ways, burn bran for perfume; but if any of them, drawn by some that passeth by, sit with him, she reproacheth her fellow that she was not thought as worthy as herself, nor her cord broken. From this particular of their cords being broken, it has been supposed they were cords of rushes (76), which might be easily broken.

(75) vi. 43.

(76) See PURCH. Pilgr. l. 1. c. 12. p. 65.

- a THEY seem to have indulged themselves in dress as well as in other respects, Their habit. and to have affected some pride and effeminacy therein; their under garment was a linnen vest, down to their heels, over which they had another of woollen, and over all a white mantle, or cloak. They wore their own hair; their heads were adorned with a tiara or mitre, and their bodies were anointed all over <sup>i</sup> with oil of sesame <sup>k</sup>. They each of them wore a seal-ring on the finger, and in their hand a wrought staff, or scepter, adorned at the head with some particular ensign, or figure, as an apple, or rose, or lilly, or an eagle, or some such badge, without which it was unlawful to appear with one of these sticks, or staves. On their feet they wore a kind of slippers <sup>l</sup>. Traces of which may be picked out of the figures remaining at Persopolis, b as we may observe hereafter.

THIS people was famed for learning, and particularly those of them that were Learning of the peculiarly called Chaldeans, who were, as is said, their priests, their philosophers, Chaldees. astronomers, astrologers, soothsayers and the like. And, in respect of this pretended claim to learning and supernatural knowledge, the Chaldees are distinguished quite from the Babylonians, and are said to have inhabited a region peculiar to themselves next to the Arabians and the Persian gulf <sup>m</sup>, where we have placed them accordingly. They were divided into several sects, as the Orcheni, the Borsippeni, and known by other names of distinction, borrowed either from particular places <sup>n</sup> where different doctrines on the same points were held, or from particular persons who had doctrines peculiar to themselves. Many of their learned men were famous, and known by name among the Greeks, as Alena, Naburian, Sudin, and many others <sup>o</sup>.

WE have hitherto considered this tribe as set apart for devotion and the superstitious functions belonging to the religion of this people; we are now to speak of them as philosophers only, and of the doctrines they taught as such, as well as of their manner of institution.

- WE have already seen how they pretended to have first come by their learning <sup>p</sup>, Had not their learning from the Egyptians. and their strange tale concerning their first instructor Oannes, who, long before the deluge, came out of the sea, and formed them in the several branches of policy, religion, and learning, and particularly explained to them geometry and astrology; and have observed that he was, according to their tradition, a monster, partly man and partly fish, and that by his coming out of the sea he must have been some stranger, that his name might be, with no great violence, derived from a word, which in Syriac signifies a Traveller, or a Foreigner <sup>q</sup>; as also, that by some circumstances he must have been the same they meant by their Mylitta, or great Venus <sup>r</sup>. To which we shall now add, that, by what is said of his inventions and useful communications to men, he may have been considered as the Egyptian Isis, or Osiris, or both. However this may have been, the report of Oannes's appearance in Chaldea from out of the sea has given birth to an opinion, that Osiris and Oannes were at least contemporaries, and that the Babylonians had all their learning from the Egyptians, and that c not much earlier than the days of Ammon and Sesac, or Sibsbak, whom our author <sup>s</sup> will have to have been the same with Sesostris, or not long before the days of David and Solomon. To prove this, he exhibits the authority of several antient authors, the one <sup>t</sup> writing, That the Egyptian Belus, the son of Neptune and Libya, carried colonies from Egypt into Babylonia, and that, settling upon the banks of the Euphrates, he instituted priests with the same privileges as in Egypt, and that these were called Chaldeans, and were to observe the stars after the manner of Egypt; another <sup>u</sup> declaring the Babylonian Belus had his name from the Egyptian of that name, the son of Libya. In a word, our author <sup>v</sup> concludes, that when Sabacco, the Ethiopian, invaded Egypt, multitudes of that country fled from him into Chaldea, and carried with them their
f astronomy, astrology, architecture, and the form of their year, which they preserved in the æra of Nabonassar; and as a farther proof of this, he produces the form of the tower or temple of Belus at Babylon, which was built pretty nearly after the manner of the Egyptian pyramids. All this, according to our author's hypothesis, seems plausible enough, but must be confessed to differ vastly from what we read in scripture, by which the reverse rather should appear.

BOTH

<sup>i</sup> HERODOT. ubi sup. c. 195. <sup>k</sup> STRABO ubi sup. p. 745.
 Geogr. l. 16. p. 739. <sup>l</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>m</sup> Idem ibid.
 in the notes, ibid. <sup>n</sup> See before in the notes, p. 923.
 amend. p. 210, 211, & seq. <sup>o</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. l. 1. c. 17.
 Is. NEWT. ubi sup.

<sup>p</sup> HERODOT. STRAB. ibid. <sup>q</sup> STRABO
 See before, p. 90. <sup>r</sup> See before Sir Is. NEWT. Chron. of Anc. Kingd.
<sup>s</sup> PAUSAN. l. 4. c. 23. <sup>t</sup> Sir

Arguments to prove it.

BOTH the nations, their very countries, and situations, have certainly in all respects a very near resemblance of each other, and an exact parallel might be deduced between them to make it self-evidently appear. We have seen that they were constant rivals with each other for antiquity<sup>a</sup>; in which the Babylonians must have had the preference, according to scripture, where we read, that they kept possession of what we may call the original seat of mankind after the flood; and must have been therefore settled before any of the other nations, who left them behind in Shinar, a country which must have been a good deal improved before the dispersion, when all the rest went out in quest of new seats. This historical circumstance may be sufficient to rank them the first of nations, though the Egyptians would never allow them that honour; and if these unjustly arrogated the point over them in this respect, why may they not have done the same with regard to others?

THE truth is, both these nations have been strangely addicted to fable, and both of them may be fairly questioned in most we know of their pretences to superiority; and are doubtless to be equally disbelieved. But if the Egyptians are preferred to the Babylonians in any respect by the Greeks, it must be attributed to partiality and prejudice, in favour of such near neighbours as they were in comparison; and if not to this, at least it may be owing to their better acquaintance with the former than with the latter, and to their hearing of the story but on one side. We have at least as good authority to argue in behalf of the Babylonians as can be produced in favour of the Egyptians.

THE early transaction of attempting to raise the tower of Babel, in the very country of this people, must imply them to have been well versed in architecture, and in some of the concomitant arts, even in those early times; and as for the learning of either of the nations, it does not seem to have been such as to deserve the contending for; it appearing to have been rather the corruption of human knowledge than the refinement of it, or, at least, it seems to have been built upon such principles, as were a reproach to sound reason, rather than an honour to the human understanding, and rather calculated to deceive than to inform; to spread the mists of ignorance, than to clear up the lights of knowledge.

HOWEVER, to turn the tables, we have as good an authority as to the contrary, that the Egyptians were instructed in all their knowledge by the Chaldees, and namely by Abraham<sup>1</sup>, who was one of this country. This is the tradition of the Jews, the Arabians, and the Indians, which deserves at least as much credit, and even more, with regard to this people, as the pretences of the Egyptians, who were immediately parties concerned, or of the Greeks, who were particularly biased in their favour. Nor are these orientals unsupported by the traditions of the westerns, according to whom, the Assyrian or Babylonian Belus was the inventor of the sidereal science<sup>2</sup>, and the nation he belonged to the foremost in antiquity for empire and power, and consequently for the arts and learning; and as they derived their instructor Osanes from times preceding the deluge<sup>3</sup>, as should seem, and suppose him to have sprung from the primigenial egg; it is seemingly plain, that whatever constructions may have been put upon his appearance from out of the sea, or the derivation of his name, they acknowledged themselves beholden to no nation under the sun for what they pretended to know; and indeed it must be confessed, that by the bulk of what we understand, both by sacred and profane writers, our author has here strained things too violently to accommodate them to his hypothesis; but, to insist no longer on this doubt, let us take a survey of what the learning was that is so contested.

Their manner of institution.

THEY acquired not their learning in the manner of the Greeks, but possessed what they knew by tradition from father to son, and, being exempt from all offices or impositions to divert their studies, they had nothing to do but to apply themselves to the instruction they had received, from better hands than from the mouth of a mercenary pedagogue, or master. They never departed from what they imbibed, fully satisfied of what they received from their ancestors; and, by a tenacious adherence to their point, they became perfectly knowing in what they professed<sup>4</sup>.

SUCH was the manner of their institution, and the tenaciousness of their adherence to what they had received from their fore-fathers, which if true, we need no other proof

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 922.

<sup>1</sup> See before in the notes, p. 435.

<sup>2</sup> See before, p. 90.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid.

<sup>4</sup> DIONYS. SICUL. Bibl. Histor. l. 2. p. 82.

- a proof to assure us, that they made little or no progress, even in the learning they particularly professed, and that so it really was may be discovered in the sequel.

They taught that the world was eternal; that it never had beginning, and never shall have end; though they acknowledged a divine providence; that the motions of the heavens were not directed by blind chance, or performed spontaneously, but by the guidance and direction of superior agents, or gods. They are universally said to have been the first that cultivated astronomy, and are pretended to have made such progress therein, as to have not only discovered the exact motions of the heavenly bodies, but also to have found out certain influences they have over things below, and to have thence been able to foretel what was hidden in the womb of futurity <sup>c</sup>.

- b By this it appears, that whatever advances they made as astronomers, they were more particularly valuable, if we may so express ourselves, as astrologers. From this delusive amusement, they boasted a knowledge of what was to come, the power of averting of evil, and procuring of good; upon these accounts they were highly revered under the title of magicians, tho' in fact not much better than fortune-tellers <sup>d</sup>.

They planets they called Interpreters, and made the greatest account of their influence, and particularly, as we are told, of that we call Saturn; the next in degree of eminence with them was Sol, or the sun; Mars, Venus, Mercury, and Jupiter; six in all, which were all the planets they reckoned: These they called Interpreters, as by their motions and aspects they in a more evident manner portended the will and pleasure of the gods. They sometimes judged by their rising, and sometimes by their setting, and sometimes by the colour or degree of their light; whence they foretold storms of wind, or of rain, or exceeding droughts; as also from the appearance of comets, from eclipses of the sun and moon, earthquakes, and the whole train of prognosticks they pretended to foresee the good or bad fortune of nations in general, and of kings and private persons in particular <sup>e</sup>.

- c UNDER these six planets they ranged 30 stars, which they called Counselling Gods; and half of these they allotted to take notice of what was done under the earth; and the other half to take cognizance of what was done by men, or transacted in the heavens. And they gave out that once in ten days one of the superior of these stars descended to the inferior, as it were a messenger from those above; and that in return one of the inferior ascended to the superior in the same nature; and that this their mutual correspondence was natural to them, and to continue for ever. They reported, that the chiefs of these Counselling Gods were 12 in number, and assigned to each of them a month of the year, and a whole sign of the zodiac <sup>f</sup>.

ALL these stars they gave out to have influences over the natiivities of men, and to forebode whatever is to befall them of evil, or happen to them of good, in the course of their lives. Again, out of the zodiac they selected 24 stars, and placed 12 of them towards the north pole, and 12 towards the south. Those of them within our sight they assigned to the living, and those not within it they called the stars or Constellations of the Dead; and these stars they termed the judges of all things: In short, the Chaldeans were complete astrologers, and pretended to excel all other nations therein <sup>g</sup>.

- d THEIR astronomy, which ought to have taken place of the former, in respect of its dignity above it, must yield its rank here, it being seemingly what they cultivated as a science secondary to the other; and accordingly we find it to have been quite coarse and plain. They had notions that the earth was like a vessel or boat; and that it was hollow within; and had a way of supposing this doctrine by various arguments <sup>h</sup>.

e We have seen their division of the zodiac into 12 signs, throughout which they taught that the several planets performed their revolutions: But they seem to have had no notion of the immense distance of some of the planets from the sun, and accounted for the time they took up in their revolutions, purely by the tardiness of their motion; though, by their theory of the moon, the contrary should appear, for they taught that she completed her course the soonest of any, not because of her extraordinary velocity, but because her orbit, as we now speak, was less than the orbit of any other body that circumscribed in the heavens. They taught that she shone with a light not her own, and that, when she was eclipsed, she was

<sup>a</sup> Dion. Sicul. Bibl. Hist. l. 2.

<sup>d</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>e</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>f</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>g</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>h</sup> Idem ibid.

was immersed in the shadow of the earth. As to eclipses of the sun they were still a more extravagant, and in the dark, especially as to the time when they would happen <sup>1</sup>. In short, the whole of their philosophy and learning seems to have been chiefly what we now call judicial astrology; a science, falsely so called, and as much condemned with us, as it was prized by the antients.

Their boasted learning condemned.

NOR has this boasted knowledge and learning of the Chaldees been arraigned by the moderns only; it has also been condemned by the antients, as inconsistent with the nature of things, and as implying a fatal necessity, and destroying the freedom of our will <sup>2</sup>. And this was the mighty learning for which the Chaldeans were so famed, as to be denominated, as it were, a distinct nation from the Babylonians for the sake of it; and indeed from scripture we gather they were no better; for Daniel, speaking of them, divides them into four sorts or kinds, as magicians, astrologers, forcerers, and Chaldeans <sup>3</sup>; to which he afterwards adds <sup>4</sup> the diviners, or such as divined by lots, and soothsayers, or such as foretold events by the inspection of entrails. And though there are those who suppose the Chaldeans, as here distinguished from the five other sorts, to have been a sect peculiar to themselves, and to have been of deeper and more solid learning <sup>5</sup>; we may easily perceive that they, as well as the rest, pretended to divination, and that they were called upon, as well as the rest, to discover what was hidden to other men. Whence we may safely conclude, that they all in their several ways were consulted as so many oracles, and that they were all devoted to the same end, however they may have been divided <sup>6</sup> as to the means and methods of attaining it; so that seemingly these Babylonians had their science branched out amongst them, much after the manner the Egyptian physicians had theirs <sup>7</sup>. Their learning must have been made up entirely of superstitious practices, and delusive arts, and if any better they had, they must have concealed it under such ænigma's, and far-fetched resemblances and allegories, as must have rendered it quite a secret, even to themselves, who, considering that they are said from father to son to have received implicitly whatever was taught them, may have been as little able to explain what was really intended by their doctrines, as others were to conceive them to any solid purpose; and it seems not to have been without good reason that many <sup>8</sup> of latter times have made slight of them as philosophers, and concluded that the Greeks were in this respect little, if at all, beholden either to them or the Egyptians.

Babylonians in distinction of the Chaldees;
their arts.

As the Chaldees were peculiarly the men of learning among this nation, so the Babylonians, properly so called, were the men of art; though perhaps we shall have more reason to call these the men of learning among them than the former, if true it be that they were wholly addicted to, and set apart for the sidereal consultations, and the propagation of the extravagancies, which must, as should seem, have made up the system of their philosophy. For in this case the Babylonians, as distinguished from the Chaldeans, must have been good mathematicians and mechanics, as may be gathered from the immense buildings they reared, and which could not be effected without great skill in the several branches of the mathematics and geometry. This we may say in general; but how far, or how far not, they excelled in perspective and the true harmony of proportion, may not be quite so easy a matter to determine, though that their ornaments and decorations fell short of what was afterwards seen in Greece, can never be doubted. This may be plain to any one that has seen the representations of the ruins of Persepolis, which must certainly have been built in the Babylonian manner, which, how far it was beneath the Grecian for elegance and proportion, may be more properly considered, when we come to speak of the Grecian architecture, and to compare it with that of the Egyptians and this people, who, it is certain, were more ambitious of being vast in their performances of this nature, than exquisite. And hence we may pronounce, that their paintings and statues, however gaudy, rich, and colossean, were nothing to compare with the same that took birth with the Grecian artists.

Musie.

MUSIC they had, but in what perfection we must never hope to know; nor would it be worth our while to labour in so unfruitful a field. But that they had a variety of instruments among them, we are well assured, by the above-mentioned prophet, who tells us <sup>9</sup> that they had flutes, cornets, harps, sackbuts, psalteries, dulcimers, and all kinds of music.

<sup>1</sup> DIOD. SICUL. lib. 2. <sup>2</sup> Vid. BARDESSAN. apud EUSEB. Præpar. Evangel. l. 6. c. 10. p. 273. & ALIOS apud eund. ibid. <sup>3</sup> DAN. ii. 2. <sup>4</sup> Ibid. ver. 27. <sup>5</sup> PURCH. Pilgr. l. 1. c. 12. p. 63. <sup>6</sup> See before, p. 218. <sup>7</sup> CÆL. RHODOG. JOSEPH. SCALIG. PRUCER, &c. &c. <sup>8</sup> DAN. iii. ver. 5.—19.

<sup>a</sup> music. What these instruments exactly were, nobody will ever know; but if we may judge of their skill in harmony, by what we can discover of their painting and statuary, they will appear vastly inferior to the Greeks in the harmonic science.

THEIR poetry we have nothing to say to; but must leave the reader to form Poetry, his judgment of it, by that of the other eastern nations, their neighbours, both ancient and modern. Nor do we pretend to say by whom it was particularly cultivated, whether by the Chaldeans, or the Babylonians; but, as it has at all times been sacred to religion and superstition, we may suppose the former, as priests, laid claim thereto, as a part of their province.

PHYSIC we have declared to have been no regular science among this people, Physic in what we have said of their manner and custom of treating the sick; though that the same, as a science, grew into vast repute with the Persians, their successors, will be observed when it comes properly in turn.

As to their language, which was the Chaldee, we have already shewn it to be almost Language, the same with the Syriac, and that the difference is not much greater than between the English and the Scotch: Their common alphabet we have already given<sup>1</sup>; and as for the Mendeian character, which is also peculiar to them, it is not only what we may call modern, but also so nearly like the Estrangelo of the Syriac, that we have thought it unnecessary to insert it. Bochart<sup>2</sup> supposes they had a sacred character as well as the Egyptians, but upon no very satisfactory foundation.

THE Babylonians, properly so called, were great architects, and ingenious in the Architect. casting of metals, and great workmen and contrivers, as will be particularly remarked when we come to speak of their great city of Babylon; and therefore it may be needless to expatiate on it in this place, when we have reserved another, where we intend to do all possible justice to their great labour and industry in these respects, since they will be found to have fallen short of no one nation under the sun in it, but to have, perhaps in great measure, shewed the way to it to every nation besides.

NOR were they less famous for their manufactures, and particularly for their rich Manufactures embroideries, sumptuous vestments, and magnificent carpets, and fine linnen; info- and fine linnen. much, that we read of Cato, that he immediately sold a Babylonian cloak, or mantle, which was left to him by inheritance, as being what he was ashamed to wear<sup>3</sup>; and elsewhere, that at Rome there had been paid, for a suit of Babylonian hangings for a dining-room, six thousand four hundred fifty-eight pounds six shillings and upwards<sup>4</sup>. It were to no purpose to quote authors for farther instances of this magnificence, which is known to a proverb; or to aim at a detail of the several products of their industry: we would only add, that the Babylonians, as well as the Tyrians, had their purple, which they sent into the eastern parts by way of traffic<sup>5</sup>. This purple they had from a port called Apologus, near the Euphrates<sup>6</sup>; but as it is disputed whether or no this was what may be called a discovery among them, and whether they were not before used to supply themselves therewith from Tyre<sup>7</sup>, we shall not insist thereon, any farther than to take notice, that their country afforded the best material of its sort, for dying, meaning alom, both natural and artificial<sup>8</sup>.

THIS people was not only divided into two great tribes, the Babylonians and Particular Chaldeans properly so called; there seems to have been other subordinate tribes or tribes. sects of them. Three of these are said to have fed upon nothing but fish<sup>9</sup>; and thereby seem to have infringed a sacred law among them, in reverence of their great goddess, for whose sake the Babylonians seem to have abstained therefrom. The same we have elsewhere observed† to have been done by the Egyptians, some of whom worshipped the fish which others of them fed upon. However, it may not have been upon a religious principle that this people departed from the rest of their countrymen; and the rather as it seems to be imputed to necessity<sup>10</sup>, these tribes living among the fens, and being destitute of corn; to supply the want of which, it was their custom to dry their fish in the sun, which they afterwards made into paste, and, having baked it, ate it instead of bread<sup>11</sup>. Something yet more extraordinary than this we are told of the inhabitants

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 377.

<sup>2</sup> PLUTARCH. in vita Catonis. and measures, p. 142.

<sup>3</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>4</sup> Vid. BOCHART. PHALEG. c. 7. col. 28.

<sup>5</sup> See before, p. 200. d. & alib.

<sup>6</sup> Ibid. p. 719.

<sup>7</sup> PLIN. Hist. Natur. l. 8. c. 48.

<sup>8</sup> ARRIAN. Peripl. Mar. Eryth. in minor.

<sup>9</sup> STRAB. l. 16. p. 746.

<sup>10</sup> Ibid. p. 378.

<sup>11</sup> See ARBUTH. of anc. coins, weights,

<sup>12</sup> CANAN c. 17. col. 773.

<sup>13</sup> HUDSON, vol. II. p. 20. 21.

<sup>14</sup> Vid. eund. ibid.

<sup>15</sup> HERODOT. l. 1.

<sup>16</sup> HERODOT. ubi sup.

habitants of Borsippa, where the bats being much larger than usual in other places, they<sup>a</sup> used to salt them for food<sup>f</sup>; and this, whether it proceeded from any superstition or want, which last seems a little hard to believe in so plentiful a country as this must have been, we leave undecided.

Commerce.

THE trade of this antient people is no where, that we know of, professedly treated of; but that it must have been very considerable is not in the least to be doubted, and especially when Babylon was in the meridian of her glory; whoever contemplates the splendor of this monarchy, and the commodious situation of this country in general, and its capital in particular, cannot doubt but commerce must here have flourished to a very eminent degree. Babylon was situated, as it were, in the very midst of the old world, and by means of the two great rivers, the Euphrates and Tigris, had very easy communication with the western and northern parts, as also with the eastern, by the means of the Persian gulf. In a word, it may either, by land or by water, have had easy commerce with all the points of the compass: and as it was not only the seat of a potent monarchy, but also afforded many productions and manufactures of its own, to exchange with its neighbours round about, and lay so within the reach of them all, it is not to be doubted but that trade was as extensive here as ever it was any where. Whether the Babylonians were famous for shipping of their own, we are pretty much in the dark; though it cannot well be disputed, but they must have been considerable as navigators. Something like it is hinted by the prophetic evangelist (X), and since Babylon is by him peculiarly styled the city of waters, as the prophet expresses himself, it is but natural to conclude, that they very much abounded in shipping of their own.

S E C T. III.

The Chronology of the BABYLONIANS, from the first Rise of the Monarchy, to its Dissolution.

WE are here to consider the Babylonians in two very different views; first, as<sup>d</sup> composing a small, though perhaps a formidable kingdom, immediately after the deluge, the chronology of which we have already settled as exactly as the nature of the thing will bear<sup>e</sup>; and secondly, as constituting a potent and wide-spreading empire, founded by, and at last rising upon the ruins of the Assyrians, their brethren<sup>h</sup>; so that in effect we are here only to look back to the early times of the Assyrian monarchy, of which this was a collateral branch, and possessed, as should seem, by princes of the same blood with those who filled the throne of Niniveb. We may refer the reader back to what we have said in the chronology of the Assyrians, to satisfy himself concerning the chronology of this people; for they properly took rise in one and the same person, meaning Pul king of Assyria, and nearly at one and the same time. But not to anticipate what may be more properly insisted on hereafter in the course of this section, we shall proceed to distinguish the kingdom of Babylon from the kingdom of Assyria, and to exhibit, according to our custom, a series of the kings of Babylon, according to several authors.

<sup>f</sup> STRAB. ubi sup. p. 739.

<sup>e</sup> See before, p. 126.

<sup>h</sup> Ibid. p. 902.

(X) Besides what might be gathered to prove this point, in the Prophets, the book of Revelations, (77) describing the fall of Babylon, has these words, which at once display the mighty riches of this city as an emporium, and convince they must have abounded in shipping: Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen . . . The merchants of the earth shall weep and mourn over her, for no man buyeth her merchandise any more: The merchandise of gold and silver, and precious stones, and of pearls, and fine linen, and purple, and silk, and scarlet, and all thyine, or sweet-wood, and all manner of vessels of ivory, and all manner of vessels of most precious wood, and of brass, and iron, and marble, and cinnamon, and odours, and ointments, and frankincense, and wine, and oil, and fine flour, and wheat, and beasts, and sheep, and horses, and chariots, and slaves, and souls of men . . . The merchants of these things which were made rich by her, shall stand afar off, for the fear of her torment, weeping and waiting, and saying, Alas! alas! that great city that was clothed in fine linen, and purple, and scarlet, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls . . . And every shipmaster, and all the company in ships, and sailors, and as many as trade by sea, stand afar off, and cried . . . Alas! alas! that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ships in the sea, by reason of her costliness . . . is . . . made desolate (78).

(77) xviii. 2. 19,

(78) Ibid.

A TABLE of the Successions of the Babylonian Kings, according to Ptolemy's Astronomical Canon, and the Ecclesiastical Account.

According to the most correct copies of Ptolemy's canon.		According to the ecclesiastical account in Syncellus.
	Years.		Years.
1 Nabonassar reigned	14	1 Nabonassar or Salmanassar reigned	25
2 Nadius	2	2 Nabius	8
3 Chinzirus and Porus	5	3 Chinzirus and Porus	5
4 Jugens	5	4 Illuleus	5
5 Mardoc Empadus	12	5 Mardocempadocus	12
6 Arkianus	5	6 Arceanus	5
7 Inter-reign I.	2	7 Inter-reign I.	2
8 Belibus	3	8 Belithus	3
9 Apronadius	6	9 Aporanadisus	6
10 Rigebélus	1	10 Iregiballus	1
11 Mesessimordacus	4	11 Messisimordacus	4
12 Inter-reign II.	8	12 Inter-reign II.	8
13 Assar-Addinus	13	13 Isarindinus	13
14 Saofauchéus	20	14 Saofuchius	9
15 Chyniladanus	22	15 Cimeladanus	14
16 Nabopalassar	21	16 Napobalassar	21
17 Nabocassassar	43	17 Nabuchadonosor his son	43
18 Ihuaredannus	2	18 Ebidan Merodach	5
19 Niricassolassar	4	19 Nireglesarus or Baltasar	3
20 Nabonadius	17	20 Nabonadius, or Assyages, or Darius, or Assuerus, or Artaxerxes	17
210		200

a THIS table contains on the one side a genuine and most correct copy of Ptolemy's astronomical canon (Y), and on the other a corruption of it. We shall not here inquire into the differences between these two lists, or the liberty the author of this ecclesiastical account has taken with his original, which we may occasionally consider under the reigns of these kings. Syncellus, whence we have taken this ecclesiastical computation, has another, under the same head, the authors of which are Africanus and Eusebius<sup>1</sup>. We shall therefore have little to do here; few arguments can be wanting, and indeed none can be necessary to prove the first rise and duration of the Babylonian empire, which is so happily ascertained to our hands by Ptolemy, whose canon is so exactly agreeable to scripture history, that if this latter could possibly stand in need of confirmation as to the historical parts of it, so far as it relates to the history of the great empires of the Assyrians and Babylonians, nothing could be so effectual towards it as this canon, which has given birth to one of the most famous profane æra's, that of Nabonassar, the first king in it, and without which there would be the most palpable darkness over the affairs of these people. Nothing is more surprizing than that this most noble monument should have been so little examined by the light naturally reflected on it from the sacred pen-men, as not to have extricated the whole body of chronologers and historians from out of the labyrinth they have almost all bewildered themselves in, misled by the extravagances of one fabulous Greek writer, who has been blindly followed by the antients, and unnaturally by the christian moderns. This canon takes date from about the 23d year of Pul's first appearance on this side the Euphrates, about the year 2252 after the flood, according to our computation, and 747 years before Christ;

<sup>1</sup> Vid. Can. Chron. SÆCUL. xvii.

(Y) This canon was particularly rectified from a manuscript in the Bodleian library at Oxford, and sent by Dr. Overal, Dean of St. Paul's, to Seth Calvisius, and first published, with Ptolemy's Hypothesis, by Dr. Bambridge, (79), professor of the mathematics at Oxford (80).

(79) Vid. GREGOR. Postum. de æra & Epoch. c. 7. p. 149. (80) Vid. MARSH. Can. Chron. Sæcul. xv.

Christ; which shews the kingdom of Babylon to have been immediately of Assyrian <sup>a</sup> origin, according to the prophet *; Behold the land of the Chaldeans; this people was not till the Assyrian founded it for them that dwell in the wilderness; they set up the towers thereof, they raised up the palaces thereof. The kingdom of Babylon was then founded by the Assyrians. This is so plain, that it may be needless to add any thing more to it, especially after what has been already said in the chronology of Assyria, to make this appear.

Ptolemy, we may perceive, could discover no king of Babylon older than Nabonassar, and therefore begins with him; and the scripture mentions no king of Assyria before Pul, who appeared on this side of the Euphrates about 23 years before the first year of the canon; and as Nabonassar is an Assyrian name, most evidently compounded of Nebo-addon-assur, we may thence conclude that he was the son or grandson of Pul, who upon his death divided his monarchy between his children. This seems a most evident point, and abundantly helps us to understand what the prophet means in the text above; and without which it is impossible to understand how the Assyrians should have founded the land of the Chaldees. This kingdom of Babylon being then of Assyrian extraction, and considered as a sister-kingdom with Assyria, and being a natural branch of it, we have nothing here to add to what we have already urged, except that we can fix the date of it with somewhat more certainty than that of the Assyrian empire, which we could have no notice of till the first appearance of Pul in the west. It may begin then with us in the 24th year of Pul's <sup>c</sup> appearance to the westward of the Euphrates, 2252 years after the flood, and 747 years before Christ: It ends 2462 years after the flood, and 537 years before Christ. So that its whole duration was no more than 210 years compleat; to which if we add the 23 or 24 years of Pul before the date of this canon, we shall have a number not exceeding 234, for the years of the duration of the great Assyrian family; whether at Niniveh, or at Babylon, with respect to what we know of the rise of these kingdoms; and that Niniveh, which is confessedly the oldest, did not much exceed this number, must appear to any one that gives himself the trouble to recollect what we have so amply observed in the third, fourth, and fifth sections of the preceding chapter. <sup>d</sup>

THE Chaldees, we are told, were founded by the Assyrian, and by the undoubted authorities of scripture, and Ptolemy's astronomical canon, this Assyrian can have been no other than Pul. If any one can prove the existence of another Assyrian conqueror or founder before him, we shall be very ready to congratulate him upon the discovery. The canon itself directs us when to date the fall of the Babylonian empire, namely, in the 18th year of Nabonadius; though according to the canon he reigned but 17 years; for every king's reign there begins with the last Thoth of his predecessor's reign.

S E C T. IV.

The History of the Babylonians.

BEFORE we enter upon the history of this people, as constituting a wide and <sup>e</sup> most famous monarchy, we must just take a retrospect of their first establishment as a kingdom, which is vainly given out to have existed before the deluge. In doing of this, we have little more than to remind the reader that we have already exhibited the antediluvian princes of this part, according to the several authors, and that we have already said as much of its first founder Nimrod as we have been able to collect. We have therefore now nothing that remains, but to declare who are said to have been his immediate successors in this infant kingdom, a list of which we have here transcribed.

* Iai. xlii. 13.

A TABLE of the Kings of Babylon, that immediately succeeded Nimrod.

According to Eusebius.		According to Syncellus.
	Years.		Years.
1 Evechoos or Nimrod reigned . . . . .	6	1 Evechoüs or Nimrod reigned : . . . .	6
2 Chomasbolus . . . . .	7	2 Chofmabolus . . . . .	7
3 Porus . . . . .	35	3 Porus . . . . .	35
4 Necbubes . . . . .	43	4 Necbubes . . . . .	43
b 5 Abios . . . . .	48	5 Abius . . . . .	48
6 Oniballus . . . . .	40	6 Oniballes . . . . .	40
7 Zinzirus . . . . .	45	7 Zinzirus . . . . .	45
	<hr/> 224		<hr/> 224

Our authors, we see, perfectly agree as to these kings who are called the dynasty of the Chaldees, and indeed, in this case, Syncellus has faithfully copied Eusebius. This dynasty, which lasted no more than 224 years, was no sooner expired, than the Arabians became uppermost, and produced a race of six kings at Babylon. This Arabian dynasty lasted 216 years, and the two dynasties together 440 years. The whole interval, as we have stated it between the first of the reign of Nimrod, and the call of Abraham, is 646 years. This Arabian dynasty then expired 206 years before the call of Abraham, and was succeeded by the Affyrian dynasty, beginning with Belus and ending with Sardanapalus; as we have given it in the chronology of the Affyrians <sup>k</sup>. The Affyrians must then have erected their monarchy long before the call of Abraham, and the same must have continued at least a thousand years after him, without any intermission, according to the most common accounts, which may be sufficiently disproved by this one argument. Besides, there can be well no doubt but these Arabian kings were, according to scripture, of the country of Elam, or Persia; for under Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, we find Amraphel, king of Sbinar, the undoubted Babylonia; warring upon the kings of the Canaanites; we may then as good as satisfy ourselves, that this Arabian dynasty, as it is called, subsisted after the call, when Abraham rescued his brother Lot from them; so that hence it may appear, that, if any people can claim to have been properly the first monarchy, the Elamites or Persians are the people, as we shall observe in its proper place.

FROM the year of the flood 431, or from its foundation, we have no certain notice of any thing relating to this kingdom, except, that about 600 years afterwards, there was a king of it called Amraphel, who warred under the king of Elam <sup>l</sup>. This is all we have to say concerning these early times of this antient kingdom, except we adopt the Ctesian accounts of Semiramis, who, according to him, must be called the foundress of Babylon; and that is what has been sufficiently confuted already.

HOWEVER, we cannot but take notice, that the series we have given of the Affyrian kings, as they stand in Eusebius and Syncellus, is reckoned as the third dynasty of the Chaldeans or Babylonians, and called the Affyrian; but, concerning this, we must refer the reader to our chronology of the Affyrians, where we hope he will meet with what may satisfy him of the little weight this succession of dynasties ought to have with him.

ACCORDING to this method of arrangement, the kings in Ptolemy's canon should be called the fourth dynasty of the orientals, and distinguished by the title of the Babylonian; but this we must reject as built upon no tolerable foundation, and especially with us, who distinguish so widely as we do, between the antient kingdom of Babylon, and the monarchy or empire of the same.

WE have now brought all the history we know of this people down to the æra of Nabonassar; but before we begin with that genuine race of princes, who are the only kings of Babylon we can possibly acknowledge, from the days of Amraphel above to the said Nabonassar, we must relate what is fabulously reported of the man, who, according to some profane authors, must be accounted the first king of Babylon.

H2

<sup>k</sup> See before, p. 865.<sup>l</sup> Ibid. p. 424.

The story of Belshazzar, or Namybrus.

He is by some called Belefsis <sup>m</sup>, and by others Namybrus <sup>n</sup>, and both affect to give us an extraordinary story of him, which will be almost all we shall be able, in these authors, to find concerning the Babylonian empire, till it was put to an end.

UNDER the name of Belefsis, this first prince is represented as a crafty and a mean-spirited knave, and as nothing less than a hero. It is said he was base enough to circumvent Arbaces, his colleague and friend, in the most shameful manner, by pretending a vow he had, in the midst of the war, made to his god Belus, That if success was the event of it, and the palace of Sardanapalus was consumed, as it was, he would be at the charge and trouble of removing the ashes that were left to Babylon, and there heap them up into a mount near the temple of his god; there to stand as a monument to all who should navigate the Euphrates, of the subversion of the Assyrian empire. He, it seems, had been privately informed by an eunuch, he kept close up to himself, of the immense treasure which had been consumed in the conflagration of the palace at Niniveh, and, knowing it to be a secret to Arbaces, he was tempted to forge this pretence. His request was granted him, the ashes were given to him, to do with them as he would; and not only so, but Arbaces constituted him king of Babylon, with an exemption from all tribute. Belefsis, by this artifice, carried a prodigious treasure with him to Babylon; but, when the secret was discovered, he was called to an account for it, and tried by the other chiefs who had been assistant in the war, and who, upon his confession of the crime, condemned him to the loss of his head. But Arbaces, a magnificent and generous prince, freely forgave him, left him in possession of the treasure, and also in the independant government of Babylon, saying, The good he had done ought to serve us a veil to his crime; and thus he became at once a prince of great wealth and dominion <sup>o</sup>.

IN process of time, and under the successor of Arbaces, he became a man of dress, and shew, and effeminacy, unworthy of the kingdom or province he held. Namybrus, for so we must now call Belefsis, being informed, that a certain robust Mede, called Parfondas, held him in the utmost contempt, and had solicited the emperor of the Medes to divest him of his dominions, and to confer them upon himself, offered a very great reward to the man who should take Parfondas and bring him to him. Parfondas hunting some-where near Babylon with the king of the Medes, and straggling from the company, happened at length to fall in with some of the servants of the Babylonian Namybrus, who had been tempted with the promised reward. He had been all the day at his exercise, and being very thirsty, and these servants being purveyers to the king of Babylon, he asked them for a draught of wine, and they, knowing him, very readily plied him therewith, and not only so, but prevailed upon him to stay and eat a meal with them. Parfondas, who was thoroughly fatigued, thankfully accepted the offer, and, sending the prey he had taken to his king, indulged himself in what was laid before him, and especially in some rich wines, which were plentifully poured out on purpose to inebriate him. Parfondas, quite flustered, called for his horse that he might go to the king of the Medes where he was incamped, but, instead of his horse, they brought him some beautiful women, and desired he would pass his night with them, and defer his departure till the light of the next morning. He consented, and being sated with his pleasures, and fallen into a profound sleep, they rushed upon him in the midst of the night, bound him, and carried him off to Namybrus; who no sooner saw him, than he began to expostulate with him for his seditious attempts to displace him in Babylon, without any the least offence given on his part, that should make him an enemy. To this Parfondas resolutely answered, That he thought himself to be more worthy of the dominion than so indolent and effeminate a prince as he was; which the other taking into high disdain, and reflecting on him for the manner in which he had suffered himself to be surprised by his servants, vowed he would make him as soft, and as tender, and as delicate as any body <sup>p</sup>.

HAVING thus sworn by the gods Belus and Moliss [or Mylistis as it should be] he called for the eunuch who had charge of his music girls, and ordered him to shave him, and smooth and paint him, and dress him just after the manner of those girls, and to see that he learned their art, and by all the means and methods possible to transform him into one of them; accordingly, as the fable goes on, Parfondas became in a short time quite emasculated, and to all outward appearance even more delicate than a than the fairest female of them all, and exceeded them all in singing and playing, and the other arts of allurements; and whoever saw him, at the entertainments the king gave, not only pronounced him a woman, but the most beautiful of the train in waiting<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>m</sup> See before, p. 886. <sup>n</sup> NICOL. DAMASC. in Excerpt. VALES. p. 424. <sup>o</sup> CRIS. apud DIODOR. SICUL. l. 2. p. 78. <sup>p</sup> NICOL. DAMASC. ubi sup.

THE king of the Medes, Artaxerxes it seems by name, had in vain sought after his favourite companion Parfondas, and in vain offered rewards to whoever should produce him alive or dead, and, hearing no news of him, gave himself up to grief for his faithful servant, concluding he had been destroyed by some wild beast in the chase when he lost him. At length, after seven years, it happened that, an eunuch having been most cruelly scourged and beaten by Nanybrus's order, Parfondas took b the opportunity of the man's discontent, and, with great promises, prevailed on him to fly to the king of the Medes, and to make known to him his metamorphosis. The eunuch went, and told what he was ordered, and the king of the Medes no sooner heard it, than he was moved with the highest indignation. Immediately he dispatched an officer to Nanybrus to demand Parfondas; but, when the officer arrived at Babylon, he denied that he had ever known any thing of any such person. This answer being carried back to the Mede, he sent a more resolute and robust officer than the former, with letters commanding Nanybrus, without delay or reserve, to send him the man whom he had shamefully debased and confined among his eunuchs and music girls, or to expect the sudden loss of his head; and ordered the officer, c if he persisted in the denial, to bind him with his sash, or girdle, and to lead him to immediate execution. Nanybrus scared at this, and consulting his own safety, promised to deliver up the man, though he could abundantly justify himself with the king of the Medes for what he had done in this respect. He then entertained the officer at table, and the dishes were no sooner placed before them, than 150 women, among whom Parfondas was, made their appearance, singing, and playing upon various instruments; but Parfondas was more charming to the eye and to the ear by far than any of the rest; and accordingly Nanybrus inquiring of the Mede which he liked best? he immediately pointed at Parfondas. The Babylonian at this clapped his hands, and fell into an immoderate fit of laughter; and asking d his guest, whether or no he should be willing to pass his night with his favourite? and he declaring his desire that the thing might be so; Nanybrus told him he could not possibly grant it: Why then did you ask me the question, said the Mede? Nanybrus paused a while, at last, This, says he, is the Parfondas you want. The officer was astonished, and incredulous of what he heard, till at last the Babylonian, convincing him that what he told him was fact, alledged, that what he had done with Parfondas he could answer for before the king of the Medes. Artaxerxes, wondering at the prodigious alteration he saw in Parfondas, asked him, how it had been possible for him to live so long under such a load of infamy? Parfondas pleaded necessity, and the desire he had to see his face again, as also to live to see himself revenged; and begged e of all things that he would take revenge for him accordingly. Artaxerxes promised him fair, and Parfondas recovered himself to his former masculine habit and appearance<sup>2</sup>.

Artaxerxes came to Babylon, attended by Parfondas, who was continually calling upon him for justice; but, when Nanybrus appeared before the king, he pleaded his cause with great resolution, urging that Parfondas, towards whom he never was guilty of the least offence, would subdulously and barbarously have procured his death, that so he might succeed him in the kingdom of Babylon. The king of the Medes observed that this was but a weak excuse for his having presumed to act as judge in his own cause, and inflict punishments in his own right, instead of appealing to him, and submitting to what he should have thought most proper to be done in the case; and, f in short, declared that in ten days time he would pass the sentence on him he had deserved<sup>3</sup>.

Nanybrus, terrified at this, repairs to an eunuch called Mitrapbernes, who was in greatest favour with the king of the Medes, and promised him 10 talents of gold, 100 talents of silver, 10 golden cups, 200 of silver, and a great quantity of fine cloathing, if he would but stand his friend. As for the king of the Medes himself, he made him, by this eunuch, at the same time, an offer of 100 talents of gold, 1000 talents of silver, 100 golden goblets, 300 of the same in silver, innumerable vestments, and other rich gifts, if he might but have his life spared, and the kingdom of Babylon secured to him<sup>4</sup>.

THE

<sup>1</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>2</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>3</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>4</sup> Idem ibid.

THE eunuch, thus tempted, repaired to the king's bed-chamber, and pressed a him very much in the behalf of his client, representing that he had done nothing worthy of death; that he had not even taken a cruel revenge on Parfondas; that he had abstained from his blood, and served him only in kind. He then urged, that, if after this it should be thought right to deprive him of life, he might be spared for his sake, and promised that, if the favour was granted him, the Babylonian should present him with vast gifts, and give Parfondas 100 talents of silver. The king, at length, gave ear to the insinuations and arguments of this his favourite eunuch, and sentenced Nanybrus to a fine accordingly; which, as it gave great joy to Nanybrus, affected Parfondas equally with indignation and disdain, who bestowed his maledictions upon the man that first found out gold, seeing, for the sake of that, he was to live the sport and derision of an effeminate Babylonian. The eunuch, who had thus interposed with his good offices, understanding that Parfondas still glowed with rage, and even more than ever; not only exhorted him to be reconciled to Nanybrus, but told him it was the king's will and pleasure he should be so. But Parfondas, deaf to all that could be said to him on this subject, continued to meditate revenge, both on Nanybrus, and his friend the eunuch; and in the end had the satisfaction of being revenged on both <sup>b</sup>.

BUT we have been too particular in these stories about this pretended protomonarch of Babylon, so self-evidently fabulous, that to dilate thereon would only lead us into a repetition of what is gone before in disproof of the whole. <sup>c</sup>

The genuine history of the Babylonians.

Nabonassar.

FROM this fictitious relation then, to proceed to the genuine history of the Babylonians, in which there is a vast chasm of many hundreds of years between the times of Nimrod and Amraphel, to the times we are now reached down to; the first Babylonian king we meet with after these, and those we have mentioned to have succeeded between them, that we meet with in history sacred or profane, is Nabonassar, the first in Ptolemy's canon. Concerning this king, so well known for the æra that passes under his name, we have nothing particular recorded; but as it may be of great use to know in what manner he came to be king of Babylon, and how it comes to pass that Ptolemy could be assured of no Babylonian king who lived before his time, so late in comparison of what has most generally, and till very d lately, been pretended, we will venture to supply the deficiency by some probabilities and conjectures which may carry so much weight with them, after what we have said of the first rise, progress, and apparent obscurity of the antient kingdom of this people, as may satisfy every reader, that no point of history has been so perfectly mistaken, as that which relates to the first rise of the Babylonian kingdom, so much talked of by profane writers.

TOWARDS this attempt we have done much already, but this must be here premised, or rather repeated, that, however, we distinguish the Assyrians and Babylonians from each other; they were but two branches of one and the same family. By scripture this seems clearly to appear, where the Babylonian names are pure Assyrian; <sup>e</sup> and by profane authors as much is explicitly confessed, who unanimously agree, that the city of Babylon was built by the Assyrians; and hence we are to conclude, that the antient nations, that were in immediate subjection to Nimrod, have properly nothing to do with the great Babylonian kingdom, which arose in after-times, but must wholly relate to those people who migrated with Asbur, or Assur, and ever after retained his name. If any proof of this could be wanting, after what we have so often attempted in favour of it, we might not only recur to Ctesias himself, and to Herodotus, but to the whole tribe of Greek and Latin writers; we therefore shall insist no farther on it here, supposing it to be what must be universally granted, and shall only observe that in Ptolemy's canon the kings of Babylon are called Assyrians, and that in the same the kings of Persia are called the kings of the Medes, as it were in honour to the two nations of which they were natural branches; for, in strictness, the history of the empire of Babylon is no other than a continuation of the history of the Assyrian empire; just as the empire of the Persians is of the empire of the Medes; and hence, in the title of the canon above, you have mention only of the Assyrians and the Medes, though none but the kings of Babylon and Persia are to be found therein, excepting the princes which follow Alexander the great, <sup>f</sup>

<sup>g</sup> Idem ibid.

HAVING

- a HAVING settled this point, as we think beyond the possibility of dispute, we shall next endeavour at the proof of what we suggest, by the very situation of the countries in respect of each other, and the nature of things; by which it must be plain, that the kingdom of Babylon took birth with the kingdom of Assyria, and that they were twin sisters, or at least produced within a few years of each other. Previous to this we must just repeat, that Pul, the first Assyrian with us, does not appear as a conqueror westward above 24 years before the first of the reign of Nabonassar, and we would venture to assert, that Pul must then have been in the middle of life, and that after this he may have lived at least 24 years. And this being supposed, as it very naturally may, we shall have as good a proof as we can almost require, that he divided his empire between two of his sons; for, according to Ptolemy, Nabonassar had Babylon for his portion, and according to scripture, Tiglath-pileser had Assyria for his; for in scripture we find him as the immediate successor of Pul, in about seven years after whose death, as we have here stated it, he appears on this side of the Euphrates, and leads off with him a number of captives of different tribes and nations; so that no chronologies can more exactly concur together than the scripture and the canon in this particular; and what is more, they will, at the same time, help us to some lights to guide us to the truth of what Ctesias and his followers have so seemingly disguised, as we shall not fail to observe. In the mean time to return to our point, The very situation of these countries may convince us, that the thing was as we contend; for they so mutually extend against each other on the banks of the Tigris, which was the common boundary of both, and the only partition between them, and Babylonia was so throughout a barrier between Assyria and the western parts, that the Assyrian could not have reached any of them, but by crossing some part or other of the country of Babylon*, so that but to imagine that he attempted to cross the Euphrates, before he had made a conquest of this rich and fertile land, were an absurdity of the most glaring kind. Accordingly we find that Ctesias, how inconsistent soever he may have been in other points, was so sensible of this, that he makes this the first conquest the Assyrians attempted, even though he as good as confesses his Ninus never to have crossed the Euphrates, concluding it would appear
- c ridiculous, that a man, who had taken it into his head to become a conqueror, and to extend his dominion over all other other countries, should not first make sure of so near a neighbour, which must have been more tempting to him than any other he could possibly have in view, as well as most dangerous if left unconquered.

Now, as we have plainly seen that the two kingdoms took birth together in one man, it is inconsistent to suppose they were not in subordination to one another; and accordingly it appears that Nabonassar was the younger son, and consequently in subjection to his brother Tiglath-pileser, who is stiled the king of Assyria, and held his residence at the original seat of the empire, Niniveb, which, that it was older than the city called by us Babylon, is not only to be gathered from the prophet†, and other passages in scripture, but from the bulk of profane authors, who concur, that Niniveb was finished before the foundations of Babylon were laid.

THIS being settled, we shall have no more reason to wonder, that these two kingdoms were in perfect harmony, than that two brothers should agree together; the ambition of the one must have contributed to the grandeur and prosperity of the other reciprocally; and that a right of superiority was acknowledged by the younger branch at Babylon, towards the elder at Niniveb, may be easily conceived. If this was not exactly the case, we shall have such difficulties start up against us, both in the history of Babylon and that of Assyria, as are quite insurmountable. We know they existed as collateral kingdoms, for while the great Sennacherib was in his full glory, and warring in the west, we read of an embassy from Merodach Baladan, king of Babylon, to Hezekiah; not to mention the other kings before him and after him in the canon. Now if there had not been the strictest union, and a most natural subordination, between the two kingdoms on the other side of the Euphrates; is it to be imagined, that any king of Assyria would have crossed that river to war in the west, while he was disjoined from his own country by so formidable and powerful a kingdom as Babylon must have been, and who might have taken the advantage in his absence, when he had, as it is likely, drained his country try of the choicest of his soldiery, to spoil and destroy it? Or might they not have <sup>a</sup> joined the Ciseuphratenfians against him, and have surrounded him on all sides, and, by the additional numbers they must have brought into the field, have routed and utterly destroyed him? And must not this or the other have really been the case some time or other, if the kings of the two countries had not been bound together by the most solemn ties of obligation every way? Could the Babylonians, who were confessedly a kingdom all the time, have been so supine as supposed, with such a neighbour at their very door, and when, at the same time, they must have known that all the western nations would most readily have joined them to destroy these ambitious princes, who, by so frequently crossing the Euphrates, exposed themselves, as powerful as their armies may have been, as often, in great measure to their <sup>b</sup> mercy? Other irresistible arguments may be urged, to maintain us in what we would here advance; but, apprehending we have said rather more than enough to convince the reader already, we shall pass them over as needless.

The kingdom of Babylon is subjection to that of Assyria.

* See the map of these countries. † See before, p. 936.

Nabonassar likely to have been the Ninus of profane authors.

FROM all this we may gather, that Nabonassar, this first king of Babylon, bids as fair to have been the Ninus of Ctesias, as Tiglatb-pilefar, and rather more so; and particularly as he was, as is most likely, the husband of Semiramis, who, if she had any right to be denominated from any city of these parts, was confessedly, according to the common notion, a Babylonian, as we shall observe immediately. For notwithstanding the Ninus of Ctesias is said to have raised the city of Niniveh, in which he differs from what we think very evident, he agrees in so many other <sup>c</sup> points with the person of Nabonassar, that he makes full amends for it. We have seen him the visible son of Pul, whom we have asserted to have been the Belus of that author; and that he was a warrior cannot be doubted, when it is considered, that the family he was a branch of had just begun to establish a power, by conquest, over all the nations they could reach. But that he may have been magnified a little beyond the truth, or indeed a great deal, must not astonish us, when we remember, that this younger family, rising upon the ruins of the elder, may have arrogated more to themselves than was really their due, and that even what they did arrogate may have been enlarged by tradition, which always spreads as it goes.

THUS far again we see a resemblance between Ninus and Nabonassar, the con- <sup>d</sup> quests of the former are confined wholly to the Transseuphratenfian regions, he never once makes his appearance on this side of the river<sup>1</sup>, except in the romantic lists of his conquests. And so it is most likely to have been with Nabonassar, who may have warred upon the Medes, the Bactrians, and neighbouring people, while the emperor, his eldest brother, was prosecuting a war, and grasping at conquests of far greater importance, whereby he hoped to become master of the great and wealthy kingdoms of Syria, Phenice, and Palestine, and thereby to pave his way to Egypt itself; states, which for their great opulence must, above all others, have allured a race of princes, possessed with an unnatural lust to live upon the spoil.

As we have seen that he may possibly have been the Ninus of profane writers, we <sup>e</sup> are next to declare, that he can never have been either the Sbalmaneser of scripture, or the Belefsis of Ctesias, according to the generality of christians. Sbalmaneser he cannot possibly have been; for he had, according to the canon, been dead five years before Sbalmaneser seems to have begun his reign; nor can he have been Belefsis, for, if he be a prince any where in the canon, he must have been Nabopolassar, and indeed can have been no other. Now Nabopolassar did not begin to reign at Babylon till full 108 years after Nabonassar had been departed this life. Nor consequently can he have been Nanybrus, who was confessedly the same with Belefsis.

Semiramis
most likely to have been the wife of Nabonassar.

To dwell no longer on the mistakes that have been committed with regard to this first king of Babylon, we would next observe, that the Semiramis of the Greeks <sup>f</sup> must have been his wife, if ever there was such a queen of Babylon; whereby we shall still more amply evince that he may have been Ninus. We have been told she was born at Ascalon in Syria, that she was brought from that country by a certain officer belonging to the king of Assyria, and that Ninus fell in love with her, though married to that officer, and made her his queen<sup>2</sup>. Now as we have stated the chronology of Assyria and Babylonia, it was about the middle of Nabonassar's reign at Babylon, that his seeming brother, Tiglatb-pilefar, crossed the Euphrates, and captivated some of the tribes and nations to the westward. Among these

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 872, 873, & seq.

<sup>2</sup> See before, p. 877.

- a these captives it is very likely Semiramis may have been, according to the story of Ctesias; and as she must have been a woman of very superior wit and beauty, it is not strange that some great Assyrian lord should take her to his bed, and even make her his most favourite wife. It is possible also that she may have attended him to the war with the Bactrians, as related<sup>a</sup>, where we have made it probable that Nabonassar may have commanded. And that this was something of the case appears by this, that Ninus lived not very long with her, and left her behind him with a young child<sup>b</sup>. Now Nabonassar reigned but 14 years in all<sup>c</sup>; and it was in the seventh year of his reign that Tiglath-pileser first made any captives from this side of the river. If then we suppose, as according to the story we may,
- b that she lived with her first husband five years, she must have fallen to the lot of Nabonassar, if she was his wife, in the latter end of his 12th, or the beginning of his 13th year, and so he can have lived with her but barely two years; and this agrees seemingly with Ctesias, who, as we apprehend, makes the duration of their marriage to be very short<sup>d</sup>.

- If we build upon any foundation, as possibly we may, we shall hereby be able to discover how it came to pass that she had the sovereign sway over Babylon, as also that her reign was but very short. For considering her own personal excellencies, that she must have been the idol of her deceased husband, and the mother and nurse of a tender infant he had left to succeed him, nothing is more natural
- c than that she should assume the reins of the government, and in consequence thereof attempt to make herself an everlasting name for her exploits abroad, and her works at home. Accordingly it is possible she may have headed armies to some of the people mentioned in her story; and though she did not build the city of Babylon, which by all circumstances we may assure ourselves she did not; she may so have added to it, or embellished it, as to have entitled her as much, in proportion, to the honour of being reckoned the foundress of Babylon, as Nebuchadnezzar had to be esteemed the founder. A woman, of the sort she must have been, could never slip so favourable an opportunity of making herself conspicuous to all ages; and by her example she is said to have stirred an emulation in a queen, who succeeded
- d almost 200 years after her, and who, it seems, vied with her to the degree of eclipsing her<sup>e</sup>. The name of this queen is Nitocris, and between her and Semiramis there is said to have been five generations<sup>f</sup>, which, according to the common way of computing, being equal to 150 years, and the sum of the years of the Babylonian kings amounting to 210, if from thence we deduct the 14 years of Nabonassar's reign, and as many from that of Nabonadius, who was the last king, and the son of this Nitocris<sup>g</sup>, we shall have a remainder of 182 years. This will be an argument against us, with regard to what we are attempting to prove of Semiramis, and we confess it; for after this rate Semiramis must have lived above six generations before Nitocris; we would therefore, since we have so many concurrent
- e circumstances in our behalf, conclude that Herodotus is mistaken in this matter, which he well may be, in so traditionary a piece of history as this must have been in his time. If no historian had made greater mistakes than this, we should not have been involved in such labyrinths as we have often been throughout the course of this work.

- Now, if things were as we suspect them to have been, this great and deified Semiramis reigned but two years<sup>h</sup>, for her son, according to this, lived no longer, and must have died at two or three years old; and indeed we have formerly made it an objection<sup>i</sup>, that she should have reigned so great a length of time after her son was arrived at years of discretion. Nor can she have been any other than the
- f wife of Nabonassar, by the tradition which makes her the foundress of Babylon, of which she is reported to have laid the very foundations; this is supposing her to have been the first queen there, and if so, as at the bottom of the profane accounts there may be something of truth as we have observed<sup>k</sup> before, she can have been queen to no Ninus, but Nabonassar, and can have reigned no longer than her infant son, who was king but two years.

HAVING thus picked some seeming truth out of Ctesias's fiction, we may from the several particulars reflect a light on the worship that was paid to her, particularly before, p. 877.

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 876.

before in the canon, ubi sup.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. p. 877.

<sup>c</sup> HERODOT. l. i. c. 185.

<sup>d</sup> See before in the notes, p. 883.

<sup>e</sup> See before in the canon, p. 935.

<sup>f</sup> Idem, ibid.

<sup>g</sup> Idem, ibid.

<sup>h</sup> See before, p. 871.

<sup>i</sup> See

<sup>j</sup> See

<sup>k</sup> See

hence it came to pass that Semiramis ruled over Babylon.

cularly in Palestine, Syria, and Babylon<sup>1</sup>. For she may have really been born in a the first, transported from the second, and deified in the third; so that, each having a sort of natural claim to her, it is no wonder they so eagerly contended to do her honour. All this may stand with the times we here suppose her to have lived in; but can possibly suit with no other that we know of. And that she was of mean extraction at Ascalon; that she was in the state of a servant in Syria, or the parts adjacent; and that thence she was carried to Niniveh or Babylon, does not only appear by the Ctesian account of her, and by what is positively asserted of her, that she was originally a servant, or slave<sup>m</sup>; but also by the fable invented to cover the obscurity of her birth. In a word, the circumstances, as related of her by profane authors, may very naturally be deduced from the circumstances of the first rise of the Assyrian b monarchy in scripture; and it is plain they are put backwards a number of ages, only to reflect the greater degree of reverence on her; nor must we wonder that she had forty years added to the length of her reign, by the priests, or others, who may have had a greater interest in magnifying her, than in an adherence to the naked truth, any more than that she should be said to have done infinitely more than that it is certain she did; or that in the end she should have been deified; for whatever could contribute to derive the greater honour on her, contributed the more to confirm her in the superstitious awe that in time came to be contracted for her.

Particulars concerning her.

HAVING thus seen that Semiramis must, in all probability, have been the wife c of Nabonassar, the first Babylonian king, and son to the great Pul, or Belus, we shall next take notice of some circumstances concerning her, which we purposely omitted when we gave her history as queen of Assyria. She is equally famed as the foundress of the city of Babylon, and as a fortunate heroine, who aimed at no less than the conquest of the whole known world, as we have seen: That she may have embellished or added greatly to that city, we have granted, nor can we refuse some sort of credit to so general a tradition; nor will we deny but she may have warred against the Bactrians, and other nations in those parts<sup>n</sup>; and this her masculine turn of mind may, by the way, confirm us in a belief, that she was from her youth bred up to the toil and labour of a servant, as reported, which must naturally have formed her to such exploits. As for what she did at Babylon, it must have been d but little in comparison to what was done to it afterwards, when it came to be improved by the great Nebuchadnezzar, as we shall hereafter observe; only for the present taking notice, that as the city must in her time have been in its infancy, and she at most reigned but two years without the participation of her husband, and not above four years in all, and in the midst of the wars then waging by the Assyrians with all the nations round about, it is not conceivable but she must have left that city in no very extraordinary state for magnificence or grandeur.

AGAIN, as her reign must have been very short, we would urge that she did not any thing like what is reported of her as an heroine; and that it is almost clear that she did no more than finish the war with the Medes, or with the Bactrians, or e perhaps with both, as tradition informs us; and that thus she completed what her husband Nabonassar, according to our supposition, had begun, and conducted towards an end. More she certainly cannot have done in the short space of her administration, whether in the days of her husband or of her son; and this must have intitled her to immortal fame, if at the same time, as it seems we must grant, she did any thing notable towards the improvement or embellishment of the city of Babylon; nor is it strange that after this we should be shewn her through the magnifying-glass of prophane authors, who had their accounts from the Babylonians, who may have thought they could not possibly do themselves too much honour in reporting wonders of this their first and most fortunate queen. And all their tales being greedily swallowed even by the most judicious, we have her thence compared f with Sesostris<sup>o</sup>, a fabulous hero, and hence we see her building of fleets, arming of legions, raising of Babylon, and, in short, circumnavigating the red sea, or Indian ocean, and reducing the Arabians and Ethiopians<sup>p</sup>, and hence her altars, together with those of Hercules, the Liber Pater, and others towards the confines of India<sup>q</sup>. Hence she is represented to have been a tyranness of the most rigid and inexorable sort; and

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 920.    <sup>m</sup> See before in the notes, p. 878. & PLIN. Hist. Natur. l. 35. c. 18. p. 694.
<sup>n</sup> See before, p. 880. 'B'    <sup>o</sup> PLUTARCH, ΓΥΜΝΙΚΩΝ ἀρεταί, p. 243.    <sup>p</sup> Idem, Περὶ τῆς Αἰθιοπίας
τύχης ἡ ἀρετῆς λόγος, p. 336.    <sup>q</sup> PLIN. Hist. Nat. l. 6. c. 16. p. 314.    <sup>r</sup> Excerpt. Chronol.
ex AFRICAN. EUSEB. & alius, p. 74.

a and hence she is fabled to have been so active in keeping the people in subjection and awe, that hearing of a tumult, and an insurrection of the Babylonians, as she was dressing her head, she would not give herself time to finish what she was about, but rushed forth from her chamber with her hair half about her ears, to reduce the revoltors, and would never do so much as set her hair in order before she had done as she had resolved<sup>a</sup>; and that thenceforward she was represented by a statue at Babylon, in an undress, and with her hair half dishevelled<sup>b</sup>. Hence it is she is represented as a monster of lust<sup>c</sup>; and hence she is celebrated for the many mighty deeds and exploits we have formerly related of her<sup>d</sup>, and others equally fabulous, which we shall not here insist on. In fine, she is said to have been the first Assyrian queen and lady, to have first surrounded Nineveh with walls, and to have changed its name into Babylon<sup>e</sup>; a strange absurdity, we need not animadvert on. But after all that is boasted of her by the same author<sup>f</sup>, he acquaints us that she died in her bed<sup>g</sup>.

THE second king of the Babylonians is called Nadius<sup>a</sup>, who reigned but two years; and if what we have ventured to conjecture in the foregoing reign was at all the case, as by comparing things together, as we have there done, it seems to have been, this Nadius must have been the Ninyas of Ctesias and his followers, and must have died an infant of about three years old.

THE next that filled the throne were Chinzirus<sup>b</sup> and Porus, who reigned five years: Concerning these we have nothing to conjecture. The names seem to belong to two persons, and they may have been brothers; or it may be, that one man may have born both the names, which seem to have no direct affinity either with the Chaldees or the Assyrians.

Jugæus<sup>c</sup> reigned next; there is nothing recorded of him, nor can we offer at one conjecture concerning him, except that he, as well as those that immediately preceded, and those that came after him, down to Assar-addin, did nothing worthy notice, and that they may have passed their days in sloth and effeminacy.

Mardoc-empad<sup>d</sup>, he is certainly the Merodach-baladan of scripture, the same that sent an embassy to Hezekiah king of Judah. The times of the former in the canon, and of the latter in scripture, agree exactly; and it must have been in the seventh or eighth year of his reign that he sent to Hezekiah. In Isaiab<sup>e</sup> he is called Merodach-baladan, as we have written him above, but in the book of Kings he is called Bero-dach-baladan<sup>f</sup>, and in both places, the son of Baladan, whence we gather, that the Jugæus above, who seems to have been his father, would perhaps have been more properly called Baladan, though that is what we would not venture to do. If, as is most generally supposed, he sent this embassy to Jerusalem, to enquire concerning the regression of the shadow upon Abaz's sun-dial<sup>g</sup>, he must be concluded to have been a prince of curiosity, and a man that cultivated astronomy, or at least encouraged it in others: Though that this was all the business of this embassy, may be disputed; for there seems to have been some other view in it, by the parade Hezekiah, upon this occasion, made of his warlike stores and treasures<sup>h</sup>. It may be suspected there was something more than the solution of a curious enquiry intended; for as Sennacherib was then alive, it cannot well be conceived how there should have been such a liberty taken by his Babylonian relation or dependant, as to correspond with an enemy by ambassadors. This is the first Babylonian king we read of in scripture to have had any intercourse with the kings at Jerusalem; and he must have been a man of resolution and ambition, if we suppose he wanted to draw Hezekiah into an alliance with him against the Assyrian emperor. Upon the whole, the men he sent from Babylon seem rather to have been private agents than public ambassadors, and what was transacted with them seems to have been quite a secret. He may have understood, that the Medes were on the point to revolt, as they certainly did a very short time afterwards, and that other nations, their neighbours, were ripe for the same; this he may have known, and may therefore have attempted alliances with the Jews and others, on this side the Euphrates, against Sennacherib, to secure his own dominions, or to enable him the fourth Sect. of the Hist. of Assyria.

<sup>a</sup> VALER. MAXIM. l. 9. c. 3.

<sup>b</sup> See before in the canon, p. 935.

<sup>c</sup> 2 Kings xx. 12.

<sup>d</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>e</sup> SUIDAS ad vocem Σμίσσας.

<sup>f</sup> Ibid.

<sup>g</sup> Ibid.

<sup>h</sup> PLIN. ubi sup.

<sup>i</sup> See before in

<sup>j</sup> Ibid.

<sup>k</sup> Ibid.

<sup>l</sup> Ibid.

<sup>m</sup> Ibid.

<sup>n</sup> Isai. xxxix. 1.

<sup>o</sup> Isai. xxxix. 2.

him to withstand such incursions as he may have dreaded from the same people; a but we forbear to expatiate farther hereon. Thus far is certain, that things now began to threaten some calamity to Assyria; and it is likely Merodach-baladan might have foreseen it, and bestirred himself to make sure of what belonged to himself. This prince reigned 12 years, and was succeeded by Arkianus.

First inter-reign.

Arkianus <sup>b</sup>, concerning whom all we know is, that he reigned but five years, and that after him there was an inter-reign of two years<sup>1</sup>. This is distinguished as the first inter-reign in the Babylonian kingdom, and thereby it might be fairly concluded, that the line of Nabonassar became extinct in the last king, or that it was set aside, if it be not more rational to suppose that the kingdom was not hereditary, so as to fall of course to the eldest son. There may have been disputes among the sons<sup>b</sup> about the succession; or the king of Nineveh, who may have appointed the kings of Babylon according to his own pleasure and good liking, may not, in this space of time, have determined who should next be king of Babylon. Assar-baddon was now emperor of Assyria, and the Medes had actually revolted five or six years before, and he may now have been at a loss who to substitute in the throne of Babylon, which, if what we have observed be right, may have been filled by slothful and inactive princes ever since the death of Nabonassar, or his wife, if she was so, Semiramis. For while the kings of Nineveh were successively warring in the west, the kings of Babylon may have degenerated considerably, and have fallen into disgrace and vice, in conformity to what profane authors relate of the successors of Semiramis; <sup>c</sup> and may, by their indolence or connivance, have encouraged the Medes to shake off the yoke.

Belibus.

Bélibus <sup>k</sup> succeeded to this inter-reign, but by what means, or by what right, we know not, except that it may plainly appear, that he was appointed by Assar-baddon. He reigned but three years, at the end of which term, whether he died, or was displaced, may be doubted, by the shortness of his duration as king.

Apronadius.
Regibélus.
Metessimordacus.

He made room for Apronadius <sup>l</sup>, who reigned six years, and gave place to Regibélus <sup>m</sup>, who possessing the throne but one year, made way for Metessimordacus <sup>n</sup>, who held the scepter but four years, and gave place to an inter-reign<sup>o</sup>, which lasted full eight years. This chasm or deficiency may be reasonably urged as a proof, that the kings of Babylon were at the pleasure of the king of Assyria, and appointed by him, as he thought proper, out of the Babylonian family; the shortness of the four preceding reigns, may persuade us, that the kings, between this inter-reign and the former, did not succeed each other as father and son, and the same we may indeed conclude of the kings between Nabonassar and the first inter-reign, who were but a little while on the throne, and seem to have been rather appointed governors for a certain term of years, than kings succeeding in right of each other, and reigning to the end of their lives. And it is reasonable to suppose that the elder family at Nineveh must in time have assumed considerably over the younger at Babylon, and contracted a jealousy of them, and at length imposed such hardships on them, or have some way or other behaved to them so as to provoke them at last to join with the Medes to destroy them. Thus the thing seems to have been.

Second inter-reign.

Assar-addin.

THE eight years of this inter-reign being expired, Assar-addin <sup>p</sup>, the Esar-baddon of scripture, possessed himself of the kingdom of Babylon. We have already said all we positively know of him, when we formerly gave his reign as king of Assyria. It is remarkable that he should deliberate so long as eight years, before he assumed the government of Babylon in person. We formerly made it a doubt<sup>q</sup>, whether or no he seated himself master here by art or by violence; but by what we think we plainly discover of these collateral kingdoms of the Assyrians and Babylonians, he now set aside the Babylonian family as useless or dangerous to his empire, which must now <sup>r</sup> have been in a very crazy condition. By this step of policy he seems to have re-established the Assyrian monarchy; and remarkable it may be thought that he made no attempts towards the recovery and extension of the Assyrian conquests westward, till he had thus taken Babylon to himself. Hence it may appear that the former division of the empire, however small it may have been, was now judged hurtful to it; and that so it is like to have been, appears by the consequences of this junction, which presently after raised the Assyrians to a higher pitch than ever they had been,

at

<sup>b</sup> See before in the canon, ubi sup.
<sup>m</sup> Ibid.    <sup>n</sup> Ibid.    <sup>o</sup> Ibid.
<sup>l</sup> Ibid.

<sup>k</sup> See before, ibid.    <sup>p</sup> Ibid.    <sup>q</sup> See before, p. 895.    <sup>r</sup> See before, ibid.

a at least in the western parts, where under this king they established their power more firmly than it ever had been, and even conquered Egypt<sup>1</sup>. The obscurity of the kings of Babylon between Nabonassar and this Affar-addin, may have given birth to what is related of the sloth and inactivity of all the kings that succeeded between Semiramis and Sardanapalus, a name which we have as good as proved to have belonged to this prince<sup>2</sup>; but at the same time we have shewn there were two of the name, a warrior, and an effeminate man. This then must have been Sardanapalus the warrior, for his history declares him to have been such, but this is what we need not repeat. He reigned at Babylon 13 years, and was succeeded by

Saosducheus, or Saosduchinus<sup>3</sup>, who, as well as his predecessor, was king both of Saosducheus.

b Nineveh and Babylon. We have already said all of him we have been able to collect<sup>4</sup>, as king of Affyria. He reigned 20 years, and was succeeded by Chyniladan<sup>5</sup>, whom we have shewn to have been the Nabuchodonosor of the Chyniladan book of Judith<sup>6</sup>, where we have given all the history we know of him. He, as well as his two predecessors, was king both of Affyria and Babylon, and reigned 22 years. The length of these three reigns, which in sum make up 55 years, which exceeds the sum of the nine reigns and two inter-reigns between Nabonassar and Affar-addin, by two years, may convince us of what we hinted a little higher, that the kings of Babylon during that interval were little better than governors, placed and displaced by the kings of Affyria at their will and pleasure; and continued or discontinued just as they approved themselves more or less trusty, and serviceable to the Affyrian kings. Hitherto the kingdom of Babylon had been dependant on the emperors at Nineveh; it now begins to emerge, and to rear up its head as an empire, and to raise itself on the ruins of the Affyrian monarchy.

For Nabopallasar<sup>7</sup> succeeded Chyniladan, and is said to have wrested the king-Nabopallasar. dom of Babylon from the Affyrians, and to have seized on it himself, and is plainly the man who transferred the seat of the Affyrian monarchy to Babylon. His name declares him to have been an Affyrian, and to have derived his origin from Pul and Nabonassar his son, it partaking equally of both; for as Nabonassar is plainly compounded of Nebo-addon-assur, this man seems to have rejected the Addon for Pul,<sup>8</sup> Year of the Flood, 2373. Year before CHRIST, 626. and to have had his name compounded from Nebo-pul-assur; which it is likely he may have assumed upon his revolt from the Affyrian Sarac, Sarchedon, or Sardanapalus above mentioned<sup>9</sup>, and claims, as should plainly appear by his name, to have been lineally descended from Pul by Nabonassar, and so, it is likely, pretended to a right of inheritance in the kingdom of Babylon, of which his family had been unjustly deprived by the elder branch of Affyria. This seems to us a very natural conclusion, and if so, he had a fair opportunity of asserting his right; for being appointed over Chaldea, upon the death of Chyniladan, who left the Affyrian affairs in great confusion, and at a time when the Medes were in the full vigour of their pursuit against the kings at Nineveh<sup>10</sup>, he took the advantage, and seizing on the kingdom of Babylon for himself, he entered into alliances with Astyages the Mede, and to confirm the same, desired his daughter Amyite in marriage for his son Nabocolassar<sup>11</sup>, and joining heartily in the war with him against the kingdom of Affyria, they reduced it to a very humble condition, though, as we have made it appear<sup>12</sup>, he did not live to see the final destruction of it; for the irruption of the Scythians put a stop to the progress of these new allies, for the space, as we are told, of 28 years<sup>13</sup>.

This prince is called by contraction Nabulassar<sup>14</sup>, but by the same author he is also called Nabuchadonosor<sup>15</sup>, as he is by others<sup>16</sup> Nebuchadnezzar, whence he is distinguished from his son, as the first of that name<sup>17</sup>; in a word, he, and no other, can have been the Belefs of Ctesias<sup>18</sup>, and the Narybrus of Nicholas of Damascus<sup>19</sup>; but what is seemingly strange, he is also called Sardanapalus, which we have taken notice of already<sup>20</sup>. This prince, besides what he must have suffered and apprehended from the Scythians, who, during his time, prevailed in Asia<sup>21</sup>, was in imminent danger

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 896.    <sup>2</sup> See before in the notes, p. 896.    <sup>3</sup> See before in the canon, ubi sup.
<sup>4</sup> See before, p. 897.    <sup>5</sup> See before in the canon, ubi supr.    <sup>6</sup> See before, p. 897. (U) 898, &c.    <sup>7</sup> See before in the canon, ubi supr.    <sup>8</sup> See before, p. 902. a, (C)    <sup>9</sup> See before in the notes, ibid.    <sup>10</sup> See before, ibid.    <sup>11</sup> ALEX. POLYHIST. apud SYNCER. p. 210. EUSEB.
in Chron.    <sup>12</sup> See before, p. 903. (E, F)    <sup>13</sup> See before, ibid.    <sup>14</sup> Beros. apud JOSEPH.
contr. AP. I. 1. p. 1044. & Antiq. I. 10. c. 11.    <sup>15</sup> Idem apud eund. Antiq. I. 10. c. 11.    <sup>16</sup> In Libr. JUCHASIN. p. 136.    <sup>17</sup> DAVID GANTZ II. Chion. I. 2. n. 285.    <sup>18</sup> See before,
p. 938. b.    <sup>19</sup> See before, ibid.    <sup>20</sup> See before, p. 902. (A)    <sup>21</sup> See before, p. 903. (E) danger of being blasted in his hopes by an invasion from Egypt. For Pharaoh Necbo, at that time king of the country, understanding that the kingdom of Assyria was as good as dissolved, by the combination of the Babylonians with the Medes, and that the confederates themselves were under restraint from the Syrians, thought this a proper opportunity to be revenged on the Trans-euphratenians, who had captivated the kingdom of Egypt, in the days of the great Esar-baddon <sup>1</sup>, and to raise himself an empire over the kingdoms and countries on this side of the Euphrates, which had, for some time past, been under the kings of Assyria by conquest. He prosecuted his design, succeeded to his wish, and even took the great city of Carchemish, Circutium, or, as it is most corruptedly written, Carchabesa, upon the Euphrates <sup>2</sup>. This we are told was his case, but we have already proved it to be <sup>b</sup> false; for before this invasion of Necbo he must have been dead some time, as appears by the circumstance we are told of Josiah's death, who was slain at Megiddo, in making head against Necbo, as he was marching against the king of Assyria <sup>3</sup>, who can have been none other than Sarac <sup>4</sup>; for as Josiah reigned full 31 years <sup>5</sup>, he must, according to the course of scripture and Ptolemy's canon, have survived Nabopolassar. It is therefore plain that we cannot rely upon Berosus <sup>6</sup>, when he informs us, that he sent his son Nabuchadonosor to quell the rebellious satrapa, or governor of Egypt, Phenicia and Syria, as he plainly calls Pharaoh Necbo; nor did Nabuchadonosor effect this till after his death, and after he had subverted Nineveh, which was brought to pass by his valour and good fortune, in conjunction with Cyaxares the Mede, his brother-in-law <sup>7</sup>. There was then no war between Babylon and Egypt, during the life of Nabopolassar, nor was there any such Officer as a satrapa set up by the Assyrians over Egypt, Phenicia and Syria in his time; Egypt had recovered itself a considerable time before, from the conquest and captivation of Esar-baddon; and Judah was all this time under her own king Josiah <sup>8</sup>; and that all the western regions, on this side of the Euphrates, had shaken off the Assyrian yoke is plain, not only by the history of Chyniladan <sup>9</sup>, but by the trouble the great Nebuchadnezzar had afterwards to reduce them to Babylon. We may perceive then that Berosus, in the passage before us, confounds the father and son together, and that he is too hasty in bringing on the destruction of Nineveh; for till that had been effected, there is no supposing the <sup>d</sup> Babylonians could have pretended to cross the Euphrates; and that there was a king of Assyria subsisting in the day that Josiah was killed by Necbo, we learn from scripture <sup>e</sup>, and that Josiah survived Nabopolassar, we understand by comparing the same with the canon <sup>4</sup>. This satrapa of Egypt and Syria must be understood proleptically, except we suppose the office to have subsisted upon the conquests of Esar-baddon; which if it did, whoever enjoyed it had little to boast but the empty title, as may be easily discovered. We are certain then of no one particular fact relating to Nabopolassar, except that he revolted from the king of Assyria, that he joined with the Mede, in order to put an end to that kingdom, and that he reigned 21 years, and was succeeded by his son

Nabopolassar. Nabopolassar <sup>6</sup>; who is the great Nebuchadnezzar of scripture, and is by the Greeks called Nabuchadonosor (A). It was he that compleated what his father had aimed at, and subjected what had been before the Assyrian empire, to the obedience of that of Babylon; it is he therefore that must be called the first Babylonian monarch. It has been said, that his father, grown old and feeble, had intrusted him with the reins of the

Year of the
Flood, 2394.
Year before
CHRIST, 605.

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 896. <sup>2</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. ubi sup. c. 7. <sup>3</sup> See before, p. 267. <sup>4</sup> See before in the notes, p. 903. <sup>5</sup> See before, p. 845. <sup>6</sup> See before, p. 902. <sup>7</sup> See before, p. 845. <sup>8</sup> Apud JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 10. c. 11. & contra APION. l. 1. <sup>9</sup> See NEWTON's Chron. of anc. Kingd. amend. p. 292. <sup>a</sup> 2 KINGS xxiii. 29. See before in the notes, p. 896. <sup>b</sup> See before, p. 841, 842, 843, & seq. <sup>c</sup> See before, p. 897, 898. <sup>d</sup> 2 Kings ubi sup. <sup>e</sup> See before in the notes, p. 903. <sup>f</sup> See before in the canon, p. 935.

(A) His Name, taken which way you will, may be discovered to have been Assyrian, by the termination Assur. We have already given the seeming derivation of it ||, and only mention it here to remind the reader of what we have so often asserted, that the Babylonian monarchy, how much soever it may have been distinguished from the Assyrian, was no more than a continuation of it. And this may be the more pertinently remarked here, as this prince was not only the first emperor at Babylon, properly so called; for his father can never be quite considered as such; but as he was also the man in whom the Assyrian or Babylonian greatness arrived at its utmost height, as appears by Daniel, who, summing up the whole of it in his person, declares, that the golden head he saw in his vision, was meant to signify that monarch. *

|| Before, p. 867. f.

* Dan. ii. 38.

a the government some years before he died, and that, in consequence of this, he waged war with Pharaoh Necho, who had conquered all Syria to himself, while the Medes and Babylonians were under restraint by the Scythians, or busied in the reduction of Nineveh; and that in this war he not only wrested Carchemish, or Circesium, or Circutium, a considerable town on the Mesopotamian side of the Euphrates, from Pharaoh Necho, and routed him with a great slaughter; but reduced all the provinces on this side of the Euphrates which had been seized by Necho, and made a conquest even of Egypt itself, where, understanding his father was dead at Babylon, he took the necessary measures to secure those countries, and by the shortest way of the desert, hastened to that metropolis. This we have shewn to be a mistake; b so far as it is possible to detect an error of this nature (B). Nor can he be reasonably f BEROS. apud JOSEPH. CONTR. APION. l. 1. & apud EUSEB. in PRÆP. EVANG. l. 9. c. 40. p. 455.

(B) We have already (1) demonstrated the thing to have been as we here suggest, concerning the death of Nabopolassar; but as it is a point which immediately concerns the history of this branch of the Affrian family, we may be allowed to repeat our attempt here, by stating it in another manner, and to make it still clearer, if it be possible so to do. From the death of Affar-addin to the first year of the reign of Chyniladan is 30 years, and from the first of the reign of Chyniladan to the 12th, that he warred upon the Medes, is 32 years. Manasseb was taken prisoner by Affar-addin in the 21st year of his reign, and, according to all appearance in the 9th or 10th year of Affar-addin's reign at Babylon. The 9th or 10th year we say; because, as he took Manasseb captive not long before he invaded Egypt, and was to hold Egypt but three years (2), according to the prophet, and reigned at Babylon but 13 years, we cannot be induced but to think he effected his conquest of Egypt in the latter part of his reign, and that, as he certainly must have kept the same in subjection all his life-time, he died within three or four years after he had taken Manasseb prisoner. This being stated, if Manasseb was made a captive in the 9th or 10th year of Affar-addin at Babylon, and as Manasseb reigned 34 years after his said captivity, if to the 32 years between the war Chyniladan made upon the Medes, and the death of Affar-addin, we add three or four years, to make the 13 years of this last king complete at Babylon, it must follow, that Manasseb died either in the 10th or 11th year of the said Chyniladan; and as between the last year of Manasseb, and the first of Josiab, there is an interval but of two years, Josiab must have begun his reign either in the 12th or the 13th year of the same Chyniladan; from the 12th or the 13th of Chyniladan, to the last year of his successor Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, must, according to this, have been either 30 or 31 years. Now Josiab reigned 31 years, and therefore must either have outlived Nabopolassar by one year, or have died the same year he died; supposing the reign of this Babylonian to have ended with his life, and we know not how to think otherwise, for if he had committed the reins of his government ever so much to the guidance of his son, he must have been considered, according to all appearance, but as his lieutenant; the father must still have been king, though we consider him but as colleague with his son, and the years he lived and reigned, either in whole or in part, must have been reckoned to him accordingly. Now when Josiab was killed, there was a king of Affria still in being, it was not against the Medes and Babylonians that Pharaoh Necho went up, as Josephus in a hurry mistakes the matter: his business was apparently to get a share of the Affrian empire, which the Medes and Babylonians were on the point of dividing between them; Nabopolassar then could have claimed no lawful homage of the king of Egypt, who can have been no rebel to him. nor can he have even sent his son to such remote parts as Egypt, when he had so much to do at home, and found that his whole force, combined together with that of the Medes, was not more than necessary to destroy the old Affrian family; not to mention the Scythians, who, if ever they held any dominion in these parts of Asia, must have held it now, in this interval between the fall of the Affrians, and the rise of the Babylonians and the Medes. Berosus then, in what he says of Nabopolassar's sending his son against his pretended satrapa of the Syrians and Egyptians, seems rather to have designed to magnify this first Babylonian hero, than to adhere to the truth. No attempt can have been made either by him or his son, on this side of the Euphrates, till Nineveh had been destroyed, and the Scythians expelled. Now in the very last year of his reign, Pharaoh Necho came upon his very frontiers, and took Carchemish from him, as we have here stated it, though as we computed before †, this invasion and success of the Egyptian must have fallen out full four years after his reign had been expired. So that take it which way you will, and make all the allowances you possibly can, in the behalf of Berosus, it is plain he is not sincere with us in this case. Pharaoh Necho, who must have been the satrapa or governor he talks of in the western parts, must have been by far a more powerful prince than Nabopolassar, his pretended master; and we are, for this reason, inclined to think, that by the same rule he degrades this potent Egyptian, he must have spun out the life of his Babylonian beyond its natural limits, and have made him a mightier man than he was. If Berosus abounded with many such mistakes as these seem to have been, he deserves to be as little regretted as Trogus, or any other we have condemned.

Here we would beg leave to rectify an oversight, and seeming inconsistency, that formerly (3) escaped us, where we supposed the city of Nineveh to have been some time destroyed in the fourth year of Nebuchadnezzar, which, as we have stated things there, coincides with the year in which Josiab was slain by Necho, though, according to scripture, there was then an Affrian king absolutely in being, and tho' we have elsewhere determined (4), that Nineveh was not ruined till the second, third, or fourth year of Jehoiakim, which is what we still adhere to as most probable: by the computation here above, it must appear, that Nineveh had been some time destroyed in the fourth year of Nebuchadnezzar; though there had been, as there actually was, a king of Affria, when Josiab was slain at Megido.

(1) See before in the notes, p. 897, 903.
A 897. (Q)

(3) See before, ibid. (Q)

(2) See before, p. 895.

(4) Ibid. p. 904. sub not. (G)

* Antiq. l. x. c. 6.

† See

reasonably supposed to have crossed the Euphrates before he, in conjunction with his a brother-in-law Cyaxares the Mede, had put an end to Nineveh, and established himself on a solid basis in the east. But after he had once settled his affairs, it is probable enough that he marched beyond that river (C) to recover what formerly made a part of the Assyrian empire, taking Carchemish from the Egyptians, and reducing Syria as related; but as for Egypt, he laid no hands on that till many years afterwards; as not only appears by the history of Egypt itself, as delivered by profane authors, but also by the plain concurrence of scripture.

He takes Car- HAVING destroyed the city of Nineveh, and possessed himself of Carchemish*, hemish, and he crossed over to this side of the river Euphrates, and having conquered Syria, and conquers Syria. the neighbouring countries, he came with a mixed number of nations<sup>b</sup>, and having ravaged<sup>c</sup> Samaria, Galilee, Scythopolis, and the Jews in Galaaditis, he at length laid siege to Jerusalem<sup>k</sup>, and took it on the 9th of the month Cisleu, or November, a day the Jews commemorate even in our times with a fast<sup>l</sup>. He now took Jeboiakim prisoner, and bound him in chains with design to carry him to Babylon; but he changed his mind upon the humble deportment of the captive king, who swearing to be true to him as his vassal and tributary, he restored him to his liberty; though he did not abstain from the plunder of Jerusalem, whence he transported the vessels in the temple to that of Belus in Babylon<sup>m</sup>, and took with him some of the choicest and most promising youths, whom he committed to the care of Ashpenaz, the prince of his eunuchs, with a charge to see them instructed in the learning<sup>n</sup> and language of the Chaldees, and to educate them in such manner, that they might be fit to attend him as his royal domesticks. Of these particular notice is taken of Daniel, and his three friends Hananiab, Misbael, and Azariab<sup>o</sup>.

Returns to Ba- THUS did Nebuchadnezzar begin to establish himself in the west (D), whence bylon. returning to Babylon, he resolved to adorn and enlarge the seat of his growing empire, in proportion to the sovereignty it was to possess over the nations far and near<sup>p</sup>. But whilst he was thus employed at home, it happened that he was, in an extraordinary manner, affected by dreams<sup>q</sup>. Under great anxiety of mind, he called together his magicians, forcerers, astrologers, and Chaldeans, and not only demanded of them the interpretation of a certain dream which had escaped his memory, but also what the dream had been. These tried in vain to convince him that his demand was above the power of any mortal; their excuse only wrought him to that degree of fury, that he resolved to put them all to death<sup>r</sup>, and gave his orders accordingly to Arioch, the captain of his guard. Arioch was on the point to execute this bloody command, when he was accosted by Daniel, who expostulating with him upon the rashness of the decree against the wise men, and requesting him to suspend the execution of it, gave him assurance that he would shortly satisfy the king in what he was so solicitous to know<sup>s</sup>.

His dream of Daniel then went into the presence of Nebuchadnezzar, and begging that he the image. would grant him a little time to consider of the thing, repaired to his three companions above-mentioned, and joining with them in an address to heaven, the secret was revealed to him in a night vision<sup>t</sup>. Thus instructed from above, he went to Arioch, g BEKOS. ubi sup. h EUFOL. apud EUSEB. Præpar. Evang. l. 9. c. 39. p. 454. 2 Kings xxiv. 2. i EUPOLEM. ubi sup. k 2 Kings xxiv. 11, 12. Dan. i. 2. l USSER. Annal. ad Ann. Mucd. 3398. m Dan. i. 2. See also before, p. 848. c. d. n Dan. i. 3. o Ibid. 6. p BEKOS ubi sup. q Dan. ii. r Ibid. ver. 12. s Ibid. ver. 16. t Ibid. ver. 19.

(C) Eupolemus (5) tells us, that Nabuchadnosor, king of Babylon, understanding that Jeremiah had prophesied in his favour, entreated Astibares, the king of the Medes, to assist him in this expedition against Syria and Palestine. That accordingly the army of the Medes and Babylonians united together, and consisted of ten thousand chariots, one hundred and eighty thousand foot, and one hundred and twenty thousand horse. By this author then it appears they had made an end of the Assyrian monarchy, before they attempted any thing upon Syria, which, though it is certain, without any such evidence, we may yet quote it to confirm what we have endeavoured to clear up in the note above.

(D) Thus it was, and most natural it must appear: he had settled himself in the east, and his business now was to strip Pharash Necho of his new empire over Syria, which had formerly belonged to the Assyrian monarchy. He does so, drives the Egyptians from Carchemish, whence they pretended to curb the Babylonians, even in their own country, recovers all the dominions of Syria and Palestine, quite to the river of Egypt (6), and the king of that country dares no more shew his head in these parts (7); being more solicitous to defend himself in his own country (which was to be invaded in its turn, as having been joined to the Assyrian empire by Efor-addon (8),) than to attempt any thing else.

(5) Apud EUSEB. Præpar. Evang. l. 9. c. 39. p. 454. (6) 2 Kings xxiv. 7. (7) Ibid. (8) See before, p. 896. 2, (1, K.).

<sup>a</sup> Arioch, the captain of the guard, and begged of them that he would not so much as think of the orders he had received against the wise men, but conduct him to the king, whom he was prepared to satisfy <sup>u</sup>. When the king saw Daniel, or Belteshazzar, (that was his name in Babylon) he asked him if he could tell him his dream, and what is portended; to which he answered, with a prefatory introduction to instil into the haughty prince some notions of the might and majesty of God, that his dream had been as follows <sup>v</sup>, That in his sleep he saw an image, vast and resplendent, and terrible to the sight; that the head of this image was of fine gold, the breast and arms of silver, the belly and thighs of brass, the legs of iron, and the feet of part iron and part clay; that he saw a stone, thrown down by an invisible hand, which struck the image on the feet, which being part iron and part clay, were immediately crushed to pieces; after which, all the metals in the body of the image became as dust, which was swept away by the wind, and no more seen; while the stone, which had caused this destruction, remained behind, grew into a mountain, and filled the whole earth <sup>w</sup>. That as for the interpretation of this extraordinary dream, He himself, as king of kings, was signified by the golden head of the image; that a second kingdom, inferior to his, should arise, which was denoted by the breast and arms of silver; and that from thence, a third kingdom of brass should arise, and lord it over the whole earth; that a fourth kingdom should arise and be as strong as iron, and destroy all that had gone before; but that the feet and toes being part iron and part clay, this fourth kingdom should be nevertheless partly strong and partly feeble: That after these, God would set up a kingdom which should endure for ever, and that this was signified by the stone hewn or thrown without hands, and which had shattered the gold, the silver, the brass, the iron, and the clay of the image into dust, which had been scattered abroad by the wind <sup>x</sup> (E).

Nebuchadnezzar, amazed at what he heard, fell on his face and worshipped Daniel, commanding that they should straight offer him an oblation and sweet odours, acknowledging his God to be a God of gods, and a Lord of kings <sup>y</sup>. He then promoted him to a great height of dignity, made him great presents, invested him with the government of all the province of Babylon, and made him chief of the presidents of all the wise men. Daniel, mindful of his three friends, Shadrach, Meshaach, and Abed-nego (so they were called in Babylon) begged of the king that they might have charge of the affairs of the province of Babylon, which was granted accordingly; while Daniel was appointed to sit in the gate of the king, as next immediately to himself <sup>z</sup>.

WHILE Nebuchadnezzar was at Babylon, news came to him, that Jeboiakim had rebelled against him, and refused to pay him any more tribute; but not having a proper opportunity to chastise this distant king in person, he ordered the Chaldees, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, to make incursions into the territories of Judab <sup>aa</sup>. In this manner did they continue to perplex him for the space of three years; till at length uniting their forces, they came and laid siege to Jerusalem, and Jeboiakim received soon after the reward of his treason and impiety, according to the prediction of Jeremiah <sup>ab</sup>, as we have related it in a former chapter <sup>ac</sup>. The circumstances of

<sup>a</sup> Dan. ii. 24. <sup>u</sup> Ibid. ver. 31. <sup>x</sup> Ibid. ver. 35. <sup>y</sup> Ibid. ver. 45. <sup>z</sup> Ibid. ver. 47.
<sup>aa</sup> Ibid. ver. 49. <sup>ab</sup> 2 Kings xxiv. 1. <sup>ac</sup> Jerem. xxii. 18, & seq. <sup>ad</sup> See before, p. 848. b.

(E) "In this vision of the image composed of four metals, the foundation of all Daniel's prophecies is laid. It represents a body of four great nations, which should reign over the earth successively, viz. the people of Babylonia, the Persians, the Greeks, and the Romans. And by a stone cut out without hands, which fell upon the feet of the image, and brake all the four metals to pieces, and became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth, it further represents, that a new kingdom should arise after the four, and conquer all those nations, and grow very great, and last to the end of all ages.

"The head of the image was of gold, and signifies the nation of Babylonia, who reigned first, as Daniel himself interprets. Thou art this head of gold, said he to Nebuchadnezzar. These nations reigned, till Cyrus conquered Babylon; and within a few months after that conquest, revolted to the Persians, and set them up above the Medes.

 "The breast and arms of the image were of silver, and represent the Persians, who reigned next. The belly and thighs of the image were of brass, and represent the Greeks, who, under the dominion of Alexander the great, conquered the Persians, and reigned next after them. The legs which were of iron, represent the Romans, who reigned next after the Greeks, and began to conquer them in the eighth year of Antiochus Epiphanes. For in that year they conquered Perseus, king of Macedon, the fundamental kingdom of the Greeks; and from thence forward grew into a mighty empire, and reigned with great power, till the days of Theodosius the great. Then by the incursions of many northern nations, they brake into many smaller kingdoms, which are represented by the feet and toes of the image, composed part of iron and part of clay."

<sup>ad</sup> Sir Is. Newton's Observ. on the Prophecy of Daniel, Part i. c. 3. p. 25, 26.

of this siege are differently related by Josephus <sup>a</sup>, according to whom, Nebuchadnezzar must now himself have been before Jerusalem, and must have taken it in person; and have put the flower of the inhabitants to the sword, and have carried off 3000 of the chief citizens into captivity.

Year of the
Flood, 2400.
Year before
CHRIST, 539

BUT to return to scripture <sup>e</sup>; these confederated nations, though they had thus destroyed the king of Judab, did not possess themselves of Jerusalem, but continued to blockade it till Nebuchadnezzar came, who appeared, in a few months (F), at the head of his whole army; and investing it with a regular siege, he forced Jeboiachin to surrender himself, and put him to death in the manner formerly related. He now resolved at once to exert the utmost of his rigor, and to give a full glut to his avarice; and in consequence thereof, he emptied the sacred and the royal treasures, and cutting to pieces the golden vessels of the temple, he carried all off, together with the inhabitants that were considerable either for valour or ingenuity; draining the land to that degree, as to leave none but the poorer sort just to cultivate the land; and appointing Mattaniah, whose name he changed into Zedekiah, king over the desolate kingdom of Judab. Thus did he march back in triumph to Babylon, laden with the spoils of the Jews, and followed by numbers of that captive people, who, by their valour and skill, might have been, and no question were, of great use to him in the stupendous works he had begun or projected at Babylon, and highly serviceable to him in the prosecution of his other conquests. And thus ended his second war with the Jews.

No sooner was this over, than Jeremiah <sup>b</sup> began to prophecy the increase of this prince's dominion, and particularly that he should subdue Elam, a kingdom on the river Ulai, to the eastward of the Tigris (G). This country, which is reckoned to have been the Susiana of the Creeks, lay so opportunely for him, being, as it were, a borderer on him, that he can have been no very great while in the completion of this advantageous prophecy. And accordingly we find, that, in after times, the capital of this country, Shushan, was sometimes honoured with the presence of the Babylonian monarchs.

THIS mighty prince, the darling of heaven, or the instrument rather of God's wrath to punish the wickedness of the nations round about him, had always his victories and accessions of fortune preceded by prophecies from the mouth of Jeremiah, or some other prophet; nay, plots and seditions contriving against him were blasted, while yet in embryo, by typical remonstrances from men divinely inspired. So, when the kings of the Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrrians and Zidonians, would have tempted Zedekiah, the thoughtless king of Jerusalem, to rise against the Babylonian; Jeremiah <sup>c</sup> sent to each of the ambassadors in his court, a present of yokes and bonds, to be carried to their masters, with this declaration, That the Lord of hosts, the God of the whole earth, had doomed them all to be servants to Nebuchadnezzar; that they should all serve him, his son, and his son's son; that such as should but offer to reject his yoke, he would punish with the sword, and with famine, and with pestilence, till they were utterly consumed by him; but that

<sup>d</sup> Antiq. l. x.    <sup>e</sup> Ubi sup.    <sup>f</sup> See before, p. 848.    <sup>b</sup> Ibid.    <sup>c</sup> Jerem. xlix. 34—39.
<sup>i</sup> Ibid. xxvi.

(F) If it be wondered, how it came to pass that Nebuchadnezzar neglected, for at least three years, to appear in this war personally: it is answered (9). That is uncertain what detained him so long, though it is very probable he was busied in the conduct of his vast designs at Babylon; that, however, he may have been engaged as a mediator between the Medes and the Lydians, who, after a war of several years, being on the point of fighting a decisive battle, were interrupted by a total eclipse of the sun (10), which, as they interpreted it, prevailed on them to submit to the arbitration of two neighbouring princes, they should agree to chuse for each other. It is now supposed, that Nebuchadnezzar was chosen by the Mede, and that he was employed in that affair, while the nations mentioned made war upon Judab; but Herodotus expressly saying it was Lalynetus (11).

who was this mediator, we shall defer what may be suggested thereon to the time of his reign.

(G) By the words of the prophecy, Elam must have been a great and potent kingdom; Behold, I will break the bow of Elam, the chief of their might. And upon Elam will I bring the four winds from the four quarters of heav'n, and will scatter them towards all those winds, and there shall be no nation whither the out-casts of Elam shall not come. For I will cause Elam to be dismayed before their enemies, and before them that seek their life; and I will bring evil upon them, even my fierce anger, saith the Lord, and I will send the sword after them, till I have consumed them. And I will sit my throne in Elam, and I will destroy from thence the king and the princes, saith the Lord. (12)

(9) PRIDEAUX'S Connex. of the Hist. of the Old and New Test. Vol. I. part i. l. i. p. 67. 8vo.
(10) HERODOT. l. i. c. 74.    (11) Idem. l. i. c. ibid.    (12) Jerem. xlix. 35—38.

a that those who quietly submitted their necks, and faithfully obeyed the king of Babylon, should find mercy, and remain in the possession of their country<sup>k</sup>; such was absolutely to be their fate if they resisted, and such their reward if they behaved submissively under their bondage.

A more sublime elevation no man can be shewn in than this, which exalts him to the height of being, as it were, God's immediate vicegerent here on earth. But how great and terrible soever he be here represented, he was dreaded but for a time, by the western nations especially; who, notwithstanding the severe remonstrance and declaration of Jeremiah, were contriving how they should free themselves from the king of Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar understanding that the Egyptians, the Jews, and the other nations, were contriving to withdraw themselves from his obedience; and that Zedekiah, whom he had appointed king of Jerusalem, had been encouraged by Pharaoh Hophra, or Aries, king of Egypt, to set him at defiance, resolved particularly to punish their ingratitude and infidelity<sup>l</sup> in the most extraordinary manner; and putting himself at the head of his army, he advanced to the frontiers, at the same time to chastise all these presumptuous nations. Here being arrived, and considering with himself, that he had a number of them to deal with, he remained in suspense for a while, dubious where he should first open the war; till at least he referred this important business to the ordinary methods of divinary direction in practice with the Chaldees; and these having consulted the entrails of their victims, their images, or teraphim, and their arrows (H), delivered it as their opinion, That the war should first break out against the Jews<sup>m</sup>. The Babylonian army then made its readiest way against that people, and, in a few days, became master of all their cities, except Lachish, Azekah, and Jerusalem<sup>n</sup>; which last, in the latter end of December, the same year, was blocked up by Nebuchadnezzar, with all his formidable army, and a close and vigorous siege ensued<sup>o</sup>.

WHILE he was thus employed, he had advice, that Pharaoh Hophra was on his march to relieve the besieged; whereupon he broke up from before the city, and marched to give the Egyptian battle<sup>p</sup>, and attack him before he could be possibly joined by any of the discontented nations mentioned above; but before he left Jerusalem, he took care to send all the captive Jews in his camp, amounting to 832 persons, under a good guard to Babylon<sup>q</sup>. He then moved against the Egyptians, who, not daring to abide the onset, as the prophet's words seem plainly enough to intimate<sup>r</sup>, retreated as fast as Nebuchadnezzar advanced; though divers<sup>s</sup> tell us they ventured on a battle, which ended in their overthrow.

H A V I N G

<sup>k</sup> Jerem. xxvii. <sup>l</sup> 2 Kings xxv. 1. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17. Jerem. xxxix. 1. li. 4. <sup>m</sup> Ezek. xxi. 19—24. <sup>n</sup> Jerem. xxxiv. 7. <sup>o</sup> 2 Kings, ubi sup. Jerem. xxxix. 1. li. 4. <sup>p</sup> Jerem. xxxvii. 5. <sup>q</sup> Idem lii. 29. <sup>r</sup> Idem xxxviii. 7. <sup>s</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. Jud. ubi sup. c. 10.

(H) This practice of divining by arrows continued among the Arabs till Mahomedism prevailed, which absolutely forbids it (13), and appears to have been the very same in use with the Babylonians at this time. "The arrows used by them for this purpose were like those with which they cast lots, being without heads or feathers, and were kept in the temple of some idol, in whose presence they were consulted. Seven such arrows were kept at the temple of Mecca; but generally in divination they made use of three only; on one of which was written, My LORD hath commanded me; on another, My LORD hath forbidden me; and the third was blank. If the first was drawn, they looked on it as an approbation of the enterprize in question; if the second, they made a contrary conclusion; but if the third happened to be drawn, they mixed them and drew them over again, till a decisive answer was given by one of the others. These divining arrows were generally consulted before any thing of moment was undertaken; as when a man was about to marry, or about to go a journey, or the like. [Ebn al Athir, al Zamakh. & al Reid. in Kor. c. 5. Al Mostatraf. &c. Vid. Poc. Spec. p. 327. &c. & D'Herbelot. Biblioth. Orient. Art. Académ.] This superstitious practice of divining by arrows was used by the ancient Greeks, [Vid. Post. Antiq. of Gr. vol. i. p. 334.] and other nations; and is particularly mentioned in scripture, [Ezek. xxi. 21.] where it is said, that the king of Babylon stood at the parting of the way, at the head of the two ways, to use divination; he made his arrows bright, (or, according to the version of the Vulgate, which seems preferable in this place, he mixed together, or shook the arrows) he consulted with images, &c. The commentary of St. Jerom, on this passage, wonderfully agrees with what we are told of the aforesaid custom of the old Arabs. He shall stand, saith he, in the highway, and consult the oracle after the manner of his nation, that he may cast arrows into a quiver, and mix them together, being written upon, or marked with the names of each people, that he may see whose arrow will come forth, and which city he ought first to attack." (14) (13) See the Koran, c. 5. p. 94. of Mr. Sale's translation. (14) See the prelim. Disc. to the same, p. 126, 127.

Year of the
Flood, 2411.
Year before
CHRIST, 588

HAVING thus driven the Egyptians back again into their country, he had leisure a once more to prosecute the vengeance he had resolved to take on the king at Jerusalem, which city he besieged once more, raising works about the place, from whence he so annoyed the inhabitants, that they did not so much as dare to shew their heads on the walls<sup>1</sup>. And yet this siege continued so long, and was in a way of continuing so much longer, that Nebuchadnezzar seems to have lost all patience, and to have retired to recreate himself at Riblab<sup>2</sup>; if it was not business rather than pleasure that drew him thither. While he was at Riblab, his generals, Nebuzaradan, Nebushasban, Rabfari, Nergal-sharezzer, and Rabmag (I), stuck close by Jerusalem; and, at length, perceiving the inhabitants to be quite exhausted of their strength and courage, they assaulted the city in the middle of the night<sup>3</sup>, and took it, after b a twelvemonth's siege. At first they missed Zedekiah and his family, but they took him the next morning, as he was attempting to escape. Nebuchadnezzar no sooner saw Zedekiah brought before him at Riblab, than severely upbraiding him for his perfidy and ingratitude, he caused his children, and all his friends that had been taken with him, to be put to death before his face, and then depriving him of his eye-sight, ordered him to be bound with chains of brass, and in that deplorable condition to be carried away captive to Babylon<sup>4</sup>.

He then dispatched Nebuzaradan, the captain of his guard, with orders quite to dismantle the city of Jerusalem, to burn the temple there, and the royal palace, and in short the whole place. This was executed with the utmost rigour, and to compleat c the tragedy every soul in the land was led away into captivity, except some few of the most miserable of the people, who were left to take care of the soil, and the fruits as yet ungathered. Thus did the Chaldeans, under Nebuchadnezzar, deal with the Jews; they stripped the temple of all its furniture, and destroyed the brazen sea, and the two brazen pillars<sup>5</sup>.

AMONG the prisoners Nebuzaradan brought with him to Riblab were Seraiah the high priest, Zephaniah the second priest, the three governors of the temple, Zedekiah's chief general, and five of his favourites or counsellors, together with his muster-master, who was also his secretary; Nebuchadnezzar ordered all these to be beheaded. In the midst of his fury, however, he concluded it was adviseable not to d leave the land without some body to look to the miserable remnant that was in it, and to this office he appointed one Gedaliah<sup>6</sup>: Nor did he fail to extend his mercy and favour towards the prophet Jeremiah, giving Nebuzaradan a favourable charge with regard to that holy person, to leave him to his choice of remaining behind in his own country, under his particular protection, or of going forward with him to Babylon, there to enjoy himself in peace and plenty in his palace. And now Nebuchadnezzar returned once more in triumph to the city of his residence, adding great strength and glory to it, by an immense booty he brought with him, and a numerous accession of new inhabitants.

WITH the gold he amassed in this expedition, it is thought he erected<sup>7</sup> the e monstrous colossus of that metal in honour of his god Bel, in the plain of Dura, in the province of Babylon. It was sixty cubits in height, and six cubits in breadth, and all of gold; and having summoned together all his princes, governors, captains, judges, treasurers, counsellors, and all the rulers of provinces, to the dedication of this idol, proclamation was made, That all people, nations and languages, should no sooner hear the sound of various musical instruments, than they should fall down and worship the golden image Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up; under the fearful penalty of being thrown into the midst of a burning fiery furnace<sup>8</sup>. They failed not to obey at the signal given, all but the Jews, and particularly Shadrach, Meshech, and Abednego (K), who being brought before the king, and f accused

<sup>1</sup> Idem ibid.    <sup>2</sup> 2 Kings ubi sup. ver. 6.
<sup>3</sup> Ibid.    <sup>4</sup> P. RIDEAUX ubi sup. l. 2. p. 87.

<sup>5</sup> Ibid. ver. 4.    <sup>6</sup> See before, p. 850.    <sup>7</sup> Ibid.
<sup>8</sup> Dan. iii.

(I) Josephus (15) calls them Nergelzar, Aremantur, Emegar, Nabafaris, and Echarampsaris.

(K) It may be thought strange that Daniel was not accused as well as his friends, it being impossible to suppose he fell down and worshipped the image. To this it is answered (16), that he must have been either absent, or, if present, must have been too great a man to be accused: It is observed (17) to be most probable that he was present, it being impossible well to conceive how so important an officer could have been absent upon so general a summons, and upon so solemn an occasion; but that his enemies

(15) Antiq. Jud. l. 10. c. 11.

(16) See P. R. ubi sup. p. 87.

(17) Idem ibid.

a accused of the neglect, and contempt, and persisting in a refusal to do as was commanded, he became quite furious against them, and ordered that the furnace should be heated seven times more than it ever had been, and that they should be thrown into it c. They were immediately bound with all the apparel about them, and thrown in, though the heat or the flame of the furnace was so violent, that it killed the men who had charge of the execution d. This was no sooner over than Nebuchadnezzar became all astonished, and hastily inquiring if they had not thrown three men bound into the furnace, and being answered accordingly, he cried out, I see four men loose walking in the midst of the fire, and they have no hurt, and the form of the fourth is like the Son of God e. He then drew near to the mouth of the furnace, b and conjured the three men, as servants of the most high God, to come out to him. They did so, and all were astonished at what they saw, when they perceived they had not received the least hurt or alteration, even in their garments f. Nebuchadnezzar blessed the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, and soon after issued out a decree, that whosoever of any people, nation, or language, should presume to speak any thing irreverently against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, the criminal should be cut in pieces, and his house turned into a dunghill g.

This mighty prince thus reformed, was obliged once more to cross the Euphrates, to make war on the nations on this side, whose turbulence of spirit could not rest. It had been prophesied, that he should subdue Egypt (L), and serve her as Judah c had been served, and that the same fate should also befall the city of Tyre (M).

In completion of these predictions he sat down with his army before Tyre, and underwent a most tedious siege of 13 years there, and at last had nothing but an empty

Year of the
Flood, 2314.
Year before
CHRIST, 585.

c Ibid. ver. 20.

d Ibid. ver. 22.

e Ibid. ver. 25.

f Ibid. ver. 27.

g Ibid. ver. 29.

enemies might think it dangerous to begin with him, and chose to pave the way to his destruction by that of his three friends, who being miraculously delivered, Daniel escaped all danger of course.

(L) The prophet's words are (18), Son of man, take up a lamentation for Pharaoh king of Egypt, and say unto him, Thou art like a young lion of the nations, and thou art as a whale in the seas; and thou camest forth with thy rivers, and troublest the waters with thy feet, and foulest the rivers. Thus saith the Lord God, I will therefore spread out my net over thee, with a company of many people, and they shall bring thee up in my net . . . For thus saith the Lord God, The sword of the king of Babylon shall come upon thee . . . There be the princes of the north all of them, and all the Zidonians, which are gone down with the slain, with their terror they are ashamed of their might, and they lie uncircumcised with them that be slain by the sword . . . Pharaoh shall see them, (that is, Pharaoh shall see the Zidonians, or Tyrians, destroyed before him; for Nebuchadnezzar subdued Phœnicia before he invaded Egypt) and shall be comforted over all his multitude, even Pharaoh and all his army slain by the sword, saith the LORD GOD. That this prophecy immediately relates to Nebuchadnezzar, appears by the recapitulation, made in this same chapter, of the conquests of this monarch, as Assur, or Assyria, Elam, &c. as for Jerusalem it may not have been mentioned, as not being yet destroyed. The same prophet dilates much upon this fearful destruction and captivity of Egypt in other places (19). Jeremiah is quite explicit upon this occasion, and mentions (20) this king by name, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, Behold, I will send and take Nebuchadnezzar my servant . . . And when he cometh, he shall smite the land of Egypt, and deliver such as are for death, to death; and such as are for captivity, to captivity; and such as are for the sword, so the sword. And I will kindle a fire in the houses of the gods of Egypt, and he shall burn them, and carry them away captives, and he shall array himself with the land of Egypt, as a shepherd putteth on his garment, and he shall go forth from thence in peace. He shall also break the images of Bethshemesh, that is in the land of Egypt, and the houses of the Gods of the Egyptians shall be burn with fire. Much more to the same purpose is to be found in this same prophet (21).

(M) These are the words of the prophet (22), Son of man, because that Tyrus hath said against Jerusalem, Alas, she is broken, that was the gates of the people . . . Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I am against thee, O Tyrus . . . Behold I will bring upon Tyrus, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, a king of kings, from the north . . . I will slay with the sword thy daughters in the field, and he shall make a fort against thee, and cast a mount against thee, and lift up the buckler against thee. And he shall set engines of war against thy walls, and with his axes he shall break down thy towers. By reason of the abundance of his horses their dust shall cover thee, thy walls shall shake at the noise of the horsemen, and of the wheels, and of the chariots, when he shall enter into thy gates, as men enter into a city wherein is made a breach. With the hoofs of his horses shall he tread down all thy streets; he shall slay thy people by the sword, and thy strong garrisons shall go down to the ground. And they shall make a spoil of thy riches, and make a prey of thy merchandise; [This seems to contradict what is said of the Tyrians removing to the island, and the emptiness of the place when Nebuchadnezzar got possession of it, but may be meant only to exaggerate the destruction of the old town.] and they shall break down thy walls, and destroy thy pleasant houses; and they shall lay thy stones, and thy timber, and thy dust, in the midst of the water . . . And I will make thee like the top of a rock; thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon; thou shalt be built no more . . . Then all princes of the sea shall come down from their thrones, and lay away their robes, and put off their broidered garments; they shall cloath themselves with trembling, they shall sit upon the ground . . . and be astonished at thee; and so on in this place, and in others (23) of this same prophet, to the same purpose.

(18) Ezek. xxxii. 2—31.

(19) xxix. xxx. xxxi.

(20) xlvi. 10—13.

(21) xlii.

xi. xvi. xvi. &c.

(22) Ezek. xxxii. 2—16.

(23) xxxvii. xxxviii.

empty town for his pains<sup>h</sup>. For the Tyrans perceiving his obstinacy against them, <sup>a</sup> and sensible they must sooner or later fall into his hands, bethought them of removing to the island opposite to them, and not much above half a mile from the shore, where they built them a new city, whither they conveyed all their effects, and left Nebuchadnezzar to vent his rage upon the empty walls of the old town, which he failed not to do<sup>i</sup>. However during this siege he from time to time, by detached parties, seems compleatly to have subjugated all the countries about; and this he certainly did, in pursuance of the several prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Thus during this siege, he sent Nebuzaradan with a party into Judea, to take vengeance on them for the murder of their late governor Gedaliah: In consequence of which he brought off with him all the inhabitants he could meet with, and <sup>b</sup> which amounted to no more than 745 persons, so nearly had the king already compleated the desolation of the land.

Year of the
Flood, 2427
Year before
CHRIST, 572

WHAT Nebuchadnezzar may probably have done at Tyre, before he departed thence, we have declared already<sup>k</sup>. But to make amends for this disappointment, it was promised by the prophet, that Egypt should pay him for what he had suffered before Tyre<sup>l</sup>. Egypt was at this time as weak as Tyre was apparently strong; for the country was at this time in great distraction, caused by a civil war then raging between Apries and Amasis<sup>m</sup>. But concerning this his expedition against Egypt, we have no manner of account, except what we find relating thereto in the prophecies of Ezekiel and Jeremiah; whereby we understand that Egypt suffered as much by <sup>c</sup> him as any nation had till then done (N). About this time also we suppose him to have conquered the Libyans and Ethiopians, and other adjacent nations, according to other prophecies concerning him (O). As for Egypt, it is quite uncertain in what state, or upon what conditions, he left that country, or whether or no he did not appoint Amasis, so famed among the Egyptians, his lieutenant or viceroy there<sup>n</sup>. The glory and prosperity of the reign of this Egyptian king, as represented by the Egyptians themselves<sup>o</sup>, need not prevent us from concluding he was no better than a substitute and tributary to the king of Babylon, and the rather, as the prophet foretels of them, that they should be confounded and desolate for 40 years afterwards<sup>p</sup>, which is a space of time nearly equal to the reign of Amasis<sup>q</sup>; and his defection in the end may have been as good a reason as any formerly given for the <sup>d</sup> rage, as it is represented, of Cambyfes against him<sup>r</sup>, when the Persians had destroyed the empire of Babylon.

But to desist from conjectures of so very dubious a nature, Nebuchadnezzar is said to have carried his arms into the very heart of Libya and Iberia, and to have far exceeded even Hercules himself<sup>s</sup>. Thus far we have seen him a warrior beyond all that had gone before him; we have now done with his martial deeds, and must retire with him to Babylon, and take a view of what he did there; and since the magnificence of

<sup>h</sup> See before, p. 417. <sup>i</sup> Ibid. <sup>k</sup> See before, ibid. <sup>l</sup> Ibid. p. 268. <sup>m</sup> Ibid. p. 269. <sup>n</sup> See before, ibid. <sup>o</sup> Ibid. p. 271. <sup>p</sup> Ibid. p. 268. <sup>q</sup> Ibid. p. 273. <sup>r</sup> Ibid. p. 272. <sup>s</sup> ABYDEN, ex MEGASTH. apud EUSEB. Præpar. Evang. l. 9. p. 456. & BEROS. apud JOSEPH.

(N) This, besides what we have cited from other prophets to prove it, is directly said by Jeremiah (24), who addressing himself to such of the remnants of the captivity as thought to have found a sure place of refuge in Egypt; Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel: If ye wholly set your faces to enter into Egypt, and go to sojourn there, then it shall come to pass, that the sword which ye feared shall overtake you there in the land of Egypt, and the famine whereof ye are afraid, shall follow close after you there in Egypt, and there ye shall die. So shall it be with all the men that set their faces to go into Egypt, to sojourn there, they shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence: and none of them shall remain or escape from the evil that I will bring upon them. For thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, As mine anger and my fury hath been poured forth upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, so shall my fury be poured forth upon you, when ye shall enter into Egypt: and ye shall be an execration, and an astonishment, and a reproach, and a reproach, and ye shall see this, saith the Lord (25). See also the next Note.

(O) Son of man * prophecy and say, Thus saith the Lord God, Howl ye, howl ye, two worth the day. For the day is near, even the day of the Lord is near, a cloudy day, it shall be the time of the heathen: Great pain shall be in Ethiopia, when the slain shall fall in Egypt, and they shall take away her multitude, and her foundation shall be broken down. Ethiopia and Libya, and Lydia, and all the mingled people, and Chub, and the men of the land that is in league, shall fall with them by the sword. Thus saith the Lord, They also that uphold Egypt shall fall, and the pride of her power shall come down: from the tower of Syene shall they fall in it by the sword, saith the Lord God. And they shall be desolate in the midst of the countries, that are desolate, and her cities shall be in the midst of the cities that are wasted. And they shall know that I am the Lord, when I have set a fire in Egypt, and when all her helpers shall be destroyed. In that day shall messengers go forth from me in ships, to make the careless Ethiopian afraid, and great pain shall come upon them, for so it cometh (26).

(24) Ibid.

(25) Ibid. 15 — 18.

* Ezek. xxx.

(26) Ibid. 2 — 9.

- a of that city is wholly attributed to him, we cannot do it better than by a description of it, which we have particularly reserved for this place; for it was this prince that enlarged and adorned it, and enriched its temples with the spoils he had taken, and, in fine, did most of what is attributed to Semiramis, except the immediate foundation; and indeed as it is evidently under him, and almost under him only as monarch of Babylon, that the country flourished, lorded it over the nations, and divided the empire with the Medes, who upon his death seem to have been upon no very good terms with the Babylonians; so nothing is more natural than to conclude that the city attained to the height of its splendor under him, and that whatever may have been done to it afterwards, was rather to preserve it from assaults of the enemy,
- b than to set it off as the queen of the east.

TOWARDS the description of Babylon, and what Nebuchadnezzar did there, we have <sup>Babylon described.</sup> little or nothing to add to what has already been said for us; and therefore we shall have no more to do than to transcribe it, and particularly in the method of a late learned author<sup>1</sup>.

- Semiramis*, as we have seen by some<sup>1</sup>, and Belus<sup>2</sup> by others, is said to have founded this city; but whether it was originally founded by Belus or Pul, or his son Nabonassar, the first Babylonian king in Ptolemy's canon, it was Nebuchadnezzar that made it one of the wonders of the world. The most famous works in and about it were the walls of the city itself; the temple of Belus; Nebuchadnezzar's palace, and the
- c hanging gardens belonging to it; the banks of the river; and the artificial lake and canals made for the draining of the river; works which for magnificence and expence were exceeded by no one attempt of human labour, excepting the wall of Cbina.

- THE walls that surrounded the city were every way prodigious; for they were <sup>The walls.</sup> in thickness 87 foot, in height 350 foot, and in compass 480 furlongs, or 60 of our miles<sup>3</sup>. These are the measures according to Herodotus, who was himself at Babylon; and though there are those who differ from him in these dimensions, yet most who agree in any measures of these walls, give us<sup>4</sup> the same, or nearly the same he does (P). These walls formed an exact square<sup>5</sup>, each side of which was 120
- d stades, or 15 miles in length, and were all built of large bricks, cemented together with bitumen<sup>6</sup>, a particular product of the neighbourhood of this city<sup>7</sup>, and much more durable and strong than lime. On the out side of these walls was a large ditch full of water, and the earth dug out of it served to make the bricks which built the walls<sup>8</sup>, so that from the great dimensions of the walls, those of this ditch or moat may be readily conceived. In each side of this square were 25 gates, 100 in all, and all of solid brass: Between every two of these gates were three towers, and four more at the four corners of this great square, and three between those corners and the gates next on each side, and each of these towers was ten foot higher than the walls. But this is to be understood only of those parts
- e of the walls where towers were needful for defence<sup>9</sup>. For some parts of them being upon a morass, and inaccessible by an enemy, there the labour and cost was spared, which, though it must have spoiled the symmetry of the whole, must be allowed to have favoured of good oeconomy. This is indeed what one would not have expected from a prince who had been so determined, as Nebuchadnezzar must have been,

to

<sup>1</sup> PRIDEAU x Connest. p. 1. l. 2. <sup>2</sup> See before, p. 878. <sup>3</sup> ARYDEN. ex MEGASTH. apud EUSEB. PRÆP. EVANG. l. 9. p. 457. QUINT. CURT. l. 5. c. 1. <sup>4</sup> HERODOT. l. i. c. 178. <sup>5</sup> PLIN. Hist. Nat. l. 6. c. 26. PHILOST. l. 1. c. 18. <sup>6</sup> HERODOT. ubi supr. <sup>7</sup> Idem ibid. c. 179. QUINT. CURT. l. 5. c. 1. STRAB. l. 16. p. 743. DIODOR. SICUL. l. 2. p. 69. ARRIAN. de expedit. ALEX. l. 7. <sup>8</sup> See before p. 145. sub. not. (1). <sup>9</sup> HERODOT. ubi supr. <sup>10</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. l. 2. p. 68.

(P) Diodorus Siculus, as we have seen before (27), diminishes the circumference of these walls very considerably, and takes somewhat from the height which Herodotus gives them, though he seems to add to the breadth of them, by saying, That six chariots might drive abreast thereon; while the former writes, That one cannot only might turn upon them; but then he places buildings on each side of the top of these walls, which, according to him, were but one story high (28); which may pretty well reconcile them together in this respect. It is observed (29), that those who give the height of these walls but at 50 cubits, speak of them only as they were after the time of Darius Hystaspes, who had caused them to be beaten down to that level. To dwell particularly on the variations we meet with in authors that have spoken of this city, would be both endless and fruitless.

(27) P. 878.

(28) L. i. c. 179.

(29) Vid. PRID. ubi sup. p. 95.

to make the city compleat both for strength and beauty; and hence it should seem <sup>a</sup> that we see a woman in after-ages compleating the walls of Babylon; which may have been no more than supplying the deficiency of towers in the part so destitute of them, which may be better considered when we come to speak of her in particular. The whole number then of these towers amounted to no more than 250, whereas a much greater number would have been necessary to have made the uniformity compleat all round. From the 25 gates in each side of this square, there was a strait street, extending to the corresponding gate in the opposite wall, whence the whole number of the streets must have been but 50; but then they were each about 15 miles long, 25 of them crossing the other 25 exactly at right angles <sup>d</sup>. Besides these whole streets, we must reckon four half streets, which were but rows of <sup>b</sup> houses facing the four inner sides of the walls. These four half streets were properly the four sides of the city within the walls, and were each of them 200 foot broad <sup>e</sup>, the whole streets being about 150 of the same. By this intersection of the 50 streets, the city was divided into 676 squares, each of four furlongs and an half on each side, or two miles and a quarter in compass. Round these squares on every side towards the streets stood the houses, all of three or four stories in height, and beautified <sup>f</sup> with all manner of ornaments; and the space within each of these squares was all void, and taken up by yards, and gardens, and the like, either for pleasure or convenience.

A branch of the Euphrates divided the city into two, running through the midst <sup>c</sup> of it, from north to south (Q), over which, in the very middle of the city, was a bridge, a furlong in length <sup>g</sup>, or rather more, and indeed much more, if we hearken to others, who say it was no less than five stades or furlongs in length, though but 30 foot broad <sup>h</sup>, a difference we shall never be able to decide (R); this bridge however is said to have been built with wonderful art <sup>i</sup>, to supply a defect in the bottom of the river, which was all sandy. At each end of this bridge were two palaces <sup>k</sup>; the old palace on the east side, the new one on the west side of the river; the former of which took up <sup>l</sup> four of the squares above-mentioned, and the latter <sup>m</sup> nine of them. The temple of Belus, which stood next to the old palace, took up another of the same squares.

THE whole city stood in a large flat or plain in a very fat and deep soil <sup>n</sup>; that <sup>d</sup> part or half of it on the east side of the river was the old city <sup>o</sup>, and the other on the west was added by Nebuchadnezzar <sup>p</sup>, both being included within the vast square bounded by the walls aforesaid. The form of the whole was seemingly borrowed from Nineveh, which was also 480 furlongs; but though it was equal in dimensions to this city, it was less with respect to its form, which was a parallelogram <sup>q</sup>, whereas that of Babylon was an exact square: It is supposed that Nebuchadnezzar, who had destroyed that old seat of the Assyrian empire, proposed that this new one <sup>r</sup> should rather exceed it than not <sup>s</sup>, and that it was to fill this great intended city with inhabitants, that he transported such numbers of captives from other countries hither. Whether this method, which had been constantly followed by the kings of <sup>c</sup> Assyria, was really the most effectual to secure their conquests, we will not pretend to determine; sure it is, no city could be more fertily situated for maintaining such a prodigious number of inhabitants, if he had lived to fill it. BUT

<sup>d</sup> HERODOT. ubi supr. c. 180. * DIODOR. SICUL. l. 2. p. 67. <sup>e</sup> HERODOT. ubi supr. PHILOSTR. l. 1. p. 738. <sup>f</sup> See before, p. 878. <sup>g</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. l. 2. p. 68. HERODOT. l. 1. c. 186. QUINT. CURT. l. 5. c. 1. PHILOSTR. l. 1. c. 18. <sup>h</sup> BEROS. apud JOSEPH. Antiq. Judaic. l. 10. c. 11. HERODOT. ubi supr. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supr. QUINT. CURT. ubi supr. PHILOSTR. ubi supr. See before, ubi supr. <sup>i</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supr. <sup>k</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>l</sup> HERODOT. ubi supr. c. 193. <sup>m</sup> BEROS. ubi supr. <sup>n</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>o</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supr. p. 65. <sup>p</sup> Vid. PRIDEAUX's Connect. of the Hist. of the Old and New Test. vol. 1. l. 2. p. 97. in 8vo. <sup>q</sup> Vid. eund. ibid.

(Q) It seems rather to have been a branch of the Euphrates (30) than the main stream itself, that thus divided this city. In Ptolemy's maps it is seated upon the Naharmalcha, or royal river.

(R) By the former of the dimensions of this bridge, it is plain the city was not immediately upon the great river of Euphrates, but rather upon some artificial canal, or inferior branch of the main stream. By the latter indeed it may seem, that it stood upon the main stream itself; however, as they both agree so well in the breadth of the bridge, we may be inclined to think the former was the truest length thereof, the latter being quite disproportionate thereto; and hence we may be brought to conclude, that the city of Babylon was not immediately upon the great river Euphrates. Other arguments, this way tending, may be alledged; but as it is a point of such obscurity, we waive them.

- a BUT it plainly appears that even in his successor's time, it was never wholly inhabited, so that even in the very meridian of its glory, it may be compared with the flower of the field, which flourishes to-day, and to-morrow is no more; for, as we shall see in the course of this work, it never had the time to grow up to what Nebuchadnezzar visibly intended to have made it; for within 25 years after his death Cyrus removing the seat of the empire to Shushan, Babylon fell by degrees into utter decay, as appears by the condition 2. Curtius tells us Alexander found it in † when he came to lay siege to it, (S) and yet it must be owned, as we just now hinted, that no country could have been better able to support so vast and populous a city as this was intended to have been, had it been the will of fate that it should have been completed up to the first design. But neither did Nebuchadnezzar live long enough, or b the empire itself subsist a time sufficient to bring this to pass. THE

† L. 5. c. 1. vid. prid. ub. sup.

(S) So far was that city from being finished according to its original design, that our author tells us Alexander found no more than 90 furlongs of it were then built, which can no otherwise be understood than of so much in length, and if we allow the breadth to be as much as the length, (which is the utmost that can be allowed) it will follow, that no more than 8100 square furlongs were then built upon, but the whole space within the walls contained 14400 square furlongs, and therefore there must have been 6300 square furlongs that were unbuilt, which Curtius tells us were plowed and sown. And besides this, the houses were not contiguous, but all built with a void space on each side, between house and house. And the same historian tells us this was done, because this way of building seemed to them safest. His words are, Ac ne totam quidem urbem tectis occupaverunt, per 90 stadia habitatur, nec omnia continua sunt; credo quia tutius est pluribus locis spargi. i. e. Neither was the whole city built upon, for the space of 90 furlongs it was inhabited, but the houses were not contiguous, because they thought it safest to be dispersed in many places distant from each other. Which words [they thought it safest] are to be understood, not as if they did this for the better securing their houses from fire, as some interpret them, but chiefly for the better preserving of health; for hereby, in cities situated in such hot countries, those suffocations and other inconveniences are avoided, which must necessarily attend such as there dwell in houses closely built together. For which reason Delhi, the capital of India, and several other cities in those warmer parts of the world are thus built; the usage in those places being, that such a rated space of ground be left void between every house and house that is built in them; and old Rome was built after the same manner. So that putting all this together, it will appear, that Babylon was so large a city in scheme rather than reality: for, according to this account, it must be by much the larger part that was never built, and therefore, in this respect, it must give place to Nineveh, which was as many furlongs in circuit as the other, and without any void ground in it that we are told of. And the number of its infants, at the same time, which could not discern between their right hand and their left, which the scriptures tell us, were 120,000 in the time of Jonah, doth sufficiently prove it was fully inhabited."

Here we beg leave to remark, that nothing can be concluded from what is cited by Curtius, at a time when the city must have suffered a very great decay, and when the houses and private buildings in particular must have been deserted and gone to ruin, and leveled with the ground, the ground that became void amounting to a considerable space, may have been converted to the uses of tillage and pasture. For when Alexander came to Babylon, it must have been little better than the skeleton of the old city; so that let what Curtius reports concerning it be ever so true, it proves no more than that such was the state of Babylon when Alexander came there, not what it had been, and doubtless was, when the seat of the Babylonian, or latter Affyrian empire. Again, as to what is alledged in the citation above, to confirm what is asserted by Curtius, as to the distance left between house and house, and the example produced in Delhi, and other cities in hot countries, which are built in that straggling manner, it may be needless to animadvert thereon, when at the same time it is granted, that in the length or breadth of 15 miles there was no more than 25 streets, or 26, including the two half streets, or rows, at the ends and at the sides. A city built in this proportion must have been small enough, and by the proportions it must appear, that there were such void spaces behind all the houses, as must have answered all the purposes of preventing suffocations, and other inconveniences the inhabitants may have been in danger of. And besides, if Delhi, and other cities in the east, are built in the extensive and incoherent manner above suggested; other cities there are, in climates to the full as warm, and under much better regulation, which are not only built without this discontinuity, but as close as possible, and with streets so narrow, that there would not be much more than room for one of our coaches to pass through them; as Canton in China (32), and other cities in the same country, and others.

Lastly, it is almost certain, that Nineveh was never so big as Babylon, notwithstanding what is inferred from the 120,000 souls there, who could not distinguish their right hand from their left; which, as we have suggested formerly (33), may be as justly understood of a religious blindness, as a natural incapacity; and is a figurative expression, which may be very aptly used on the occasion when Jonah was to open their eyes, that they might see the dangers their sins were like to bring upon them. Nineveh was, in the time of Jonah, in its infancy (34); there was as yet no king of Affyria, distinguished as such (35), and therefore to suppose that city, in the days of Jonah, to have been more considerable than Babylon was, at the height of her meridian, is a little out of the way. Nor will it be much more just to imagine it to have exceeded this city, even when it was at the greatest; for it is plain, by the history of all the Affyrian kings at Nineveh, that they never established a settled dominion over the parts of their empire, as it is called, but were for ever diverted by foreign wars, so that they lived rather upon the spoil, from time to time, as they made their incursions upon this kingdom or that, than upon any regular or continued revenue or tribute from the several (31) Vid. eund. ibid. (32) See the Dutch Embassy. (33) See before in the notes, p. 889. (34) Ibid. (35) Ibid.

Temple of Belus.

THE next work in Babylon, attributed to Nebuchadnezzar, is the temple of Belus <sup>1</sup>. <sup>a</sup> This temple or tower, as to its form and dimensions, we have sufficiently described already <sup>2</sup>, where we have also declared our thoughts concerning the first foundation and completion of it <sup>3</sup>; but some particulars we must however add, to give a more distinct idea of what it was. The ascent to it was by steps on the outside, by the slope lines which formed the eight retractions or benchings in, which shaped it, as it were, into eight distinct towers, as may be observed in the representation we have copied of it. What the uppermost of these towers was set apart for, we have seen already; but on the top of this there was, it seems, an observatory <sup>4</sup>, by the means of which the Babylonians are pretended to have advanced themselves to their great pretended knowledge in the sidereal sciences. Till the times of Nebuchadnezzar <sup>b</sup> it is thought this tower was all the temple of Belus; but as he did by the other ancient buildings of the city <sup>7</sup>, so he did by this <sup>2</sup>, making great additions thereto by vast edifices erected round it <sup>2</sup>, in a square of two furlongs on every side, and just a mile in circumference, which exceeded the square at the temple of Jerusalem by 1800 foot <sup>b</sup>. On the outside of these buildings was a wall, which inclosed the whole, and in consideration of the regularity wherewith this city was to all appearance marked out, it is supposed <sup>c</sup> that this wall was equal to the square of the city wherein it stood, and is therefore concluded to have been two miles and an half in circumference. In this wall were several gates leading into the temple, and all of solid brass <sup>d</sup>, which it is thought <sup>e</sup> may have been made out of the brazen sea, and <sup>c</sup> brazen pillars, and other vessels and ornaments of the kind which Nebuchadnezzar had transported from Jerusalem; for in this temple he is said to have dedicated his spoils from that of Jerusalem <sup>f</sup>.

In this temple were several images or idols of massy gold, and one of them, as we have seen <sup>g</sup>, 40 foot in height, the same, as is commonly supposed <sup>h</sup>, with that which Nebuchadnezzar consecrated in the plains of Dura <sup>i</sup>. This last is said to have been 60 cubits, or 90 foot high, which, though it vastly exceeds the dimensions of the former of 40, yet this last is thought to have been so extraordinary for size, that it has been attempted to reconcile them into one <sup>k</sup>, by supposing that in the 90 foot the height of the pedestal is included, and that the 40 foot are for the height <sup>d</sup> of the statue without the pedestal (T); and being said to have weighed 1000 talents

<sup>1</sup> Beros. ubi sup.    <sup>2</sup> See before in the notes, p. 145. (K).    <sup>3</sup> Ibid.    <sup>4</sup> Diodor. Sicul. l. 2. p. 98.
<sup>5</sup> Beros. apud Joseph. ubi sup.    <sup>6</sup> Idem apud eund. ibid.    <sup>7</sup> Herodot. ubi sup.    <sup>8</sup> Vid.
Priod. Connect. vol. i. part 1. l. 2. p. 100. in 8vo.    <sup>9</sup> Idem ibid.    <sup>10</sup> Herodot. ubi sup.
<sup>11</sup> Vid. Priod. ubi sup.    <sup>12</sup> Dan. i. 2.    <sup>13</sup> Chron. xxxvi. 7.    <sup>14</sup> See before, p. 879. d.    <sup>15</sup> Vid.
Priod. ubi sup.    <sup>16</sup> See before, p. 954.    <sup>17</sup> Vid. Priod. ubi sup.

several people they over-ran, who never rested quietly for any space of time, under their yoke. Esar-ladon was the most powerful of them all, and extended his dominion even over Egypt, which none of his predecessors ever did, and was in a fair way of effecting the monarchy his fore-fathers had in vain aspired at; but he dying soon after he had thus established himself, and being, as it seems, succeeded by a prince of no active genius, the empire mouldered away by degrees till it became no more. Nebuchadnezzar, of all the Affyrian race, seems to have raised the family to the utmost it ever was. His great successes, and the length of his reign, in comparison of what was enjoyed by any Affyrian king before him, may abundantly convince us, that he raised Babylon to a pitch of magnificence and grandeur which had never been seen at Nineveh; and if thereto we add his passion to aggrandise and embellish this city, which plainly eclipsed her sister in Affyria, we cannot so much as doubt of it; though, after all, we are very ready to think Babylon never was so very enormous as represented.

(T) With the pedestal or without, this golden colossus must be allowed to be a wonder, and especially if it was all of gold. We will forbear to talk of the proportions of this statue, as a late learned author (36) has done; they may have been just, for ought we know, though that is what we are apt to suspect; as well as that Diodorus, by the statue he mentions (37), means that which Nebuchadnezzar raised in the plain of Dura. It shall suffice, that we take notice that the same late learned author (38) imagines this statue, vast as it was, weighed but 1000 talents of Babylon, and consequently that, according to the value of the Babylonish talent in Pollux's Onomasticon, it amounted to three millions and a half of our money. The golden statue in Diodorus, is placed in the temple of Belus (39), where Herodotus has also seemingly two golden statues of solid gold, the one, which he represents as large, of Jupiter or Belus (40), in a sitting posture, on a throne of gold, and with a table of the same metal before it, the whole together weighing 800 talents of Babylon; and another of 12 cubits high, all of solid gold, which if it weighed so much as 800 talents, must have been much larger than the former; which, with its throne and all its furniture, weighed no more; and that to Herodotus (41) seems so much, that he with his usual caution, reports it on the credit of the Chaldeans themselves. Whatever was the difference in weight between these two statues, it may thence appear, that Diodorus, in allowing but 1000 talents for his statue of 40 foot high, is egregiously mistaken, and consequently that our author (42) was a little inattentive

(36) See Priod. ubi sup. p. 101.    (37) See before, p. 879.    (38) Priod. ubi sup.    (39) See before, ubi sup.    (40) See before, p. 916.    (41) l. 1. c. 183.    (42) Priod. ubi sup.

<sup>a</sup> talents of Babylon<sup>1</sup>, it is thence computed that it was worth three millions and an half of our money<sup>m</sup>. In a word, the whole weight of the statues and decorations in Diodorus Siculus amounting to 5000 and odd talents in gold; the whole is estimated at above<sup>n</sup> one and twenty millions of our money; and a sum about equal to the same in treasure, utensils, and ornaments, not mentioned<sup>o</sup>, is allowed for; which we leave to the reader, with this one observation, that our author supposes this immense treasure to have been about 2000 years in collecting, and that as he is most apparently mistaken in that, he may as likely be out in his computation, which, if it was curtailed considerably, might have been, together with other plunder of the fort, a sufficient indemnity to Xerxes for his Grecian expedition.

<sup>b</sup> NEXT to this temple <sup>p</sup>, on the same east side of the river, stood the old palace <sup>q</sup> of the kings of Babylon, being four miles in circumference. Exactly opposite to it, <sup>r</sup> on the other side of the river, was the new palace, built by Nebuchadnezzar; it was eight miles in circumference, and consequently four times as big as the old one. Both these palaces we have already described according to such accounts as we have remaining of them<sup>s</sup>, but must add, that as vast as this palace must have been, it was the work of no more than 15 days<sup>t</sup>. The two palaces.

BUT nothing in the city of Babylon has obtained a greater degree of admiration, The hanging-gardens. than what we call the penfile or hanging-gardens, built by Nebuchadnezzar, to gratify his wife Amyitis<sup>u</sup>, who was a Mede<sup>v</sup>, and desirous to have something of a prospect <sup>w</sup> that might look like her own country, which was as woody and mountainous as Babylonia was otherwise. They are said to have contained a square of four plethra on each side, and described to have consisted of terrasses one above another, and carried up to the height of the wall of the city; the ascent from terrass to terrass being by steps ten foot wide. The whole pile consisted of substantial arches upon arches, and was strengthened by a wall surrounding it on every side of 22 foot thick, and the floors on each of them were laid in this order: First, on the tops of the arches was laid a bed or pavement of stones 16 foot long, and four foot broad; over this was a layer of bitumen, and over this two courses of brick, closely cemented together with plaister; and over all these were thick sheets of lead, <sup>d</sup> and on these the earth or mould of the garden. This storage was designed to retain the moisture of the mould, which was so deep as to give root to the greatest trees which were planted upon every terrass, together with great variety of other vegetables pleasing to the eye. Upon the uppermost of these terrasses was a reservoir, supplied by a certain engine with water from the river, from whence the gardens on the other terrasses were supplied.

THE other works attributed to Nebuchadnezzar by Berosus<sup>x</sup> and Megasthenes, or Abydenus<sup>y</sup>, were the banks of the river, the artificial canals, and the great artificial lake, said to have been sunk by Semiramis<sup>z</sup>. The chief of these canals was the Nabarmalcha, or Basilicos Potamos of the Greeks<sup>a</sup>; the lake was to abate the inundations of the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, just as the lake Maris in Egypt was designed to correct the irregularities of the Nile<sup>b</sup>; their uses were exactly alike, viz. to fecundate the country in times of drought, and to rescue it from the dangers of inundation. The banks, artificial canals, and lake.

<sup>1</sup> See before, ubi sup. 879.    <sup>m</sup> Vid. PRIB. ubi sup. p. 101.    <sup>n</sup> Idem ibid.    <sup>o</sup> Idem ibid.
<sup>p</sup> STRAB. l. 16. p. 731.    <sup>q</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi sup. PHILOSTRAT. ubi sup.    <sup>r</sup> See before, p. 878.    <sup>s</sup> BEROS. apud JOSEPH. ubi sup.    <sup>t</sup> Idem ibid.    <sup>u</sup> See before, p. 902.
<sup>v</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi sup. p. 70.    <sup>w</sup> Apud JOSEPH. ubi sup.    <sup>x</sup> Apud EUSEB. PRÆP. Evang. ubi sup.    <sup>y</sup> See before, p. 879.    <sup>z</sup> Ibid. p. 57.    <sup>a</sup> Ibid. p. 195.

attentive to this seeming absurdity, except he concluded his statue to have been hollow, or plated over with a thick sheet of gold; that indeed might alter the case, and he would have done well to have made this distinction; but he plainly concludes it to have been of massy gold (43).

We formerly declared (44), we were not sure that Herodotus, by the height he gives of the one, and the weight of the other, does not mean the same statue; our reason for this, among others, is his omitting to name who the last statue represented, which being so remarkable a piece of furniture in this Babylonian temple; we wonder how so exact a writer should have been guilty of the omission, and this inclines us to think they were both Jupiters, and consequently the same god, and perhaps the same image. If so, he may have thought it needless to repeat the name, which would have been quite necessary, if they had been distinct deities, but as we formerly made it a doubt (45), so now we are far from pretending to decide the matter.

(43) Ibid. p. 100.

(44) See before, p. 916.

(45) Ibid.

inundation<sup>c</sup>. This lake, however, if we are to credit our historians, was vastly a more in circumference than that in Egypt, it being on the one hand <sup>d</sup> said to have been 210 miles in circuit, and on the other <sup>e</sup>, which is much less, 160, either of which give it a square, for that was the form of it, far exceeding that of the Egyptian lake, which has been thought a work too stupenduous to have been effected by the labour of men; but indeed what this wanted in length and breadth, it seems to have more than made good in depth, which was in some places no less than 50 fathom<sup>f</sup>, whereas the depth of this Babylonian lake is given but at 35 foot<sup>g</sup>, or 75 at the utmost<sup>h</sup>; a difference which is attempted to be reconciled by a supposition, that the one measures only the surface of the sides, while the other includes the banks thrown up upon them<sup>i</sup>.

THIS lake is said to have been dug to receive the river, which was diverted while Nebuchadnezzar built the banks to each side of the city of Babylon<sup>k</sup>, and to have been to the westward of that place. These banks were built for the security, convenience, and decoration of the city particularly, and were made all of brick and bitumen<sup>l</sup>, and extended on each side throughout the whole length of the city<sup>m</sup>, and even farther, according to some<sup>n</sup>, who reckon they extended 160 furlongs, or 20 miles; whence it is concluded<sup>o</sup> they must have begun two miles and a half above the city, and have been continued an equal distance below it, the length of the city being no more than 15 miles. These banks were built from the bottom, and were rather walls of the same thickness with those that surrounded the city; and opposite to each street on each side he had a brazen gate in the said wall<sup>p</sup>, with stairs leading down from it to the river; these gates were open by day, and shut by night. Berosus, Megasthenes, and Abydenus, attribute all these works to Nebuchadnezzar; but Herodotus tells us, the bridge, the banks, and the lake, were the work of a queen after him, called Nitocris, who may have finished what Nebuchadnezzar left imperfect, and thence have had the honour this historian gives her of the whole<sup>q</sup>. If these works fell even much short of what we have here seen them to have been, it must be granted we have not said too much of the Babylonians, where we have represented them to have been ingenious, industrious, and laborious<sup>r</sup>, and if Nebuchadnezzar did but attempt them, it must be allowed that he deserves the first place among those who have endeavoured to signalize themselves by such stupenduous monuments of art and labour; but if he did really conduct them towards a state of perfection, nothing can be said too much of him considered in this view.

WE have now seen this first Babylonian monarch, properly so called, in all his majesty, both at home and abroad; what we have remaining to say of him, will be of a different nature: for we shall see him under great trouble and anxiety of mind, and even, as the text is commonly understood, degraded beneath the meanest of the race of mankind, and seemingly exhibited as an example of terror to princes, who, swoln with vanity, and drunk with power, would arrogate to themselves what they ought not.

Year of the Flood, 2429. Year before CHRIST, 570. Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the tree. HE had scarce returned from his late war of 16 or 17 years continuance, and flushed with the conquest of Egypt, Ethiopia, and Libya, and the reduction of all Syria, but reposing himself in his palace, he had a dream, which may be best delivered in his own words<sup>a</sup>; "I saw, and behold, a tree in the midst of the earth, and the height thereof was great. The tree grew and was strong, and the height thereof reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof to the end of all the earth. The leaves thereof were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all: The beasts of the field had shadow under it, and the fowls of the heaven dwelt in the boughs thereof, and all flesh was fed of it. I saw in the visions of my head upon my bed, and behold, a watcher, and an holy One came down from heaven. He cried aloud, and said thus, Hew down the tree, and cut off his branches, shake off his leaves, and scatter his fruit; let the beasts get away from under him, and the fowls from his branches. Nevertheless leave the stump of his roots in the earth, even with a band of iron and brass," in

<sup>c</sup> See PRID. ubi sup. p. 103. & See before, p. 195. <sup>d</sup> HERODOT. ubi sup. c. 185. <sup>e</sup> MEGAST. apud EUSEB. ubi sup. <sup>f</sup> See before, p. 195. <sup>g</sup> HERODOT. ubi sup. <sup>h</sup> MEGAST. ubi sup. <sup>i</sup> Vid. PRID. ubi sup. p. 104. <sup>k</sup> Vid. ABYDEN. ubi sup. HERODOT. ubi sup. DIOD. ubi sup. <sup>l</sup> ABYDEN. apud EUSEB. ubi sup. <sup>m</sup> HERODOT. ubi sup. <sup>n</sup> BEROS. ubi sup. <sup>o</sup> Vid. PRID. ubi sup. <sup>p</sup> Compare BEROS. ubi sup. with HERODOT. ubi sup. <sup>q</sup> Vid. PRID. ubi sup. p. 105. <sup>r</sup> See before, p. 933. <sup>s</sup> DAN. iv.

- a " in the tender grass of the field, and let it be wet with the dew of heaven, and " let his portion be with the beasts in the grass of the earth. Let his heart be " changed from man's, and let a beast's heart be given unto him, and let seven " times pass over him. This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the de" mand by the word of the holy Ones: to the intent that the living may know,
 " that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever
 " he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men."

HAVING declared this to have been his dream to his wise men, astrologers, The interpre-
Chaldeans, and the like, and all to no purpose, he at length revealed it to Daniel, tation of 18.
 or Belteshazzar<sup>a</sup>, which, how he should have neglected to do at first, after the proofs
 b he had had of his superiority, and the omnipotence of his God, may be hard to account for, if we do not suppose him to have laboured under some sort of distraction. To waive this, he is represented as revealing his dream to Daniel, in words to the effect above; and Daniel no sooner heard it, than he was astonished for one hour, and his thoughts troubled him<sup>c</sup>. At length, after he had recovered himself, and deprecated the evil omen, and excused himself to the king, who was very sollicitous with him to tell him the truth without fear or disguise, he told him, The tree he saw was meant of himself; that by the order of the watcher and the holy One concerning the tree, it was signified that he should be driven out from the society of men, and become as a beast, and that, in fine, he should so continue c to be till he had been brought to a due sense of the supremacy and omnipotence of God; that the stump of the tree which was to be left, signified that the kingdom should nevertheless revert to him once more<sup>d</sup>. Such was Daniel's interpretation, which he closed with an exhortation to him to abstain from sin, and to shew mercy to the poor, that so he might procure to himself a prolongation of peace and tranquillity<sup>e</sup>.

THIS extraordinary sentence thus pronounced on him, and by the lips of a man whom he must entirely have relied on, seems to have made no lasting impression upon him; for not being immediately executed upon him, he might have worn off the terrors of it, before the time was quite come. So that about twelve months His pride and d afterwards, as he was walking in his palace, or, as some think<sup>f</sup> the fact may have metamorphosis.
 been, on the uppermost of the terraces of his hanging-garden, and contemplating the glories of the city he had adorned; unable to contain the pride of his heart, he cried out, " Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the " kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty<sup>g</sup>?"
 He had no sooner vented himself in this insolent manner, than there fell a voice from heaven, saying, " O king Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken, The king" dom is departed from thee<sup>h</sup>. And straight he was driven from the society of men, and dwelt with the beast of the field, and he ate grass as an ox, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagles' feathers, and his e nails like birds' claws<sup>i</sup>. Thus runs the letter of the text, which is sometimes taken in all the strictness of it; it being supposed that losing his senses, he wandered about in the fields, and there took up his abode with the cattle, till seven times, or seven years, had passed over his head<sup>j</sup>; but concerning this metamorphosis, and the duration (U) of it, there is a great variety of opinion.

DURING

- <sup>a</sup> Dan. iv.    <sup>b</sup> Ibid. ver. 9.    <sup>c</sup> Ibid. ver. 19.    <sup>d</sup> Ibid. ver. 26.    <sup>e</sup> Ibid. ver. 27.
<sup>f</sup> PRID. ubi supr. p. 105.    <sup>g</sup> Dan. ubi supr. ver. 30.    <sup>h</sup> Ibid. ver. 31.    <sup>i</sup> Ibid. ver. 33.
<sup>j</sup> See PRID. ubi supr.

(U) Concerning the nature and degree of this change, " Origen (46) believed the thing to be impossible, and turned it into allegory. Bodin (47) thought he was really changed into a bull, and that he lost even the soul of a man; while others (48) maintain he was changed as to the body only, retaining his reason, as Apuleius did while an ass, and like the Italians, mentioned by St. Austin (49) who having tailed of cheese, presented to them by certain magicians of the country, were immediately turned into beasts of burthen, but at last recovered their first form and condition of life.

 Some Rabbins have pretended, that the soul of Nebuchadnezzar deserted his body, and, for a time, gave place to the soul of an ox, which degraded him into all the inclinations and sensations of that animal; while others (50) admit no more to have been the case than a vitiated imagination in the prince, and a kind of fascination in the eyes of his subjects, which made them fancy, as well as himself, that he was, for certain, become an ox, though there was no such thing.

(46) Apud HIERON. in Dan. iv. (47) Demonol. l. 2. c. 6. (48) MALDON. in Dan. ubi sup.
Et TERTULL. de Panis. c. 12, 13. (49) De Civit. Dei. l. 18. c. 18. (50) MEDIN. de res. in Deum fide, c. 7. VIER. de præstig. Dæmon. l. 1. c. 24.

His death.

Year of the
Flood, 2437.
Year before
CHRIST, 562.

DURING this his disorder, it is said his son Evil-merodach administered the government for him <sup>e</sup>, and that he did it so ill, as to draw his father's most heavy displeasure on him, when he came to understand what he had done; for when his seven years were expired, he threw him into the prison where Jeboiachin, the captive king of Judah, had lain 37 years. Having thus satisfied his injured subjects by this exemplary justice on his son, and given the honour and praise due to God, and acknowledged him to be above all, and all this by a publick decree, he continued in the possession of his kingdom about a twelve-month afterwards, and then departed this life, after a reign of 43 years.

His prophecy.

THE circumstances of his death are omitted in scripture, but may be fabulously supplied from those <sup>f</sup> who tell us, that after all the great things they report him to have done, he ascended to the top of his palace, and that being there suddenly seized by a spirit from heaven, he prophesied to this effect, and in these words; "Behold, O Babylonians, I foretel you a calamity at hand, which nor the fates, nor our forefather Belus, nor our queen Beltis, may possibly avert. A Persian mule shall come, and by the assistance of your own gods, shall load your necks with a most galling yoke; and this destruction shall befall you by the means of a Mede, in whom the Assyrians were wont greatly to glory themselves. O would that he, ere thus he betrays my people, were swallowed up by some whirlpool, or overwhelmed in the depths of the sea; or that hurried away into some lonely desert, he might there remain a wanderer, never to behold again the footsteps of mankind, and never to see ought but birds and beasts of prey. O grant unto me, before he is agitated by this rage of mind, to share a happier end;" thus saying, he was suddenly snatched from the sight of men; the same exit Semiramis is said to have made <sup>g</sup>.

Year of the
Flood, 2437.
Year before
CHRIST, 562.

HE was succeeded by his son Evil-merodach <sup>h</sup>, Ivoradam <sup>i</sup>, Ebidan-merodach <sup>k</sup>, Evil-maluruch <sup>l</sup>, and, as is most likely, Belsazzar. That he was this seemingly last king of Babylon, according to Daniel, we shall endeavour to make out before we close up his reign. In the mean time, we must look back to what he seems to have done while regent for his father, when under distraction of mind, which, among other false steps he may have committed, may particularly have drawn on him his father's most heavy displeasure, and which, if strictly true, must have laid the foundation of that animosity in the Medes and Persians, which hurried on the dissolution

<sup>e</sup> Hieron. in Esai. xiv. 19.
<sup>f</sup> See before, p. 883.
<sup>g</sup> Ibid. in the ecclesiastical account.

<sup>h</sup> MEGASTH. EX ABYD. apud EUSEB. Præp. Evang. l. 9. c. 41.
<sup>i</sup> Jerem. lii. 31.
<sup>j</sup> See before in the canon, p. 935.
<sup>k</sup> MEGASTH. ubi sup.

"thing. The most received opinion is, that by the power of God, Nebuchadnezzar fell into a black melancholy, and, under this oppression of mind, fancied himself an ox; as in a lycanthropy a man persuades himself he is a wolf, a dog, a cat; a change which exists no where but in the disordered brain, nor to be discovered but by his motions and behaviour, which tend to the imitation of a wolf in his rapacity, howling, and desire to range the country, and fly from men. That after some such manner it must have been that this king became an ox, and agitated by all the affections and desires of one. That his People, astonished at such an alteration (51), bound him as a madman, but that escaping from them, he fled into the fields, and lived after the manner of an ox."

Our author (52), whence we have extracted this, thinks nothing more than this last supposition is required to account for what, in scripture, is said of this extraordinary event; that there was nothing miraculous in it, except the prophet's prediction of its approach and duration.

As there are doubts about the manner of this accident, so there are varieties as to the continuance of it. "Some, with Theodoret (53), maintain, that as the Persians divided their year into two seasons, winter and summer, the seven years of Nebuchadnezzar must be reduced to three and a half. De- rotheus (54), and the spurious Epiphanius (55) affirm, that God had actually condemned him to a seven years punishment, but was prevailed on, by Daniel, to shorten it into seven months: the pseudo-Epiphanius adding, that as Daniel ceased not to foretel the restoration of the king, and the great men continually disbelieved him, and derided what he said, he obtained of God, that his time might be shortened for the sake of convincing them. Others maintain he was changed but for 21 months, explaining these Words of Daniel, Dumex septem tempora mutantur super eum, as intended for seven times the space of three months; tempus, according to them, being a quarter of a year. Peter Camester allows but seven months, which he proportions out in this manner: For the first 40 days he allows him to have been in a phrenzy, or mad; the 40 days following, he bewailed his offences; and the next 40 days, he gradually recovered from his infirmity. But that nevertheless, in compliance with what he had been exhorted by Daniel, he remained seven years in the exercise of repentance, abstaining from ought but herbs and pulse, to atone for his pride and folly." But our author (56) concludes, with the bulk of commentators, that we need no interpreter but Daniel himself, who plainly means whole years.

(51) Hieron. Theodoret. Maldon. Perreri. Cornet. Sanct. in Dan. Valer. de Sac. Philo-soph. c. 80. Bartholin. de Morb. Bibl. &c. (52) Calmet. Dict. of the Bible, Art. Nebuchadnezzar. III.
(53) Ubi sup. (54) In Synop. (55) De l'is. & Morb. Prophet. (56) Calmet ubi sup.

a dissolution of the Babylonian empire. While his father was deprived of his senses, this prince his son, who was upon the point of marrying the Nitocris <sup>m</sup> so celebrated by Herodotus, took it into his head to divert himself with a hunting-match, upon the borders of Media, where he understood there was great plenty of game, by reason of the pacific state the Assyrians and Medes had been in for some years. He went attended by a small force, light armed, consisting both of horse and foot, and seemingly equipt for the chase only. Being arrived on the frontiers, he halted near some garisoned places, where he staid all night, intending to enter upon his diversion the next morning: But it happening that certain troops appeared for the relief of those in garison in these parts, he took a fancy that these men, added to those b he had brought with him, might form such a body as might be able to make some notable impression upon the Medes, which he judged would redound more to his honour than the diversion he at first proposed. He obeyed this irregular impulse, and the next morning, by break of day, he moved towards the nearest places that belonged to the Medes, leaving his foot behind him to guard his own frontiers, while he proceeded with the horse. Being advanced as far as he thought convenient, he made halt, and incamped with the best of his troops about him, that so he might the better keep the garisons of the Medes in awe, and prevent their sallies; the rest he sent out in detached parties to pillage the country. The king of the Medes understanding the violences Evil-merodach, the son of c the Assyrian, was committing in his country, marched towards him with such troops as he had usually attending him, and such as his son could raise upon so sudden an emergency; but on his march he was joined by others who came in to his assistance, and among these was Cyrus, now about 16 years of age, and who now first signalized himself in battle. The parties Evil-merodach had sent out were first attacked by the Medes, who at length falling upon his main body, routed and pursued him with a great slaughter, quite home to his own borders <sup>n</sup>. Such was the event of this rash, and seemingly unjust enterprise (W); and this action may not only have exasperated his father in a particular manner against him, but may also have been the first cause of that enmity of the Medes and Persians, which ended d in the ruin of Babylon, as we have already observed. And this spirit thus roused in the Medes may have been so dreaded, and the consequences of it so naturally foreseen by his father, the great Nebuchadnezzar, as to have caused him to imprison this his son, and to utter the predictive exclamation we have seen above.

THIS prince, who, if this action be founded upon truth, was justly called, as Evil-merodach his name is interpreted, Foolish Merodach, having administered very ill during his father's disorder, was thrown into prison upon his recovery: And in this confinement he contracted such a kindness for the captive king of Judab, that succeeding to the throne, upon the death of his father, he took Jeboiachin out of prison, and e entertained him like a king ever afterwards *. Farther concerning him is uncertain, except that indulging himself in sloth and wickedness, he became intolerable to his subjects, and that after a very short reign he was treacherously murdered by his sister's husband Neriglissar; who, that he was a Mede, and particularly Darius the Mede, we shall endeavour to make out in his reign; and if so, his murder of Evil-merodach his brother-in-law may be accounted for by the aversion he may have contracted in common with his countrymen against this unwise prince, who had so behaved to them as we have seen.

WHAT we have material to add concerning this king, is, that by all circumstance he is more likely to have been the Belshazzar of Daniel, than any other king f in Ptolemy's canon. This we gather from the concurrence of scripture with profane history. Berosus <sup>o</sup> represents Evil-merodach as a lewd and wicked prince; Belshazzar is in scripture <sup>p</sup> represented as the same. Berosus <sup>q</sup> relates that Evil-merodach was killed at a banquet by some of his lords; the scripture <sup>r</sup> says Belshazzar was murdered

<sup>m</sup> Vid. USSER. Annal. ad Ann. Mund. 3421. Jerem. lii. 31. JOSEPHUS, &c.

<sup>o</sup> Ubi sup.

<sup>n</sup> XENOPH. Kyr. Hist. d.

<sup>p</sup> Dan. 5.

<sup>q</sup> Ubi sup.

* 2 Kings xxv. 27.

<sup>r</sup> Ubi sup.

(W) If it was really Nitocris this prince was now about to marry, and if she was really a Mede, as it is most generally understood, it is impossible to account for these his hostilities upon that nation, and especially at the time our author here seems to mean; but this is what may be considered hereafter.

murdered at a great feast he gave to 1000 of his lords, but mentions not by a whom. They both say he was the son of Nebuchadnezzar, by the name of Evil-merodach<sup>a</sup>, and scripture says the same of Belshazzar, which is not said of any other of the Babylonish kings. If to this it should be objected, that both Evil-merodach and Belshazzar are mentioned in scripture<sup>c</sup>, as sons of Nebuchadnezzar, and that therefore they cannot be the same person: we answer, that they are not mentioned any where in scripture, either together, or in a course of succession, but in different books, and not at all in reference to each other. That in scripture it is not unusual to call the same prince by different names in different places. Thus Nebuchadnezzar himself is in some places, and particularly in the Propheets, called Nebuchadrezzar. Thus the king, who in one place is called Abasuerus<sup>b</sup>, is in another called Artaxerxes<sup>w</sup>: and in one and the same chapter<sup>x</sup> is Esar-baddon, the great Assyrian, called Asnappar; and this authority is so much the more valid, as it occurs in a part of scripture indisputably genuine. If again it be objected, that in scripture mention is made of the third year of Belshazzar's reign<sup>y</sup>, whereas Evil-merodach is allowed on all hands to have reigned but two years<sup>z</sup>; we answer again, that parts of years are never reckoned as whole years by chronologers; so that though he was in the beginning of his third year, they reckoned but two to his reign; an instance of which we have in Ptolemy's canon, where Laborsoarchod, the successor of Neriglissar, is left out, because he did not reign a complete year, though he reigned nine months of a year. This shall suffice for this subject for the present; we may resume it hereafter still farther to the reader's satisfaction.

Neriglissar.

Year of the
Flood, 3439
Year before
CHRIST, 510

Neriglissar, Niriglissoroor, Niricassolassurus<sup>a</sup>, or, as we think, Darius the Mede, who is represented as the chief of the conspirators against Evil-merodach<sup>b</sup>, usurped the throne. Of him, it is seemingly recorded, for he is not mentioned by name, that dreading the Medes, who began to threaten Babylon, he endeavoured to strengthen himself by foreign alliances. The story, as it is told<sup>c</sup>, represents this king as a great conqueror, and one who had made himself master of all Syria, Hircania, and Arabia, and to have been busied in a war with the Bactrians, when Astyages the Mede departed this life, and thereby to have given a violent alarm to the Medes<sup>d</sup> and the Persians, who began to fear it would be their turn next. This king then concluding that if he could but reduce the Medes, the rest would bow to him of course, dispatched ambassadors to Croesus king of Lydia, to Cappadocia, Pbrygia, Caria, Paphlagonia, the Indies, and Cilicia, to instil jealousies into the several princes of these countries, and to stir them up against the Medes and Persians, as if they were about to make themselves masters of all, particularly insisting on the strict union between them, by the mutual ties of marriage. The success of these several embassies was, that some yielded to his reasons, and others<sup>e</sup> to his present largesses, and future promises. Now, by what our author here says of this king, and particularly of his conquests, one would be rather apt to imagine he meant Nabopolassar, or Nebuchadnezzar, than any king of Babylon that succeeded him, and particularly as he makes him contemporary with Astyages the Mede. As for the pretence of union between the Persians and the Medes, the same was as strongly cemented between the Babylonians and the Medes; for Nebuchadnezzar was married to a Mede<sup>f</sup>, and it is very likely that Neriglissar was a Mede, by his being husband to a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar's<sup>g</sup>. In short, the Medes and the Babylonians seem to have been as closely united by marriages as any other nations of the time.

BUT we must allow our author<sup>h</sup> to be a little inaccurate, and especially as it is made a doubt whether it was a history he meant to write, or a romance. f However, that it is built upon some sort of truth, may be gathered from what he is here supposed to write concerning our Neriglissar; for as an usurper, it is but natural he should have made such strong and earnest applications to the nations round about, he is said to have done; a method of procedure which can never be reconciled with a conqueror in the full stream of his good fortune, as this prince is by our author<sup>h</sup>, at the same time, represented to have been. We must therefore tax him a him with a little inattentiveness to what he was writing. Neriglissar, though he may have been of the royal blood of the Medes, may have been dubious whether or no they and the Persians would suffer him to sit in quiet possession of the Babylonian empire, and may have had sufficient reasons to dread they would not; and that in such case he should so bestir himself in his own defence is no wonder.

<sup>a</sup> Jerem. lii. 31.    <sup>t</sup> Ibid. & Dan. ubi supr.    <sup>u</sup> Ezr. iv. 6.    <sup>w</sup> Ibid. ver. 7.    <sup>x</sup> Ibid. ver. 10.    <sup>y</sup> Dan. viii.    <sup>z</sup> See before in the canon, ubi supr.    <sup>a</sup> See before, ibid.    <sup>b</sup> Beros. ubi supr.    <sup>c</sup> Купе Плат. β.    <sup>d</sup> Ibid.    <sup>e</sup> See before, p. 961.    <sup>f</sup> See before, p. 965.    <sup>g</sup> Xenoph.    <sup>h</sup> Idem ibid.

LET this have been as it will, it is apparently certain, that when this king seized on the sovereignty, the empire was in its decline, and in great danger from both the Medes and Persians, and it is not unlikely but he may have actually stood in need of foreign aid. Thus when Nabuchodonosor was threatened with an invasion by the Medes, he issued out his commands to all nations to come in to his assistance<sup>i</sup>, a conduct Ctesius <sup>k</sup> has ascribed to his Sardanapalus; and which may serve to illustrate what we advance concerning the distress Neriglissar must have been in upon his usurpation; but he does not command as they did, he claims no obedience, but petitions rather, and begs and bribes for aid.

To have done with this obscurity, the army which ranged itself under the Babylonian standard, is said to have consisted of a mixed multitude as follows. Craesus, <sup>The confederate army under him.</sup> king of Lydia, came with 10,000 horse, and upwards of 40,000 light-armed foot; Artamas, king of the greater Phrygia, brought 40,000 foot, mostly pike men, and 8000 horse; Aribæus, king of Cappadocia, led with him 6000 horse, and 30,000 foot, mostly armed with missile weapons; Maragdas, the Arabian, conducted c 10,000 horse, 100 chariots, and a great number of slingers*. These were the confederates of Neriglissar, and such the quota's they respectively furnished; but we are not quite to depend upon the exactness of them, they being given as upon hear-say only, and in a conversation between Cyaxares and Cyrus.

As for Neriglissar himself, this potent Babylonian and fortunate conqueror, as our author has represented him, the numbers he himself brought into the field seem to be very short, considering him in that view; for as much as he may have been a principal in this war, he headed no more than 20,000 horse, 200 chariots, and foot proportionable<sup>l</sup>. Whether or no this confederate army received any farther addition, is not certain; but the Carians, Cilicians, Paphlagonians, and some others, d seem to have receded from their first engagements. So that the case is pretty much alike between Chyniladan<sup>m</sup>, the Affyrian, and this Babylonian, in regard of the many nations they called in, and the many that disappointed them, and left them to their fate. The army of the Medes and the Persians did not amount to above a third of that under the Babylonian king, till they were joined by a considerable reinforcement under Tigranes the Armenian. In the midst of these great and industrious preparations for war, ambassadors arrived from India, to inquire into the grounds and causes of it; with an offer of mediation, if it might be accepted, and with a threat, in case it was rejected, of joining with those who should appear to have the most justice on their side<sup>n</sup>.

e How this embassy concluded is uncertain, but the war begins very much to the disadvantage of Neriglissar; for Cyrus subdued the Chaldeans in the mountainous coun- <sup>War between him and the Medes and Persians.</sup> try, from whence they were wont to make their inroads upon the country of Armenia<sup>o</sup>. These Chaldeans, as they are called, can have been no other than the proper Affyrians, who, for ought we know, may have been formerly so called; but the proper Chaldeans, and their mountains, were far away from any part of Armenia<sup>p</sup>. Whether or no our author is here guilty of an error in geography, we cannot positively say: but to us it seems that he is. These Chaldeans however, according to our <sup>Chaldeans next to Armenia.</sup> author's description, were the most valiant race of men in all these parts, and carried no other arms than a wicker shield and two javelins, and entered willingly into foreign pay, as being naturally addicted to war, and very poor; but they were sub- f dued by Cyrus, and obliged to make a peace with their next neighbours the Armenians, and, in a manner, to become the same people with them<sup>q</sup>.

THE two armies now appeared in sight of each other, and the Affyrians, or Baby- <sup>Battle between the Babylonians and the Medes.</sup> lonians, under Neriglissar, incamped and fortified themselves with strong retrenchments, while the Medes and the Persians covered themselves only with the villages and hills in the neighbourhood. In this posture they continued for some days, till at length the Affyrians leaving their retrenchments, and drawing themselves up in battle array, and being exhorted by Neriglissar to behave as became them in the approaching

<sup>i</sup> See before, p. 898.

<sup>n</sup> Kypri Naisd. ubi sup.

<sup>k</sup> Ibid. p. 887.

<sup>o</sup> Ibid.

<sup>p</sup> See before, p. 906.

* Kypri Naisd.

<sup>l</sup> Ibid.

<sup>m</sup> See before, p. 898.

<sup>q</sup> Kypri Naisd. ubi sup.

Neriglissar
slain.

Year of the
Flood, 2443
Year before
CHRIST, 556.
Neriglissar
most likely to have been Darius the Mede.

approaching conflict, and particularly as their all was at stake; were attacked by the <sup>a</sup> enemy, who shamefully routed them in the field, and pursued them with a prodigious slaughter close to their retrenchments, where those within did not dare to shoot an arrow against the insulting Medes and Persians, under the conduct of Cyrus; and no sooner understood that he intended to force their camp, than they betook them to the most precipitate flight, and left their wives and children to lament their loss, in the most woeful and sensible manner. This when the confederate kings perceived, they hastened, with the choicest of their men that were left them, to repulse the Persians, and they succeeded in their endeavours, and Cyrus retreated and incamped at some distance. But Neriglissar lived to see no more of the war now kindled. He was slain in battle, his subjects were in the utmost consternation, and <sup>b</sup> Crasus and his allies quite at a loss, and amazed at the intrepidity of the enemy, resolved to save themselves as they could, and left their camp a prey to Cyrus and his Persians <sup>c</sup>.

SUCH was the unfortunate end of Neriglissar, who, that he was Darius the Mede, appears by these arguments. If as king of Babylon, he is in the canon of Ptolemy, Darius the Mede can have been no other than Neriglissar. Secondly, Darius the Mede is said to have commenced king of Babylon at the age of 62 years; which, if we do not suppose him to have been slain by Cyrus as above, may be thought to suit better with Neriglissar's short reign of four years, than Nabonad's longer reign of 17 years, which would make him 79 years old at his death; and, by the way, <sup>c</sup> as Nabonad did not end his days with his reign, Darius the Mede must, in this case, have been still much older, which is not very likely. Thirdly, Neriglissar is represented as a wise, a worthy, and a brave prince, which neither of his successors were, and just such an one does Darius the Mede seem to have been. Fourthly, Though Neriglissar is not said to have been a Mede, yet he very probably may have been so, and nothing is said to the contrary. He is allowed not to have been of the line of Babylon, though he married the daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, and sister of Evil-merodach; and these marriages, as we have suggested above, may have been frequent between the two kings of the Medes and Babylonians, till Evil-merodach behaved so impolitickly as he is represented to have done, in breach of <sup>d</sup> the faith and good intelligence between the two kingdoms. Fifthly, Neriglissar is on all hands allowed to have succeeded Evil-merodach, whom he slew, and so Darius the Mede is said to have slain Belshazzar, and to have assumed his kingdom. And though the scripture expression, in this case, does not always imply an immediate succession, it may be fairly enough admitted in such a sense, in the circumstance before us, till something to destroy it be exhibited against it. Sixthly, That Neriglissar was a Mede, may be gathered from the inveteracy he seems to have born against Evil-merodach, whom we take to have been Belshazzar; and it may be very naturally accounted for, if what we have related from Xenophon has any truth in it. Seventhly, The scripture does not say that Darius was king of the Medes, but only <sup>e</sup> that he governed by their laws, which he may have introduced with the good liking of the Babylonians, who may thereby have had a limited monarch for an unlimited one. And lastly, He may have been a Mede, and yet Cyrus may have made war upon him, and slain him in battle; for Cyrus, it is said, made no scruple to dethrone even his own grandfather; whence Darius may not only have been a Mede, but may also have been very nearly related to Cyrus, and yet have perished in battle against him; for nothing is to stand in the way of those who are fired by the wasteful ambition of conquest, and universal monarchy. This is what we have thought necessary to say in this place.

Laborosoarchod.

THIS last king was succeeded by his son Laborosoarchod <sup>f</sup>, Labassoarasc <sup>g</sup>, or Chabassoarach <sup>h</sup>; some suppose him to have been the same with Nabonadius, or Belshazzar, and to have been the last king of Babylon. But they contradict an historical fact very explicitly related; whereby we understand, that he came very young to the throne, and that betraying a most vicious and abominable turn of mind, he was murdered, as not even worthy to live, much less to reign, which he did no longer than nine months; so that not having completed a year, it is thence he is omitted in the canon.

SOME of this king's evil doings are supposed † to have been recorded by Xenophon ‡, according to whom it may have been, that he committed such cruelties on <sup>f</sup> Kuxi Hase<sup>g</sup> ubi sup.

ubi sup.

<sup>g</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>h</sup> BEROSUS ubi sup.

† PAID. ubi sup. 113.

<sup>g</sup> ARYEN. ubi sup.

‡ Ubi sup. d. 1.

<sup>h</sup> Idem apud EUSEB.

- a on Gadatas and Gobryas, two great Babylonians, as provoked them to the share they are said to have had in the subversion of this empire. The son of the former of these he is said to have slain for no better reason than hitting a beast, at a hunting he had invited him to, which he himself had missed; and the latter he is said to have castrated, only because one of his concubines had commended him for an handsome personage*. By these most violent acts of tyranny it is supposed †, that he drove them, and the provinces they commanded, over to the enemy. Such is this king supposed to have been, though there are other seeming reasons why he should have been particularly odious in the eyes of some of the Babylonians, and particularly of his successor and his associates.
- b Nabonadius, who had the chief hand in the murder of Laborsoarchod, is said to have been a Babylonian‡, so that what is said above of the unworthiness of his short-lived predecessor, may have very little of truth or justice in it. His greatest fault may have been, that he was the son of a stranger and an usurper; and being perhaps a child, or little able to defend himself, he may easily have been destroyed, and reasons may as easily have been given for the deed. Nor can we wonder greatly at this barbarity, in a man who was confessedly the son of Evil-merodach, and grandson to the great Nebuchadnezzar; one who must have thought himself injured by an exclusion from the throne, and that it was even a duty on him not to slip so favourable an opportunity of retrieving the lustre of his family. Nor must we
- c forget that he must also have been the son of the famed Nitocris, who is said even to have outshone Semiramis herself; and who, if the thing were so, could not have rested in a private state, while the son of an usurper possessed the throne in prejudice of her son; and thus was it the scepter came again into the hands of a prince of the old Assyrian or Babylonian race, of the male branch, which in him was to cease from empire.

THIS king is also called Nabondius*, Labyntus, Labynitus‡, Nabannidochus‡, Naboandel‡, Belfazzar, and Darius the Mede‡, and by other names, and rather struggled for the empire than possessed it; for Cyrus was now in the career of his victories, and a professed enemy to the kingdom of Babylon, and had some battles d with this king, as should seem, and his allies, in the beginning of his reign; but the particulars being no where to be met with, we must content ourselves with the little we know of the matter, and which we shall relate hereafter. Nabonadius appears, however, to have been the most powerful prince of his time, and the kingdom of Babylon to have been such, that Cyrus thought it prudent to strengthen himself, the most he could, by the conquest of all the neighbouring kingdoms, before he undertook to destroy this.

- WHAT sort of a man Nabonadius was, is hard to say; but his mother, according to some, has all the glory of his reign; all the honour of preparing for the defence of the falling kingdom is ascribed to her. Her name was Nitocris‡, and is
- e supposed to have been a Mede by birth*, and to have been wife to Evil-merodach; and being a woman of great sagacity and resolution, she not only foresaw the storm that was gathering, but prepared for shelter against it, and particularly by fortifying the city itself of Babylon, so that it should be proof against any enemy that might assault it. Accordingly it was in this reign, and consequently by her, that Babylon is said to have been first surrounded with walls† next to the river; and it is pretty plain, as we have observed before, that she completed what Nebuchadnezzar had begun. Thus Herodotus represents her to have not only fortified the sides of the river with walls, to prevent the enemy from landing on either side of the city, but to have sunk the lake, and done other works ascribed to Nebuchadnezzar, and
- f particularly to have built the bridge, which till then had been wanting at Babylon‡. This heroine, having done all that could be done to secure the city from all danger of the enemy, while her son Nabonadius wallowed, as should seem, in sloth and luxury, neglectful and careless of what threatened him, was commemorated by an extraordinary extraordinary inscription on a monument which had been prepared by herself, to a the following effect, IF ANY KING OF BABYLON AFTER ME, SHALL BE IN DISTRESS FOR MONEY, HE MAY OPEN THIS SEPULCHRE, AND TAKE OUT AS MUCH AS MAY SERVE HIM; BUT IF HE BE IN NO REAL NECESSITY, LET HIM FORBEAR, OR HE SHALL HAVE CAUSE TO REPENT HIM. This monument and inscription, said to have been over one of the most remarkable gates of the city, is also said to have remained untouched till the reign of Darius, who considering the gate was useless, no man caring to go under a dead body, and being invited by the hopes of an immense treasure, broke it open; but instead of what he sought, is said to have found nothing but a dead body, and another inscription, to the following effect, HADST THOU NOT BEEN MOST INSATIABLY AVARITIOUS, AND b GREEDY OF THE MOST SORDID GAIN, THOU HADST NEVER VIOLATED THE ABODE OF THE DEAD (X). Thus much for Nitocris*; we must now return to her son, and see how the Babylonian empire ended under him.

* Ibid. † PRID. ubi sup. ‡ ABYD. ex MEGASTH. apud EUSEB. ubi sup. & BEROS. apud JOSEPH. ubi sup. & Id. ubi sup. * See before in the canon, ubi sup. † HERODOT. ‡ MEGASTH. ubi sup. § JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 10. c. 12. b See before in the ecclesiastic account, ubi sup. c HERODOT. and his followers. d HERODOT. l. 1. c. 185. e Vid. USSER. Annal. ad Ann. Mund. ubi sup. f BEROSUS apud EUSEB. & JOSEPH. ubi sup. HERODOT. ubi sup. § HERODOT. ibid. c. 186.

As the circumstances of the fall of Nineveh are involved in great obscurity, those of the fall of Babylon are in many respects no less so; for all we seem positively to know concerning it, is, that it was destroyed by Cyrus; and all we can do is, first, to relate what profane authors write concerning this last king; and, secondly, to inquire whether or no he was the Belshazzar of Daniel.

Herodotus's account of the fall of Babylon. IF we adhere to Herodotus b, who calls him Labyntus, we must conclude him to have been still a great king, who, as yet, had not been attempted by the Medes and the Persians; but to have been, on the contrary, in such high esteem with the former, as to have been chosen their mediator with the Lydians; which apparently destroys what Xenophon represents of the war which subsisted without any intervention of settled peace, from the reign of Neriglissar to the last day of the Babylonian monarchy; and this circumstance being considered, it has been thought, that however Herodotus may seem to give this king, who thus reconciled the Medes and Lydians, for the last of the race, he could certainly mean no other than the great Nebuchadnezzar, who alone, of all the kings at Babylon, seems to have had weight and authority enough to be invested with this mediatory office.

Herodotus has a Labyntus whom, in two places, he calls the king of the Babylonians, and a Labyntus whom he calls emperor of Ahyria, and reports to have derived his name from his father. Under this Labyntus, according to him, it was that Babylon was taken by Cyrus; so that, after all, it may have been some former Labyntus, king of Babylon, that reconciled the Medes and the Lydians; but having thus suggested all we know concerning this matter, we leave it to the reader's decision.

THIS Labyntus understanding that Cyrus was on his march to besiege the city of Babylon, went out with a great army to meet him; but being vanquished, the Babylonians betook them to their city, which being furnished with great stores of provision to hold out a very long siege, they made a jest of it, and lived within e the walls as if no enemy had been near them; but being one day in the midst of a riotous festival, the Persians, who had drained the river by diverting it into the great lake we have described, scaled the works which defended the banks of the city, and the Babylonians were surprised in the midst of all their mirth and jollity, and an end was put to their empire f.

The fall of Babylon, according to Berossus and Megasthenes.

By other authors g we understand that this last king did not retire in person to Babylon, but chose rather to go to Borsippa, where being besieged by Cyrus, he surrendered himself to that conqueror, who behaved very kindly to him, and sent him as his lieutenant, as should seem, into Carmania, where he spent the remainder of his days. And thus was Babylon taken, and such was the fate of her last king, p after

* Idem ibid. c. 187. b Ibid. c. 188. f Idem ibid. c. 191. g BEROS. MEGASTH. ALEX. ubi sup.

(X) Plutarch (57) mentions this monument and inscription as belonging to Semiramis. Thus the sepulchre of Bel himself is said to have been opened by Xerxes, who found nothing there but a glass vessel almost full of oil, with a dead body floating in it, and an inscription on a small pillar hard by, That the man who should open it, should dearly repent him of what he had done, if he did not fill up the vessel with oil; which Xerxes in vain attempting, he went away heavy and sad, and experienced the efficacy of the threat in his Grecian expedition. So Darius, by others, being said to have opened the tomb of Semiramis, a pestilence is reported to have issued thence, and to have destroyed one third part of the race of men (58): Strange figments!

(57) In Λυσιπποῦ, p. 173.

(58) Vid. PURCH. Pilgr. part i. c. 12. p. 65.

a after a reign of 17 years, according to profane historians; nor is the same inconsistent with scripture so very much as to oblige us quite to reject it.

But as much weight as these authors may have, Xenophon varies from them, and tells us<sup>1</sup>, that this king lost all the considerable places in his country by a continued warfare waged on him by Cyrus, notwithstanding all the leagues he could make, and all the foreign aid he could procure of Egyptians, Greeks, Thracians, and all the nations of the Lesser Asia, over whom he constituted Craesus his general, and sent him even to invade Media. But Craesus being utterly routed, and the country afterwards as good as all reduced, Babylon was left as it were to herself. The city and the little territory about it was all of the east that now held out against Cyrus, who at length drew near to besiege the Babylonian citizens. This last king then marched out to give him battle, but being overthrown in the field, he was driven back to his city, and blocked up by a close siege. The place was thought impregnable, on account of its walls, and the great number of people to defend them; not to mention a store of all necessaries to last them for 20 years. The siege continued two years; at the end of which, the river was diverted into the lake as above, and a strong party was posted where the river ran into the city, and another where it ran out. These parties were commanded by the Babylonians, Gobryas and Gadatas, who, about midnight, observing the river to be drained, marched into the bed of the river, and finding all the water gates open, which upon ordinary nights, for it was now a festival, were used to be shut, they proceeded to the palace, and surprized and slew the guard. The palace being opened to know the cause of this confusion, they rushed in and slew the king as he was valiantly fighting with his sword in his hand<sup>2</sup>.

If he was really Belsazzar, he certainly came to this unfortunate end; for having made a feast for a 1000 of his lords, and having profaned the vessels his fore-father had brought from the temple of Jerusalem, the fingers of a hand came out, and wrote upon the wall in a character unknown to any person then present; the king saw this, and was quite terrified; he trembled, and his knees smote one against the other<sup>3</sup>. He cried out for the astrologers, Chaldeans, and the rest, and promised that the man among them who should decypher the writing, and inform him of what it meant, should be clothed in scarlet, and have a chain of gold, and be third ruler of his kingdom<sup>4</sup>. He addressed them in vain (Y), till the queen, who is supposed to have been Nitocris, understanding the trouble the king was in, came in and informed him of Daniel, who had been so esteemed by his father; but that he should have been unknown to Belsazzar, is what it may be to no purpose to enquire into. Daniel came, and having reminded him of what his father had been, and what had befallen him, and rebuked him for his insolent pride, and for profaning the holy vessels which had stood in the house of the Lord, he read the words, which were, MENE MENE, TEKEL UPHARSIN<sup>5</sup>. "This is the interpretation of the thing; MENE, God hath numbred thy kingdom, and finished it; TEe "KEL, thou art weighed in the balance, and found wanting; PERES, thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians<sup>6</sup>." Notwithstanding the severity of this doom, Belsazzar performed to Daniel all the promise he had made to the man who should thus satisfy him; and in that night was Belsazzar the king of the Chaldeans slain: And Darius the Median took the kingdom, being about 62 years old<sup>7</sup>.

In the first year of the reign of Belsazzar it was that Daniel<sup>8</sup> had the vision of the four beasts, which we may resume hereafter, and in the third of the same Belsazzar it was that he had the vision of the ram and the he-goat<sup>9</sup>. In the reign of Darius the Mede it was that the same Daniel was thrown into the lion's den<sup>10</sup>; but the particulars of these several occurrences we reserve for another time, seeing we are at a loss for the proper place of these two reigns.

We are now to consider whether or no this Nabonadius was either Belsazzar or Darius the Mede; in which we shall rather propose our own doubts, than pretend to decide upon so palpable an obscurity as is the whole history of Babylon, from the Darius the Mede.

<sup>1</sup> Kuru Hase p. 5. * Ibid. <sup>m</sup> Dan. v. 1. — 6. <sup>n</sup> Dan. v. 7. <sup>o</sup> Prin. ubi sup. p. 122.
<sup>p</sup> Dan. v. 25. <sup>q</sup> Ibid. ver. 28. <sup>r</sup> Ibid. ver. 31. <sup>s</sup> Dan. vii. <sup>t</sup> Ibid. viii. <sup>u</sup> Ibid. vi.

(Y) It is supposed the writing was in what we call now the Samaritan character, which being unknown to the Chaldeans, they could not read it (59).

(59) See Prin. ubi sup. p. 122.

the time that Nebuchadnezzar had died, to the day that Cyrus made himself master of a this city. Sir Isaac Newton, and Doctor Prideaux, are quite clear that he was Belshazzar, and support themselves by many considerable arguments, but not so very powerful as to admit of no contradiction. To enter into the several opinions and varieties concerning this succession of princes, would lead us into an inextricable labyrinth, and confound rather than inform us; we shall therefore chiefly refer to what we have before offered in proof that Evil-merodach must have been the Belshazzar of Daniel, and Neriglissar the Darius the Mede of the same, if they be any kings exhibited in Ptolemy's astronomical canon; and to suppose they are not, would be a seeming reflection on the accuracy of that valuable piece.

It is to be observed, that if any credit is to be given to profane historians, Nabonadius cannot have been Belshazzar; for the former must have died in a strange land, while the latter was slain in his own palace. Again, Belshazzar's ignorance of Daniel can never be reconciled with so long a reign as that of Nabonadius. The utmost we can gather that Belshazzar reigned at Babylon was not above three years; Nabonadius reigned seventeen.

THIS Nabonadius was certainly the last king of Babylon, and by Ptolemy's canon, and by the concurrence of the bulk of profane authors, there was no king there between him and Cyrus; nor does the scripture itself, which makes Darius the Mede to have preceded Cyrus, say that he reigned after the last king of the Babylonian race, or that there was no king of Babylon between Darius the Mede and Cyrus.

Now that this last Babylonian cannot have been Darius the Mede, as is sometimes said <sup>w</sup>, may be proved by profane authors <sup>x</sup>, who agree that he was a Babylonian, nay, and of the royal race <sup>y</sup>; and this shall suffice for the present, together with what has been said before, to evince that he was not Darius the Mede.

Nabonadius was certainly of the royal race †; there is all the reason in the world to believe he was a descendant, and even a grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, and especially if the celebrated Nitocris was married to Evil-merodach, the son of Nebuchadnezzar, as the common opinion is. It is said that all nations should serve him and his son's son; Nabonadius may then have been this son's son. It is said, that God would cut off from Babylon the son and the grandson ‡, and therefore it is concluded, that this last king must have been killed as well as Evil-merodach; but there is no occasion to suppose this, if profane evidence may be received; and that so it ought to be, when it agrees with the text of scripture, can be no manner of doubt. Now we understand that this prophecy was amply fulfilled; for we are told, that Evil-merodach, the undoubted son of Nebuchadnezzar, was murdered <sup>a</sup>, and that his grandson, by his daughter who was married to Neriglissar, and whose name was Labrosoarchod, was murdered likewise <sup>b</sup>. Supposing then Nabonadius to have been the grandson likewise of Nebuchadnezzar by Evil-merodach, there is no necessity to suppose he was murdered or slain. The predictions then that all nations should serve Nebuchadnezzar's son, and his son's son, and that God would cut off his son and his grandson, were apparently different, and apparently fulfilled. In a word, Belshazzar, who, to all appearance, was no other than Evil-merodach, seems rather to have been butchered by the hands of assassins than to have fallen by the sword of the enemy; nor can it be consistent with the character we have of Nitocris, to imagine she could have been so negligent as to suffer the enemy to surprise the city in the manner they did; she then must have been dead, and not alive, as Prideaux would have it. Though it is prophesied, that the enemy should possess the city at the time of a feast, while her great, and wise, and mighty men were in liquor, it does not follow immediately thence, that the king himself was slain at the same time. That it was taken at the time of a great festival, we have confirmed to us by an historian of the first credit, and nearest to the times <sup>c</sup>, and that is sufficient for the honour of the prophecy.

Arguments deduced from Nebuchadnezzar's prophecy.

As we are not wholly to reject profane authorities, but, on the contrary, very much to rely on them, we would observe, that from the prophecy of Nebuchadnezzar <sup>d</sup>, which he is supposed to have owed to no less a man than Daniel himself,

<sup>w</sup> DU PIN Biblioth. Univers. des Histor. 296. <sup>x</sup> MEGASTH. BEROI. ABYD. ubi sup. <sup>y</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 10. c. 12. † Idem ibid. ‡ See before, p. 952. <sup>a</sup> Isai. xiv. 22. <sup>b</sup> See before, p. 965. <sup>c</sup> Idem 968. <sup>d</sup> HERODOT. ubi sup. <sup>e</sup> See before, p. 964. <sup>f</sup> Vid. PRID. ubi sup. p. 106.

- a self, it may be gathered, that what we have here and elsewhere above suggested, concerning Belshazzar and Darius the Mede, is not very much out of the way. For he speaks of the destruction to befall to Babylon, as just at hand; and, though he must have been then very old, what he might possibly be a witness to; and thus Belshazzar, who is in scripture expressly called his son, was murdered two or three years after his death. This destruction was to be brought on by the means of a Mede, in whom the Assyrians, or Babylonians, were wont greatly to pride themselves; and what Mede can this have been so likely as Neriglissar? who seems by his name to have been even naturalized an Assyrian, and who had married Nebuchadnezzar's own daughter <sup>l</sup>. The Persian mule is plainly Cyrus, who, by warring upon Neriglissar to dethrone him, first struck at the root of the Babylonian empire, and, by continuing the war, brought it at length to the ground.

UPON the whole, it may appear rather more evidently than not, that if Darius the Mede, and Belshazzar, are any of the kings of Babylon in the canon, and that they are not cannot well be so much as supposed, they can have been no other than Evil-merodach and Neriglissar. The son and grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, against whom it was denounced that they should be cut off, cannot well be allowed to have been any but Evil-merodach and Laborosoarchod; and his son and his son's son, whom all nations, as it is hyperbolically expressed, should serve, can have been no other than Evil-merodach and this Nabonadius, in whose days the empire of Babylon came to an end, as had been foretold by the prophets . . . . The burden of Babylon, which c Isaiah the son of Amoz did see . . . . Howl ye, for the day of the Lord is at hand; it shall come as a destruction from the Almighty . . . . Behold I will stir up the Medes against them . . . . And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrhah. It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation; neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there, neither shall the shepherds make their fold there. But wild beasts of the desert shall lie there, and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures, and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there. And the wild beasts of the island shall cry in their desolate houses, and dragons in their pleasant palaces g : : How art thou d fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, thou son of the morning! How art thou cut down to the ground, which didst weaken the nations! . . . . I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of hosts, and cut off from Babylon, the name, and remnant, and son, and nephew, [or, as it should be, the grandson <sup>h</sup>]. . . . I will also make it a possession for the bittern, and pools of water: and I will sweep it with the besom of destruction i . . . . Babylon is fallen, is fallen; and all the graven images of her gods be bath broken unto the ground k . . . : Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth . . . . They stoop, they bow down together, they could not deliver the burden, but themselves are gone into captivity l . . . . The word that the Lord spake against Babylon, and against the land of the Chaldeans, by Jeremiah the prophet . . . . Say Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, e Merodach is broken in pieces, her idols are confounded, her images are broken in pieces m . . . . Hear ye the counsel of the Lord, that he hath taken against Babylon, and his purposes that he hath purposed against the land of the Chaldeans n . . . . Behold I will raise up against Babylon, and against them that dwell in the midst of them that rise up against me, a destroying wind. And I will send unto Babylon fanners, that shall fan her, and empty her land . . . . Flee out of the midst of Babylon, and deliver every man his soul: be not cut off in her iniquity . . . . Babylon is suddenly fallen and destroyed: howl for her, take balm for her pain, if so be she may be healed. We would have healed Babylon, but she is not healed: forsake her, and let us go every one into his own country: for her judgment reacheth unto heaven, and is lifted up even to the skies . . . .

f Make bright the arrows: gather the shields: the Lord hath raised up the spirit of the king of the Medes: for his device is against Babylon to destroy it . . . . Set ye up a standard in the land, blow the trumpet among the nations, prepare the nations against her, call together against her the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni and Ashchinez, appoint a captain against her, cause the horses to come up as the rough caterpillers. Prepare against her the nations with the kings of the Medes . . . . The land shall tremble and sorrow: for every purpose of the Lord shall be performed against Babylon, to make the land of

Babylon

<sup>l</sup> See before, p. 969.
<sup>i</sup> Ibid. xlv. 1, 2.

<sup>g</sup> Isai. xiii.
<sup>m</sup> Jerem. l. 2:

<sup>h</sup> See Ps. lxx.

<sup>i</sup> Isa. xiv. 12.—23.
<sup>n</sup> Ibid. ver. 45.

<sup>k</sup> Ibid. xxi. 9.

Babylon a desolation without an inhabitant . . . . One post shall run to meet another, a and one messenger to meet another, to shew the king of Babylon that his city is taken at one end (Y) . . . . Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, the God of Israel, The daughter of Babylon is like a threshing-floor, it is time to thresh her: yet a little while and the time of her harvest shall come . . . . And Babylon shall become heaps, a dwelling place for dragons, an astonishment and an hissing without an inhabitant . . . . The sea is come up against Babylon: she is covered with the multitude of the waves thereof. Her cities are a desolation, a dry land and a wilderness, a land wherein no man dwelleth, neither doth any son of man pass thereby . . . . The heaven and the earth, and all that is therein, shall sing for Babylon . . . . And I will make drunk her princes, and her wise men, her captains and her rulers, and her mighty men: and they shall sleep a perpetual sleep, and not wake, saith the King, whose name is The Lord of hosts . . . . The broad walls of Babylon shall be utterly broken, and her high gates shall be burnt with fire, and the people shall labour in vain, and the folk in the fire, and they shall be weary<sup>o</sup>.

SUCH was Babylon, and such her end. Upon the whole it appears, that the Assyrian monarchy, whether the first at Niniveh, or the second at Babylon, was never thoroughly settled in a dominion over the nations for any length of time, and that it rather contended for empire than enjoyed it in any settled form, and that, if we except Nebuchadnezzar, no one of these monarchs, from Pul to Nabonadius, could ever boast any thing like the conquests attributed to Semiramis. Esar-baddon may claim the next place after him for conquests and dominion, but his life ended by<sup>c</sup> the time he had exalted himself over the west. The rest of these princes were all unfortunate, one way or another: Some of them, with infinite labour and hazard, attempted to subjugate the nations; but the flame still broke out some where or other against them; others of them, by a supine neglect, saw themselves in danger, from those their warlike predecessors had awed, and were some of them, in the end, subdued, and captivated, and destroyed by them. In fine, we see both the Assyrian and the Babylonian submitted to that fate, which must sooner or later dissolve all universal monarchies, which must have almost as many enemies as subjects.

<sup>a</sup> Idem li. 2, — 58.

(Y) Whether from hence it may be gathered, reader: and consequently, whether or no the that this last king was within the city or with- Belsazzar of Daniel was this last king or out it, at the time it was taken, we leave to the not.

The END of the FIRST VOLUME.

The Explanation at large of SOLOMON'S Temple, and of the City of Jerusalem, according to the Sacred Historians.

FOR the right understanding the description in the foregoing plate, we shall lay down the following preliminary observations:

I. First, The temple of Solomon being our chief and proper object, we give the plan or ground-plot of it (which we declare to be our only task) whole and complete, just as we conceive it to have been: but Jerusalem we represent only with an eye to those parts which bore some relation to the temple; such as the palace on the south, and the suburbs to the west, the valley between both, the horse-gate towards the east, and the like.

II. Secondly, We pretend to no other knowledge of the temple, but what we have from scripture in terminis, or the clear sense of it; and where that fails, we only beg to be allowed the use of criticism, and reasonable or plausible conjecture; for beyond these we have no other evidence*. How great soever the learning of some moderns may be, much greater we own, than any we pretend to, yet what they assert has no weight, unless they can bring such manner of proof as that which we ourselves intend to use. Whether they or we best stand the test, must be left to the judgment of the reader, that will be at the pains of perusing these sheets with some attention, and of comparing our plan with any other now extant. As for ancient authors, we have none to produce besides Josephus, and other Jews, rather of a later date than he. Now all we might learn from them, that has no foundation in holy writ, to us is no evidence at all. Much they knew or pretended to know from tradition, but that we presume is not to be depended upon. We know no monuments they had besides those we have ourselves: And the Hebrew tongue, properly so called, being a sort of dead language at the time these authors writ, it may well be doubted, without sinning against modesty, whether they, who had no other books to learn it by, than those that are now in use, could understand it better than those that study it at present. Nay more, it might be shewn, we dare say, that Josephus understood not some of those Hebrew words he pretends to explain in his History of the Jews (A).

III. Thirdly,

* See before page 795, & seq.

(A) This is the more to be wondered at, because Josephus boldly asserts, at the end of his Jewish antiquities (1), That there were none of his countrymen so perfect in that sort of learning as he was. But we are not alone in our opinion of him*; tho' the late editor of his works, taking his bare word for it, sets him off in the margin (2) as a very learned hebraean: Bochart (3) and Huetius (4), not to name any more, have openly declared themselves quite opposite to that eulogium of Josephus by Dr. Hudson. Some indeed have tried to bring him off upon a supposition, his writings were interpolated; which is not unlikely in some instances (5), and truly he himself should not be charged with the blunders of either his transcribers or translators. We should think what is read in his manuscripts (6), that the Hebrews called the ark Heoron, and many such, other strange names (7), is no fault of the historian, but of those that copied his writings, and the same we judge of the translations. The French one, though much valued, says, The ark was made of an incorruptible wood, the Hebrews call

Heoron; and truly so the Latin has it, which the French exactly followed, though pretending, in the title, the translation was made from the Greek original; and Roger L'estrang here treads in Dan-dill's steps heartily. However, to us it is probable, that Josephus being about to give in Greek the word in Hebrew for the ark, he wrote ἡ ἀρκα, or as Dr. Bernard of Oxford would have it (8), ἡ ἀρκα. Now pronounce it either way, Aron with the Hebrews, or Eron with the Chaldeans, the word itself signifies a Trunk, as was the ark, and Josephus is right enough, though others have wronged him in relating his words. But what seems therabouts (9) to be Josephus's own fault, is the interpretation of what his manuscripts and editions both call Cethonene; which, he says, signifies a linen coat, because it is Cethon we call linen; now begging his pardon, Cethoneth, the Hebrew word, or Cethoneth, as the Chaldeans pronounce it, may be also a coat of wooll. Not to observe the Cethoneth of many colours Josephus wore (10), or that that hang'd like a robe about Thamar (11), possibly were not of linen, those

(1) Lib. xx. c. 10. p. 903. * Vid. sup. p. 535. in fin. (Z) (2) JOSEPHUS in hebraeis literis versatissimus. (3) Hieros. lib. ii. c. 9. p. 154. (4) Dem. Evang. Prop. iv. p. 175. 199. (5) Vid. Antiq. lib. iii. c. 7. p. 112. De Veit. Sacred. & V. 8. 213. etym. Samson. (6) Lib. iii. c. 6. p. 110. (7) ἡ ἀρκα, ἡ ἐφεσθονη, ἡ ἐφεσθονη, ἡ ἐφεσθονη, ἡ ἐφεσθονη. (8) In loc. ed. SHELDO. p. 166. 4. (9) Ubi sup. Numb. 2. (10) Gen. xxxvii. 3. (11) 2 Sam. xiii. 18.

III. Thirdly, We do admit of Ezekiel as a divinely inspired prophet; and therefore what he has said or written ought to be received by us as most true. But then we take it he has not given us a description of the temple of Solomon, but of quite another; a prophetic or emblematical temple, that never existed but in the revelation that was made to him, and the representation he has set down in his prophecy. He himself says <sup>a</sup>, In the visions of God brought he me into the land of Israel—and said unto me, Behold with thine eyes, for to the intent that I might shew unto thee art thou brought hither. Declare all that thou seest to the house of Israel—and much more to the same purpose. Now it does not seem probable at all that there wanted so much care and solemnity to shew the prophet a temple he had himself seen a hundred times over and over; he, as it is well known, being a priest <sup>b</sup> who had there officiated, and had no need of divine inspiration to tell his countrymen the Jews what most of them could not well be ignorant of, or rather were well instructed in. And if it should be urged that this might well be forgotten in a captivity of 70 years (B), I will readily allow it, and all that can be drawn from this concession, provided it be proved that any use was made of this so solemn a description, in their building of the temple, after the return from the captivity; but so far was it from it, that at the sight of the second temple many tears were shed, this second temple built by Zorobabel being much inferior to that they had seen of Solomon's building <sup>c</sup>; and what then, if compared with that of Ezekiel? For this temple (and that is the thing we dare rely upon) had no proportion as to its measures with that other of Solomon. Whether any body has ever apprehended Solomon's temple to have been of each side above 500 cubits (C), we do not know: but that would be nothing to Ezekiel's, which was 500 reeds <sup>d</sup>, that is to say, 3000 cubits, for it is well known that a reed was six cubits (D), so that here is a difference as of six to one in their capacity or enclosure, which is impossible to be thought or said of one and the same temple. But you will say, it might be the same except the enclosure: I answer, No, because the mountain had no proportion to such a one, no not by any jettées, or other ways you can imagine; for the square being 2000 reeds, will not give you less than 12000 and odd cubits, or about 4500 paces. Now Jerusalem itself was never so large (E); how then can we suppose the temple to those most surely our first parents were clothed with are said (12) to be of skin. Accordingly, we are told, those of the priests were of linen (13), on purpose that they should not be thought of some other stuff. But finding Chetbon, or Keiban, for linen, in the vulgar language of Jerusalem, Josephus thought Chetboneth in holy writ to signify a coat of linen; which indeed does not look so strange as the etymology he seems to give (14) of Jerusalem being a compound of the Greek Hieron, a sacred thing, and the word Sohma, unless this also be an interpolation. And the same one might say concerning Bezatha, which Josephus (15) makes to signify the New City, when no such thing can be made out of that word. But if it be worth while to guess at it, בזא Bazath, as it is a root, or radical word, seems to be preserved in that well known derivative among the Turks, viz. Bostangi, a gardiner; and among the Rabbins in Bustan, a garden. So that it is not unlikely that part of Jerusalem that lay northward of the temple, viz. Bezetha, before it was built into streets, was the gardening place for the city, and kept its ancient name, as is still customary among ourselves in such like occasions.

<sup>a</sup> Ezek. xl. 2—4.    <sup>b</sup> Ezra i. 3.    <sup>c</sup> Ibid. iii. 15.    <sup>d</sup> Ezek. xlii. 15, 20.    <sup>e</sup> Ibid. xl. 5.

(B) 'Tho' this revelation was made to Ezekiel in the 20th year of the said captivity, and but the 14th after the taking of Jerusalem by the Babylonians (16).

(C) The temple may well be taken for the whole ground on which it stood, with all its courts, and truly that name must be taken in this latitude, in our translation of the gospel; in Greek it is ἱερον, which might be properly turned into English by a consecrated place, or ground (17); and the Jews, who commonly call it Har babbaitb, mountain of the house, say it was a square of 500 cubits (18).

(D) What these cubits were, has been observed chap. 7. of this history (19), to be almost equal to 22 inches, which is far from improbable. Some indeed would increase the cubit to a greater length, and others reduce it to ours of 18 inches, which yet could not affect our argument, because which soever of the divers hypotheses be the nearer the truth, it makes no difference here in the main, the cubit not being considered in itself, but comparatively to the measuring reed, said to be (20) six cubits by a cubit and a hand breadth, or, according to the Septuagint, six cubits and one hand breadth besides.

(E) Tho' we know what Josephus does relate out of Hecateus, who, in the reign of Ptolemy Lagus, makes the circuit of Jerusalem almost 50 stadia πνήχυστα μάλιστα (21) stadia τὴν περίμετρον, which indeed he does not seem to correct, yet he himself does not reckon this renowned city's largest extent to have been above 33 stadia, τὴν πόλεως δὲ ὅπῃς κύκλος σταδίων ἢν τριακοντα τριῶν (22). Now a stadium, as is well known, being 125 paces, 33 stadia to have been so, that was but part of that city? Besides Josephus<sup>f</sup>, in the dimensions he gives us of Herod's temple, that he had himself seen, and was by far the largest of the three; does not exceed 4 stadia, or 500 paces. In a word, never any real temple, built upon Moria, was any thing near so big as that temple Ezekiel saw and delineated by inspiration.

(12) Gen. iii. 21. (13) Exod. xxviii. xxxix. pass. (14) Antiq. lib. vii. c. 3. p. 287. (15) Bell. Jud. lib. v. c. 4. p. 1223. (16) Ezek. xl. 1. (17) Matth. xxi. 12. Coll. 17. & al. pass. (18) Tract. Midd. c. 2. cui tit. בֵּית דָּוִד. (19) See before, p. 652. Vid. CUMBERLAND'S Essay on weights and measures, p. 39, &c. (20) Ezek. xl. 5. (21) Ap. JOSEPH. cont. Ap. Bel. Jud. lib. i. p. 1348. (22) JOSEPH. cont. Ap. Bel. Jud. lib. v. c. 4. p. 1223.

IV. A fourth observation very necessary to be attended to, is the true situation of Jerusalem, as to its two principal parts, well known by the names of two mountains, viz. Sion and Acra, on which stood the upper and lower city; for Sion stood a good deal higher or loftier than Acra. They rose like two huge heaps one against another, with a valley between them, by which they were ever, and are still parted, though not, as it is easy to imagine, without some very great alteration in their particular form or figure. The temple was built upon mount Moriah, which was either part of mount Sion, or a hill of less compass near it. That Moria stood to the east is not disputed; but whether Sion was on the south or the north, has been a question among the learned. This an eye-witness could easily have determined, if any one had favoured us with a map exactly drawn, or answered the question in express terms: For all this, we could try to clear it by the help of the sacred monuments, which, thanks to the learned Reland<sup>i</sup>, would prove an easy task, but too prolix for this performance; and therefore we chuse to refer to that author for a full satisfaction about it. However, it is pretended, that Isaiab<sup>k</sup> leaves room to think that Sion lay northwards of the lower city: For, says the king of Babylon, as he is introduced speaking by the prophet, I will sit upon the mount of congregation in the sides of the north. But it is not said here mount Sion lay on the north of Acra; what is said seems to be, that the conqueror would establish his dominion where was the king's palace, bordering upon the south of the temple, and situate on the northern side of mount Sion. There the Babylonian thinks himself secure, and in full possession of the city. But says the prophet to him, alluding to the valley bordering upon mount Sion, toward Acra, Thou shalt be brought down to the sides of the pit. This situation of Sion, which might be further proved from Josephus<sup>l</sup>, besides our judicious traveller the Rev. Mr. Maundrel<sup>m</sup>, and the Paris citizen Antoine Regnault<sup>n</sup>, we did insist upon, because very great men<sup>o</sup> have appeared on the opposite side, who by their uncommon learning may draw others into the same error.

V. THE fifth observation will give us the true situation of the temple. 'Tis known that when the Hebrews did worship, they turned themselves towards the most holy place or temple<sup>p</sup>. Now we learn from what Ezekiel saw, that it lay westwards of its door or entry. His words are very plain, Behold, says he<sup>q</sup>, at the door of the temple were about five and twenty men, with their backs towards the temple, and their faces towards the east; and they worshipped the sun towards the east; therefore the front of the temple was turned towards the east (F); and this is confirmed by Josephus, stadia will produce 4125 paces, which would reduce the whole extent of the city to three stadia, 375 paces less than that of the temple. There is indeed a book written in Dutch (23) by the learned Camp. Vitringa, wherein he undertakes to make void this our argument, by observing, That the 2000 reed are to be understood only of so many cubits, as the Septuagint have expressed it in their translation; and to make it answer in the Hebrew text, he supposes the word there (24) to signify by an ellipsis, cubits of a reed, that is to say, such cubits as six of them make up one reed. But whether this will satisfy, we must leave to the judgment of our readers.

<sup>f</sup> Antiq. xv. ult. p. 702. <sup>g</sup> Vid. Jerof. Descript. ap. JOSEPH. Bell. Jud. lib. v. c. 4. p. 1221. coll. & 1235. <sup>h</sup> 2 Chron. iii. 1. comp. 2 Sam. xxiv. 18. & 1 Chron. xxi. 18—28. xxii. 1. <sup>i</sup> Vid. Palest. illust. p. 839. <sup>k</sup> Cap. xiv. ver. 13. <sup>l</sup> Ubi sup. p. 1222. & 1230. <sup>m</sup> A Journey from Aleppo, &c. p. 67, 76, 78, 86, 99, 100. <sup>n</sup> Discours du voyage d'outremer au S. Sepulcre, 1573. p. 47, 92, 140, &c. Add LE BRUYN. Voyage au Levant, tom. ii. c. 53, 55. <sup>o</sup> DRUS. ad voc. N. T. voce Sion. LIGHT-FOOT, CELLARIUS, CALMET. <sup>p</sup> 1 Kings viii. 48. Psal. cxxx. 12. Dan. vi. 10. & pass. <sup>q</sup> Ezek. viii. 16.

(F) Theodoret, it seems, gives a very good reason for it, viz. That as the Israhites were commanded to worship God alone, they might have the sun behind their backs, turning themselves towards the tabernacle, and not adore the sun, but his maker; and truly when the custom prevailed among the Christians of turning their faces towards the east in their worship, the Pagans did upbraid them with adoring the sun (25). But the author of the apostolical constitutions, knew well how to put it in another view, for the holy apostles are introduced by him, saying, ἡμεῖς οὐκ ἀνταρῶμεν τῷ ἡλίῳ, κ. τ. λ. (26).

(23) בִּקְנֵה Bikneh, with a reed; or with the measuring reed. Ezek. xlii. 16, &c. (24) Den Tempel Ezekiel's, cap. xli. (25) Solem credunt Deum nostrum, says TERTULL. Apol. cap. xvi. (26) Lib. vii. c. 44.

Josephus, who so far must be right, the temple having at first been in the same situation he saw it in afterwards.

VI. Lastly, Though our proper enquiry be into what appears to us to be strictly true, as to this matter of Solomon's temple, yet we do not pretend that all that is true of it has been said by us, because it is possible many things about it may have been omitted by the sacred historians, and therefore, as has been intimated, cannot in any wise be said by others. Neither do we aver that all we intend to say is exactly true or certain. Once more we must be so plain with our readers, as to let them know that we do not pretend to give demonstrations, but probable conjectures. And if our weak endeavours are not satisfactory, we should be very glad if they do put others upon gratifying the world with a scheme more accurate, wherein all things appearing better connected, might also better answer, or be more agreeable to the several passages or texts of holy writ here under consideration. All then we do engage on our part is carefully to distinguish between those things we have a full proof of, and those things wherein we only try to make some near approaches towards the truth; and upon this foot will now be explained the several particulars in the plan before us, according to the indication of them by the letters in the margin, for the greater conveniency of finding out whatever may seem to want a review, or deserve to be more narrowly looked or inquired into.

- a. WE begin with the Oracle (G), where God did speak from between the cherubim<sup>s</sup>; accordingly it is called the Oracle of his Holiness, or, as it is otherwise translated, His Holy Oracle<sup>s</sup>, towards which the Israelites turned themselves when they did worship<sup>a</sup>; and this was a square room of 20 cubits, as appears from 1 Kings vi. 2, 20. 2 Chron. iii. 8.
- b. THE holy place, or Sanctuary, 40 cubits long, and 20 broad, as is plain from 1 Kings vi. 2, & 3. where it is also called the Temple of the House. For the House (H) might properly be the name of the two apartments<sup>w</sup>, but that of the Temple (I), the proper name<sup>x</sup> for the second apartment: However, the length of both these together, being the House and (K) Temple of God<sup>y</sup>, was sixty cubits, 1 Kings vi. 2.
- c. BEFORE the Sanctuary stood a Porch. Twenty cubits was the length thereof, and ten cubits was the breadth thereof, as is said ver. 3. and so far we have a certainty from the books of Kings and Chronicles. To which we might, if needful, add the authority of Josephus<sup>z</sup>, and numbers of others.
- d. As for the Wall between the porch and the temple, any one sees it ought to be there admitted, though never mentioned in so many words by the sacred historians. We say it appears to have been of great use, not only better to sustain the building, but also to separate the temple from the porch belonging to it; that so this temple might stand wholly by itself, and also be shut up when there was occasion for it.

BUT

<sup>a</sup> Antiq. lib. viii. c. 3. p. 342. <sup>b</sup> Exod. xxv. 22. ult. Psal. xcix. 1. <sup>c</sup> Psal. xxviii. 2. <sup>d</sup> See before, p. 660. & comp. Psal. xxviii. 2. <sup>e</sup> 1 Kings vi. 5, & pass. <sup>f</sup> Ibid. ver. 17. <sup>g</sup> Psal. v. comp. xxviii. 2. <sup>h</sup> Pag. 342.

(G) In Hebrew, דְּבִיר Debir, as if one should say Locutum, or speaking-place. For there it was that God used to speak, or give his orders, or instructions to his lieutenant, if one may so call the judge or prince, and to the high-priest, his first minister. Besides, it was called the oracle of the house, and most holy place, Heb. holy; or, as the Septuagint (27), holies of holies, and as it is translated (28) concerning the tabernacle, the holiest of all (29).

The Septuagint have kept the Hebrew word, reading it δᾶβιρ, or δᾶβιρ, except in one place, where it is translated ναός, or temple.

(H) הַבַּיִת Habbaitb, or בַּיִת Baitb, an house (30), by way of excellency. It was the house of God, and in some sense that of the Israelites also, wherefore they say (31). Our holy and beautiful house, where our fathers praised thee. However the house of the Lord is indifferently taken for the whole, or part of the building.

(I) הֶעָכָל Hecal, is properly a palace, witness the [becal] palace of Abab (32), and by this name seems to be called the different parts belonging to the tabernacle (33). The Septuagint translate it ναός most frequently, and sometimes δᾶβιρ.

(K) Well might it be called so, when it was the place of his residence among the Israelites. So says Solomon (34), I have surely built thee an house to dwell in; a settled place for thee to abide in. And therefore the Jews have given the name of Shekinah to this habitation not improperly, for there was God's symbolical presence upon the ark (35), or, as it were, his throne; and there also was a real presence conspicuous by its operations, I mean by the oracles which God delivered there.

(27) Exod. xxxv. 22. Numb. vii. 89. (28) 1 Kings viii. 6. Psal. xxvii. 28. (29) Hebr. ix. 3. (30) 1 Kings viii. 16. (31) Isaiah lxiv. 11. (32) 1 Kings xxi. 1. (33) 1 Sam. i. 9. iii. 3. (34) 1 Kings viii. 13. (35) 1 Sam. iv. 4. 2 Sam. vi. 2. Psalm lxxx. 1.

- e. BUT further, our conjecture is strengthened by this plain inference, that the temple had doors. Thus it is said <sup>a</sup>, For the entering of the oracle he made doors <sup>b</sup>, —so also made he for the entering (L) of the temple posts of olive-tree,—and the two doors were of fir-tree. Now a door seems to suppose a wall, where-ever a wall appears to be necessary, as was here. And should it be objected that the oracle had a door as well as the sanctuary, though we do not conceive any wall between them, it might be answered, That there is nothing upon record concerning such a wall (M); that we see no necessity for one; and lastly, that there might be something else in lieu of it.
- f. FOR a very rich and strong Veil was made to separate the most holy from the holy place <sup>c</sup>, the same we suppose as St. Matthew calls the veil of the temple that was rent in twain when Jesus yielded up the ghost <sup>d</sup>. Josephus <sup>e</sup> positively tells us, that Solomon made a partition wall, different from the veil; but this is not so clearly expressed in the sacred books. The translation indeed says <sup>f</sup>, He made a partition by the chains of gold before the oracle: and accordingly we may understand that there was both a partition and a veil, the partition being fixed, and the veil hanging before it, so as to be moved like our curtains. But we do not warrant that this is the true sense of the Hebrew (N), which is rather, He placed chains (bars or bolts) across the oracle: However there was a door to it, as we have seen already. And although we may easily conceive a door without a wall, properly so called, we must suppose some such thing as a partition. Besides, what bolted this door, or went across before the oracle, was of gold, and therefore not the veil itself. At least the Hebrew text allows us to say the oracle was shut up with golden bolts. Yet whether there was a partition besides the door of each side <sup>g</sup>, or whether the door itself served instead of a partition, we shall not determine (O), but conclude this article by saying, that the doors of the porch are mentioned as such in one passage <sup>h</sup>, and called the doors of the house of the Lord in another <sup>i</sup>.
- g. WHAT we have now to consider are the Chambers, built against the wall of the house round about, both of the temple and the oracle, the nethermost said to be five cubits broad, and also five cubits high <sup>k</sup>; but of their length we find nothing in the books we refer to. It seems they were square rooms: Josephus tells us <sup>l</sup>, they were thirty in number all about the temple, which, it may be, he took from that of Ezekiel <sup>m</sup>, who says, The side chambers were three, one over another, and thirty in order: So that thirty being multiplied by three, according to the number of stories in the first book of Kings, those chambers will amount in all to ninety, that are called the nethermost, the middle, and the third. And such a number may easily be placed about the house, supposing them to have been each of five cubits length,

as

<sup>a</sup> 1 Kings vi. 31. <sup>b</sup> Ibid. 33, 34. <sup>c</sup> 2 Chron. iii. 22. <sup>d</sup> Matth. xxvii. 50, 51.
<sup>e</sup> Ant. lib. viii. c. 3. p. 343. <sup>f</sup> 1 Kings vi. 21. <sup>g</sup> 1 Kings vi. 31. <sup>h</sup> 2 Chron. xxix. 7.
<sup>i</sup> Ibid. xxviii. 24. <sup>k</sup> 1 Kings vi. 5, 6. <sup>l</sup> Antiq. viii. c. 3. p. 342. <sup>m</sup> Ezek. xli. 6.

(L) The word in Hebrew is כַּתֵּף Petach, the same as for the oracle above, and therefore entring ought to be kept in English, not door, as in our translation; although Petach, an entring, is in other places translated a door, by a true analogy.

(M) This must be understood of holyness, wherein no mention is made of any such wall, though indeed our translation says, as to the door of the oracle, “the lintel and side posts were a fifth part of the wall.” But those last words are not in the Hebrew, and truly another interpretation is given in the margin, viz. that they were five square; however, the reading in the text may well be admitted relatively to the height of the oracle, so that this is meant, that the lintel, &c. were five cubits high.

(N) וַיַּעֲבֹד בְּרֵאשִׁית וַיַּעֲבֹד בְּרֵאשִׁית Vajebabber Beratikoth, or, according to the keri, Beratukoth, which is verbatim, he made pass with chains, supposing ratikoth to be chains, for that word occurs in no other place but this, and may be as well translated bars, or bolts, or any thing equivalent. Hence then it seems Josephus (36) took “the in and out-side of the temple

“was all lined with cedar, and that the cramping “of the cedar together with strong chains, (ἀλυσσάν
 “not irons, as L'esfrange has it) was a great strength
 “and security to the building.” However, pro materia subjuncta, to make pass with chains; or as it might be translated without the particle (37), to make chains pass, seems to be nothing else but to chain, or tie with chains, to bolt or bar; unless the word veil be supplied to fill up the gap of this expression, well understood at that time, though afterwards, being obscure and obsolete, it was omitted by the Septuagint. The vulgate says, he fastened the shelves with nails.

(O) It will hardly be expected we should here take particular notice of those sacred vessels and utensils that adorned this holy house, viz. the ark, and cherubims, the table of shew-bread, the golden candlesticks (38), and the altar of incense; since we could hardly add any thing that is needful concerning them, to what hath been already observed in the course of this history.

(36) Antiq. viii. c. 3. p. 343. (37) Coll. Lament. i. 17. Psal. lv. 18. (38) See 1 Kings vii. 49.

as well as height, for in the breadth they differed from five to six, and from six to seven; the reason of which is there given. Upon this score they will undoubtedly appear somewhat small, and so indeed Josephus <sup>a</sup> calls them. However if their use was well known, that might give some light into this matter. But concerning their use, we find only <sup>b</sup> that Joas was bidden in the bed-chamber (P) belonging to the temple. Taking it then for granted that they were chiefly or frequently intended to lay in, we may venture to say that they were sufficient for that purpose, especially those of the middle and third story. Besides that, the bed-chambers among the Jews were generally upper rooms, as has already been observed in this Universal History <sup>c</sup>.

b. ONE thing more remains to be attended to about the temple, properly so called. It is said <sup>d</sup>, The door for the middle chamber was in the right side of the house, and they went up with winding stairs into the middle chamber, and out of the middle into the third. Where we may well imagine an opening was left in the thickness of the wall for a pair of stairs, to go up to the second story of the chambers about the temple, and also a passage from the temple to the porch, for there might be several occasions that required the ministers of the temple to go up to those chambers, as well as in and out of the temple, of which we suppose a detail is not here expected.

i. WE are now come to the Porch, where we meet with those celebrated columns, or pillars, Solomon adorned it with. It is said <sup>e</sup>, He set them up in the porch of the temple, and he made before the house two pillars, and he reared up the pillars before the temple; which expressions taken together sufficiently seem to imply the pillars were before the temple in its porch. But it is not quite so easy to assign the height of them. In one place it is said of Solomon <sup>f</sup>, He cast two pillars of brass of eighteen cubits high apiece. In another <sup>g</sup> we read, He made two pillars of thirty and five cubits high. This seeming inconsistency between the two sacred historians we shall presently reconcile; only we will first beg leave to take notice, that this is an instance of their not combining together, of their not being corrected or amended by one another. Now let us only suppose the pedestal or basis of the columns to have been 17 cubits high, this added to the eighteen cubits (1 Kings vii. 15. Jer. lii. 21.) for the shaft will, added together, make exactly 35, the number mentioned 2 Chron. iii. 15. Lastly, taking from 1 Kings vii. 16. five cubits, being the height of the chapter, we shall have the true height of the pillars, viz. 40 cubits. It is true that in another place <sup>h</sup> the height of the chapter is said to have been three cubits; but here we apprehend we have the dimension of the chapter only, strictly so called, Cotbereth in the Hebrew, or Crowning, which is expressed to have been three cubits; and there is left to be understood the wreathen work on it round about, which was two cubits more; both which sums added, make that of five, the number set down before by the same author. We can say but little concerning the thickness of the shaft of those pillars, only that a line of twelve cubits did compass either of (Q) them round about <sup>i</sup>, and therefore the diameter was four cubits, which is the proportion of 12 for the circumference. But it may be further observed, that one of the pillars <sup>a</sup> שְׁפָחוּת עֲמֻמָּה. ubi sup.

<sup>b</sup> 2 Kings xi. 2.

<sup>c</sup> See before, p. 700.

<sup>d</sup> 1 Kings vi. 8.

<sup>e</sup> 1 Kings vii. 15.

<sup>f</sup> 2 Chron. iii. 15.

<sup>g</sup> Ibid. ver. 17.

<sup>h</sup> Kings, ubi sup.

<sup>i</sup> Chron.

ubi sup. <sup>j</sup> 2 Kings xxv. 17.

<sup>k</sup> 1 Kings vii. 15.

(P) In Hebrew, הֶדֶר Heder, or Cheder, and seems to be understood of one of the three stories about the temple (39), where might be the beds for the priests in waiting, and among those rooms, or chambers, one, or more, especially reserved, or set apart for the high-priest; which also ought therefore to have been a retired place, and not easily accessible but to himself and consort, with those they trusted. These rooms we find also called inner-parlours (40), where for parlours the Hebrew hath Chadarim, and there distinguished from the lower-apartments, Ganpakim, (the treasuries in our version) and from the upper-rooms. So as we have here the several parts of the Jatziagh there spoken of (41) by their proper names, pillars was to be seen on the right of the porch, and called Jachin, and the other on the left called Boaz<sup>a</sup>. Now Jachin signifies he shall establish, and Boaz, strength is in him. By which it seems Solomon would give to understand, that he depended only on an Almighty Power for the continuance and duration of this temple. But by way of conjecture one might suppose there was an inscription in some such sense upon the basis of each of the pillars, that on one beginning with the word Jachin, and that on the other with the word Boaz; from whence the pillars might have their denomination; as we see the books of Moses called by the first word they begin with*. Lastly, as to their situation; we take it they stood before the temple<sup>b</sup>, in the porch of the temple<sup>c</sup>: So says our translation; which we chuse here to follow (R).

(Q) Some will say the Hebrew differs from our translation, for what is here either of them, is there (הַשְּׁנַיִם Hasbani) the second, and we acknowledge this is a seeming, though no real difference. It is said, Eighteen cubits was the height of the first column, and a line of twelve cubits did compass the second, which is an elliptical expression where, in a period, one branch of it not expressed, is understood by what the other expresses (42). So here the height of the first column gives you the measure of the second, and the thickness of the second the measure of the first. But this not being agreeable to our stile, another turn ought to be took, which is usual and intelligible in our way of speaking.

(39) See 1 Kings vii. 25. (40) 2 Chron. xxviii. 11. (41) 1 Kings vi. 5. (42) Vid. Prov. x. 1. Ijai. xxxii. 3. Deut. xv. 12. Psal. cxlii. 4. Conf. Jerem. lii. 21, 22.

- k. GOING now out of the porch, we must take notice first of the Altar standing before the porch<sup>d</sup>, or before the house<sup>e</sup>, as in the Hebrew, not improperly translated the fore-front of the house: and there it seems to have stood in the middle of the court (S), of which court afterwards. This altar for burnt-offerings did answer to one of the same use in the tabernacle, whereof we have spoken at large<sup>f</sup>. What remains for us to observe, is only the new altar, which was in length two cubits, and as many broad, besides ten cubits high<sup>g</sup>; and since no steps were allowed in the tabernacle to go up to the altar<sup>h</sup>, it ought to be supposed there were none for that use in the temple, but only an easy ascent up to the altar.
- l. OF the court itself we must own it is our opinion that it went at first all about the temple. Thus was the court about the tabernacle an oblong square, the length thereof being an hundred cubits, and the breadth fifty every where<sup>i</sup>. Now as we find no dimension of the court in the temple, all we can well do to go somewhat by a scriptural rule, is to make this last court twice as big as that in the tabernacle, because it sufficiently appears king Solomon kept pretty near to that proportion in the building of the temple itself. Again, as in that oblong square the tabernacle stood westwards, and that by that means the court had on the east two third parts or more of the whole space, we conceive the court in the temple, as Solomon at first built it, to have been much the same.
- m. BUT a wall is placed here on the west side of the court before the porch, for which no warrant will easily be found in that part of scripture that was to be our guide in our present enquiry, and therefore does not seem to be built upon any sure foundation; but yet what we have to say for it may be seen in the next note (T).

A

<sup>a</sup> 1 Kings vii. 21.    * See before, p. 595. not. A.    <sup>b</sup> 2 Chron. iii. 17.    <sup>c</sup> 1 Kings vii. 21: d 1 Kings vii. 64. coll. 2 Chron. vii. 7. xv. 8.    <sup>e</sup> Ibid. xv. 8.    <sup>f</sup> Ubi sup. No. IX. p. 661.
 <sup>g</sup> 2 Chron. iv. 1.    <sup>h</sup> Exod. xx. 26.    <sup>i</sup> Ibid. xxvii. 9, 12.

(R) One reason is the difference to be observed between the two particles in the texts of Chronicles and Kings. In that it is לפני Alpene, which cannot otherwise be translated than by Before. But in this it is ל Le, which may be translated several ways, and especially by In: so you read Lerouach (43), in the cool of the evening; Lchisse (44), in the throne, and such like expressions (45). Besides, the Vulgate has in porticu, and the Septuagint do not much differ as to the sense: They translate, he set up the pillars τὴ ἀλυσμῶν of the porch; which seems to imply, that the pillars were an appurtenance of the porch, and therefore very properly placed in it. Josephus, as to this, says only (46), Solomon placed one of them on the right post of the porch, and the other on the left. The French and English translations add, at the entrance of the porch. We have declared our opinion to be they were within; but after all, if one likes them better without, we would not much oppose it, since ל may signify At, as where it is said of Zabulon (47) "He shall stand ל at the haven of the sea," or For, as in the very same expression, viz. ל our own interpreters have taken it elsewhere (48) and render'd it for the porch.

(S) In the tabernacle, the altar of burnt-offerings was to be placed (49) before the door, and at a convenient distance*, so that our translation seems to be very right in saying by (50) and at (51) it, which could not be well otherwise, the court being of a small compass. But as that in the temple was much larger, the altar might here stand in the middle of the court, and this further appears from its relation to the King's Seat, which was in the midst of the other court, and before this altar, as will be seen hereafter (52).

(T) By saying this, we would not be understood wholly to deny there might be such a wall in Solomon's time, for we read (53) concerning the house he built for his queen, The great court round about was with three rows of hewed stones, and a row of cedar-beams; As for the inner court of the house of the Lord, and for the porch of the house. Instead of As our translation renders Both, the Hebrew ו We, whose ordinary signification is and. But in the way of a comparison, (as it plainly appears to be here used) if we consult our translation in other places (54), it would, we think, be more properly rendered by as. However, the wall for the porch of the house may, it seems, be understood of this wall that stood before the porch of the temple, though others, with some probability, understand it of a porch before the queen's house.

(43) Gen. iii. 8.    (44) Psalm ix. 4.    (45) Psalm xvi. 10. Dan. ii. 1. Os. v. 12. Zeph. ii. 15.
 (46) Antiq. lib. viii. c. 3. p. 344.    (47) Gen. xlix. 13.    (48) 1 Kings vii. 12.    (49) Exod. xl. 6.    * See before, p. 660. e.    (50) Levit. i. 5.    (51) Ibid. v. 7, 8.    (52) Nots Y & Z.
 (54) 1 Sam. xii. 15. Prov. x. 25.

- " A NEW court is plainly mentioned in sacred history. Thus we read<sup>1</sup>, That Jehoshaphat stood in the congregation of Judah and Jerusalem in the house of the Lord, before the new court (V). That here by the house of the Lord is understood the whole compass of the temple, with its several courts, wants no proof, after what has been said above<sup>m</sup>. But what that new court is, we are now to consider. Some will have it to have been the court of priests repaired, as indeed the altar was, by king Ash<sup>n</sup>, and therefore called the New Court.

BUT though by the analogy of the temple with the tabernacle, the court of priests seems to have been round about the holy and most holy place, and not divided by a wall; yet afterwards such a wall being found convenient to be made between the altar and the porch, that part of the court about the temple becoming now a sort of a court by itself, might be called the new court, the old name, viz. the court of the priests, remaining with that part where stood the altar. Now whether this will be judged a rational conjecture must be submitted to the reader.

- o. WE have a few words to add concerning the other, but undoubted wall of the court of priests. It is said<sup>o</sup>, Solomon built the inner-court with three rows of hewed stone, and a row of cedar-beams. It is elsewhere<sup>p</sup> called the court of priests, and bore the name of the inner, because of another round about it. But what these rows were, is not so easy to explain. Some indeed do not spare buildings that cost them nothing, and of these rows make so many stories; but whether the single Hebrew word, Tur, i. e. row, will uphold such a heavy building, we very much doubt: To us there appears no more than a kind of parapet wall, of some four or five foot high, (consisting of three rows of stone, one upon another, and a fourth of cedar-beams over them) sufficient to keep off the people from being an hindrance in the court of priests, but low enough for the Israelites without to see all the priests were doing within.

- p. ONE thing remains to be considered, which is the several entries into the court; for though we should not find any mentioned as they are sufficiently<sup>q</sup>, they must, in the nature of things, have been there, and we therefore place them where we find it most proper, viz. over-against the gates that are said to have been in that court where the people did meet for their solemn devotions.

- q. NOW this court (X) was called the Great Court<sup>r</sup>, because of its bigness, comparatively to that of the priests, which was a good deal less; both of them being said to be the two courts of the house of the Lord<sup>s</sup>. And that Solomon himself did build the one as well as the other, we read in these words, Furthermore he made the court of the priests, and the great court, and doors for the court, and over-laid the doors of them with brass. Josephus not thinking this metal valuable enough, has made a transmutation of it into silver<sup>t</sup>, and has, at no other expence than his fancy, built a large court upon a mount raised on purpose 400 cubits high. It is easy to presume he has spared neither columns, nor porticos, nor all the embellishments a fruitful imagination could prompt him to adorn it with (Y).

HASTE

<sup>1</sup> 2 Chron. xx. 5.

<sup>m</sup> Note C. & al.

<sup>n</sup> 2 Chron. xv. 8.

<sup>o</sup> 1 Kings vi. 36. vii. 12.

<sup>p</sup> 2 Chron. iv. 9.

<sup>q</sup> Ibid.

<sup>r</sup> Ibid.

<sup>s</sup> 2 Kings xxi. 5.

<sup>t</sup> Antiq. lib. viii. c. 3. p. 346.

(V) The name given by the Septuagint to this court deserves some attention: They call it αὐλὴ τῆς σκηνῆς, the court of the tabernacle; which, well understood, seems to be a very proper name; for the house in Solomon's building did answer the tabernacle of Moses, and here and there equally was the Shekinah, or inhabitation of the divine majesty, to which St. John also seems to have an eye, when he says, the λόγος word ἐσθῆναι μετ' ἡμῶν dwell among us.

Now this situation of the New Court being allowed, we may, by it, further explain and fix the place where Zachariah, the high-priest's son, was killed. It is said this happened in the court of the house of the Lord (55), between the temple and the altar (56), which must be as he came out of the temple, into this New-court, towards the wall before the porch.

(X) The Septuagint call it αὐλὴ ἱερῆς, where ἱερῆς ought not to be taken for hecal commonly rendered, as has already been observed (57) by another Greek word, but never, as we know, by ἱερῆς. This last word, as made use of both by them and Josephus (58), does signify either the whole of the building, or some out-part of it, and is properly a sacred place, or consecrated ground; the court of Israel being its proper court, as it encompassed round about immediately that of the priests, and mediately the temple itself and oracle.

(Y) His words are, "Beyond this partition was another square court, (gr. ἱερῆς) or building, with large porticos or galleries about it, and four stately gates that opened east, west, north and south, the doors all plated and inlaid with gold. This place was common to all the people.—The erecting of this outward building was so studen-

dous

(55) 2 Chron. xx. 5.

(56) John i. 14.

(57) 1 Chron. xxix. 4. coll. Ezek. xlv. 19.

(58) Antiq. viii. c. 3. p. 346.

1. HASTE we now to fix the gates. There were three on three sides of the temple, east, north and south; besides two on the west side. These gates were kept by wardens, trusted with power and authority, who had under them numbers of Levites; for we read <sup>u</sup>, Among these were the divisions of the porters, even among the chief men, having wards one against another, to serve in the house of the Lord; and they cast lots, as well the small as the great, for every gate. We have nothing remarkable to say concerning the north and east gates; but just by that to the south, we find the house of Asuppim <sup>x</sup>, and what this house was, is not easy to determine; however, as this belongs properly to our subject, we shall make our best endeavours towards a discovery that way.

2. THE radical verb Asap signifies to add, assemble, or gather together, and the several nouns derived from it keep all this primitive sense; so that it is to be presumed it is also preserved in the word Asuppim; but as this idea is indefinite, we must try to fix it by the use of this word, to be found only in the place already quoted, and a little lower <sup>y</sup>, and in Nebemiah <sup>z</sup>. In the first quotation, the translation is word for word the house of Asuppim, but the sense seems rather (Z) to imply each of the two houses, for so many there were under the direction of Obed-edom and his sons. In the second text, the translation says, toward Asuppim two and two, (adding the word and, which is not in the Hebrew) and as far as can be judged, the true sense is this, There were four Levites trusted with the care of the Asuppim, two to the one, and two to the other. This seems to be confirmed by the third passage, that in Nebemiah, for one reads, according to the Hebrew, Porters keeping the ward at the Asuppim of the gates. In the version it is at the thresholds, and in the margin treasuries or assemblies. It would have been better to have preserved in the translation the Hebrew word Asuppim, which, though a proper name, is there a case governed. And if the three above-mentioned passages are carefully compared together, it will plainly appear that there were near the gate we have been speaking of, two houses, or distinct apartments, one on each side of this gate, where either the priests or the levites, or it may be both orders, assembled at times, either about business relating to the temple, or deposited all things of use in that consecrated place, since gathering and assembling are equally an apt translation of the word Asuppim. Besides we find in holy writ that there were such apartments or houses within the inclosure or precinct of the temple, or its courts. So, for example, Jeremiah <sup>a</sup> brought the Rechabites into the house of the Lord, into one of the chambers, where he did put before them pots full of wine, and so on. This room, which for that very reason, we may suppose to have had some extent, did belong to the offspring of Igdaliah, a man of God, that is to say, a prophet; and its situation is said to have been next to the chamber of the princes, or chief men, which in the temple can be understood only of the priests, or chiefs of the levites. Besides, it is said that this chamber was above the chamber of Maasejah, the keeper of the door. It was an upper room. And it is well known that about business of moment they met in such rooms among the Jews, which was still a custom in the time of the apostles <sup>b</sup>. Let that be as it will, there are seen here in the same house large rooms, different or distinct both in relation to the uses they were put to, and the persons that occupied them, whether they met or lodged in them, in order to be of service to the temple, or its ministers; or whether in particular the lower part, or ground floor of these houses, served as store-houses, or treasuries, which it seems may be gathered from what is related

<sup>u</sup> 1 Chron. xxvi. 12, 13.
<sup>a</sup> Chap. xxxv. 2. &c.

<sup>x</sup> Ibid. ver. 15.
<sup>b</sup> Acts i. 13, & pass.

<sup>y</sup> Ver. 17.

<sup>z</sup> Chap. xii. ver. 25.

<sup>u</sup> does an undertaking, that no tongue can express <sup>a</sup> the difficulties of raising it, and a man would <sup>a</sup> have much ado to believe his own very eyes that <sup>a</sup> saw it. Such hollows, such depths to be filled <sup>a</sup> up, as a body could hardly have looked upon, or <sup>a</sup> but so much as fancied, without turning his brain;
<sup>a</sup> 400 cubits to be brought up to a level with the <sup>a</sup> top of the mountain, only to make the work
<sup>a</sup> regular and the ground even. This port was en-<sup>a</sup> compassed again with a kind of double cloyster,

<sup>a</sup> and two rows of pillars to support it, every <sup>a</sup> pillar being cut whole out of the rock; the doors
<sup>a</sup> were all silver work, &c.

(Z) According to an usual way of speaking in scripture; as where we read, The fool hath said (59). How sweet thy word (60). Let us lurk for the innocent (61). The wicked flee (62). She, that is, the Woman, shall be saved (63). For, by what follows, the sense appears to be each or either of the things and persons mentioned. See above, letter O.

(59) Pf. xiv. 1. (60) cxix. 103. (61) Prov. i. 11. (62) xxvii. 1. (63) 1 Tim. ii. 15.

related elsewhere <sup>c</sup>, That Amaziah took all the gold and the silver, and all the vessels that were found in the house of God with Obed-edom (A).

4. It will be pertinent enough, before we go to the other gate, to put here together what we have more to say concerning the other apartments we have delineated in this court of the people. Upon which two things are very distinctly to be considered, the first relates to the form and particular situation of these apartments, and this we must frankly own we are ignorant of. But as it was absolutely necessary to place them some where, we have disposed of them in the plainest manner we could to the four corners of the temple, leaving to every one to fix and represent them as may be thought most proper. The second thing we have to say about these chambers, is concerning their real existence, of which there is no room to doubt. For setting aside what has just now been instanced of the Asuppim, and apartments mentioned by Jeremiab; and supposing them to be different from those we are now speaking of, it is plain from holy writ <sup>d</sup>, that David gave to Solomon the pattern of the courts of the house of the Lord, and of all the chambers round about, of the treasures of the house of God, and of the treasures of the dedicated things; and this order was executed, for Abijah was over the treasures of the house of God, and over the treasures of the dedicated things (B). To this it may be added, that in the temple of Zorobabel, in Nebemiab's time, when to be sure there had been no thoughts of exceeding Solomon's temple, Eliashib <sup>e</sup> the priest having the oversight of the chamber, or rather of each chamber (C), of the house of God, had prepared for Tobiah, one allied unto him, a great chamber, where afore-time they laid the meat-offering, the frankincense, and the vessels, and the tithes of the corn, the new wine, and the oil, and the offerings in the courts of the house of God.

We would have these last words to be attended to, because these chambers should be carefully distinguished from those already mentioned <sup>f</sup>, which immediately joined the temple. For besides that these last, as has been seen <sup>g</sup>, were very small, and did not seem to have been capacious enough for those uses, the others were put to; the difference of their names makes it probable that these chambers were different. Those about the temple are called Jatziagh (D), and these in the courts Leshacoth, and they were the chief porters that were over these chambers, or, as in the margin, store-houses and treasures of the house of God <sup>h</sup>; and very large they ought to have been indeed, since in one of them, the chamber of Gemariab, in the higher court (E), which was that we are about, Baruc did read the words of Jeremiab in the ears of all the people <sup>i</sup>, which cannot well be understood but of a considerable number there met together (F).

LET

<sup>c</sup> 2 Chron. xxv. 24.
Supra Litt § in marg.

<sup>d</sup> 1 Chron. xxviii. 12.
<sup>h</sup> Ibid.

<sup>e</sup> Ibid. xxvi. 20.

<sup>f</sup> Nehem. xiii. 4, 5.
<sup>k</sup> Jerem. xxxvi. 10.

(A) Not surely the same Obed-edom, who, from the foundation of the temple, had been chief warden of the Asuppim, with his sons under him, but one of his family or posterity, who now was in the same employment, or office: either bearing the same name, or going by it in that his publick capacity, or as successor to him. Somewhat like we see in the names of Israel, Judab, David, &c.

(B) It may be not unworthy taking notice, that the same word אוצרות Ozroth, is equally in both texts, though it be differently translated, viz. Treasures and Treasures.

(C) According as has been observed above, though, it may be the four Hebrew characters there לשכת are not rightly punctuated for Lykeath, in the singular, a chamber, but ought to have been so for Leshacoth, in the plural, chambers. Yet, one way or other, the sense is much the same.

(D) יציא We take to have been somewhat like the Italians corridore, which some derive from currere, where one may run in, round about an house, as you have some furnished with bed-rooms in our hospitals and colleges. And truly the Hebrew word comes up to that notion, for יציא jatzia is to lay, and יציא jatzia a bed, Psal. 132, 139. However, in the jatzia, belonging to the temple, the rooms were of a smaller sort, but לשכת Leshacoth, the larger sort of them, like our dining-rooms, parlours, or halls. And indeed in that emblematical temple of Ezekiel, where all is represented in the height of grandeur and bigness, far above that of Solomon's temple, there is no mention of any such thing as jatzia, but, in its stead, so many Leshacoth. Yet it may be objected, that David gave to Solomon the pattern of the court of the house of the Lord, and of all the chambers, Leshacoth, round about (64). True they were such rooms, but not joining to the house, as the jatzia; which Solomon built against it (65).

(E) This is an expression that occurs but once, and is therefore the harder to be understood; though of itself a plain one, which seems to be in relation to a court that stood lower. But it may be, no more is intended than thereby to signify the great court. However, if higher, must be taken in the proper sense; to us it appears, 'tis the new court that is here called the higher, because thereon was the temple, in the east of the hill, where it is commonly supposed was its top.

(F) It may be said indeed, he might read it out of a window or balcony, which we are not willing to oppose; but then we do further remark, that this chamber, out of which he read, was at the entry of the new gate, supposed to be the eastern, and near it, in either courts, might be large apartments.

(64) 1 Chron. xxviii. 12.

(65) 1 Kings vi. 5. 10.

u. LET us now consider the gates to the west, which deserve a particular attention. Thus says the sacred historian <sup>1</sup>, To Shuppim and Hofah the lot came forth westward with the gate Shallecheth, by the causey of the going up, ward against ward, and <sup>m</sup> at Parbar westward, four at the causey, two at Parbar. As to the first at south-west, the name may be applied, according to its etymology, to what comes out like a projecture, as we call it from the Latin, or a jutting or leaning out in a building. The word is found only in two places of scripture, this of Chronicles, and another <sup>a</sup> where it is said of oaks, whose substance is in them when they cast their leaves, says our version, but the Hebrew be-shallecheth, where the particle be stands for in, and Shallecheth, we should think to be, what is risen, or above ground, for here such trees very well stand or subsist (G).

HOWEVER, when the name of Shallecheth is given to the gate we are speaking of, we see it at the same time joined to a causey. This was a jettee, bank, terrass, or bridge, that led up to the temple. And here it seems should be placed the misbad, made for the temple by the king <sup>o</sup>. The translation calls it pillars in the text, but in the margin rails, (Heb. a prop) and in another place it bears the name of Me-filloth, rendered by terrises in the text, but in the margin stays, (Heb. high-ways) the sense of all which comes to one; for the ground without the temple seems to have been very uneven, and in order to make the coming to it not only commodious, but delightful, Solomon contrived an avenue over the valley, one end of which answered the gate Shallecheth, and the other the palace, over-against the south-side of the temple, to the north of mount Sion. It is in this disposal or order we are to consider what is called <sup>q</sup> his ascent, by which he went up into the house of the Lord; which ascent was built by Solomon in so costly a manner, that it was looked upon with admiration by the queen of Sheba. Thus have we assigned a cause why this gate should be called Shallecheth; and as there was the greatest concourse of those about court, and in general from the high city, here were two distinct guard-houses, parallel to one another, one under Shuppim, and the other under his co-partner Hofah.

x. BUT the second to the west, towards the north of the temple, was for the inhabitants of that part of the city that has since been called the lower; and this gate was called Parbar (H), the way from it leading to the suburbs named in sacred history Parvarim, from which this gate seems to derive its name, but slightly altered, the b and v consonant being capable of permutation, as is easy to be seen in most languages, both antient and modern. Now as the temple might be more exposed on that side than any where else, and there was a very great concourse of people, the out-let of the road near the gate was guarded by four levites, and the gate itself by two more. But now let us return to the temple by the terras-gate.

y. HERE we find the covert for the sabbath, and (z) the king's entry adjoining to it; for we read in sacred history <sup>1</sup>, that king Ahaz cut off the borders of the bases, and removed the laver from off them; and took down the sea from the brazen oxen that were under it, and put it upon a pavement of stones; and the covert for the sabbath that they had built in the house, and the king's entry without, turned he from the house of the Lord, for the king of Assyria. We presume somewhat of a commentary on this passage, as to the two things here mentioned, will not be unacceptable to the reader.

WE must first form to ourselves an idea of this covert, called in Hebrew Misac, or, as the Maforites read it, Musac; which pronunciation is not of great concern, for this word is to be found only in this place, the signification of which it is no easy matter to ascertain. Sacab is to cover, and Masac a covering or veil. As for the thing itself, we must look for what may relate to it among those things built by Solomon in the temple. At the time of its dedication one finds <sup>2</sup> he had made

<sup>1</sup> 1 Chron. xxvi. 16.

<sup>m</sup> Ibid. ver. 18.

<sup>a</sup> Isaiah vi. 13.

<sup>o</sup> 1 Kings x. 12.

<sup>p</sup> 2 Chron. ix. 11.

<sup>q</sup> 1 Kings ubi sup. ver. 5. Ch. v. 4.

<sup>r</sup> 2 Kings xxiii. 11.

<sup>s</sup> 2 Kings xvi. 18.

<sup>t</sup> 2 Chron. vi. 13.

(G) This, to us, appears to be the true notion the Hebrew text gives of what we have seen rendered by the word Substance, which is מצבת Mazebeth, the subsistence, properly, or subsisting of a thing, wherefore it signifies a pillar and monument. Gen. xxxv. 14. 20.

(H) Which word the Targum does expound by that of ברא bara, i. e. without; and this sense of it seems very probable, since Parbar had its issue, or out-let, into the then out-parts of Jerusalem.

made a brazen scaffold, (in Hebrew it is Kior) of five cubits long, and five cubits broad, and three cubits high, and had set it up in the midst of the court, and upon it he stood, and so on. Here it is easy to imagine a raised up place, where stood the king. It might be in the shape of a hemisphere, or hollow vessel, almost like the concha, or triumphal car of the Romans; but whatever might be this Kior, it must of necessity have rested upon, or been supported by a pedestal or column. This the Vulgate, following the Septuagint, expresses by the word base, instead of the Hebrew Kior. Much the same figure therefore would have been made use of, both in the text and translations, where the whole takes its denomination from a part of the throne. We shall try to distinguish every one of them that made up this royal seat.

First, We take notice of the base or column; for it is said of Joas, when he was proclaimed king <sup>a</sup>, He stood upon the pillar: this is the true meaning of the Hebrew <sup>a</sup>, the same turn of expression already made use of in relation to Solomon, although in the translation it is by a pillar; and, what is very remarkable, the text adds Cammissaphath, according to the manner, that is, as the kings were used to do in the temple, in their usual place or throne. According to this, Josiah, in order to renew the covenant <sup>b</sup>, stood upon the pillar, according to the text; and this same pillar the king stood upon, is even in our translation <sup>c</sup> called his place wherein he stood. It is plain to be seen this place was very fit and proper for the king, who appeared there at the head of the Israelites, in their court, in the midst of which the sacred historian has fixed the throne <sup>d</sup> before the altar <sup>e</sup>. But it will not be amiss to observe that the king did not stand or sit there, when he came to the temple in the form of an humble suppliant to the God of Israel, or to ask his council; for in this case it seems the kings were mixed and confounded among the croud of their subjects. At least it is said of Ezekiab <sup>f</sup>, after he had received the threatening letter of the Assyrian king, He went up into the house of the Lord, and spread it before the Lord, and prayed, &c. where no mention is made of his standing upon the pillar. And we are the more apt to judge he did not, for that Jehosaphat before him <sup>g</sup>, when in fear of the Moabites and Ammonites, he had proclaimed a fast, He stood in the congregation of Judah and Jerusalem, in the house of the Lord, before the new court, and there prayed. There the king would not appear upon his throne, but went as near to the temple as well he could, which in our opinion is intimated by his standing before the new court; for we have seen this court was immediately next to the temple, whereas the court of the priests, properly so called, before which stood the throne, was further off. However, the throne was the ordinary seat upon all solemn occasions, when the king appeared before the altar. And there also it was, young Joash was seated in all the pomp of a king at his inauguration. So the historian says <sup>h</sup>, The king stood upon his pillar at the entering in, and the princes and the trumpets, &c. Our translation here again is stood at his pillar, but we do not chuse to vary where the text is uniform.

Secondly, Upon this pillar was a sort of alcove, or small gallery, made, as we have hinted above, much in the same shape as our pulpits. This rested on the central point of its convex side, upon the pillar: There the king might either sit or stand, and turn himself about to the temple, altar, or consecration, as he had occasion, as is observed of Solomon at the consecration of the temple <sup>i</sup>.

Thirdly, The Kior seems to have been covered, as is at present the throne of our kings, and for this reason it was called Musac, which may be explained by canopy or cloth of state, this third part denominating the two first.

BUT it is not easy to conceive for what reason, to the idea of covering, is joined that of Sabbath. The word Sabbath properly is rest, and figuratively the solemn day on which one did rest. If you take it in the first sense, it must only be understood that the Musac covered the place where the king rested, or sat down (1), every one else standing <sup>g</sup>: if you take it in the second sense, it may imply that the Kior, or throne, was covered with the Musac, or cloth of state, only on the last day

<sup>a</sup> 2 Kings xi. 14.

xxxiv. 31.

<sup>d</sup> 2 Chron. xx. 5.

<sup>g</sup> Ubi sup. ver. 3:

<sup>x</sup> עַמֻּד אֶל עַמֻּד Homed al-hamoud.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. vi. 13.

<sup>e</sup> Ibid. xxiii. 13.

<sup>y</sup> 1 Kings xxiii. 3.

<sup>b</sup> Ubi sup. ver. 12.

<sup>f</sup> 1 Kings viii. 14.

<sup>z</sup> 2 Chron.

<sup>c</sup> 2 Kings xix. 14.

<sup>h</sup> 2 Chron. vi. 3, 12, 13.

(1) The seventy interpreters seem to have taken it in this sense. For they translate the covert of the sabbath by τὸ θεμελίον τῆς καθέδρας, the foundation of the chair, or seat.

day of the week, the day of rest or sabbath; and then it was laid up till the next sabbath-day, unless some high festival intervened that required the king's presence in the temple.

It may give some air of probability to this second conjecture to take notice, that the Musac was surely a very rich and valuable piece of work, since Abaz made use of it with a design to glut the avarice of the king of Affyria, whom he had very imprudently called to his aid against the king of Damascus <sup>h</sup>.

It will now be proper to shew the agreement between what we have been speaking of, and the King's entry without. In order to do this, it will be needful to consider what is written in the New Testament concerning Solomon's Porch: Christ used to walk then in the temple <sup>i</sup>, the apostles were all with one accord there also <sup>k</sup>, and all the people ran together unto them in the porch that is called Solomon's <sup>l</sup>. Now that this king had built such a porch Josephus acknowledges <sup>m</sup>, but placeth it eastward, which seems to be an error, unless he meant that it went up eastward, which is true in our opinion. However, the authority of St. Luke and St. John is sufficient to make us conclude, that among the several pottico's the temple was adorned with in their time, one in particular was looked upon as Solomon's. A sure sign that it was supposed he had built one, which sufficeth for our purpose.

We shall not here undertake to describe exactly the structure, nor even the situation of that built by Solomon. It only appears in general, that it might reach or extend itself from the gate, where ended the terrais by which the king went up from his palace to the temple, and that it was carried forwards in a strait line as far as over-against the Musac; but then to go to the Musac joining to the wall of the court of priests, one must turn to the left, and that turning will precisely be the Mebo, or King's entry. It is to be supposed the porch from the gate Shallecheth, as far as this entry, might be a common passage for the use of the publick as well as of the king; but from the turning to the throne, as has already been observed, it was the king's entry properly so called; which consequently was adorned and enriched much more magnificently than the rest. For which reason Abaz made use of it, as well as of the covert of the sabbath, to buy the assistance of the king of Affyria. Not that we are to think that Abaz destroyed the whole building, which was not necessary; but as we read of Hezekiah <sup>n</sup>, that he cut off the gold from the doors of the temple of the Lord, and from the pillars which he had over-laid, and gave it to the king of Affyria, now the same did Abaz, taking away a portion out of the house of the Lord <sup>o</sup>, viz. The king's entry and covert for the Sabbath, just as Hezekiah did the rest abovesaid.

BUT what may be of more weight in this enquiry is, that this hypothesis of the situation of the Musac, or royal throne, will clear up a circumstance in Joab's inauguration, otherwise very difficult to be understood <sup>p</sup>. It is well known that that prince, by Jeboiada's means, having been proclaimed in the temple, the noise was heard by Atbaliab in her palace; upon which she in haste ran to the temple by the terrais walk, which for her, was the readiest and shortest way (K). She went

<sup>h</sup> 2 Kings xvi. 7. <sup>i</sup> John x. 23. <sup>k</sup> Acts v. 12. <sup>l</sup> Ibid. iii. 11. <sup>m</sup> Antiq. lib. xx. c. 8. p. 899. & B. I. lib. v. c. 5. p. 1225. <sup>n</sup> 2 Kings xviii. 16. <sup>o</sup> 2 Chron. xxviii. 21. <sup>p</sup> 2 Kings xi. — 2 Chron. xxviii.

(K) We confess no place of scripture gives the situation of this palace, so as to fix it exactly. However, it is probable, the ground it stood upon was called the middle city, as we have it in the margin of our translation, though in the text, middle court (66). The truth of which is, what is written in the Hebrew, called, ketib, is בָּהִיר bahir, the city; but what is read according to the Masorites, called keri, is בָּזֵר bazer, or chazer, a court. Now supposing, as is likely, the true reading to be bahir, this shews where the palace stood; for nothing could well be called the middle city, but what had westward the top of mount Sion, whereon was built the higher city, or city of David. And then at the foot of this mount, on a plain, or level surface to the east, you meet with the palace of Solomon, though not in a low place; for to the north; a large valley lay betwixt it and the temple, standing itself upon that other hillock called Moriab. Further it does appear (67), the place stood in the eastern part of Jerusalem, where was the court of the prison, the water-gate, and the horse-gate that led to the palace; whose front looked up to the temple; both places having an easy communication by the celebrated terrais, or ascent, of which before.

(66) 2 Kings xx. 4. (67) Nebem, iii. 25 — 28. Conf. 2 Kings xi. 16. & 2 Chron. xxiii. 15.

went in at the gate Shallebeth, and crossed what we have called the portico, or porch of Solomon, at least that part of the court, where stood in arms the Levites, according to the directions of the high-priest<sup>q</sup>. They seeing the queen, but having no particular orders concerning her, did let her advance, so that she drew nearer; and coming as far as the King's entry, or directly over against it, it is said, See looked, and behold the king stood upon his pillar at the entering in, and the princes and the trumpets by the king.—Then Ataliab rent her clothes, and said, Treason! Treason! Hereupon the high-priest, Jeboiada, ordered the commanding officers to haze her forth of the ranges<sup>r</sup>; which, according as their armed Levites were posted, could not more conveniently and with greater surety be done, than in opening the ranks towards the gate of Asuppim, which was over-against the king's entry to the south (L). By this gate then Ataliab was thrust out of the temple immediately, and the better to hinder her from returning to her palace, they conducted her towards the fields, through the eastern gate of Jerusalem, called Miphkad, or prison gate<sup>s</sup>, then turning to the right by the corner<sup>x</sup>, down to the horse-gate<sup>v</sup>, eastward of the palace, thereabouts she was killed. Soon after, the high-priest brought the king from the temple to the palace, by the way of the gate of the guard (M), and thence through the great or high gate of that palace<sup>z</sup>. This we reckon is the true sense; though some would understand by this high gate, a gate of the temple; but there was no such gate in the temple till the reign of Jotham, of whom it is said in express terms*, He built the high gate of the house of the Lord; which is generally taken to be that towards the east (N). But let this suffice, possibly have we launched out too far, and ventured upon too many conjectures; but we hope the reader will do us the justice to acknowledge we have kept our word, in carefully distinguishing between probable opinions and things of greater certainty.

I beg leave to conclude the whole with one remark. It is allowed that the main scope of the sacred writings was not so much to satisfy our vain curiosity, as to inspire us with the love of all christian virtues; and therefore, though we may justly expect, that every thing which relates to this latter, which is the essential of religion, should be delivered with all possible clearness, it would be absurd to expect the same satisfaction about the former. Those less important points, many of which are well worth enquiring after, make a branch of christian philology, in which every man being forced to supply the want of evidence with probable conjectures, is intitled to differ from others, whenever he thinks his own better grounded. But though in points like this I have been upon, it be almost lawful to err, yet those are more excusable who keep a constant regard to the sacred original above all things, than those who manifestly depart from it to follow their own fancies, or the fabulous accounts of the Jews. Now as I have drawn the greatest part of my light from the former, I am sensible that those who have been conversant with all the pompous descriptions we have extant, will be surpris'd to find this of mine come

<sup>q</sup> Kings ubi sup. ver. 5, 11. <sup>r</sup> Ibid. 14. <sup>s</sup> Chron. ubi sup. ver. 13. <sup>t</sup> Kings ubi sup. 15. & Chron. ubi sup. 15. <sup>u</sup> Nehem. iii. 31. xii. 3, 9. <sup>x</sup> Jerem xxxi. 40. <sup>y</sup> 2 Kings xi. 16. <sup>z</sup> Chron. xxiii. 15. Nehem. iii. 28. <sup>a</sup> 2 Chron. xxiii. 20. <sup>b</sup> 2 Kings xv. 35. & 2 Chron. xxvii. 3.

(L) Being divided in three parts, the Levites had three different posts joining to one another (68); one third part was to guard the King's house, or apartment, next to the temple, southward; another to be at the gate of Sur, or turning, which seems to be that of Asuppim, whereat the king turned to his throne. It is indeed called by another name, but very like it in the Hebrew, viz. the gate of Sippim, where our version has doors or thresholds. The last was at the gate beyond the guard, or runners (69), which seems to be that of Shallebeth. For the king coming to the temple through this gate, any one may see that there was their proper station in the avenue. It is also called the gate of foundation, because of the projecture there made with the terrais, as has been observed.

(M) So says the first of the sacred historians (70), meaning, as we take it, the gate that before has been called the gate beyond the guard, viz. Shallebeth, or south-western gate. But if one had rather, that the gate of the guard, here, which is somewhat different from the other, should signify the same with the high gate in Chronicles, where the guard of the king's house stood; this will make no variation in the main: for as it is rightly supposed to have been in the front of the palace, it was the first gate they met with coming from the Lord's to the King's house over the terrais, or ascent.

(N) This we do remark, because Ezekiel (71) speaks of the higher gate that lieth toward the north, the same it seems, with that which Jeremy (72) calls the high gate of Benjamin, which was בֵּית הַבְּתֵל bebeth, in or by the house of the LORD.

(68) See 2 Kings xi. 5, &c. 2 Chron. xxiii. 4, &c. (69) See of them, 2 Sam. xv. 8. 1 Kings i. 5. xiv. 27. (70) 2 Kings xi. 19. (71) Cap. in. 2. (72) Cap. xx. 2.

come so vastly short of the boasted magnificence of that sacred building. But here I desire it may be remembered, that as this was designed to contain no more than could be met with, or fairly deduced from the sacred writings, so the reader will at least reap this benefit from it, that he will now be better able to judge what is, or is not, authentick in other plans of this structure, than he could have been without it.

A Description of JERUSALEM.

AFTER the account we have given of the holy city's greatest ornament, the Temple of SOLOMON, we have thought it would not be unacceptable, for a more comprehensive view of the whole, to subjoin a description of the city itself, according to the sacred historians.

It is a general supposition, though, as we presume, without any solid argument to support it, that Melchisedek's Salem stood in the same place, where afterwards was built the city, the subject of our present enquiry (A). We will not, at this time, undertake to decide the question, but shall only take notice of the habitations of the Canaanites, who dwelt here and in the adjacent parts, being called Je- Its Origin and Names.
bus and Jebusi<sup>a</sup>. David having taken from them the mountain, upon the top of which was their strong hold, made it his place of residence<sup>b</sup>, and this is commonly called Zion, or the city of David<sup>c</sup>. Under Solomon the name of Jerusalem either first began, or first got the better of the other; but there being no sure reason assigned for this, nor any determined signification affixed to the name (B), we will dwell no longer upon these uncertainties, but enter into the matter in hand, by considering Jerusalem.

In regard to its holiness. We must not imagine this attribute has been given to it Holiness.
by the rabbies only, or by the legend of the shekels, which is Jerusalem the holy<sup>d</sup>. Isaiah<sup>e</sup> tells us, that the Israelites call themselves of the holy city. Nebemiah twice qualifies it by that title<sup>f</sup>, all which doth sufficiently shew it was generally called so. In the new testament<sup>g</sup> the same title is several times given to it. Besides, it is well known that in the Psalms it bears the name of City of God<sup>h</sup>; in the Propets; we read, that it shall be called the Throne of the Lord; our Saviour himself calls it the City of the great king<sup>k</sup>, as being hallowed and consecrated in a particular manner by God's residence in the temple. The rabbies<sup>l</sup> add, that there was a penalty forbidding the leaving a dead corps in it the space of a night, and that the importation of dead mens bones was unlawful; notwithstanding this, in it were contained the Tombs of the royal family<sup>m</sup>. It is further added, by the rabbies, that within its walls were not to be seen gardens, trees, dung, or limekilns, or even cocks. In it no houses were to be let; and this, I think, means only that

<sup>a</sup> Josh. xv. 8. xviii. 28. Jud. xv. 10. <sup>b</sup> 2 Sam. v. 7. 9. <sup>c</sup> Ps. xlviii. & pass. 1 Chron. xi. 5. <sup>d</sup> ירושלם הקדושה, See above, p. 721. <sup>e</sup> Is. xlviii. 2. <sup>f</sup> Nehem. xi. 1, 18. <sup>g</sup> Matth. iv. 5. & pass. <sup>h</sup> Ps. xlvii. 5. <sup>i</sup> Jerem. iii. 17. coll. Ezek. xxxviii. 35. Joel iii. 17. Zach. viii. 3. <sup>k</sup> Matth. v. 35. coll. Ps. xlviii. 3. <sup>l</sup> In Gemara Bava Kama & libro Siphra ap. REZARD. <sup>m</sup> Vid. JOSEPH. Ant. vii. p. 331. fin. conf. Nehem. iii. 16.

(A) What is generally alledged, that the tabernacle was in Salem (1), proves only that it was the shortened or abridged name of that city, like that of Solyma. Some even have said Solymus for Hierosolymitanus (2).

Solyms nigrantem pulvere fratrem.

(B) ירושלים according to the pronunciation of Majorites, Jeroushalaim; but to that of the Chaldæes, in holy writ, Jeroushelem; which is much the same as the Greek ἱερουσαλὴμ, and our Jerusalem. This word, in all likelihood, is compounded and derived from Shalem, or Shalum, peace; and, as several are of opinion, from jarah, to fear; or raab, to see; or jarah, to inherit or possess; or from Jeru, altered from Jebus, by a mutation of letters. We read in Josephus (3), that by some it was thought Homer had called this city Solyms; and that truly the Temple was called, in Hebrew, Solyms, i. e. safety, or security. St. Jerom lays this to the Jewish historian's charge in very hard words (4); and, as it seems, with some just ground. For, in another place, the same historian (5) tells us, that Melchisedek was the first that built the temple re iser; and that after he had built it, he called it isposolyma, which was before named solyma: Where that strange etymology is again seen; not to mention other gross errors, which give us room to think this passage is very much falsified (6). This may have happened to several other, which, it is to be hoped, will be restored by Mr. Whiston, in the translation he intends to publish.

(1) Ps. lxxvi. 3. (2) VALER. FLAV. lib. 1. Argonaut. (3) Ant. vii. p. 287. (4) Quod absurdum esse peregrinæ linguæ mixtura demonstrat. De Loc. Hebr. (5) Bell. Jud. vi. p. 1292. (6) Conf. above temple, p. 1. A.

that the inhabitants were obliged to exercise hospitality by entertaining their brethren, on whom it was incumbent to resort from all parts to Jerusalem on the days of the great Festivals (C).

Extent.

It is no easy matter precisely to determine the extent of this city in its different changes. Its most antient state of perfection was under the flourishing reign of its founder's successor, I mean Solomon; in whose time this city, before embellished by his father David, appeared in its greatest lustre and beauty, and there is no great likelihood that it was enlarged by those that came after him. The general and indeterminate descriptions, to be found in the authors of those times, will not permit us, as we have just now hinted, to settle with any exactness the bounds of it. We will however venture to suppose its circumference, at first, to have been about seven or eight Stadia, or a Roman Mile. It was certainly twice, or probably three times as large under Solomon. After the Captivity, this city being rebuilt, took up much the same space as before; as may be gathered from Nehemiah's description of the ruins of the city, and its condition after it was repaired. This description of Nehemiah we shall take particular notice of, and at the same time shall not let that of Josephus pass unheeded. According to this historian, the whole circumference of Jerusalem was 33 Stadia*, which is about four Miles and 125 Paces. But Hecateus, who has described it such as it was in his time, under Ptolemy Lagus†, gives it no less than 50 Stadia‡, probably including the out-parts, which properly did not belong to it; for there is no reason to believe, that there was any considerable decrease, from the time of Hecateus to that of Josephus, so that we must stand to the measure of the last of these: we will only add, that Hecateus's assertion, that there was in Jerusalem one hundred and twenty thousand inhabitants, is very probable (D).

Situation.

THE situation of this capital city of Judea has always been extremely advantageous. The agreeable variety of rising grounds with which it was encompassed*, the fruitful meadows that lay between, interspersed with clear rivulets, and wholesome streams†; the hills on which it stood, which rose gradually one behind another, and looked like a natural Amphitheater, made up as pleasing and delightful a prospect as can well be conceived.

OF these hills the two largest, Zion and Acra, were directly opposite to each other; on Morija, whose compass might be about three quarters of a mile, Solomon built the temple. Of the two first we will take a more distinct view, beginning by mount Zion.

THIS hill, as has already been shewn‡, bounded to the south the whole circumference, and reached from west to east. The western side was highest, and bounded by the valley of Hinnom (E) as the eastern by that of Jebozababai§, which, it * Cap. ii. iii. & xii. † Bell. Jud. vi. 4. cui tit. Ἰεροσολύμων περιεγραφή, p. 1221. ‡ Ibid. p. 1223, No. iii. § Diodor. Sicul. lib. i. * Apud Joseph. c. Anton. p. 1348. ה'סבוב לה' ה'י' שלם Pf. cxxxv. 2. † 2 Chron. xxxii. 3, 4. ‡ See above Temple, descript. p. 977. § Joel iii. 2.

(C) Of this some have thought an imitation seems to be given in the gospel (7), where Christ will have a room made ready for him to eat the passover.

(D) His words are, ἡ οὐκὸς μὲν ἀνθρώπων σφραγισμένη μυριάς, twelve myriads; now a myriad is 10,000; and 120,000 inhabitants may seem rather too few for such an extent as had Jerusalem of four miles. We see that in the siege perished, according to Josephus (8), 1100,000 men, μυριάδες ἑκατὸν καὶ δεκά; besides 97,000 taken prisoners during the war; and that this may gain more credit Josephus adds, as an undoubted proof, that in Cleopas's enrollment on Easter-day were reckoned 255,600 lambs. Now there was not less than ten men to each lamb; so that the number of those that were purified according to the law, besides the rest, must have been two millions, five hundred and fifty six thousand.

(E) ה'נ'נ' ג'ס' binnom, so it is called (9) in Yagha, where Hinnom is a man's name. In another place (10) it is the valley of the sons, or children of Hinnom; and it is said, that in this valley was Tophet, where the children were made to pass thro' the fire in honour to Molech. Upon this account it is thought, this place took its name from the tears the children shed whilst burning, and from the noise of the drums which were kept beating, in order to drown their shrieks. But the text in Yagha shews, that the valley did bear this name long before it was put to such an use, if ever it was put to it at all. At least if we believe Maimon, and other rabbies, the children were made to pass through the flame only, as being, by that ceremony, consecrated to the idol (11). However, in later times, the carrion was thrown into this valley (12); and, when it did not wait away fast enough, frequently burnt. This has given room to fix upon the word Greena, (which represents in Greek and Latin the Hebrew word) the notion of hell fire (13).

(7) Matth. xxvi. 17. (8) De Bell. Jud. lib. ult. p. 1291. (9) Yagha xv. 8. (10) 2 Kings xxiii. 10. (11) Seld. de Diis Syris, Syn. i. cap. 6. (12) 2 Kings xvi. sup. (13) Matth. x. 21, 29. & 30, pass.

it is thought, joined the other towards the south<sup>w</sup>. Here were several springs, particularly that of Gibon*, or Shiloh†, which ran very plentifully with exceeding good water (F). To the north, Zion had another valley that lined it from one end to the other, named by Josephus‡ the valley of the Cheesemongers; probably the same as that distinguished in Zephaniab§ by the epithet of the Maltbesh (G), translated by the Septuagint τῆς κατακεκομμένης, that was cut into, or made hollow (H).

Acra (I), with the said valley to the south, stood to the north of Zion; its declivity was equal on every side, as Josephus says; and we cannot give a better idea of these two hills, nor of the valley between them, than he who had so often seen them. According to this historian¶, Jerusalem was built upon the two hills, Zion and Acra, directly opposite one to another, and separated by the valley of the Cheesemongers. The first was higher, and its length formed a much straiter line than the second. Upon it, that is Zion, stood the high city, in the author's time called the high market-place. The lower city stood upon Acra, but before that, bore other names, as hath been already observed in the description of the temple||.

LET US now examine these mountains, in relation to their different wards or quarters, streets and publick places, as well as palaces, and most remarkable buildings.

THE principal quarter was called the city of David*, on the top of mount Zion, Ward, towards the west. This was a fortification which enclosed that king's palace; and it is likely that near this, afterwards, stood that of Herod, which served as a citadel†. To the west of the fort was מִצְפָּה Mizpah, or Maspha, according as the Hebrew word is differently pronounced; but this is not the knotty part of the question: the difficulty would be to prove that Mizpah was a part of Jerusalem, it being sure that near it was a small town that bore that name‡. These are the words of Nebemiah§, Shallum of Colbozeb, ruler of the פֶּלֶס Pelec of Mizpah, repaired the gate of the fountain. Now Pelec in Hebrew is a staff||, and so may signify a district, ward, or quarter, subject to a particular jurisdiction or inspection, in the same manner as שֵׁבֶט Shebet, a rod, signifies a tribe. The Chaldee dialect makes use of Pelac, and נִכְדָּה Pileca, in the same sense as is here given to Pelec. The Arabians give this name, which they pronounce Felec, to a sphere; so that it would be a pretty good translation of παροιμία Parish, as it denotes the neighbourhood round about. The Septuagint translate it here part, or portion; but every where else in this chapter it is a περιχωρος circumference of land, a district of more or less extent. The Latin word Vicus bears the same sense, and is made use of in the Vulgate; though in this place, speaking of Mizpah, that translation has Pagus, and in another place Pars; so uncertain it is to trust to translations, how useful soever they may be when compared together. However, I shall venture to say that Mizpah was <sup>w</sup> Kimhi in Loc. * 1 Kings i. 33. ‡ Chron. xxxii. 30. † Isai. viii. 6. Joan. ix. 7. ‡ Ubi sup. in Ecphrafi. † Chap. i. ver. 11. ‡ Ubi sup. in Ecphrafi. † Ibid. † Vid. ubi sup. p. iii. ‡ 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14. Nehem. xii. 37. † Bell. Jud. p. 1230. ‡ Jerem. xl. 10. † Nehem. iii. 15. † 2 Sam. iii. 29.

(F) Πηγὴν γλυκείαν τε καὶ πολλὰν are the words of Josephus (18). Others have thought that Shiloh was a rivulet of Gibon, and it is true that that word signifies font, according to the etymology given of it in the gospel (19); where it is also called pool.

(G) Which word signifies a mortar, or any hollow thing. Thus the מִכְשֵׁל בְּלִי, which so seasonably refreshed Samson's thirst, is universally rendered the hollow of the rock lechi, so called from its resemblance to a jaw-bone, or from the slaughter he had made with it there (20).

(H) In the same manner, 2 Sam. xxiii. 27. babbor, (in our translation a pit, in which Benajah, in time of snow, slew a lion) literally the pit, was probably a known place, so named from its cavity and hollow-ness, and may very well be the deep valley here mentioned. What seems to favour this conjecture is, that Benajah was one of David's mighty men, or captains. Now, it is very possible, that he being upon duty at the gate of the city of David on mount Zion, and hearing in the valley, at the foot of the palace, the roaring of a lion, whom want of food, in time of snow, had brought thither, desirous of signaling himself by so singular an action, immediately went down, encountered and destroyed the hungry rapacious beast.

(I) This name seems to be borrowed from the Greek ἀκρᾶ, an eminence; and sometimes a citadel, or fortrels (21). It is well known that there was one built upon this hill by Antiochus, and afterwards laid even to the ground by Simon (22). And to this reason it must be ascribed, that Acra has been since distinguished by that name. Notwithstanding the Targum (23) makes sometimes use of this expression, the Acra; that is, the Citadel of Zion.

(18) Bell. Jud. v. p. 1222. (19) John ix. 7. (20) Judg. xv. 17, & seq. (21) Maccab. i. 35. (22) See JOSEPH. Antiq. xii. c. xiii. (23) On 2 Sam. v. 7.

was one of the quarters of Jerusalem, and that it was divided into two parts; that we are speaking of, to the west, and the other, where stood the Arsenal, and where Ezra was ruler <sup>k</sup>, to the east of the fortress.

ANOTHER quarter, divided into two parts, bears the name of Jerusalem<sup>l</sup>, which had two rulers, each of half a quarter. This is the part which Josephus <sup>m</sup> calls the City, with respect to the citadel, and both together made the upper city. There were three other quarters, which, it seems, might be looked for in Acra, viz. Beibakerem, Betbzur, and Keilah.

As for the Streets, in Hebrew הרצות Hbouzith <sup>n</sup>, all we know concerning those of Jerusalem, at that time, is, that as there was one bearing the name of Haophim, i. e. Baker's street <sup>o</sup>; so there might be others which bore the names of some other trades; thus the valley, in Josephus's time, was called Tyropæon <sup>p</sup>.

רחוב Rebob properly is an open place (K); in the Reboboth, according to Ezekiel <sup>q</sup>, were built the high places. In the book of Esther <sup>r</sup>, an officer of the king of Persia goes out to Mordecai in the Rebob of the town, over-against the gate of the palace, which seems to have been made use of by the courtiers to walk in. In the Rebob of Jerusalem <sup>s</sup>, Ezekiab assembled his generals, and made a speech to them. The people were gathered together by Ezra <sup>t</sup> in a Rebob of the temple, and the priests and levites by Ezekiab <sup>u</sup> in the eastern Rebob; we must suppose these two to have been parts of the vacant space that surrounded the courts of the temple. Lastly, there was a Rebob near the water-gate <sup>w</sup>, which must have been vastly large, since it contained all the people of both sexes, that flocked thither from all parts, in order to hear Ezra read the law, upon a scaffold, or stage, erected upon this occasion at one end of the place, in such a manner that Ezra had the whole assembly facing him.

If we have not yet taken notice of מלוא Millo, it is because we do not find it in scripture distinguished by any of the abovementioned names, or indeed by any other name than Millo. When David took from the Jebusites the top of mount Zion, he then built round about from Millo and inwards, says the text of Samuel <sup>x</sup>, where it is easy to understand, a castle was built on this mount, surrounded with strong walls, and probably of a circular form. Now this building had on the east what is called Millo, and on the other sides was bounded by the hill itself; insomuch that the city of David was within mount Zion on the north, west and south, but was bordered eastwards by Millo (L). Although it is said in the text <sup>y</sup> Solomon built it, yet the context shews that he only made an end of it, or repaired it; and as much did Hezekiab in his time <sup>z</sup>. Who the first was that built it, we do not know; but it seems to have been a work of the Jebusites, whose government was almost a Democracy, like that at Athens.

FOR this reason, and from what is said in scripture, there would be no absurdity in supposing it to have been a spacious open place, such as the Campus Martius at Rome, where the people met for their recreation, on festival and other rejoicing

<sup>k</sup> Nehem. iii. 19. <sup>l</sup> Ibid. 9, & 12. <sup>m</sup> Antiq. xiv. p. 613. <sup>n</sup> Prov. vii. 12. <sup>o</sup> Jerem. xxxvii. 21. <sup>p</sup> See before, p. xvii. <sup>q</sup> Ezek. xvi. 24. <sup>r</sup> Esther iv. 6. <sup>s</sup> 2 Chron. xxxii. 6. <sup>t</sup> Ezra x. 9. <sup>u</sup> 2 Chron. xxix. 4. <sup>w</sup> Nehem. viii. 1. 4. Add the Rebob of the gate Ephraim, ibid. 16. <sup>x</sup> 2 Sam. v. 9. coll. 1 Chron. xi. 8. <sup>y</sup> Vid. 1 Kings x. 15, 24. & xi. 27. <sup>z</sup> 2 Chron. xxxii. 5.

(K) The root רחב doth signify to enlarge itself; so that Rebob is literally a large place, and is made use of to signify the place, or square, of a town. Judges xix. 15.

(L) Without doubt Millo doth signify something either full, or to be filled; at least this may be deduced from the two Hebrew words that come nearest to it, Nelo fullness, and Miluab beazel, or collet, in which are inclosed precious stones. So Moses, receiving orders about the breast-plate, is bid to fill the beazel, Miluab, with a stone (24), that the stones shall be set in gold in their inclosings (25), and that they were inclosed in ouches of gold in their inclosings bemiluabam (26). So then Millo was something filled up; and this we are very ready to allow, for, to make it fit for the use we have been speaking of, it was required, that in some places this spot of ground should be made level, and in others filled up, in order to its being uniform and of a piece. This derivation surely favours our opinion more than any other; and we might add to this, that it is very likely this was the place where afterwards stood the Xystus (27), a large place where the Athlets did exercise. And as such a place was also called παιδίσκος, from the runnings there round about, it hath been apprehended an Hippodrome was there for horse-races; which is not improbable. However, it very much resembling what we have said of Millo, it may also be, that the first inhabitants may have given it this name from its being a place of general concourse, and so filled up with numbers of people of all sorts.

(24) Exod. xxviii. 17. (25) Ibid. 21. (26) Ibid. xxxix. 13. (27) Jos. in Ephraim 1222.

rejoicing days, or about private or publick affairs. It may be placed at the foot of the city of David, going to the valley between Zion and Acra, in the centre of the whole circumference of Jerusalem. Others imagine it to be a Street, beginning at the steps of the city of David, and reaching as far as Acra, or Morijab; or else a Wall along the valley between the two hills; and lastly, the Valley itself. But this seems less probable than what we at first hinted.

LET us next visit the publick buildings in Zion: The first that offers itself is the Building, Palace of king David, on the top of the mount in the midst of a fortress<sup>a</sup>. There was a flight of steps to go up to it<sup>b</sup>; to the north of these steps, or stairs, stood the Tomb of David, of which Josephus tells many wonderful stories at the end of the seventh book of his antiquities. At the bottom of the steps was the house of the Mighty<sup>c</sup>. This, in my opinion, served as a guard-house to the palace, or at least was the station of some chief commanders, without whose leave no one was permitted to go up to the house; such as we suppose the thirty-one worthies<sup>d</sup>, among which was Uriah the Hittite.

NEXT was the Arsenal, or Armoury<sup>e</sup>, at the turning of the wall<sup>f</sup>, in Hebrew called Mikzoab (M); but the Arsenal itself, by a compendious expression, or way of speaking, was called חַנְשֶׁק Hanneshek, for Neshek is a weapon, or arms. The word baith, a house, must therefore be understood.

NOT far from the Arsenal, and more towards the middle of the city was, if not the palace of a high-priest, at least a pontifical palace, then in the possession of Eliashib<sup>g</sup>. Nebemiab mentions it only occasionally, when he speaks of the repairs of the walls of the city; but even from the little that is said of it, we may gather that it was a spacious building. Lower, at a very little distance, we find the house of Azariah, a man of distinction of the tribe of Benjamin<sup>h</sup>. But it is time to come to the Palace or Palaces.

AND here the books of Kings do indeed mention three houses built by Solomon; the first they call the house where he dwelt<sup>i</sup>; the second, the house of the forest of Lebanon; and the third was that which he made for Pharaoh's daughter<sup>k</sup>; but this last I take to have been only a spacious apartment (N) added to the first house, whose situation it is not very difficult to fix. For on one side, this palace was almost parallel to the water-gate<sup>l</sup>, and on the other, there was a communication between it and the temple, by means of the terras built by Solomon over the valley<sup>m</sup>. I am apt to think that the second was a summer-retirement, since we have it upon record that Solomon built it in the forest<sup>n</sup>. But yet I would not contradict those who are of opinion, that it was only another wing, or apartment of the palace, which very probably took its name from the cedars of Lebanon, that may be supposed to have been the chief material employed in it<sup>o</sup>.

THE following consideration adds a great deal of weight to this side of the question, viz. That in this house<sup>p</sup> were placed the targets and shields of beaten gold; for the distance from Lebanon to Jerusalem would have made it very troublesome to bring them up whenever they were wanted, besides the risk of being taken, to which such costly armour would have been exposed by the way; and indeed they were carried away by Sibbak when he came up against the city<sup>q</sup>.

NOT far from this palace, I think, was the Mattara, translated Prison<sup>r</sup>; but if it was one, it was only like the Tower of London, or like our courts of law, or even the main corps-de-garde at the avenues of the palace. For in the court of this Mattara, Jeremiab was confined; but at the same time was allowed a good deal of liberty,

<sup>a</sup> 2 Sam. v. 11. <sup>b</sup> Nehem. iii. 15. <sup>c</sup> Ibid. 16. <sup>d</sup> 2 Sam. xxviii. 3. <sup>e</sup> Ibid. 39.
<sup>f</sup> Nehem. iii. 19. <sup>g</sup> Ibid. 20. <sup>h</sup> Ibid. 23. <sup>i</sup> 1 Kings vii. 1, 8. <sup>j</sup> Ibid. 2. <sup>k</sup> Ibid. 8.
<sup>l</sup> Nehem. iii. <sup>m</sup> 1 Kings vi. <sup>n</sup> Ibid. ix. 19. <sup>o</sup> 2 Chron. viii. 6. <sup>p</sup> See before, p. 799. Not.
<sup>q</sup> O. <sup>r</sup> 1 Kings x. 17. <sup>s</sup> Ibid. xiv. 25, 26. <sup>t</sup> Nehem. iii. 25. coll. Jerem. xxxii. 2.

(M) חֲזָקָה is properly the opening of an angle, which consequently forms a space; but פִּנָּה Pinnab is the point of an angle, or, as it is called by artists, a salient angle; so the wall had a turning out here, and this justifies the translation; and any one may see that it formed a corner, or open place, in the interior angle. For this reason, such an opening in Ezekiel's temple is called Mikzoab; Bebold, says he,

(28) in every חֲזָקָה corner of the court there was a court.

(N) Beth is often taken in that sense, as when Rebekah runs to her mother's beth (29), apartment, or lodging; and so is the house of the women (30) to be understood in the book of Ester; the said house probably not being separate from the king's, but part of it.

(28) Ezek. xlvi. 21.

(29) Gen. xxiv. 28.

(30) Ester. ii. 9.

liberty, since it was here he made the purchase of an estate in presence of several witnesses who signed the deed of agreement, and of all the Jews that lived there <sup>c</sup>. We read moreover <sup>d</sup>, that afterwards the prophet was taken as he went out of Jerusalem by the gate of Benjamin, and put in prison (O) in the house of Jonathab the scribe, from whence, by Zedekiah's order, he was transferred to the Mattara, where <sup>e</sup> he prophesied in the hearing of all the people. For this, at the request of some of the great men, he was thrown into a dungeon full of soil, where sinking into the mire, and in want of all things, he would soon have perished, had not the king, at the entreaty of a pious Ethiopian proselyte, given orders for his being taken out again. The prophet remained in the above-mentioned court till the taking of Jerusalem <sup>f</sup>.

ALL this sufficiently shews the Mattara to have been different from a prison commonly so called. This appears clearly enough; but it is not so easy to determine the situation of this building, although it seems Nebemiah has undertaken to describe it exactly; and if to us he does not appear to have so well succeeded in it, the fault lies neither at his door, nor at that of the language he wrote in, but to its being a dead language, many expressions of which are not so familiar to us as to be perfectly intelligible. However, Nebemiah, as I understand him, says <sup>g</sup>, "That Palat repaired the wall of Jerusalem, over-against the turning of the wall, and the tower belonging to the king's house, the high tower (P) that was by the court of Mattara."

HERE are two distinct indications of the reparations made by Palat in the wall; one near the turning of the wall going up to the water-gate, the other near the adjoining tower; and the situation of this tower is specified as well by its distinguishing height, as by its relation to the palace, and the neighbourhood of the court in question. So that to fix this to a point, we must look upon these buildings as being within the verge of the court, and under the immediate cognizance of king Solomon and his successors. Men were there entirely under their protection, neither could they be meddled with without the king's express orders; although it was by their orders only, they were restrained within the bounds of these buildings.

WE are now come to buildings much less remarkable for their dignity, magnificence, or embellishments; but whose situation cannot well be omitted in the particular description we are about; I mean the station or post of the Nethinims <sup>h</sup>: It is said indeed they dwelt in Opbel, eastward, near the valley; but their מושב Moshab, or dwelling, should not, we presume, be confounded with their house, בית Beth, or, as in our version, their place. Then followed the hall, or place of the merchants or retailers, Harosbelim <sup>i</sup>, who, I believe, are the same as the Collybistæ, or money-changers <sup>j</sup>, a sort of dealers very useful at the gate of the temple, where abundance of strangers resorted from all parts. But northward stood the house of the governor, supposed by some to be Nebemiah, and named in Hebrew, Kisse-pakbatb. This house was in Acra, near the gate of Ephraim. Our translation has the throne of the governor, and it might be called his court; it was like the Roman Prætorium, and had in it a tribunal, or a seat, which properly is what is meant by the Hebrew כִּסֵּה Kisse <sup>k</sup>. This too is the primitive signification of Throne in Greek, from whence that word in our language is derived.

LITTLE

<sup>c</sup> Jerem. xxxiii. 12.    <sup>d</sup> Ibid. xxxvii. 12.    <sup>e</sup> Ibid. xxxviii. 1.    <sup>f</sup> Ibid. 28.    <sup>g</sup> Ubi sup. ii. 25.    <sup>h</sup> Nehem. iii. 26, 31.    <sup>i</sup> Ibid.    <sup>j</sup> Matth. xxi. 12. and parall. in Mark and John.    <sup>k</sup> Nehem. iii. 17. Vid. MURSTAD in loc.

(O) It is called בית האסור Beth haesour, house of binding; otherwise it is called Beth כלא kele (31), the house of detaining; and in such a house we see Micaiah the prophet (32), a king of Israel named Hosheah (33), and the king of Judah, Jehoiachin (34); and this place did bear so frightful an aspect, as to make the prophet think it would soon cause his death (35).

(P) In our translation this is called the tower which lieth out from the king's high house. In Hebrew that epithet, the high, is more properly construed, we should think, with the word tower. The Septuagint has accordingly ἀνωτάτος, which necessarily refers to πύργος, not ἄλυσ, in their text. Besides, to lay out or project from a thing, according to the letter, is in the sense, as we express it, belonging to the same (36). But though it be well susceptible of this sense, when joined to that sequel of the king's house, this phrase may well admit of another signification, when without it; and this signification we then take to be that of a great extent (37); so as the Mattara, its court included, being called by the name of this high tower, that set it off exceedingly, was, it seems, a long series of buildings and walls, distant about fifty paces on the west side of the water-gate.

(31) Jerem. xxxvii. 15.    (32) 1 Kings xxii. 27. & pass.    (33) Ibid.    (34) 2 Kings xvii. 4.    (35) Jerem. xxxviii. 26.    (36) Vid. Habbae. 7.    (37) Jerem. xxviii. 15.

LITTLE is said concerning the walls of the city; but that little which is said we will here put together: 'Tis well known, after David had taken the strong hold of <sup>b</sup> Zion, he called it the city of David, and dwelt in that fort (Q), having built round about from Millo and inward<sup>c</sup>. Afterwards Solomon built the wall of Jerusalem<sup>d</sup>, which took in all the eastern part at least: However the king of Israel brake down the wall of Jerusalem, from the gate of Ephraim unto the corner gate<sup>e</sup>. This is the wall on the north of Ara, from east to west, according to the position of the gates, as we shall see hereafter; and truly although a broad wall was built there<sup>f</sup>, it was always the weak side of Jerusalem (R).

Of Jotham we read, On the wall of Ophel he built much; this lay to the south-east. Of Hezekiah, He strengthened himself, and built up all the wall that was broken, (viz. by Jeash, as above) and another wall without<sup>g</sup>. So also of Manasseh, He built a wall without the city of David, on the west side of Gihon, in the valley even to the entering in at the fish-gate, and compassed about Ophel<sup>h</sup>. Here you have almost the whole circuit of Jerusalem, from south to north by west, and to the south-east. Now to one of these latter buildings the prophet seems to allude, when speaking of the breaches of the city of David, he adds, the houses of Jerusalem were broken down to fortify the walls<sup>i</sup>; though it may be also taken for a prophecy of the calamitous times that were to follow. Lastly, it is reported, that when the city was broken up by the Chaldees<sup>k</sup>, the soldiers fled by the two walls by the way of the king's garden, which was on the south, one of these walls being built by David or Solomon, adjoining immediately to the city; and the other, the new one without, by Hezekiah or Manasseh. We read also the army of the Chaldees brake down the wall of Jerusalem round about<sup>m</sup>, which was left till Nebemiah's<sup>n</sup> time with open breaches on every side.

In ancient Jerusalem the gates, שַׁבָּרִים Shubarim, were ten in number<sup>o</sup>, viz. five Gates, from west to east by south, and five others by north: Here are their names, as they are to be found in the text and translation;

By south,	1. Dung-gate,	Haaf-poth.
	2. Fountain-gate,	Haain or en.
	3. Water-gate,	Hammajim.
	4. Horse-gate,	Hafoussim.
	5. Prison-gate,	Hanipbkad.
By north,	1. Valley-gate,	Haggai or ge.
	2. Gate of Ephraim,	Ephraim.
	3. Old-gate,	Haishan.
	4. Fish-gate,	Hadaggim.
	5. Sheep-gate.	Hazon.

Now as to that which is called of the valley, the entrance was on the west: By this gate Nebemiah went out of the city, in order to visit the ruins of Jerusalem; he likewise placed himself upon this gate, or upon the wall close to it, when he made the dedication of the re-building of Jerusalem, by a double procession of the people, one half going to the right, or south, the other to the left, or north, in order to come by the east to the temple. As they did not go through this gate, from which they set out, no mention is made of it in the account given of the places through

<sup>b</sup> 2 Sam. v. 7—9. <sup>c</sup> 2 Kings ix. 15. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. xiv. 13. <sup>e</sup> Nehem. iii. 8. <sup>f</sup> 2 Chron. xxvii. 3.
<sup>g</sup> Ibid. xxxii. 5. <sup>h</sup> Ibid. xxxiii. 14. <sup>i</sup> Isaiah xxii. 9, 10. <sup>k</sup> 2 Kings xxv. 4. Jerem. xxxix. 4.
<sup>l</sup> Nehem. iii. 15. <sup>m</sup> 2 Kings xxv. 10. <sup>n</sup> Chap. ii. 12, 15. <sup>o</sup> Ibid. conf. iii. & xii.

(Q) When David besieged Zion, the Jebusites said, "Except he took away the blind and the lame, he should not come in thither, thinking David could not come into the fort." The sense of which is not, to be sure, the most obvious at first reading, yet, when well considered, it seems to be, This fort is so strong of itself, that for its defence lame and blind men are sufficient. And to this strength of the place it is owing that the king promised to make chief or captain the man that would drive these people into the ditch (38).

(R) This Josephus in several places gives to understand (39); and hence it happened that both king Nebuchadnezzar and Titus attacked the city on this side (40).

(38) Vide BOCHART. Phaleg. l. iv. c. 36. (39) In Euphrati, N<sup>o</sup> 2. ubi de muris. Item ant. p. 448. xiv. 613. & Bell. Jud. 1289. (40) Ubi sup. ant. & Bell. Jud.

through which the processions passed <sup>p</sup>, but only where the particulars are given of the repairing the walls and gates of Jerusalem <sup>q</sup>. Neither in this account of the processions is the horse-gate mentioned, probably because the rubbish stopped up the passage, which was the reason that they turned to the left to go to the temple. This gate is placed to the east by Jeremiah <sup>r</sup>, and it was through it that Atiabab went from the temple to the palace: But we must confess it is not so easy to assign the cause for which the dung-gate is omitted in this account: However, it is spoken of in the re-building of the wall; and when Nehemiah did view the ruins, it is again mentioned by the name of the dung-port <sup>s</sup>.

As to the water-gate turning to the east <sup>t</sup>, it is likely that it answered the southern part of the palace, by the place or square in which Ezra read the law to all the people <sup>u</sup>.

THE prison-gate is in Hebrew Mipkad <sup>w</sup>. This word, which is kept in the translation, signifies visitation, and by deduction, judgment, correction, ward, prison. It is also called the gate of Mattara (S), in our translation prison gate <sup>x</sup>. It stood eastward of the palace and city both.

It is plain the gate of Ephraim took its name from its joining the highway leading to that tribe. This may serve to ascertain the truth of the situation we have given of the city.

THE sheep-gate furnishes us with means of explaining the word προβατικὴ, in the gospel according to St. John <sup>y</sup>, where our translation has, there was a pool near the sheep-market, in the text, and gate in the margin, viz. αγορά, or πύλη. And the translation in the text seems the most probable; for a sheep-market was there near the gate of the same name, and seems to have been between the gate and the pool, that of Bethesda, on the north-east of the temple (T).

LASTLY, the fish-gate <sup>z</sup> did answer to one afterwards built in the new city, and called the gate of Joppe, a sea-port on the Mediterranean.

THESE we think are all the gates of Jerusalem, either as it stood before the captivity, or as after the return from it, it was repaired by Nehemiah. It cannot be denied but a few others seem to be mentioned in that space of time; but we take them to be only different names given to those already mentioned. And first, the corner-gate <sup>a</sup>, which, in our opinion, must be the same with the old-gate, as may be gathered from Jeremiah's occasionally giving the circuit of Jerusalem from the north-east, over-against the temple, [i. e. from the tower of Hananeel] unto the gate of the corner (U), going along to the north-west, where stood the hails

Gareb

<sup>p</sup> Nehem. xii. 38. <sup>q</sup> Ibid. iii. 13. <sup>r</sup> Jer. xxxi. 39. <sup>s</sup> 2 Kings xi. &c. See above. <sup>t</sup> Nehem. xi. 37. <sup>u</sup> Nehem. iii. 4. <sup>w</sup> Ibid. ii. 13. <sup>x</sup> Ibid. iii. 25. viii. 1. <sup>y</sup> Ibid. xii. 31. <sup>z</sup> Nehem. i. 39. <sup>a</sup> Chap. v. 2. <sup>b</sup> Nehem. iii. 12. xii. 39. & al. <sup>c</sup> 2 Kings xiv. 13. <sup>d</sup> 2 Chron. xxvi. 9.

(S) Of the Mattarah itself we spoke above, as pretty near the palace that lay northward of it: And what seems to have given the name of either Mattarah or Mipkad to this gate, is, that those words well agree in their general notions; which reason appears to us more likely, than that the great Sabbatim had there his ordinary fittings, it being at least dubious whether at that time this court had any jurisdiction, or even existed. Yet we do not deny but that courts of justice were kept at the gates (41), and therefore prisons might be there also, and houses of correction besides.

(T) Though Josephus does not mention it by name, yet he (42) places a pool there, and thereabouts. Mr. Muundrel found a large empty basin, of which he gives the following description (43). "It is 120 paces long, 40 broad, and at least eight deep, but void of water. At its west end it discovers some old arches, now dammed up. These some will have to be the five porches in which sat that multitude of lame, &c. The pool is contiguous on one side to St. Stephen's gate, on the other to the area of the temple."

(U) Although the translation here somewhat differs from that above, the word in both places in the original is Happinnab. It is true in Zechariah it is read Happinnim, as if one should say the corners, but the sense is the same if (44) translated the corner. Lastly, this our translation, in the parallel to King, answers (45) the Hebrew word Hapboneb, where the margin has the gate of it that looketh; which is not easy to be understood, unless, by supposing it to be an elliptical expression, the sense is made up by what we find added elsewhere (46), viz. Zaphnab to the north, which is a true indication of the said gate. However, it may be thought this various reading is owing to the carelessness of the transcriber, as it seems may be collected from the Septuagint's having here πύλη γωνίας, corner-gate; yet notice should be taken that this gate did lie towards the σάβρος. By this name was called (47), not only the eminence, (from whence coming from the north one first discovered Jerusalem) but also the plain next to the city on that side. Now that in Hebrew would be Phonch, or Hapboneb, which we leave to our reader's consideration.

(41) Vide Deut. xvi. 8. Amos v. 15. Zech. viii. 16. &c. al. (42) Bell. Jud. p. 1248. (43) See his Journey, &c. 107. (44) See above. (45) 2 Chron. xxv. 23. (46) Ezek. viii. 3. (47) Vide JOSEPH. de Bell. Jud. v. 2. 1216.

Gareb and Gath (X), afterwards called Golgotha, or Cavalry. Then, according to the directions in the prophet, one turns towards the south, through the valley of Hinnom, and the south-east fields called the fuller's fields, unto the corner of the borje-gate to the east<sup>b</sup>: So also in Zechariah c, All the land shall be as a plain to Rimmon, south of Jerusalem, and inhabited from Benjamin's gate (Y), unto the first gate unto the corner gate, and from the tower of Hananeel unto the king's wine presses. Here first you have Jerusalem, on the south, a hilly country there, to be turned into a plain; which is easily apprehended to be figuratively spoken. But further, the northern side is traced here from a gate going to the neighbour tribe of Benjamin<sup>d</sup> to the old gate, here called the first; the following words unto the corner gate being an explanation of the former unto the first gate: So you go up to the east by the tower there, returning to the south, where was the royal garden. Another gate is mentioned in Jeremiah e, where he is bid to go forth unto the valley of the son of Hinnom, which is by the entry of the east gate, but should be rather the brick gate (Z), or of the brick-bats, it being the same with the dung gate, where was the valley of ashes<sup>f</sup>. But we do not take the city gate<sup>g</sup> to be one of the ten of Jerusalem; but rather a gate of the city of David, or Zion, to the north-west, leading to the valley gate, and since called Sion gate h.

THE situation of (שַׁבָּר הַתָּוֶק Sabbar Hattavek) the middle gate; may be deduced from what is said in Jeremiah i; Nebuchadnezzar's army, after having entered into Jerusalem by the north, advanced as far as this middle gate, of which Zedekiah being informed, he made his escape, as has already been observed k, through his garden to the south. This plainly shews that this gate must have stood in the midst of the valley between Acra and Zion.

A word or two more concerning the towers, as related by Nehemiah. They were Towers. four. Indeed, it is said of Huzziah l, "He built towers in Jerusalem, at the corner gate, and at the valley gate, and at the turning of the wall; but how many he built is not said." However, the names of the said four towers were Meab, east-ward; Hananeel, north-east-ward; Hattanourim, of the furnaces, west-ward; and Opbel, south-east-ward. The first named of these was also the first built m; near this they passed going to the sheep gate, in the dedication of the walls n; the second, called Hananeel, lay more to the north; and the third quite to the west. From beyond this tower it is said o they, in the dedication, went to the broad wall. Lastly, from the fourth, Opbel, a ward so called p, and the wall itself joining to it q, took their name; but properly it is a tower r, and supposed to be very high (A), and we should think was made use of as a watch tower; from

<sup>b</sup> Jerem. xxxi. 38—40. <sup>c</sup> Zechat. xiv. 10. <sup>d</sup> Jerem. xxvii. 13, &c. <sup>e</sup> Ibid. <sup>f</sup> Jerem. xxxi. 38. <sup>g</sup> 2 Chron. xxxii. 6. <sup>h</sup> See MAUND. ubi sup. <sup>i</sup> xxxix. 2, &c. <sup>k</sup> See above. <sup>l</sup> 2 Chron. xxvi. 9. <sup>m</sup> Nehem. iii. 2. <sup>n</sup> Ibid. xii. 39. <sup>o</sup> Ibid. xii. 38. <sup>p</sup> Ibid. iii. 26. <sup>q</sup> Ibid. 27. <sup>r</sup> 2 Kings v. 29. <sup>s</sup> See Isai. xxxii. 14. in the margin.

(X) As the word גִּתְיָ, which according to the Maforeth's pointing is read Gotha, may as well, if not better, be pronounced either Gatha or Gotba; and as the word גִּתְיָ, admitting of two sounds in the composition of known names, Galbed and Gilbad, does as naturally sound Gol; we should think the etymology of Golgotha is found to our hand, and its signification most plain, viz. the heap of Gotha: However, the great likeness the sound of this same word Golgotha had to Gagultba, in Syriac (which dialect is called Hebrew in the gospel (48), because a mixture of both was what was generally spoken at Jerusalem) it seems to have been commonly understood, as having a near relation to Gulgaltha (49), a scull, and therefore well expounded by απατίον τῶνος (50), which from the Latin Calvaria, a scull, is called in our language Calvary. Mr. Maunderel says, the church of the holy sepulchre is founded upon mount Calvary, which is a small eminency, or hill. It was antiently shut out of the walls of the city, but since it hath attracted the city round about it, and stands now in the midst of Jerusalem. Journey, p. 68, & 69.

(Y) There is a gate called the high gate of Benjamin (51), which is said to have been by the house of the Lord. It might also be translated in the house. If this sense be followed, the gate is none of the ten we are inquiring about; if the former, this is the gate that led into the land of Benjamin, and is further called the higher gate, which lieth towards the north (52).

(Z) It may be thus translated, supposing only here (53) an easy and common permutation of letters, as appears in the pronunciation of Sibboleth for (54) Sibboleth. This is the more probable, because there is already in the text a various reading of Harfouth for Harfith: However, Heres, in the Hebrew שֶׁרֶץ, is a brick, and Heres, in Chaldee חֶרֶץ, the sun. So we chuse to take it here, as if it was written שֶׁרֶץ, looking upon it as the dung gate, that opened into the valley of Hinnom, and that of ashes.

(A) This seems to appear by the very etymology of the word; for which we are beholden to the prophet's saying Opbla (55), for what is in the translation lifted up.

(48) John xix. 17. (49) Targ. on 2 Kings ix. 35. (50) Matth. xxvii. 33. (51) Jerem. xx. 2. In Hebrew it is גִּתְיָ, which is read in this sense, Numb. xxxvi. 37, 38. Jerem. xiii. 5. xxxii. 5. & al. (52) Ezek. ix. 2. (53) Jerem. xix. 2. (54) Judg. xii. 6. (55) Hab. ii. 4.

from whence one might see and observe afar off. It is said king Manasseh raised it up to a great height<sup>1</sup>; and of this tower Josephus speaks, when he says, that the wall passing through Ophlas, was carried on so as to join the east portico of the temple<sup>2</sup>.

Waters.

Of the waters and springs in or about Jerusalem we have had occasion to say something before<sup>3</sup>; but for a further knowledge of the same, it will be proper here to add what Mr. Maunderel tells us concerning the pool of Gibon; "It lies," says he, about two furlongs without Bethlehem gate, westward; it is a stately pool, 106 paces long, and 67 broad, and lined with wall and plaister, and was, "when we were there, well stored with water." This helps to understand the better what is related of Hezekiah<sup>4</sup>; "He stopped the upper water-course of Gibon," and brought it strait down to the west of the city of David." These naturally ran to the south and east out of the city; but the king turned off the course of this stream, in order to make it run towards the west in Sion. According to the Targum, Gibon is the same as Shiloh; nevertheless it is plain there were there two pools, since Gibon is named the upper pool. Now as there was a lower pool, this last might be Shiloh, of which the upper was the spring; notwithstanding one might be apt to think that Gibon was only a basin or reservoir, into which the water came from En-rogel, that is to say, the fuller's fountain, where Adonijah offered his sacrifice<sup>5</sup> at the time of his aspiring to the throne. But it is possible this may have no other foundation than the situation given to Gibon in the fuller's field. And although the word Rogel may signify a fuller, yet the word<sup>6</sup> רֹגֶל, as is made use of more properly implies it. However, since in the time of Hezekiah the water of Shiloh, or Gibon, was brought into the city, and that in all appearance when the city rose again from its ruins, it was restored to the same advantage; it is no wonder that <sup>7</sup> Tacitus places here fontem perennis aque.

THE king's pool is mentioned in Nehemiah<sup>8</sup>, as being near the fountain gate, that is, to the south-west of Zion: It is called by Josephus<sup>9</sup> the pool of Solomon, and placed, (which comes to one) winding towards the east. Isaiah<sup>10</sup> speaks of the old pool, whose water had been made to run between the two walls, and might be the same as that made by Hezekiah, barely called the pool made<sup>11</sup>, which might be named the artificial pool; not but that it was a natural spring, but because art had been made use of in order to make it water the eastern parts of Zion: However, one of the most renowned waters in Jerusalem was the brook of Cedron, whose head spring did not run very plentifully, for in summer it was generally dried up, but in rainy weather the quantity of waters falling from the mountains increased it so prodigiously, that it looked rather like a river than a brook. In the Hebrew its name is pronounced Kidron, as our translation has expressed it, as where it is said, "King David passed over the brook Kidron, toward the way of the wilderness<sup>12</sup>." What the word does signify seems not of great consequence, yet it may be remarked, that according to St. Jerome<sup>13</sup>, it is said a tenebris, and truly קֶדָר Kadar, is to be dark or black. Accordingly Josephus<sup>14</sup>, who often calls Cedron a valley, says it was very deep, and at the foot of the mount of olives, on the east<sup>15</sup>; but in one place<sup>16</sup> he names it χερμαππος, and so in the new testament we find it called<sup>17</sup>.

To conclude; we dare flatter ourselves we have faithfully represented Jerusalem as it antiently stood, from about the times of David to the Babylonish captivity: For though it may be objected that Nehemiah, from whom most of our proofs are borrowed, lived several years after the return of the Jews to the holy city, yet it must be allowed that it was not raised upon any new plan, but only rebuilt upon its antient foundations. The walls indeed had been pulled down, the gates burnt to ashes; but yet the remains, or at least some marks or out-lines of them all were still to be seen, and parts of several of them were still subsisting. So, as we read in Nehemiah<sup>18</sup>, the breaches were stopped up, the buildings re-edified, and the whole city restored, as much as possible, to its former condition.

<sup>1</sup> 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14.    <sup>2</sup> Bell. Jud. vi. 6.    <sup>3</sup> See before, note E.    <sup>4</sup> 2 Chron. xxxii. 31.
<sup>5</sup> 1 Kings i. 19.    <sup>6</sup> 2 Kings xviii. 17.    <sup>7</sup> Hist. l. 5. c. 12.    <sup>8</sup> Cap. ii. 14.    <sup>9</sup> In Eccl. i.
<sup>10</sup> 1222.    <sup>11</sup> Cap. xxii. 11.    <sup>12</sup> Nehem. iii. 16.    <sup>13</sup> 2 Sam. xv. 23.    <sup>14</sup> In Jerem. xxxi. 40.
<sup>15</sup> Bell. Jud. 1231, 1231.    <sup>16</sup> Ibid. 1216.    <sup>17</sup> Antiq. viii. 335.    <sup>18</sup> John xviii. 1.    <sup>19</sup> Chap. iv.
7. coll. vi. 1.

A N

I N D E X

T O T H E

F I R S T V O L U M E

The Numbers direct to the Page, the small Letters to the Line of the Page, and the great Letters to the Notes.

A.

A ARON, Moses's brother, married to Elizabeth the sister of Naasson, and daughter of Aminadab, son of Ezran, p. 490, a. Commanded by God to go and meet his brother, ibid. The state of his family at that time, ibid. Joins Moses at mount Horeb, 492, b. Presents himself with Moses before the Egyptian king to demand the dismissal of the Israelites, 492, d. He and his sons solemnly consecrated priests, 523, c. His priesthood confirmed by the budding of his rod, ibid. By his throwing a handful of ashes of the furnace into the air, boils break out upon men and beasts, 497, e. In Moses's absence casts a golden calf, which he sets up, with an altar, in the sight of all the camp, 520, a. His weakness in complying with the idolatrous request of the Jews, ibid. Some endeavour to extenuate his fault, ibid. b. Upbraided by Moses, 521, c. His excuse, ibid. d. His two sons, Nadab and Abihu, killed by fire from heaven, for presuming to burn incense in the tabernacle with strange fire, contrary to Moses's command, 523, d. Why excluded from setting his foot in the promised land, 532, b. Moses commanded to strip him of his priestly robes, and to array his son Eleazar with them, ibid. c. Which was no sooner done than Aaron died in the 123d year of his age, the 40th year after the Exod., ibid. The children of Israel mourn 40 days for him, ibid.

Abana and Pharpar, streams of the Chrysorrheus, or Barrady, that waters Damascus, 362, a, & (C).

Abarim, a ridge of mountains, reaching from the tribe of Reuben to the land of Moab, 288, a, & 537, c, & (B).

Abâriman, prince of the fallen angels among the Persians, 51, a.

Abb, 11th month of the Jewish year, answering July, 611, (K).

Abdastartus, king of Tyre, murdered by his nurse's sons, 415, b.

Abdemonus, a Tyrian, employed by Hiram, king of Tyre, to explain the riddles of Solomon, 414, c.

Abdolominus, see Ballonymus.

Abdon judges Israel eight years, 753, d.

Abel Mizraim, or the mourning of the Egyptians, a place in Canaan so called, because Jacob's family, in carrying his body to be interred in the cave of Machpelah, made a halt here to perform a funeral ceremony, 467, b.

Abel, when probably born, 73. The import of the word, ibid. (N). His offerings, ibid. a. Murdered, ibid. Various opinions as to the place and manner of his murder, 74, (N). Whether married, ibid. How God declared the acceptance of his offering, ibid. Abel or Hebel, etymology of, 253, (I).

Abelard Peter accused of holding the opinion that all things were God, and God all things, 8.

Abiathar, one of Abimelech's sons, escapes the universal slaughter of Saul, 767, d. Flies to David, ibid. a. High-priest, 792, e. Deposed by Solomon, and confined to his own territories, ibid.

Abibal, the first king of Tyre, mentioned in history, 413, c. Contemporary with David, ibid.

Abif, a month so called by Moses, but afterwards Misan, answering to our March or April, 604, (E). Etymology of the word Abif, ibid.

Abihu, the son of Aaron by Elizabeth, 490, a. Solemnly consecrated priest with his brother Nadab, 523, c. Killed by fire from heaven for burning incense in the tabernacle with strange fire, ibid. d.

Abijah foretells to Jeroboam the ruin of his family, 806, c.

Abijam, or Abijah, king of Judah, 806, f. Defeats Jeroboam's army, 807, b.

Abimacl, one of the sons of Jektan, where placed, 170, b.

Abimelech, king of the Philistines, a holy and just person, 344, b. His obliging behaviour towards Abraham, 345, a. Abraham binds his posterity by oath, to live in amity with that of Abimelech, ibid. e.

Abimelech II. a just and pious prince, his obliging behaviour towards Isaac and Rebekah, 346, a, b, & c. Represented by Josephus as a bad and corrupted prince, ibid. (P). Renews with Isaac the covenant made by his father with Abraham, 347, c, d.

Abimelech,

- Abimelech*, a natural son of Gideon's, 747, a. His character, ibid. Murders all the sons of Gideon except the youngest, ibid. b. Proclaimed king by the Sechemites and those of Millo, ibid. c. Razes the town of Sechem, 749, c. His cruelty to the inhabitants, ibid. Being wounded with a stone by a woman, commands his servant Zebul to dispatch him, ibid. d.
- Abinadab*, the ark placed in his house, where it continues about 70 years, 757, a.
- Abiram*, one of the house of Reuben, 529, a. Joins Koran in a conspiracy against Moses, ibid. His insolent language to Moses, ibid. d. His dreadful punishment, 530, b.
- Abner* proclaims Ish-bobeth king of Israel, 773, a. Defeated by Joab, ibid. c, d. Runs Axael through with his spear, ibid. Revolts to David, 774, b. Killed by Joab, ibid.
- Abraham*, the son of Terah, the 10th in a lineal descent from Shem the son of Noah, 421, c. Born in Ur, of the Chaldees, from whence he comes with his father into Haram, 422, a. Commanded by God to depart from Haram into a land which he should shew him, ibid. Assured that in his seed, all the nations of the earth should be blessed, ibid. Goes into the land of Canaan, ibid. God appears to him, and promises that land to his posterity, ibid. b. Forced by a famine to remove into Egypt, ibid. King of Egypt taken with Sarah's beauty, shews extraordinary favours to Abraham, 423, a. Returns to Beit-el, ibid. b. Separates from Lot, 423, c. Rescues him from Chedorla-mer, 424, b, c. Removes to Hebron, ibid. Abram's name changed to Abraham, 426, b. Etymology of both, ibid. (O), & 153, (K). Commanded to circumcise all the males of his family, 426, b, c. Assured that his wife should bear him a son, 427, a. Circumcised with his family, ibid. b. Entertains three angels, 428, a. A son promised to his wife Sarah, 429, a. Pleads for Sodom, ibid. b. Isaac born, ibid. d. Sends away Hagar and Ishmael, 430, b. Makes a covenant with Abimelech, 430, b. Commanded to sacrifice his son Isaac, ibid. c. But countermanded by an angel, 431, b. Sarah dies, ibid. c. He buys the cave of Macpheelab, 432, b. Sends his servant to get a wife for Isaac, 433, a. Being 141 years old marries Keturah, and has six sons by her, 434, c, d. Dies and is buried in the cave of Macpheelab, ibid. c, d. Traditions or fictions of the Jews, Arabians, and Indians, relating to the history of Abraham, 435, (E).
- Abjalom*, pillar of, in the valley of Jebosaphat described, 592, d, & (N).
- Abjalom* murders Ammon, 781, c. Shelters himself with the king of Geshur, ibid. f. Reconciled to his father, 782, d. Rebels against him, 783, a, b, & c. His army defeated by David's, 786, a. Hung by the hair of his head, is killed by Joab, ibid.
- Abu Moslem*, held that all things returned into one common principle, or God, 8, b.
- Abydos*, an ancient city of Thebais, 175, c.
- Accad* city of, where situate, 124, (P).
- Aceldama*, or field of blood, 586, a.
- Achæmenes*, brother to Xerxes, governor of Egypt, 273, a. Is killed in a battle, ibid. b.
- Achan*, the son of Carmi, of the tribe of Judah, conceals some of the accursed plunder of Jericho, 557, c. Is discovered and punished with death, ibid.
- Achish*, king of the Philistines, 355, b. Receives David and his wives, and treats them with great hospitality, 355, a. Marches against the Israelites, and drives them before him with great slaughter, 356, c. Kills Saul and his three sons, and hangs up their bodies upon the walls of Beth-shan, ibid. d.
- Achor*, or trouble, the valley of, where Acham was punished with death for his sacrifice, 557, c.
- Achshaph* king of, joins Jabin, king of Hamar, against the Israelites, and is defeated by Joshua, 332, c, f.
- Achthoe*, king of, a most inhuman prince, slain by a crocodile, 230, (I).
- Acoris*, king of Egypt, joins Evagoras, king of Cyprus, &c. against the Persians, 274, d. Dies, 275, a.
- Acra* S. John de, or Acra, description of its ruins, 588, a, b.
- Adisanes*, the Ethiopian, drives Ammosis from the throne of Egypt, 256, c, d. Unites Egypt and Ethiopia, 257, b, c. Sends all the Egyptian thieves and robbers to Rhinclura, ibid.
- Adad*, or Ader, a chief deity of the Syrians, 272, a. How represented, ibid. (E).
- Adab*, first wife of Esaü. See Judith.
- Adam*, in what place created, 48, c, d. Whether men before him: See Pre-adamites. Placed in Paradise, and forbidden the tree of knowledge, 59. His happy state in the garden of Eden, 53, a. Names the birds and beasts, 59, a. Takes Eve to wife, ibid. b. His fall, as related by Moses, ibid. c, d, e. Some objections to the letter of that relation, 60, a, b, c, d. The literal sense defended, ibid. e, f. By whom tempted, 61. His trial, by forbidding a fruit, very rational, 64, and the punishment just, ibid. The circumstances of the coats and aprons explained, ibid. b. The effects of his fall on men and the ground, 65, a. Changes in the constitution of man, 66, a, & seq. Changes in the constitution of the earth; how effected, according to Dr. Burnet, 66, d, e, & seq. and Mr. Whiston, 67, a. Where he dwelt, after his expulsion from Paradise, 72, c. The eastern tradition, ibid. (N). Dies, 79. Uncharitable opinions with respect to his repentance, (N). Conjectures concerning the place of his burial, 79, b. Adam an appellative rather than a proper name, and includes both sexes, 44, (N). According to some Rabbins, made first with a tail, 44, (N). Other ridiculous notions of the Talmudists, 44, c. and Mohammedans, 45, d. Etymology of the name Adam, 153, (L).
- Adam*, the city of, above the place where the waters of the Jordan divided themselves, 553, c, (Y).
- Adar*, the 6th month of the Jewish year, answering our February, 611, (K).
- Adiabene*, a province of antient Affyria, 858, b. This name given sometimes to the whole country, ibid. (D).
- Adodus*, or Adad, called, in the Phœnician records, the king of the gods, 137, b. Perhaps the Adad mentioned by Josephus, ibid. (N), (W).
- Adonia*, the meaning of this word, 484, (I).
- Adonijah* conspires against David, 790. Pardoned by Solomon, 792, d. But afterwards put to death by him, ibid.
- Adonis*, river of Phœnice, at certain seasons and upon certain occasions appears bloody, 394, c, d. Whence the superstitions, in memory of Shammuz or Adonis, yearly wounded, ibid. The cause of that appearance in the river, ibid. Adonis of the Phœnicians, Shammuz and Ofiris were but one, 400, a, & (S). One of the Phœnician deities, ibid. His father one Cinyras, an Affyrian, founder of Paphos in Cyprus, 402. The origin of the rites performed in honour of him by the Phœnicians, ibid. & seq.
- Adonizeb-bek*, king of Bezek, infamous for his cruelty and insolence, 333, d. His city taken by the Israelites, himself made prisoner and carried to Jerusalem, where he died, ibid. e.
- Adonizedek* king of Jerusalem, besieges Gibron, 332, a. He and his army cut off by Joshua in a most miraculous manner, 332, b, c, d.
- Adramelech*, an Affyrian deity, how represented, 861, b.
- Adultery*, laws against it, 676, a. The law against adultery in some Greek copies, placed before that of

- of murder, ibid. (G). Some have taken great pains to prove the former the most grievous crime of the two, ibid.
- Eolus*, who inhabited Eolia to the north of Ionia, made by Josephus to descend from Elisba, Javan's eldest son, 168, (D).
- Eon* and Protoponus, Eve and Adam in the history of Sanchoiatho, 86, c, & (N). Their issue, ibid.
- Aeria Egypt*, why so called by the Greeks, 174, d.
- Æsculapius*, a name given to Tesfortrus, or Sesfortrus, king of Memphis, more ancient than the greek Æsculapius, 218, d.
- Africa* and Asia their boundaries, 175, a.
- Agag* the first, or among the first kings of the Amalekites, 319, c. Their last king bore the same name, ibid. Taken and spared by Saul, but put to death by Samuel, 320, e. All their other kings supposed to have bore the same appellation, 319, e.
- Agenor*, first king of Phœnice, mentioned by the Greeks, 408, a. Account of his family, ibid. & seq.
- Agræus*, who in the Phœnician cosmogony, 87, c. Agræus Italicus inventors of hunting and fishing, according to Sanchoiatho, ibid.
- Agriculture* improved by the off spring of Cain, 81, a, b. Tools of agriculture said by some to be the invention of Noah, 85, (N).
- Agræus*, or Agrætes, 88, b.
- Agræus*, who, 88, b.
- Ahab*, king of Israel, defeats, with a small body of Israelites, the vast host of the Syrians before Samaria, 383, c, d. And in the plain of Aphek again with great slaughter, 384, b. His generous behaviour to Ben-badad, imploring his mercy, ibid. c, d.
- Abab*, king of Israel, marries Jezabel, and introduces the worship of the Sidonian deities, 809, a. His victory over Ben-badad, king of Syria, and generosity to him 811, a. Reproved for letting go free the king of Syria, ibid. Murders Naboth, 812, a. His expedition against Ramoth, ibid. d. His ill success and death, 813, a. His 70 sons killed, 819.
- Abîrimân*, or Ahriman, the evil dæmon in the philosophy of the Persian magi, 31, d.
- Abaz*, king of Judah, invaded by the Philistines, who reduce several cities, and add them to their dominions, 359, a. His idolatrous and unsuccessful reign, 381, a. Invaded by Edom and the Israelites, 832, b. His idolatries and death, ibid. d.
- Abaziab*, succeeds his father Abab, 813, e. Consults Belzebub, ibid. Dies, ibid. d.
- Abimon*, one of the three sons of Anak, expelled by Caleb from Hebron, 334, a, & (B).
- Abimelech* put to death by Saul's orders, 767, a.
- Abitophel* revolts from David to Achish's, 783, d. His pernicious advice to Achish, 784, d. Hangs himself, 785, b.
- Abitub*, son of Phineas, supposed to have succeeded his grandfather in the high-priest's office, 756, b.
- Abi al tchak*, or people of certainty, a sect sprung up lately among the Mohammedans, 8, b. Their opinion touching the origin of things, ibid.
- Abol-bamah*, second wife of Isaac; Vid. Bashamah.
- Abolbama* and Bezaleel set over the workmen employed in the making of the tabernacle, 523, b.
- Abyrte*, daughter of Scioftris, 254, c.
- As* king of, repulses the Israelites, 331, a. His town taken, and all in it cut off by a stratagem of Joshua, ibid. b, c. Himself hanged, ibid. Israelites attack As, but are first repulsed, and afterward, master it, 358, a.
- Ajalon*, the valley where Joshua commanded the moon to stand still, 558, c, (G).
- Al Bubriya* thought the eastern part of the Delta in Egypt, 176, c. Placed more truly beyond the western branch of the Nile, ibid.
- Alcanna*, shrub growing in Egypt, an account of it, 183.
- Alcetro*, a sacred person so called among the Syrians, 375, d.
- Alexander* the great besieges Tyre, 418, d, e, & seq. His cruelty towards the Tyrians, 420, c.
- Alexander* the epicurean, his opinion of the origin of things, 7, e. Holds that all things are essentially God, and that forms are imaginary accidents, ibid.
- Alexandria*, with its dependencies, part of the lower Egypt, 176, b. Metropolis of the whole kingdom under the Greeks and Romans, ibid. c.
- Alexandria* upon the Sinus Ifficus, a town in Seleucia, 361, a.
- Algebra* among the Egyptians, 218, a.
- Allon Bacbut*, or the oak of mourning, why so called, 448, b.
- Almah*, the unmarried damsels, why so called among the Jews, 679, (P).
- Almodad*, one of the sons of Joktan, uncertain where settled, 170, a.
- Alonymus*; Vid. Ballonymus.
- Alus* the same with Adam, 91, a.
- Alphabet Samaritan and Hebrew*, 719, c.
- Aphonso*, king of Naples, two prophane sayings of his, 558, a.
- Amalek*, the son of Esau's first born, Eliphaz by his concubine Timna, and father of the Amalekites, 317, e. Is reckoned among the dukes in the land of Edom, ibid. His genealogy according to the Arabians, 317, (A). Vid. Amalekites.
- Amalekites*, descended from Esau's first born, 317, e. How this family came to separate from the others of Esau's line, 318. The spot they first pitched upon was not probably at any great distance from Edom, ibid. Originally used circumcision, 319, b. Their arts, sciences, &c. ibid. Their government monarchical, ibid. Their king spoken of by Balaam as far above all others, and they styled the first of nations, ibid. e. Said by the Arabian historians to have conquered Egypt, and possessed that kingdom for several generations, ibid. d. The only nation mentioned to have fallen upon the Israelites, after their crossing the Red Sea 320, a. But after a bloody battle, put to flight by Joshua with the heavy doom, that for this outrage their name should be put out from under heaven, ibid. b. Miss no opportunity of vexing the Israelites, but fall by their own swords, 320, c. Invaded by Saul at the head of 200,200 men, and all cut off, except some few who fled their country; their kingdom laid waste, and their king taken prisoner and hewn to pieces by Samuel, ibid. c, d, e. The few that escaped possess themselves again of their desolate country, but are again butchered and dispersed by David, 321, a. They renew the war against David, seize and burn Ziklag, but save the lives of the inhabitants, ibid. b. Take David's two wives, ibid. But in their return are all cut off, except 400 who saved themselves by flight, ibid. Utterly destroyed and dispersed by Simeonites, ibid. e. Moses ordered to vow a lasting war against them, till their very remembrance was quite blotted out, 512, b. What induced them to fall upon the Israelites on their march to Canaan, ibid. Excluded for ever from the congregation of the Lord, 665, d. Seem to be the same people who are by the Greeks styled shepherds, 280. Opinions of the Arabian historian, concerning their descent and country, 317, (A). What the Arabians say of them, bears an affinity to what the Egyptian records report of the Phœnician history, 319, (I). Supposed to have fled into Asirie, ibid.
- Amalek*, his body taken up and burnt, for having taught, that all things were God, and God was all things, 8.

- Amasiah* succeeds his father Joash, 824, c. His success against the Edomites, 825, c. His idolatry, ibid. d. Is defeated by the king of Israel, ibid. f. Taken prisoner, 826, b. Murdered, ibid. c.
- Amasa* treacherously murdered by Joab, 787, c.
- Amasis*, king of Egypt, 266, & seq. Betrays Spiries, and drives him from the throne, 267, a. How he induced the Egyptians despising him on account of his mean extraction, to pay him the respect due to his station, ibid. c, d, & seq. Builds a very magnificent portico to the temple of Minerva at Sais, 268, e. His other publick works, ibid. & seq. The happy state of Egypt under him, and his laws, 269, a. Favours the Greeks, and is visited by Solon, ibid. b. Marries a Greek, ibid. d. A miracle on this occasion, ibid. e. His consecrated donations to Greece, ibid. f. The first that subdued Cyprus, 270, a. His latter days unhappy, and why, ibid. b. Betrayed by Phanes of Halicarnassus, 271, a. Makes Polycrates, the tyrant of Samos, his enemy, ibid. b. Dies, ibid. His dead body taken out of his tomb and burnt, 272, c.
- Amasis*, or Ammesisi, another king of Egypt, 256, c, d. His subjects join with the Ethiopians to drive him from the throne, on account of his violence and injustice, ibid. d, e.
- Amenophis*, the supposed father of Sesostris, 251, a. the son of Ramesis, thought by some to be the same whom the Greeks call Belus, and to have reigned in Egypt when the Israelites went out of it, 492, (B). His death, 252, c.
- America*, how peopled, and how animals got into it, unaccountable, 104, b.
- Americans* speak of a flood, 95, e.
- Amida*, god of the Japanese, 34, d.
- Amizadab*, the son of Ezron and father of Naasson, and Elizabeth, wife to Aaron, 490, a.
- Amittai*, the same as Jonab or Jonas, 827, (A).
- Amnibud*, king of Geshur, 391, c.
- Armon*, his incest with Tamar, 780. Murdered by Abisalom, 781, d.
- Ammon*, king of Judah's idolatry, 841, b. And death, ibid. c.
- Ammonites*, the posterity of Ammon, or Ben Ammi, the offspring of Lea and his younger daughter, 294, c. Possess themselves of the country called after their name Ammonitis, after driving out the Zamzumini, ibid. Description of Ammonitis, ibid. d. They had kings, and were circumcised, and principally addicted to husbandry, 295, a. Their religion, ibid. b. Dispossessed of great part of their country by Sihon the Amorite, 296, b. Recover their country, and possess themselves of Gilead, which they hold 28 years, but are at last driven out by Jephthah, ibid. c, d. Renew the war with the Israelites, but are routed and entirely dispersed by Saul, 297, a, b. Occasion of the war between them and David, ibid. & seq. Account of this war, 298, c, d. Their country plundered, cities demolished, and most of the inhabitants put to death, in a cruel manner, by the officers of David, ibid. & (L.) Joins the Moabites against Jehoshaphat king of Judah, 299, a. Overthrown by and made tributaries to Uzziah king of Judah, ibid. b. Rebel in the reign of Jotham, but are overthrown and forced to pay a heavy tribute, ibid. Are attacked by Nebuzaradan the Babylonian general, their country put to fire and sword, their king Baalis, and most of the nobles, carried into captivity, according to the prophecy of Amos, ibid. c, d. Give all the disturbance they are able to the rebuilding of the temple of Jerusalem, ibid. e. Fight against Judas Maccabeus, but are routed, their cities taken, and their wives and children carried into captivity, ibid. & seq. At the beginning of the second century of the Christian era were still a numerous nation, 300, a. Now blended with the Arabians, ibid. They were not to be admitted into the congregation of the Lord, till after the tenth generation, 665, e. because they joined to hire Balaam to curse the Israelites, 287, b. 293, c.
- Ammonius*, scholar of Proclus, 5. Teaches publicly in Alexandria the world's co-eternity with God, ibid.
- Amorites*, or Emorites, inhabitants of Canaan, 323, c. Description of their country, ibid. Confine the children of Dan to their mountains, 334, e. Reduced by the house of Jesseph and Dan, ibid. Some left to prove Israel, 335, a. With whom they live in common, ibid. Reduced to a state of slavery by Solomon, 337, b.
- Amos*, Amos, or Tethmosis, his cruel reign, 256, c. Said to have abolished the custom of sacrificing men to Juno at Heliopolis, 256, e.
- Amram*, the son of Kobab and grandson of Levi, father of Moses, 477, b.
- Amynus*, 886. Amynus and Magus in the Phœnician records, 134, a.
- Amynus* holds the fens of Egypt, after his country was reduced by the Persians, 273, d. Sallies out, drives the Persians from Egypt, and becomes king of the whole country, ibid. f, & seq. Is afterwards overthrown by the Persians, 234, a. His death, ibid.
- Anak*, one of the seven dukes over the possession of the descendants of Seir, 312, c. Finds mules in the wilderness, 313, c. What meant thereby, ibid. (O). From him the Anakims derived their name, 333, (L). His three sons driven from Hebron by Caleb, 334, a.
- Anakims*, inhabitants of the mountains of Canaan, invaded by the Israelites, and cut off, 333, c. Derived from one Arba, who seized on the city of Hebron, from whom it was called Kirjath Arba, the city of Arba, ibid. (Z).
- Anamelech*, an Affyriandeity, how represented, 861, c.
- Ananim*, who so called, 165, c. Where settled, ibid.
- Anathema's* or things vowed to destruction, various instances of among the Jews, 630, e.
- Anatomy* very early cultivated in Egypt, 219, e, f.
- Anaxagoras*, philosopher of the Ionie sect, 18, d. The first who rejected all chance in the disposition of the universe, ibid. c. Reforms the Ionie philosophy, by admitting an intelligent being distinct from matter, 19, c. Held two distinct and independent principles co-existent from eternity, 25, c. His notions of the origin of the universe, 28, d, & c.
- Anaximander*, his account of the origin of things, 18, d. Denies an intelligent being, ibid. Said by some to have been the first who published a book of natural philosophy, 18, (N).
- Anaximenes*, disciple of Anaximander, 19. His cosmogony, ibid.
- Andes*, mountains of Peru, their height, 102, (N). Thought by some to be the Sepphar mentioned by Moses, 169, e.
- Ancho*, an Egyptian priest, 13, b.
- Angels*, the import of the word, 48, e. Their nature, 49. Their existence universally acknowledged even by the ancient heathens, ibid. a. Epicurus the only among the ancient philosophers who denied them, ibid. Reasonable to suppose their existence, ibid. a, b. When created, ibid. Their nature, power, employment, &c. ibid. Greatly respected by the ancient Romans, Persians, Jews, Mohammedans, &c. 50, a, b. Several orders and degrees among them, ibid. The fallen angels, ibid. d. The time of their fall; their offence, &c. ibid. e, & p. 51. Angels tutelary or guardian, believed by the Jews and Gentiles, 49, d, e. Opinion of those who think that the fallen angels defiled themselves with women, 81, a. By what originally occasioned, ibid. (N). Traditions concerning

- concerning them not unknown to the Mohammedans, Persians, &c. 83. Their stories concerning them, ibid.
- Animals*, half men half fish, mentioned by Berosus, 90. a. Worshipped by the Egyptians, 210. a. What gave rise to this worship, ibid. a. b. Some pretended that the worship paid those animals did not terminate in them but in the gods, ibid. c. d. Vid. Egyptians.
- Anna*, daughter of Mettinus king of Tyre, 415. e.
- Anneditus*, a conjectural explanation of the word, 90. (N).
- Antaeus's* government in Egypt, 240. & seq.
- Antediluvian* patriarchs, a chronological table of their years, 69. a. Their genealogical table, 76.
- Antediluvian* kings of Chaldaea, 90. Length of their reigns, and remarkable events under them, 91. & 109. Antediluvian world, the state of, 107. d. e. &c. More populous and fertile than the present, ibid. d. e.
- Antediluvians*, their religion, arts, sciences, polity, &c. 107. d. e. &c. Their longevity, and the cause of it, 209. & 105. a. b.
- Antelopes*, common in Egypt, 181. e.
- Antilabanus* mount, whence so called in the Phœnician history, 87. a.
- Antioch*, upon the Orontes, a famous city of the Mediterranean Seleucis, 361. a.
- Antiochene*, the two Seleucides, so called by Mela and Pliny, 361. a.
- Antiochia ad Taurum*, a chief city of Commagene, 360. d.
- Anubis*, one of the Egyptian deities, how represented, 205. f. Son of Osiris by his sister Neptis, 239. e.
- Amyris*, king of Egypt, 261. d. Is driven from the throne by Sabacus king of Ethiopia, ibid. Re-assumes the government, 262. c.
- Apamea*, chief city of Apamene in Syria, 361. a.
- Apamene*, part of Syria, 361. a.
- Aphek*, a city of the Syrians, 384. b. Ben-hadad in the plain of Aphek worried by the Israelites, ibid. c. Walls of Aphek falling on the Syrians, crushed to death 27,000 of them, ibid.
- Apobis* king of Egypt, or Dynast of the race of the Phœnician shepherds, supposed by some to be the Pharaoh who advanced Joseph, 231. (L).
- Apis*, by the Greeks Epaphus, a bull so called, representing Osiris, and worshipped at Memphis, 206. c. Was to be the calf of a cow incapable of bearing another, and impregnated, as the Egyptians believed, by thunder, ibid. By what marks he was to be distinguished from all others, ibid. Bulls sacrificed to Apis, ibid. d. The choice of this victim, and ceremonies of the sacrifice, ibid. d. e. What reason they gave for worshipping Osiris in the shape of a bull, ibid. f. When the Apis died, another with the same marks was sought for and put in his room, ibid. How his oracle was consulted, 211. e. Slain by Cambyfes, 272. e.
- Apollo*, son of Cronus, supposed to have been the same with Phut of Mes, 137. (R). Whence set over the nine mules, 242. b. Apollo of the Phœnicians, or Pythius, why in great repute among them, 399. a.
- Apolloniatis*, a province of Assyria, 848. b.
- Apries* king of Egypt, the Pharaoh Hophra of Scripture, 266. a. Enters into a league with Zedekiah king of Judah against the Babylonians, ibid. But leaves the Jews to the rage of their enemies, and thereby deserves the curse denounced upon the Egyptians by Ezekiel, ibid. b. Takes the city of Sidon by storm, ibid. Vanquishes the Phœnicians and Cypriots in a sea fight, ibid. The curse of Ezekiel how fulfilled, ibid. d. Sends a powerful army to the assistance of Audieran, king of the Lybians, against the Cyrenæans, ibid. e. The Egyptians defeated, rebel against Apries, ibid. Engages Amasis, head of the rebels, 267. a. Is routed and taken prisoner, ibid. e. Is strangled, ibid. f.
- Apronadius*, king of Babylon, reigns six years, 946. c. Ar, called also Rubbub, or the Great, and by the Greeks Areopolis, the chief city of Mouab, 256. d. Arabia, from whom so called, 131. a.
- Arad*, king in the south east of Canaan, attacks the Israelites, takes several of them prisoners, but is at last vanquished by them, 330. b. Series of the kings of Arad, 403. a. Their reigns, 421. a. One of Canaan's sons so called, 330. (W). Arad, or Aradus, not properly a city of Phœnicia, 393. b. Believed by some to have been the seat of the Canaanitish tribe called Arvadites, ibid. (P). Its situation, ibid. b. Some remains of it extant, 394. a. Called by the Turks, Rivad, ibid.
- Aram*, son of Shem, one of the chiefs at the dispersion, 162. e. Where settled, 163. d. According to the Armenians, the seventh in descent from Haith son of Togarmah, enlarged the bounds of his kingdom, which from him was called Armenia, 167. c. The country of Aram named so from him, 360. a.
- Aram Nabaram*, or Syria, of the two rivers included what we now call Syria and Meopotamia, 360. a.
- Aramean* language, a dialect of the Syriac, 377. d. Aramites. See Syrians.
- Ararat* mountains of, where the ark rested, 108. d. The situation of these mountains, ibid. Traditions about them, 109. a. b. An account of them from Tournefort, 112. d. & (N). From a Dutch traveller, 109. (N). Several traditions relating to them, 110. a. Called by the Armenians Mafis, ibid. d. First migration of the sons of Noah from about these mountains, 141. b. c. &c.
- Arba*, the progenitor of the Anukins, inhabitants of the mountains of Canaan, 333. (Z).
- Arbab*; vid. Hebron.
- Arbal* king of Arad, 421. a.
- Arbelites*, a province of Assyria, 858. b.
- Archelaus*, the successor of Anaxagoras, his notions of the origin of the universe, 29. a.
- Archytes* the Tarentine, a Pythagorean, held two subordinate principles, 27. d.
- Aristophanes*, his ancient cosmogony, 18. a.
- Aristotle*, the first and last of the Greeks who asserted the world's eternity. 3. d. His doctrine, ibid. The great reason which induced him to assert the world's eternity, 4. a. His description of the supreme being, ibid. His sentiments embraced by many learned Mohammedans, ibid.
- Ark*, its size and figure, 103. b. c. The number of the animals in it, ibid. c. Objections against the preservation of animals in it, 104. a. b. Its materials, ibid. Where built, ibid. c. d. In what time built, 105. How many persons saved in it, ibid. (N). Noah enters into the ark ibid. b. Remains of it, ibid. Monastery of the ark, ibid. d. Fables of the Armenians concerning it, 112.
- Ark* of the old testament, a small chest made of shittim-wood, and covered over with beaten gold 655. b. Its length and breadth, ibid. Why called the ark of the covenant, and the ark of the testament, ibid. Some of opinion that there were two arks, one made by Moses, and the other by Bezaleel, ibid. Confuted, ibid. d. e. Taken by the Philistines, 756. a. What betided it, and how sent back, 351. &c. Brought by David to Jerusalem, 776. David's zeal and piety on that occasion, ibid. b. c.
- Artianus*, king of Babylon, reigns five years, 946. a. after him was an inter-reign of six years; the first inter-reign in the Babylonian kingdom, ibid.
- Armais*, brother to Sesofstris, 255. b. Said to have been the Danaus of the Greeks, 256. f. Rebels against his brother, ibid. e.
- Armenia* the name of, derived from Aram, 167. c. Armenians

- Amorians* give themselves out to be the descendants of Togarmah, by his son Haikh, 167, c. Their fables concerning the ark, 112, a, b.
- Arnon*, a brook, or torrent, running between the countries of the Ammonites and Moabites, and discharging itself into the black sea, 533, b. Supposed to have been the first northern boundary of the children of Israel, 569, (G).
- Archeris*, mentioned by Plutarch, who, 88, (N).
- Arphaxat*, the third son of Shem, 127, a. Thought to be the founder of the Chaldeans, ibid. When born, ibid. Several conjectures of writers relating to him, 127, (E). Who was his son, 126, a. One of the chiefs of the line of Shem, 162. Where settled, 163, b.
- Arraphabitis*, a province of Affria, 858, b.
- Artacene*, a province of Affria, 858, b.
- Ataus*, king of the Medes, 939, a.
- Arts and Sciences*, their original after the deluge, 173, b, c.
- Aueris*, one of the Egyptian gods, by some called Apollo, by others, the elder Orus, 239, b, c. Son of Sol, ibid.
- Aura*, a measure of land among the Egyptians, 201, a.
- Ariac*, a fabulous king of Egypt, 278.
- Ara*, king of Judah, his piety, 807, c. His victory over the Cushites, ibid. e. Makes an alliance with Ben-hadad king of Affria, 808, b. His disease and death, ibid. c.
- Ajalou*, antient city of Palestine, 340, b. Birth-place of Semiramis, ibid. d. The place which originally produced that kind of onion called Schiso, ibid. Famous for its wines, cypresses, &c.
- Akania*, a city in Lesser Phrygia, or Troas, 166, f.
- Afanius*, a river so called, with a bay of the same name, 166, c. A king of that name, mentioned by Homer to have been at the siege of Troy, ibid.
- Alepiades*, his natural principles indivisible bodies, 20, a.
- Aclepius*, son of Syde, 136, c. Passed for a god in Egypt, ibid. (P).
- Afinath*, wife of Joseph, bears him two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, 453, b.
- Aphod*, of Azois, a city of Palestine, famed among the antients, 341. Said by mistake to have been built by one who fled from the Red Sea, whose name was Aza, or Capra, ibid. Its situation, ibid. Here stood the temple of Dagon, ibid. b.
- Aster*, Jacob's second son by Zilpha, 441, d. Jacob's prophecy to him, 464. How verified, ibid. (N). His lot in the promised land, 569, b.
- Asthenax*, one of Gomer's sons, where seated, 166, e.
- Astareth*, called also Astareth Karnaim, the residence of Og, king of Basan, 330, d. Astareth, or Astare, worshipped by the Philistines, 343, d.
- Asbur*, son of Shem, one of the chiefs of that line, 162, e. Where settled, 163, a. Cities founded by him, 126, b, c.
- Asyaf*, or Shishak, king of Egypt, and contemporary with Solomon, and after his death, according to the oriental historians, took Jerusalem, 281, e.
- Asia* minor flood of, 96, (N). Asia and Africa, their boundaries, 175, a.
- Aspi*, why worshipped by the Egyptians, 210, e.
- Asphaltite* lake, so called from the quantity of bitumen in and about it, 576, b. Called also the dead sea, because it breeds no fish, nor any thing that has life, ibid. And likewise the salt sea, because in the highest degree impregnated with salt, ibid. & (K). Believed, without foundation, to have risen from the submersion of the vale of Siddim, ibid. & (L). Said to change colour three times a day, 577, (M). Apples growing on the borders of it, called infernal apples, a mere fable, ibid. No remains of the five intamous cities to be seen now, ibid. (N). Its length, breadth, and waters, 577, a.
- Assur-addin*, the Esfar-baddon of scripture; Vid. Esfar-baddon.
- Affria*, derived from Asbur, 857, a. Proper Affria, its antient extent, ibid. b. What the Greeks and Latins mean by Affria, uncertain, ibid. (B). A land of plenty, ibid. Now a desert and wilderness, 858, a. Its division, ibid. In profane accounts the first, in scripture the second most antient kingdom, 859, b. Founded by Asbur, and not by Nimrod, ibid. Its antiquity, ibid. & 860. Government, ibid. &c.
- Affrian* kingdom, epoch of its foundation, 126, c.
- Affrian* chronology to the fall of the empire, 862.
- Affrians*, their religion, 862, a. Paid particular devotion to fishes, ibid. Why, ibid. & 875. And to doves, 875, b, & (P), & 883, a, & (I). Their antiquity, 859, b. Government, 860, c, d, & seq. Laws, religion, customs, arts, language, &c. 861, a, & seq. The Affrian chronology, 862, d, & seq. A table of the successions of the Affrian kings, according to Eusebius and Synellus, 861.
- Astarimus*, or Atharimus, king of Tyre, murdered by his brother Philet, who seized on the crown, 415, b.
- Astarte*, daughter of Uranus, 136, a. Called by the Greeks, Aphrodite, or Venus, 138, a. One of the Phœnician deities, 397, b. Sometimes termed a god, and sometimes a goddess, 398, a. According to the Phœnician mythology only a goddess, ibid. Particularly called the goddess of the Sidonians, ibid. Why called by the Hebrews Astareth, ibid. (G). Opinions of the learned concerning her, ibid. (G). Represented as Isis with cow's horns on her head, and for the same reason, 398, a. Adored under the stile of queen of heaven, and also called the Phœnician Aphrodite, or Venus, 399, a. Several Astarte's, and variously represented, ibid. Said to have consecrated Tyre, by depositing there a fallen star, ibid. Had her prophets and priests in great numbers, 401, d. Worshipped in groves, ibid. Ceremonies performed in her honour, ibid. & seq. Worshipped, in a particular manner at Eyblus, as the Venus of Adonis, ibid. c. And the rites used there in her honour, ibid. Her temple at Aphac a sink of lewdness, 402, a. Called the goddess of the Sidonians, but her principal temple was at Tyre, built by Hiram, ibid.
- Astartus* recovers the throne of Tyre to his family, 415, b.
- Astronomy* foundations of, laid by the offspring of Setb, 81, a. Said to be an invention of the Egyptians, 218, a, b.
- Asychis*, king of Egypt, 261, c. Builds the eastern portico to the temple of Fulcan, ibid. d. Builds a pyramid with brick, with a very vaunting inscription, ibid. The same, in all probability, with Boccoris, ibid. Contemporary with dejus and Nebus, the father of Pjanmaticus, ibid.
- Atbel* of the vineyard, city of Ammonitis, 293, c.
- Atbaliab's* impious reign, 822, b. Pursues David's race, ibid.
- Athena*, daughter of Cronus, 138, a. Reigns over Attica, ibid.
- Athos* mount, its height, 102, (N).
- Atotbes*, king of Egypt, said to have been a physician, 218, e. Supposed to be the same with Shoth, or Hermes, 238, (B). Built the palace at Memphis, ibid.
- Atlas*, son of Uranus, 134, b. His cruel death, by the hands of his brother Cronus, 135, b. Atlantian theology, and the Atlanti in Afric derived from him, 135, (N).
- Atomic* system, by whom invented, 19, c. The principles of this system, according to Leucippus and Democritus, 20, d. The same according to Epicurus, ibid. e. Difference between the two hypotheses, 21, a. This system raised to a high degree of reputation by Epicurus, ibid. Received by by some moderns, both Christians and Mohammedans, 22, a.

Atticus, his opinion of the origin of the universe, 30.
Aturia, a province of Affria, 858, b.
Averroes, or Ebn Roshd, suspected of favouring the world's eternity, 4, b.
Augustammica, part of the Lower Egypt, 176, b.
Avicenna, or Ebn Sina, suspected of favouring the world's eternity, 4, b.
Aurite, the first race that governed Egypt, according to the accounts of the Egyptians, 92, d, & (N).
Auzates in Africa, built by Ishobal king of Tyre, 415, d.
Anabel, brother of Joab, killed by Abner, 773, d.
Azariah succeeds his father Amasiah, 827, a. His piety and success, 829, a. Attempting to infringe upon the priestly office, is smitten with leprosy, deprived of the regal power, &c. ibid. d. Dies, ibid. e.
Azelmic, king of Tyre, 418, d. In his reign happened the memorable siege of Tyre by Alexander, ibid. By Alexander spared and restored to the throne, 420, c.
Azer of the Asiatics, the same as Terah, 132.
Azotus, taken by Asar-haddon king of Babylon, and retaken by Psammetichus, after a siege of twenty-nine years, 266, e.

B.

BAAL, one of the Phœnician deities, 397, b. Had his prophets and priests in great numbers, 401, b. Baal Shalafus worshipped at Sidon, 397, d. Several deities of this name among the Phœnicians, 397, (B), (D). Sometimes termed a god, and sometimes a goddess, 398, a.
Baal appointed king of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar, 417, c.
Baal-berith, etymology of the name, 747, (I).
Baal-peor, or Peor, or Phigor, idol of the Moabites, 287, b. Etymology of the word, ibid. (E). Supposed by some to be Bacchus, by others Menes, Mizraim, and Osiris, ibid. d, & (F).
Baal-zephon, wholly unknown to the ancient geographers, 503, (O). Several conjectures concerning it, ibid.
Baalis, the last king of Ammon, 299, c. Receives all the Jews, that fly from the Babylonians, into his dominions, ibid. d. Advises Ishmael to assassinate Gedaliah, ibid. e. Is taken by Nebuzaradan, general of the Babylonians, and carried into captivity, ibid.
Baalzebub, or Belzebub, one of the Philistine idols, worshipped at Eckron, 343, b. Under what form represented, ibid. Why called Baalzebub, or lord of flies, ibid.
Baana and Rechab murder Ish-bahseth, 774, d. Put to death by David, ibid. e.
Baasha succeeds Jeroboam, 808, c. His death, ibid.
Baan, wife of Colpias, according to the Phœnician tradition, and mother to the first pair, 46, d. The import of the word, ibid. (N).
Babel, by whom built, 123, b, (P). Etymology of the word, 143, c, & 153, (I). Its building begun, 142, d, 129, b. What induced them to undertake that work, 143, a, b. Their design frustrated, ibid. b, c. The time of the enterprise, ibid. c, d. Whether sinful, ibid. d. All mankind concerned in the work, 134, a, b, & (N). Description of it, 144, b, c, & seq. Some account of its ruins, 146, (N). Traditions relating to them, 123, b, & (P). Called also the tower of Nimrod, 147, (N).
Babia, one of the Syrian deities, from whom children were called Babyas, 371, (D).
Babylon, according to some, built out of the ruins of Babel, 143, (H). Said by some to have been built by Semiramis, 878, b. Her contrivance to have it built in a short time, ibid., 146, a, & (M).

Babylon, a name borrowed from the tower and city of Babel, 905, c. Other names of this kingdom, ibid. The name of Babylon properly used for the parts between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, 905, a. Its divisions, extent, situation, and boundaries, ibid. & seq. Its climate and fertility, ibid. d. Productions, rivers, canals, &c. 907, d, e. Natural and artificial rarities, 910, b, c. Antiquity of this kingdom, ibid. Its government, 911, a, b. The civil and military offices of its princes, 912, b, c. Their household, ibid. Their laws, 913, a, b. Punishments, ibid. b. This kingdom when founded, 937, d. The city described, 957, b. Its walls, ibid. c. Temple of Belus, 960, a. Two palaces, 961, b. The hanging gardens, ibid. The banks, artificial canals, and lakes, ibid. d, e. An account of its ruins, 146, a, & (M).
Babylon the fall of, according to Herodotus, 970, b, c. According to Berosus and Megasthenes, ibid. e, f, & seq. According to Xenophon, 971, a, b. According to Daniel, ibid. c, d, & seq.
Babylonian antediluvian history, 90, a, b.
Babylonians attributed the orderly dispositions of the world to Bel or Belus, 15, a. Their religion, deities, &c. 916, b, c, & 925, e, f. First authors of human sacrifices, 926, b. Their customs, 927, a. Sale of virgins practised among them, ibid. Prostitute their women to Venus, 927, c. Their manner of treating the sick, and burials, 928, c. Their character, ibid. Their dress, 929, a. Their arts, 932, d. Their music, poetry, physic, language, architecture, manufacture, and fine linen, their particular tribes and commerce, &c. 932, f. 933, a, b, c, d, e, & 934, a, b, c. Their chronology, 934, a. Their mighty riches, ibid. (X). Table of the succession of the Babylonian kings, according to Ptolemy's astronomical canon, and the ecclesiastical account, 935, a. Of the kings of Babylon that immediately succeeded Nimrod, 937, a. Babylonians and Affyrians two branches of one empire, 940, d. The kingdom of Babylon in subjection to that of Affyria, 941, e, f.
Bacchus, worshipped by the Egyptians, 207, c. Obscene ceremonies used on his festival, ibid.
Babtra the city of, besieged and taken by Ninus, 876, c, & seq. The taking of it ascribed to a stratagem of Semiramis, 877, a.
Badazar, or Bazar, king of Tyre, 415, e.
Bæthia, or Bæthi, anointed stones worshipped by the Phœnicians, 136, (N). Why so called, ibid.
Balaam, divers opinions relating to him, 288, (G). Is sent for to curse the Israelites, ibid. d. An angel withstands him on his journey to Balak, king of Moab, 289, & seq. Whether his ass truly spoke, ibid. (I, K.) Is met on the borders by Balak, 290, a. Blesses the Israelites, and curses those who should utter any imprecation against them, ibid. c, d. His prophecies as to Moab, ibid. & (M, N). His wicked counsel to Balak, ibid. d. Slain with five kings of Midian by the Israelites, 291, a. Some obscure places of his prophecies explained, 534, (Y).
Balak, king of Moab, 288, c. Sends for Balaam to curse the Israelites, ibid. d.
Balator, king of Tyre, 417, b.
Balbek, the wonder of Syria, 363, d. Account of its rotunda, and great temple, 364, a, b. And the palace, 366, b. Thought by some travellers to have been the work of Solomon, ibid. (11).
Balaazer, or Balleastartus, or Bazar, son of Hiram king of Tyre, 415, a.
Balkis, who visited Solomon, reigned at Sanaa, or Seba, 170, d.
Bastonymus, called also Alonymus, Abdolominus, Abdolominus, how created king of Sidon, 412, d, e. & seq.
Bambyce, Hierapolis, or Magog, city of Cyrrhestica in Syria, 361, b.

- Bamoth*, or Bamoth-arnon, that is the high places of Arnon, an encampment of the Israelites on their march to the promised land, 533, b.
- Barak* and Deborah defeat Jabin king of Canaan, 336, b. Barak discomfits Sisera, 743, b.
- Barbara Wastu*, the supreme being among the Mala-barians, 33, d.
- Barca*, the son of Metinus king of Tyre, 415, c. Accompanies his sister Dido in her flight, 416, b. From him sprung the family of the Barca in Africa, ibid. c.
- Barrady*, antiently Chrysorrhoeas, a river of Syria, 361, c.
- Baruc*, Jeremiah's scribe, 847, b.
- Basban* hill of, gave its name to the kingdom of Og, 330, c. Since called Batanaca, ibid. A plentiful and populous territory, ibid. Conquered by Moses, ibid. d.
- Basbimah*, Esau's second wife, called by Moses, speaking of Esau's posterity by her, Abeli-bamah, the daughter of Anab, the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite, 441, (X).
- Baslards*, and all illegitimate issue, not to be admitted into the congregation of the Lord, till after the tenth generation, 665, d.
- Bath-sheba*, wife of Uriah, her adultery, 779, b. Married to David, ibid. c.
- Bathshemath*. Vid. Maholab.
- Battus*, the happy, third king of the Cyreneans, 268, f.
- Bazrab*, Bozrab, or Bosor, a city of Edom, 309, c.
- Bdolah* and Skobam, differently interpreted, 55, a, b.
- Beer*, king of Sodom, routed by Chederlaomer, 327, b.
- Beclamen*, what in the Phœnician language, 87, a. The chief of the Phœnician deities, 397, b. By him meant the sun, ibid.
- Beer*, an incampment of the Israelites on their march to the promised land, 533, b. So called from the wells which the heads of the Israelites dug there by God's direction, ibid. This gave birth to that song of Moses, which was sung by the Israelites, Spring up, O well, sing ye unto it, ibid.
- Beer-sheba*, or the well of the oath, the adjoining city so called, 430, (A). Whence the proverb, from Dan to Beer-sheba, ibid.
- Beetle*, why worshipped by the Egyptians, 210, e.
- Beheading*, never practised among the Jews in a judicial way before the captivity, 673, c.
- Beisar*, king of Egypt, according to the oriental historians, 280, a. Builds the city of Mezer, ibid.
- Bela*, the son of Beer, king of the Horites, 312, a.
- Bela*, or Zoar, in the vale of Siddim, 327, b. The king of this place defeated by Chederlaomer, ibid.
- Belshazzar*, the Babylonian, stirs up Arbaces to rebel against Sardanapalus, by assuring him that he should drive him from the throne, and become lord of all his dominions, 885. His resolution and obstinacy, though several times defeated, 886, c. His story, 938, a, b.
- Belibus*, king of Babylon, succeeds to the first inter-reign, and reigns three years, 946, c.
- Belpazzar*, mentioned by Daniel, most likely to have been Evil-merodach, 965, f, & seq. And not Nabonadius, 971, f, & seq. His vision, ibid. c, d. Interpreted by Daniel, ibid.
- Belus*, the supreme god of the old Babylonians, 15, a.
- Belus* and Agenor, the sons of Neptune by Libya, reigned in Egypt, where he married the daughter of Nilus, 408, a.
- Belus*, the same with Pul, 916, b. A temple erected to him in the city of Babylon, ibid. c. To him was raised the famous tower, ibid. The tower described, ibid. & seq. Said by some to have been the inventor of astronomy, 917, c.
- Belus*, a river, its sand an excellent material for the making of glass, ministered the first hint for that invention, 582, d.
- Belzebub*, Satan, or Sammael, prince of the fallen angels, 51, a.
- Benajab* succeeds Joab in the post of general, 792, d.
- Ben-badad* I. son to Tabrimon king of Damascus, tempted with large gifts, by Aja king of Judab, to make war upon Bascha king of Israel, 383, a. His army takes all Cineroth, and the land of Naph-tali, and, in the end, he extends his power to the city of Samaria, ibid.
- Ben-badad* II. king of Damascus, marches with a mighty parade and a powerful army against Israel, 383, b. His haughty behaviour towards Abab, ibid. c. His proud message to him variously interpreted, ibid. (D). His army routed, and himself put to a shameful flight, ibid. d, e. Flies to the city of Apik, where 27,000 of his men are crushed to death by the wall of the city, which fell on them, ibid. How this extraordinary casualty came to pass, ibid. (G). Throws himself upon Abab's mercy, by whom he is kindly treated, and immediately restored to his liberty, 384, c, d. Keeps possession of Ramoth-gilead, which was the subject of a fresh war, 384, d. Comes to an engagement with Abab, and Jebo-shaphat king of Judab, whereof the victory was doubtful, 385, a, b. Detaches a strong party to Dothan to seize Elisba, 387, a. They are smitten with such a deception of sight by the prophet, that they suffer him to lead them into the city of Samaria, where they are hospitably entertained, which put a stop to this war, ibid. Ben-badad marches again against Samaria, but while he was on the point of taking the city, is seized with a panic fear, and raises the siege, 387, b, c. Sends Hazael to consult Elisba about his indisposition, who receives answer that he might recover, but would not, ibid. d. Stilled by Hazael with a thick cloth dipped in water, 388, a. Worshipped as a god by the Syrians, under the name of Adad, or Ader, 372, a.
- Ben-badad* III. thrice defeated by Jeboash, the son of Jeboabaz king of Israel, loses all his father had wrested from the Jews, 389, a. Probably subdued by, or made tributary to, Jerabeam, ibid.
- Ben-badad*, or Hadad, affected by all the kings of Syria, from Hadadzer, of Lobab, downwards, 389, (B). Benbadad signifies the son of Hadad, ibid.
- Benjamin* born, 448, e. Called first Benoni, or the son of my affliction, ibid. Kept with Jacob, while the others went into Egypt to buy corn, 454, a. Sent to Egypt to redeem Simon, ibid. d. Honoured by Joseph above the rest, 456, a. Joseph's cup found in his sack, ibid. And brought back to Joseph, ibid. Jacob's blessing to him and his tribe, 465, b. How versed, (S). His lot in the promised land, 569, a.
- Benjamites*, or tribe of Benjamin, defeat that of Judab, and kill 22,000 of their men, 741, b. Repulse them from Gibeath, with the loss of 18,000 men, on the side of Judab, ibid. b, c. Are at last defeated with the loss of 25,000 men, ibid. c, d. Their cities burnt down, and the whole tribe destroyed by other tribes, except 500 men, 741, b, c, & seq. Restored, 742, c. Rebuild their cities, ibid.
- Benoth* of both sexes, and sometimes worshipped in the habit of a man, and sometimes of a woman, 919, c. Rites used in the worship of her, ibid. a. The same with the great Syrian goddess, ibid. Honoured by divers nations, ibid. The same with Derceto of Ascalon, 920, b. Was worshipped as Semiramis, ibid. f. Called the celestial Venus, and said to have been the first of all worshipped by the Affyrians, 919, c.
- Berachab* the vale of, in the wilderness of Tekoa, called valley benedictionis in the Latin of the Psalter, 574, b, & (S). So called from the miraculous overthrow of the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, ibid. & 291, 297, 315.
- Berosus*, his account of the Chaldean, or Babylonian cosmogony, 14, c. He collected the Babylonian antiquities,

- antiquities, 90. The substance of the few fragments of them that are still remaining, ibid.
- Berubai* and Betab, two cities of the kingdom of Zobab in Syria, plundered by David, 382, b.
- Beruth*, 88, c.
- Berytus*, an ancient city of Phœnice, said to have been standing in the days of Cronus, 394, b. Now called Barut, or Beroet, ibid. Description of its situation, ibid. (T.)
- Betab* and Berubai, two cities of the kingdom of Zobab, 382, b.
- Betababara*, not far from the place where the Israelites crossed the Jordan, 553, (Y).
- Betbagil*, a village, where no one circumcised is said to live above three days, 584, (T).
- Bethel Shechem*, city or land of Canaan, 324, a. The inhabitants subject to the king of Asi, join him against Jehona, but are all cut off, 331, b. Fall afterwards by fraud, and their city is seized by the house of Joseph, 334, a, b. Bethel, that is, the house of God, called formerly Luz, 440, c.
- Bethlehem*, David desires some water of the well there, 775, b. Why he chose rather to spill it on the ground than to drink it, ibid.
- Bethsheemjaites*, fifty thousand and seventy of their men punished with immediate death for looking into the ark, 757, a.
- Bethsheem* city, in the land of Canaan, 324, a.
- Bethuel*, the father of Rebecca according to some, 431, (D). More probably her brother, 433, (M).
- Betylus* son of Uranus, 134, b, & (H).
- Bezaleel* and Aholiabana, appointed overseers for the making of the tabernacle, 523, b.
- Bezek*, city of Canaan, the residence of Admizebek, taken by the Israelites, and all who were within the walls put to the sword, 333, d, e.
- Bilbab*, Leab's maid, bears Jacob Dan and Naphtali, 441, d.
- Bisba*, king of Gomorrah, routed by Chederlaomer, 327, b.
- Blacks*, their origin according to some, 120, (N). Not the descendants of Ham, 119. How their blackness may be accounted for, 47, c, d, & c.
- Blessing*, how and on what occasion used by the Jews, 692, c.
- Blood*, the prohibition of eating it as old as the deluge, 686, c. Not only forbidden to the Israelites, but to the strangers that lived among them, under pain of death, 687, a. Why forbid, ibid. & (D).
- Bocchoris*, king of Egypt, surnamed the wise, 261, b. The fourth Egyptian lawgiver, ibid. Said to have been taken by Sabbaco the Ethiopian, and burnt alive, ibid.
- Boethus*, an heterodox stoic, 8, c. Asserts the world's eternity and incorruptibility, ibid.
- Boils* upon men and beasts, one of the Egyptian plagues, 467, d. Break out by Aaron's throwing an handful of the ashes of the furnace into the air, ibid.
- Bootesellab* the valley of, said to have this strange property, that no Mohammedan can live in it above two years, 584, a, & (T).
- Boticella*, a village, where it is reported, that no Turk can live above eight days, 584, (T).
- Botrys*, in Phœnice, built by Ithobal, 415, d.
- Bozrah*, Bozor, Pazrah, names of a city of Edom, 309, c.
- Brachmanes*, old Indian philosophers, 32, c. Their opinion as to the creation of the world, ibid.
- Brama*, a secondary god in the physiology of the Bramins, 33, b.
- Bramins*, Indian philosophers, their physiology, 32, & seq.
- Brumma*, a god among the Malabarians, 33, d.
- Brathy's* mount, why to called in the Phœnician history, 87, a.
- Breast-plate* of the Jeruiss high-priest described, 637, b. Why called memorial, ibid. c. Names of the 12 precious stones fastened in it, with the tribe that was engraven upon each of them, ibid. (X).
- Bremaw* what meant by, in the phythology of the Bramins, 33, b, & 107, c.
- Bubastis*, or Diana, daughter of Osiris and Isis, 239, (A).
- Bull*, worshipped by the Egyptians, 206, e. Represented Osiris, ibid. Two of this kind kept in Egypt, ibid.
- Burnet Dr.* his theory of the earth, 36, d, & seq. How he accounts for the change in the constitution of the earth after the fall, 16, d, e. His theory of the deluge, 99, f. How he accounts for the changes made in the world after the deluge, 106, b.
- Burning*, a punishment used among the Jews before Moses, 673, b, & 451, (R). What crimes deserved this death, ibid. a.
- Bufois*, his cruelty to strangers gave rise to the fable, 211, f. Government in Egypt, 240, & seq.
- Bufris*, king of Egypt, the second and last of this name and line, founds the city of Thebes, 245, d, (C).
- Byblus*, in Phœnicia, by whom founded, 135, b. Said to have been the first city founded in that country, 394, a. Two cities of this name, one on the sea, the other called Palæ Byblus, or Old Byblus, farther up within land, ibid.
- Byssus*, super-fine linen of Egypt, 183, b.

C.

- CABBALA Jewish, or oral tradition full of carnal and ridiculous notions, 597, b. Another Cabbala, called by distinction Kabla, or reception, contains the mystical sense of the old testament, received by some of the ancient fathers, and defended by several modern writers, ibid.
- Cadeb-barnab*, the fifteenth encampment of the Jews from their coming out of Egypt, 527, c.
- Cadeb* and Shur, the names of two deserts, 429, c, & (U).
- Cadmus*, son of Agenor, 408, b. Sent by his father in quest of Europa, his sister; lands in Thrace, 409, a. Discovers there a gold mine in mount Pangæus, ibid. Advised by the oracle to leave Thrace, and pass into Bœotia, ibid. Drives from thence the Hyantes, and founds a new kingdom, ibid. Builds a city, called from his own name Cadmea, ibid. b.
- Cain*, when probably born, 72, e. The import of the word, 73, (N). His offerings, ibid. a. Why not accepted, 73, (N). Murders his brother, 73, b, & seq. His punishment, 74, a. Goes into banishment, and builds a city, 75, a. Grows more wicked, ibid. Traditions relating to his death, 76, (N). His descent, 76, 77, a. His posterity wicked, ibid. Traditions relating to his death, 76, (N). His descent, 76, 77, a. His posterity wicked, ibid. b. His race supposed to be meant by men, and the daughters of men, 77, b. His posterity employed in improving agriculture, and inventing mechanical arts, and musical instruments, 81, a, b. The pedigree of his line, as given by Sanchoiatho, compared with that given by Moses, 89, b, c. A table of his descendants, according to Sanchoiatho and Moses, 89, b, c.
- Cain*, a city in Canaan, 86, (N).
- Cainan*, one of Seth's descendants, 78, a.
- Calacine*, a province of Affyria, 858, b.
- Calab* city, where situate, 126, (B).
- Calasirians*, name of the military men in Egypt, 200, e.
- Caleb*, one of the twelve that were chosen by Moses to view the land of Canaan, 526, a. His and Joshua's report of it, c. Caleb takes and burns Jerusalem, 738, c.
- Calf* the golden, made by Aaron, probably a whole calf, in imitation of the Egyptian Apis, 520, b, & (B).
- Cambyes* conquers Egypt, 272, & seq.
- Canaan*, the fourth son of Ham, 121, b. Signification of the word, ibid. (C). According to some born

- born in the ark, ibid. b. The curse of Noah peculiar to, and wholly compleated in, him, ibid. b, c. Why cursed by Noah for the crime of his father, 119, a, b. Probably lived and died in the country called after his name, ibid. d. His tomb formerly shewn not far from Jerusalem, ibid. Known to the ancient historians, ibid. Opinions of the Mohammedans concerning him, ibid. (D).
- Canaan*, or Canaan, includes the whole land possessed by the 12 tribes, but peculiarly belongs to no more than that country westward of the Jerdan, 566, (A). Its fertility, 706, a. Vid. Land of Promise.
- Canaanites*, descended from Canaan the son of Ham, 322, a. The seven primary nations of the Canaanites, ibid. b, c. Their country, 323, a, b. Canaanites, peculiarly so called, divided into two distinct bodies, 323, d. Inhabited two distinct divisions, the sea side to the west, and the river side to the east, ibid. Those on the sea side merchants, and known to the Greeks by the name of Phœnicians, ibid. Those who had an inland situation employed partly in pasturage, and partly in the exercise of arms, ibid. b. Retained the true religion to the days of Abraham, 325, b. Fall into idolatry, ibid. c. They used human sacrifices, 325, d. Guilty of all manner of wickedness, ibid. (I). They lived in subjection to limited princes or kings, 326, a. Probably their country peopled by Canaan and his descendants, upon the first dispersion after the flood, ibid. c. According to an ancient tradition, their country originally belonged to the children of Shem, ibid. (A). Some of them said to have penetrated into Egypt, and possessed themselves of the Arabian side of the country, from whence they were driven by the Egyptians, which some will have to be the expulsion of the shepherds, ibid. d, e. Their whole land oppressed by a famine soon after the arrival of Abraham, 327, a. Joined with the Amalekites, repulse the Israelites attempting to enter their territories, 330, a. Employ Joshua six years, 333, b. Supposed in the end to have left their country in great numbers, and in their way to Afric to have seized on the lower Egypt, where they erected a monarchy, but were driven out, after having lorded it long over Egypt, 333, b. Little molested by the Israelites for 19 or 20 years, ibid. c. Invaded again by the tribes of Israel, ibid. d. Those in Bezek all put to the sword, ibid. Those of Beitbel fall by fraud, and their city is seized by the house of Joseph, 334, a, b. Those of Beth-bean, Taanach, Dor, Ibleam, and Megiddo, preserve their several jurisdictions entire against the children of Manasseh, ibid. b. Those of Gezer cannot be expelled by the Epbraemites, ibid. Those of Kitron and Nabulol stand their ground, but submit to tribute, ibid. c. Those of Acho, Zidon, Ablah, Achzib, Apluk, and Rebub, instead of being driven out by the tribe of Asher, impose what conditions they think proper on them, ibid. Those who held Beitshemish and Beth-anath, are in the end made tributaries to the tribe of Naphtali, ibid. Some left to prove Israel, maintain their ground against the Israelites to the time of David, 336, d. Reduced with the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, and Jebusites, to a state of slavery by Solomon, and employed in the heavy labour of carrying on his sumptuous works, which slavery was entailed upon them and their posterity, though admitted into the Jewish religion, 337, b. Whether ever blended with the Jews, is uncertain, ibid. c, & (O). The Canaanites properly so called, remained independent on the sea-coast, and sprung to a great height of fame, being comprehended under the famous appellation of Phœnicians, 338, a.
- Canal*, still in being, cut from the Euphrates to the Tigris, 57, b.
- Can Cam* a fabulous king of Egypt, 278.
- Candlestick* of the sanctuary described, 658, a, &c. Whether the lamps burnt only in the night, ibid. (Z). Entertained by the purest virgin oil of olives, ibid. (A).
- Canopus*, one of the Egyptian deities, 206, a. How he obtained a victory over the Chaldean god Ser, by the craft of a priest, ibid. b. How represented, ibid.
- Caphor*, probably an island, situate either in the lake of Tennis, or Tanis, extending from Damietta to Tina, 166, a.
- Caphorim*, the last of the offspring of Misraim, by all the fathers said to be the Cappadocians, and Caphor Cappadocia, 165, f. By Cappadocia here understood some place in Egypt, generally supposed by the Rabbins to be Demot, ibid. Caphorim, the progenitors of the Philistines, 338, b.
- Cappadocia*, in Asia minor, and some place in Egypt of the same name, 166, a.
- Caprus*, a river of Affyria, 859, a, & (I).
- Caraites*, a wife and ancient sect among the Jews, reject the Cabbala, 597, b. Hated by the Talmudists, ibid.
- Carchemish*, or Circesium, or Circutium, a considerable town on the Mesopotamian side of the Euphrates, 949, a. Taken from the Egyptians by Nabopolassar, 950, a.
- Carcob*, the meaning of the word, 661, (E).
- Cardu* mountains, remains of the ark said to have been formerly seen there, 109, c.
- Carmel* mount, its situation, 571, a. Famed for its fertility, and for being the favourite place of Pythagoras, ibid. Elias supposed to have sojourned here in a cave, before he was ravished into heaven, ibid. The name common both to a town and a mountain, ibid. (T). Distinguished very early by the Christians with particular marks of piety, ibid. (X). From hence proceeded the order of the frier Carmelites, ibid. Melons, olives, and such like fruits in stone found there, 582, c.
- Carpasia*, in the island of Cyprus, said to have been built by Pygmalion king of Tyre, 416, c.
- Carthage* the foundations of, laid by Dido, 415, c.
- Castubum*, where settled, 165, c.
- Cassotis*, part of the Lower Egypt, 176, b. Also part of Seleucia in Syria, 361, a. Likewise the name of a town in the said country, ibid.
- Cassius* mount, whence so called in the Phœnician history, 87, a.
- Cathim*, the last king of Egypt, of the race of the Amalekites, 282, b. Some oriental historians ascribe to him the pyramids, ibid. c.
- Cats* in high veneration among the Egyptians, 208, f, g. The killing of one was certain death, ibid. Instance of this in a Roman, ibid. Why so much veneration paid to them, 210, c, & 211, b.
- Causacus* mount, called by the Arabs the mountain of Ras, 102, (N). Its height, ibid.
- Cayumarras*, first king of Persia, said to have been the son of Shem, 126, b.
- Cedars of Libanus*, an account of them, 362, b, & seq.
- Celsus* would have had the Christians take Orpheus rather for a god than Christ, 16, c.
- Celts*, the same people with the Gauls, descended from Gomer the eldest son of Japhet, 166, d.
- Cephren*, Cephrenes, or Chabrysi, king of Egypt, 260, a. A tyrant, ibid. Erected the second of the three most remarkable pyramids, 184, & 260, b.
- Ceremonial* laws instituted, 516, a. Whether some of them were borrowed of the Egyptians, ibid. (V). Some of them typical, others political, 516, d, e, & (V), (Z).
- Cerebites*, the name by which the Philistines were known in Egypt, 343, (G).

- Ceteropha*, the first woman after the flood, according to the Indians, 107, c.
- Cetii*, a People mentioned by Homer, 168, f.
- Ceuta*. Vid. Septis.
- Chabryis*. Vid. Cephren.
- Chæremón*, according to Eusebius, thought there was nothing prior to the visible world, 13, b. Defended by Jamblichus, ibid. e.
- Chalcidene*, an island province of Syria, 361, b.
- Chalcis*, the capital city of Chalcidene, 361, b.
- Chaldaea*, whence so called, 905, e. What country comprised under the name of the proper Chaldaea, ibid. a. Its Divisions, extent, situation, and boundaries, 906, a, b, c. Climate and fertility, ibid. d. Productions, rivers, canals, natural and artificial rarities, 906, 907, 908.
- Chaldaea*, the antediluvian kings of, 90, d. Whence so called, 905, e.
- Chaldean* cosmogony, as delivered by Diodorus, 14, b. The same from Berosus, ibid. e. The Chaldean account of the flood, 91, d.
- Chaldeans*, celebrated for their acknowledging one sovereign deity, 15. Their account of the origin of things, drawn from the Chaldaic oracles of Zoroastres, 15, b. Probably founded by Arphaxad, 127, a. Their language the same with the Syriac, 377, d.
- Chaldeans*, or Chaldres, as distinct from the Babylonians, were their priests, 913, c. Their tenets, ibid. Authors of the Sabian religion, ibid. e. Their learning not had from the Egyptians, 929, b. An account of it, ibid. & seq. Their manner of institution, 930, e. Their doctrine about the world, 931, a. More astrologers than astronomers, ibid. b. System of their astrology, ibid. c. Their boasted learning condemned, 932, a. Chaldeans next to Armenia, the most valiant race of men under the Babylonian princes, 967, e. Subdued by Cyrus, ibid. f.
- Chalonitis*, a province of Assyria, 858, b.
- Chalybon*, chief City of Chalybonitis in Syria, 361, b.
- Chaos*, some philosophers suppose the origin of the earth from it, 10, c, d. Absurdity of this opinion, ibid. e. Maintained by some to have been animated by an evil spirit, 30, & seq.
- Charon*, why the lake of Mæris called at present the lake of Charon, 196, b.
- Chasadin*, a fabulous king of Egypt, 278.
- Chasleu*, the third month among the Jews, answering our November, 611, (K).
- Chedorlaomer*, king of Elam, invades the Zamzummins, 294, c. Takes and pillages Sodom and Gomorrah, 327, c.
- Chemia*, why Egypt so called by its ancient inhabitants, 174, e.
- Chemmis*, or Chembs. Vid. Chrops.
- Chemosh* and Baal-peor, idols of the Moabites, 287, b. Whether the same idol, 286. Etymology of Chemosh, ibid. (E).
- Chrops*, Chemmis, or Chembs, king of Egypt, 259, Shuts up the temples, and forbids all public sacrifices, ibid. f. Reduces his subjects to a State of slavery, ibid. Builds the greatest of the three most remarkable pyramids, 185, & ibid. f. Said to have prostituted his daughter, to get money for that end, 185, b. & ibid. f. His daughter said to have built a small pyramid, by obliging each of her gallants to contribute a stone towards the work, 260.
- Cherethites* and Peletites, who, 778, (C).
- Cherinus*. Vid. Mycerinus.
- Cherubim*, and flaming sword, placed to guard the way of the tree of life, 64, c, d. What meant thereby, ibid. Cherubim that overshadowed the mercy-seat, made of pure gold, 654. Their form, posture and attitude, ibid. d. Divers opinions concerning their shape, 654, (V). Etymology of the word, ibid.
- Chinese*, a sect of philosophers among them, 24. Hold nature to be the sole deity and soul which informs matter, ibid. Independent of all others, ibid. In what they differ from the stoics, ibid. a. Believe that numerous worlds have existed, and others to an infinite number will exist, ibid. The most common opinion among them, that God is the material soul of the world, ibid. Another opinion among them established by royal authority, and holding, that a void or emptiness is the principle and end of all things, ibid. c. Wherein it differs from Spinozism, ibid. e. They formerly acknowledged one God, 34, a. Which opinion obtains now with some of the better sort, ibid. Their physiology, ibid. b, c, d. Their historians mention the flood, 96, a. Strong marks of their language being the primitive language, 151, d.
- Chinzirus*, king of Babylon, 945, b.
- China*, mentioned by Sanchoniatho, seems to have been the same with Canaan, 121, d.
- Chrencriz*, thought by some to have been the Pharaoh that reigned when the Israelites went out of Egypt, 432, (B).
- Chronological* Table of the years of the patriarchs, according to the Computation of the Hebrews, 70. The same according to the Computation of the Septuagint, ibid. And of the Samaritan Pentateuch, 71. Chronology from the Creation to the deluge stated, 69. From the deluge to the departure of Abraham from Haran, 110, a, b. Egyptian Chronology, 95, d, 93, (I). From the time of Alexander the great, 228, & seq. Jewish chronology, 733, b. The Jewish chronicles, 735, d, e.
- Chrysor*, the same with Hephaestus, or Vulcan, 88, a. Inventor of iron, ibid. And of hooks, baits, &c. ibid. The first man that sailed, according to Sanchoniatho, ibid. Worshipped as a god, ibid.
- Chryser*, who in the Phœnician antediluvian history, 88, a. Etymology of the word, ibid.
- Chrysorrhoeas*, now Barrady, a river of Syria, 361, e.
- Chynladan*, king of Assyria, supposed, upon good grounds, to be the Nebuchadonosor of scripture, 897, a, & (Q), & 947, b. Calls in all the nations, subject to the Assyrian empire, to war against the Medes, 698, a. Defeats the Medes, gets possession of all their cities, demolishes Erbatan, capital of Media, and kills Arphaxad their king, ibid. b, c. Entertains his captives in banquets and revels, for the space of 120 days, ibid. Vid. Nabuchadonosor.
- Cilix*, son of Agenor, said to have settled in Cilicia, and given his name to that country, 409, b.
- Cimbri*. Vid. Cimmerians.
- Cimmerians*, or Cimbri, according to some, descended from Gomer, and the same people with the Gauls of Asia minor, 166, d.
- Circumcision*, a very ancient custom among the Egyptians, 213, f. Whether first introduced into the world by them, or the Hebrews, 427, (R). Discontinued in the desert, and why, 545, a. Renewed immediately after the Israelites passed the Jordan, 554, c, d. By whom, with what instrument, and in what manner performed, 690, f. & 691, a, b. Form of words used on that occasion, 490, (A). Several superstitious customs added to the ceremony by the Jews, 169, (I). The child used to be named then by the parents, ibid. b.
- Cities* of refuge. Vid. Refuge.
- Citium* in Cyprus, according to some took its name from the Kittim, 168, f.
- Cleanness*, laws of Moses concerning it, 688, c.
- Cneph*, the intellectual architect of the world, in the cosmogony of the Egyptians, 13, d. How represented, ibid.
- Cale-Syria*, and Syria Cava, the same, a province of Syria, 361, c.
- Colchi*, whether the Cassubim of Moses, 344, (K).

- Colchis*, an Egyptian colony, 256, b.
- Colour*, difference in colour between the whites and blacks accounted for, 47, d, e.
- Colpias*, a wind, and his wife Baan, parents of the first men, according to some, 46, a. The signification of the word, ibid. (N).
- Colpitis*, Phœnice so called, 391, d. Etymology of the word, ibid. (A).
- Columns of Hermes in Egypt*, 222, d.
- Combabus*, the founder of the Galli, or eunuch priests of the great Syrian goddess, his story, 374, d, &c.
- Comer*, the trajectory of one occasioned the deluge, according to Mr. Whiston, 101, a. Attested by several authors, that one appeared at the deluge, 101, (N).
- Commagene*, part of Syria, described, 360, d.
- Commandments*. Vid. Decalogue, Tables.
- Commerce*, the original of, after the deluge, 173, e, f.
- Confusion of tongues*. Vid. Tongues.
- Coptarim*, a fabulous king of Egypt, 281.
- Coptic letters*, whether the modern are the same with the antient and vulgar Egyptian, 224, (M).
- The Coptic alphabet, 225. The Coptic tongue, at present, consists of the old Egyptian and Greek, 226, b. Differs widely from all the oriental and European languages, ibid. b, c.
- Coptos*, an antient city of Thebais, 175, e. The chief residence of the native Egyptians for many ages, who are from thence called Coptos, ibid.
- Corban*, all the offerings that had life, so called, 624, (A). Etymology of the word, ibid.
- Cosmogony*, Phœnician, Egyptian, Chaldean, &c. Vid. Phœnician, Egyptian, Chaldean, &c.
- Cozbi*, daughter of Zur prince of Midian, 303, b. Sent by her father, among the rest, to debauch the Israelites, ibid. Is killed, ibid. c.
- Creation* true notion of, z, b. Moses's account of it explained, 41, c, d, e. Creation of man, 44, a. The time and season of the creation, 48, a, b. Whether completed in six days, ibid.
- Crocodile*, the little, or land crocodile, probably the same with Scincus of Pliny, described 181, c, d. Found near the Nile and Red-Sea, ibid. The extravagant worship paid him by the Egyptians, 209, b, & (N). Why worshipped, 210, f, & b. How taken by the Egyptians, 181, b.
- Cronus*, supposed to be the same with Ham, 121, a, & 134, (H). Son of Uranus, wars against his father, in defence of his mother Ge, 135, a. Drives him from the throne, ibid. Found Byblus, ibid. b.
- Cronus* the younger, sacrifices his only son, 138, a, b. consecrated after his death into the planet Cronus, or Saturn, ibid. Circumcised, and forced his auxiliaries to do the same, 138, b.
- Cronus*, or Baal, likely the Baal-berith antiently worshipped at Berytus, 397, b.
- Crown*, first used by Nimrod, according to the eastern historians, 123, (O). From whence the model of them taken, ibid. Formerly not peculiar to princes, 669, (T). The distinguishing ornament of persons in the highest stations in the courts of all the eastern princes, ibid. (V).
- Crucifying*, not a Jewish, but a Roman punishment, 674, (D).
- Ctesias of Cnidos*, his character, 867, a, b, &c. His History of the Assyrian kings, a gross forgery, ibid. An abridgment of it, 871, e, & seq.
- Cumberland* bishop, his amendments of Sanchoiatas considered, 139, (B), & seq.
- Cardestân*, the same as Asbur and Affria, 163, a.
- Cush*, wrongly supposed by some to be the country of the Cossæans, 56, b.
- Cush*, father of Nimrod, whether king, 124, a, & (R).
- Cush*, Ham's eldest son, where fixed, 104, b, c. By Cush in scripture always meant Arabia, ibid.
- Cushat-rishajam*, king of Mesopotamia, defeated by Israhel, the first judge of the Israelites, 742, d.
- Cushites*, defeated by Asa king of Juda, 807, e.
- Cushim*, the progenitors of the Philistines, 338, b. Whether the same with the Colchi, 344, (R).
- Cutheans*, the new inhabitants of Samaria, why so called, 835, c.
- Cynocephalus*, a large kind of ape in Egypt, 181, e. why so called, ibid. The figure of this beast often used by the Egyptians as a hieroglyphic, ibid.
- Cyprus*, according to Josephus, the seat of the Kittim, 168, f. Conquered first by Amosi, king of Egypt, 272, b.
- Cyreneans*, a colony of the Greeks, 268, f. Drive out the Lydians, ibid. Gain a signal victory over the Egyptians, 269, a.
- Cyrrhestica*, a province of Syria upon the Euphrates, 361, a.
- Cyrrhus*, or Cyrus, the capital City of Cyrrhestica, 361, b.
- Cyrus* subdues the Chaldeans next to Armenia, 967, e, f. Defeats Neriglissar king of Babylon, 968, a. And Nabonadius, last king of Babylon, 970, d, e. Besieges and takes Babylon, and puts an end to the Babylonian empire, ibid. Behaves kindly to Nabonadius, his prisoner, ibid.

D.

- DÆMONS, two kinds of, 82, (N).
- Dagon*, or Sidon, son of Uranus, 135, b. Worshipped by the Philistines in Canaan, 135, (N). Called Jupiter Arotrius from his contriving of ploughs, ibid. Worshipped at Azotus as the most favourite god of the country, 343, a. The import of his name, ibid. The form he was worshipped under, ibid. b. Opinions of the learned relating to him, (H).
- Dabrians*, or eternalists, a sect of philosophers among the Mohammedans, 4, a.
- Dairabunach*, a monastery in Mesopotamia, 116, a.
- Daluka*, surnamed Ajiz, or the old woman, queen of Egypt, said by the oriental historians to have succeeded the Pharaoh who perished in the Red-Sea, and to have been the most expert woman of her time in magic, 283, a, (C).
- Damascus*, now Sham, a city of Syria, 361, d. Built by Uz, the eldest son of Aram, 163, e. Seems to have been a republic in David's time, 371, c. Rose upon the ruins of the kingdom of Zobab, ibid. A famous altar to be seen there in former times, 377, c. Chronology of the kings of Damascus, 380. The kingdom founded by Rezan, in the latter part of Solomon's reign, 381, b. The inhabitants transplanted to Kir, and Damascus taken away from being a city, according to the prophecy, 390, b.
- Dan*, Jacob's first son by Bilhah, born, 441, d. Jacob's prophecy to him and his tribe, 463, b. How verified, ibid. (L). Why compared by Jacob to a viper, 464, a, b. His lot in the promised land, 569, a.
- Dan*, a city built by the tribe of that name, 740, c. An idol set up there, continued till the captivity of the land, ibid.
- Dandera*, the city called Tentyra in antient times, in Egypt, 197, a. A magnificent temple there described, ibid. & seq. Believed by the inhabitants to have been a temple of Serapis, ibid. e.
- Daniel* prophet, his writings not admitted by the Jews among those of the other prophets, 732, (O). Why, ibid. He is sent captive to Babylon, 848, a. Interprets Nebuchadnezzar's dream, 950, e, &c. By him is raised to great dignity, 951, e, d.
- Daniel* interprets to Belshazzar the mysterious words which that prince observed an hand writing on the wall, 971, d.
- Dardus*, a fabulous king of Egypt, 282.
- Darius* the Mede most likely to have been Neriglissar king of Babylon, 968, b, c, d, e. And not Nabonadius, 971, f.

- Darkness during three days, one of the plagues of Egypt, 498, f, g.
- Darkun, a fabulous king of Egypt, 283, b.
- Dathan, one of the heads of the house of Reuben, 529, b. Joins with Korah in a conspiracy against Moses, ibid. His insolent language to Moses, ibid. His dreadful punishment, 530, b.
- David of Dinant, his opinion of the origin of things, 8, b.
- David king, the son of Jesse, dispels the evil spirit from Saul by playing on the harp, 763, c. Is made his armour-bearer, ibid. Kills Goliath, 764, b, c. His intimate friendship with Jonathan, ibid. Forced to save himself in the land of Nob, 766, a, b. Flies to Achish king of Gath, ibid. c. From thence he retires into the cave of Adullam, ibid. d. Instances of his generosity towards Saul, 768, a, b, c, & 769, c. Flies into the forest of Hareth, in the land of Judah, 767, b. A covenant ratified between him and Jonathan, ibid. c. Gains Michal, Saul's second daughter, with the death of 200 Philistines, 765, b. Saved by her, when in danger of his life by Saul, ibid. Anointed by Samuel in Saul's room, 763, c. Causes the messenger to be put to death, who brought the tidings of Saul's death, 772, c. Again anointed king over Judah at Hebron, 773, a. Marries Maakah, daughter of Tolmai king of Geshur, ibid. b. Has by her Abishalom and Tamar, ibid. Puts to death the murderers of Ishbosheth, 774, d. Reigns over all the 12 tribes, except part of that of Benjamin, ibid. e. Besieges and takes Jerusalem, 775, a. Make Sion his residence, and calls it the city of David, ibid. Removes the ark to Jerusalem, 776, c. His piety and zeal on that occasion, ibid. Rout, in several battles, Hadadezer king of Zobah in Syria, possesses himself of a great part of Syria, and makes most of their kings his tributaries, 382, a, b, &c. Invaded by the Philistines, routs them in four successive battles, 356, & seq. & 775, a. Is very near being killed by Ishbi-benob, 375, b. Makes the Philistines his tributaries, 382, a, b. His alliance with Hiram king of Tyre, 775, c. Forbid by the prophet Nathan to undertake the building of the temple, 777, b. His economy, policy, &c. ibid. d, e. His gratitude towards Jonathan's sons, 778, a, b. Revenges on the Ammonites the affront put on his ambassadors, 778, c, & seq. His adultery and murder, ibid. b, c. God's severe judgment denounced against him by Nathan, 780, a. Fulfilled, ibid. c, d, e. Charges his officers to be tender of Abishalom's life, 785, a. His grief for the loss of him, c. Acknowledged by all the tribes, ibid. Forgives Shimei, ibid. e. A new revolt against him, 787, c. Numbers the people, 788, d. Which brings a pestilence on the land, 789, b. Orders Solomon to be proclaimed, 790, e. His last instructions to Solomon, 791, c. Dies in the 70th year of his age, 792, a. His vast riches and burial, ibid. b.
- Dead-Sea. Vid. Asphaltite lake.
- Debir, king of Eglon, joins Alonibezek, king of Jerusalem, against the Gibeonites, 332, a. Is cut off by Joshua in a miraculous manner, ibid. b, c. The city of Debir retaken by the Canaanites, 334, a.
- Deborah, fourth Judge of Israel, defeats Jabin king of Canaan, 336, b, & 743, a.
- Decalogue delivered, 514, a. By whom, ibid. (X). The sense of the commandment, where God is said to punish the sins of the fathers upon the children, &c. rectified, ibid. Jews join the first and second commandment into one, and divide the last into two, ibid.
- Dedan and Sheba, Raamah's two sons, where seated, 164, d. A city of this name in Edom, of great dealings with Tyre, situate opposite to Teman, 309, b.
- Delilah, Samson in love with her, 349, b. She betrays him to the Philistines, ibid. c.
- Delta, part of the Lower Egypt, 176, a. Why so called, ibid. Whether formerly a bay of the sea, 176, b. How divided by the Arabs, ibid. The most plentiful part of Egypt, 166, a.
- Deluge, changes on the earth occasioned by it, 110, c, d, e. Various accounts for, ibid. Vid. Flood.
- Demi, or Damietta, in Egypt, 166, a.
- Demi-gods, or gods that were supposed to have reigned in Egypt before the flood, 93. A table of them, ibid.
- Democritus, supposed the author of the atomic system, 19, e. Admits an infinite number of atoms to be the first principles, 20, d. Fatal necessity an inevitable consequence of his system, 21. Believed the atoms to be animated, ibid. a. What he called God, had no attributes of a deity, ibid. d. Said to have transcribed his moral discourses from a Babylonish pillar, 222, d.
- Denaba, or Dinahabab, the city in which Job is said to have reigned, where situate, 428, c.
- Derceto, goddess of the Philistines, 343, c. Also an Assyrian deity, 861. Whether the Philistine Dagon, ibid.
- Descartes, his hypothesis, 35, d, & seq.
- Deucalion, 95, (N).
- Devil, the tempter of Eve, 61, a. Why he made choice of a serpent, ibid. b, c, d.
- Dhagar, a port in the middle of the Arabian coast, 169, f.
- Dhalka, or Zalka, queen of Egypt, 280, e. In her reign, according to some Writers, the Amalekites seize the kingdom, ibid.
- Diad of Pythagoras, what meant by it, 25, d.
- Diana, in what manner her festival was observed among the Egyptians at Bubastis, 208, a.
- Dido. Vid. Elisa.
- Diet among the Jews very plain, 695, b.
- Diklah, one of Joktan's sons, where situate, 170, a.
- Dinah, Jacob's daughter by Leah, born, 442, b. Ravished by Shechem the son of Hamor the Hivite, 447, a, b. This affront revenged by her brothers, Simeon and Levi, who put treacherously to the sword all the males of Shechem, ibid. d.
- Diadorus, his natural principles indivisible bodies, 20, a.
- Diogenes of Apollonia, supposes the air the first principle of the universe, and ended with reason, 19, d. A near conformity between his hypothesis and the Cartesian, ibid.
- Dioscuri, or Cabiri, descended from Sydn, called also Corybantes and Samothrates, 134, a. Invented the building a compleat ship, ibid. The first sailors mentioned after the deluge, 136. Built the first temple, ibid. & (K).
- Diopolis the lesser, a city in Thebais, 175, e.
- Dispersion of mankind, 156, f. The time of it fixed, 157, b, c. A double dispersion supposed by some writers, ibid. The number of mankind at that time, 158, b, c.
- Diversions used among the Jews, 695, a.
- Divinations various kinds of, practised by the Jews, 693, e. How performed, ibid. (P).
- Divorce, permitted to the Jews for the hardness of their hearts, 682, a. Never practised by any of the patriarchs, ibid. In what cases allowed, ibid. b, c. The form of the bill of divorce, 683, b. Whether women might likewise divorce their husbands, ibid. (X).
- Dodanim, one of the descendants of Javan, where seated, 169, a.
- Doeg, an Edomite, one of Saul's shepherds, put to death, by his order, the high-priest Abimelek, 767, a.
- Dogr, why worshipped by the Egyptians, 208, e, & 210, b.
- Dove, sent out of the ark by Noah, 106. Why chosen, ibid. (N). Why in great respect among the Assyrians, 875, (P).

Dress, laws concerning that of the Jews, 688, b.
Druids held the alternate dissolution of the world by fire and water, 31, c.
Duration, an essential distinction between that of God and creatures, 5, d, e. The distinction of the school-men, between the manner of duration of God, and that of his creatures, rejected by many as inconsistent and unintelligible, 6, a.
Dynasties Egyptian, 92, d. Tables of their dynasties, 228, & seq. explained, 233, & seq.

E.

EASTER. Vid. Passover.

Eclipse, Tboles the first who ventured to foretell one, 218, d.

Ecbantus, the Syracusan, his natural principles indivisible bodies and vacuum, 20, a.

Ebal mount, 573, b.

Eber, who meant by in the scripture, 118, a, b, & (N). Eber, the son of Salah, one of the chiefs of the line of Shem at the dispersion, 162, e. Where settled, 163, c. The signification of the word, 128, (K). Believed by some to have had no part in the building of Babel, 129, (M). Hebreus believed to derive their name from him, 128. Thought by some to be the founder of their nation, 129, a. Arguments supporting this opinion, ibid. (L). Answered, ibid.

Eblis, prince of the fallen angels among the Mohammedans, 51, a.

Ebul and Gerizim, blessings and curses to be set up on these two hills, 540, c.

Ectros, a fabulous king of Egypt, 280.

Eden garden of, its situation, 53, b. Extravagant opinions concerning it, ibid. b, c. What owing to, 54, a. Several Edens, ibid. b, c. A local, not imaginary paradise, ibid. The schemes which place it in Syria and Armenia ill grounded, 55. And that which places it in Chaldea, 56, b, c, d. Objections to this opinion, ibid. e, f. A new scheme proposed, 57, a, b. The Mosaic description of it imperfect, 57, c, d.

Edom, so called from the children of Edom, or Esau, 308. Originally inhabited by a people called Horites, or Horim, ibid. b. Called also the land Seir, from one Seir an Horite, ibid. And Gablab, Gabal, and Gobilitis, ibid. Etymology of the word, ibid. c. Description of the country, ibid. c, d, & seq. The antient kingdom of Edom loses its name, which is transferred to that part of the land of Judea, which a part of the Edomites had pitched upon, 316, e.

Edomites, so called from Edom, or Esau, their progenitor, 305, c. Etymology of the word Edom, ibid. e. Description of their country, 308, b, c, d. The cities and remarkable places of Edom, 309, b, c. Their form of government, and character, 310, c, d, e. Several arts, sciences, &c. cultivated, if not invented among them, 311, d, e. At first right in their belief, but by degrees fall into idolatry, ibid. Arm, with much ado, prevailed upon by Moses to grant the Israelites a passage through their territories, 313, c, 314, a, b, c. Extended their territories, applied themselves to trade and navigation, and made themselves masters of the Arabian gulf, 314, c. Defeated by David in the valley of Sale, ibid. d. Massacred by Joab for six months together, wherever they could be found, ibid. Are dispersed, and escape some to the Philistines, where they fortified Azoth, or Axotus; others to the Persian gulf, 315, a. Continue under the house of David, governed by deputies till the days of Jehoshaphat, 315, c. In the reign of Jehoram rise up in arms, assassinate their viceroy, and make themselves a king, 316, a. Never afterwards annexed to the house of David, ibid. Suffer a signal overthrow from Amaziah king of Judah, 316, b. Their war with the Moabites, 316, c. Become subject to the king of Babylon, ibid. Revenge the slaughter of their forefathers, by cutting off such of the Jews as endeavoured to escape the captivity of Babylon, ibid. d. Forced by intestine commotions to leave their own country, 316, d, e. Some settled in the empty land of Judea, and those, who staid in Edom, joined the children of Nebaioth, and ever afterwards were called Nabateans, ibid. e. A decree issued out against those that had settled in Judea, commanding them to deliver up to the Jews, all they had belonging to them, 317, b. After Alexander's days, under the power of the Seleucides, ibid. b. They war against Judas Maccabeus, under the conduct of Gorgias their governor, but are worsted with great slaughter; their city Hebron is taken, with their other strong holds, ibid. b, c. Conquered by John Hyrcanus, by whom they are forced to embrace the Jewish religion, and incorporated with that people, ibid. They could be received into the congregation of the Lord after the second generation, 365, c.

Edri, the residence of Og king of Bascan, 330, d.

Egg, the Mundane egg in the Egyptian cosmogony, symbol of the world, 13, d. An egg worshipped by the Phœnicians in the orgia of Bacchus, 17, a. Image of the world among the Chaldeans, Perfians, Indians, and Chinese, ibid. No trivial question among the antients, which was the elder, the egg or the hen, ibid. The first-born god, according to the author of the hymns ascribed to Orpheus, produced from an egg, ibid. b. First egg of wind laid by night in the bosom of Erebus, 18, a.

Eglon, king of Moab, stabbed by Ehud, second judge of Israel, 290, a, b, & 742, e.

Egei, watching angels, 82, (N). Fall in love with the daughters of men, ibid. Their wickedness, ibid.

Egypt, named by its antient inhabitants Chemia, 174, b. Supposed to have been named from Ham, the son of Noah, ibid. Generally denoted in scripture by the land of Mizraim, ibid. Egypt a Greek name, 174, c. Divers opinions concerning the original of it, ibid. Its situation and extent, 174, a, b. Divided into the upper and lower, 175, b. By some into the upper, middle, and lower, ibid. Divided into several governments, called Tahir, or Nomes, 176. Its climate, fertility, &c. 176, d. Its fecundity occasioned by the Nile, 179, f. The different appearance of Egypt in two seasons, 180, b, c. Of the animals of Egypt, 181, b, c. Chief cities of the lower Egypt, 176, c. Of the upper, 175, e. Of the middle, 176, a. Vegetables of Egypt, 182, e, f, & seq. Its artificial rarities, 183, d, e, & seq. Ruins of antient buildings near the cataracts, 196. described, ibid. Grotts near Ostia, ibid. f. Ruins at Dandera described, 197, b. Divided into 12 kingdoms, and 12 of the chief Egyptian lords appointed over them, 262, f, & seq. Pjammaticus put an end to the Dandemonirate, 263, b. Becomes a province of the Persian empire, 272, f, 276, f, & 179, a. Submits to Alexander, 277, a. Its first plantation after the flood according to oriental writers, 280, & seq.

Egyptians, descended from Mizraim, 198, a. Not a warlike nation, 201, c. Their antiquity, 198, a. Assert themselves to have been the first men in the world, ibid. What gave rise to this mistake, ibid. b. Said to have found, the first, the rules of government, ibid. c. d. Their laws revered by other nations, particularly by the Greeks, ibid. d. The crown of Egypt hereditary, but the kings obliged to conform themselves to the established laws of the land, even in their private way of life, ibid. d, e. Their kings manner of life, ibid. Restraint laid on them, even in matters of the least consequence, 198, f, &c. Honour paid them when when dead, 199, e, f, g. The political division of the kingdom, 200, a, b, c. The priests had in great reverence, and next in power and dignity to the king, ibid. c. Their great cleanness, ibid. Not allowed to taste of fish, ibid. d. Their military men called Catafirians, or Hermatyrians, according to the different nomes they inhabited, ibid. e, f. Not permitted to learn or practice any mechanical art, ibid. f. Their chief excellency in horfemanfhip, and the skill of guiding chariots, ibid. Their husbandmen, fhepherds, &c. husbandmen and fhepherds by law, from generation to generation, 201, b, c. Their courts of justice, and manner of proceeding, 202, b, c, d. Banished lawyers from their tribunals, ibid. Their most remarkable laws, ibid. e, f, g, & seq. Their religion, 203, g, & seq. Said to have been the first people who erected altars, images, and temples, 204, a. The Greeks borrowed from them both their gods and religious ceremonies, ibid. Their chief gods Osiris and Isis, ibid. Their other gods, ibid. b, c. Are said to have acknowledged one supreme God, ibid. d. Over-run at last with idolatry, so as to worship not only animals, but even vegetables, ibid. e, f. The preposterous worship they paid to animals, setting lands apart for their maintenance, and employing men and women to feed them, 208, e, f, g. The vast expence they were at, in maintaining their sacred animals when alive, and in burying them when dead, 209, c, d, e. Reasons alledged by them to defend the worshipping of animals, 210, a, b. The origin of this worship, ibid. Some other of their institutions, 211, d, & seq. Their human sacrifices, 211, f. The structure of their temples, 212, d. How they educated their children, 212, e, f. Disapproved of music and wrestling, 213, a. Their diet, ibid. b. Had an aversion to swines flesh, ibid. c. Their entertainments, ibid. d, e, f. Were very cleanly, ibid. Avoided eating with strangers, ibid. Used circumcision, ibid. Their dress, 214. Women among them employed in business abroad, while the men staid at home to spin, ibid. b. Pretended to excel all mankind in gratitude, ibid. c, d. Said to have been the first who asserted the immortality of the soul, 214, d. Why they used such care to preserve the dead bodies, ibid. d, e. Their mourning for the dead, and funeral rites, ibid. e, f. Their manner of embalming the dead bodies, ibid. f, & 215, a. Their sepulchres, 216, f. Early famous for wisdom and learning, 217, d. First inventors of geometry, ibid. e. Arithmetic diligently cultivated among them, 218, a. Astronomy said to have been their invention, ibid. b. And physick, ibid. Of their chymistry, ibid. d. Anatomy, ibid. f. Natural physick, 220, a. Magic, ibid. c, d. Statuary, painting, architecture, &c. 221, e, f. How they preserved their learning, 222, c. Their literary monuments, ibid. d, e, f. Two sorts of learning among them, the vulgar, and the secret wrapt up in hieroglyphics, symbols, &c. ibid. 223. The three sorts of characters they made use of, ibid. d, e. Their navigation on the Nile, and construction of their vessels, 222, a. Their trade and navigation, 226, c, d. Bore a great aversion to the sea, because it swallowed up their Nile, and to sailors, 227, c. Their language very ancient, and probably a mother tongue, 225, c. Used literal characters of two sorts, viz. sacred and vulgar, 224, a. Explication of some of their characters, ibid. (L). Whether the same with the modern Coptic, 224, (M). Conjectures touching their letters precarious, ibid. According to Eusebius, they acknowledged no deity besides stupid matter, 13. Defended from this imputation, ibid. c, d. Professed the belief of a demiurgic reason, and intellectual architect of the world, 13, d. How they represented this intellectual principle, ibid. d, e. They acknowledged soul superior to nature, and mind or intellect superior to soul, 14. Cause of their enmity to the Jews, 473, d. During a great famine, sell their lands and themselves for corn, 459, d. And are transplanted from one end of the kingdom to the other, ibid. e. The fifth part of the product of their lands assigned by Joseph to the crown, 460, a. Invaded by the shepherds, 245, b. Are reduced by the Persians to the lowest degree of submission, 274, d, e. Revolt, but are again subdued, 275, b. Revolt a second time, and chuse Inarus for their king, 275, c, d. Their king taken prisoner, and their country reduced to a state of slavery, 275, e, f. The fabulous history of the Egyptians, 241, b, & seq. A table of the Egyptian gods, and demi-gods, who are supposed to have reigned before the flood, 93, a, b. Their chronology, 92, d, 93, d, &c. Series of their kings, according to several authors, 228, a. A table of the last 16 of the 30 dynasties, according to the old Egyptian chronicle, ibid. 229, & seq. A table of the Egyptian dynasties, from Menetho, according to Africanus, and according to Eusebius, 231. From Menetho, according to Josephus, ibid. A table of the Theban kings, from the Laterculus of Eratoſthenes, 232. A table of the Egyptian kings, according to Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, ibid. & seq. Succession of the Egyptian kings, according to the oriental historians, 277, b. Antediluvian kings, according to the same, 278, a. Postdiluvians, ibid. & seq. & 280. Egyptian plagues, 496, & seq. Egyptian cosmogony, as delivered by Diodorus Siculus, 12, d. Their priests taught, that the earth had certain periods and revolutions, being destroyed alternately by water and fire, and renewed again, 14, b. Those of Thebais worshipped a supreme being, under the name of Cneph, 14, a, b. No strangers to the flood, 95, e. Their first-born slain by the destroying angel, 501, c. Received into the congregation of the Lord, after the second generation, 665, c. Ehud, second judge of Israel, slays Eglon king of Moab, and frees the Israelites from the yoke of that nation, 289, d, & 742, e. Whether that action justifiable, 290, (R). Ebron, corruptedly Accaron, a city of Palestine, 341, c. The famous idol of Baalzebub worshipped there, ibid. Elab, king of Israel, lays siege to Gibbethon, a city of the Philistines, 358, b. Murdered by Zimri, 808, d. Elab of the Terebinth, the valley of, where David slew Goliath, 574, b. Elam, son of Shem, and one of the chiefs of the line of Shem, 163, e. Settles in the country of Elam, ibid. f. Kingdom of Elam, on the river Ulai, to the eastward of the Tigris, subdued by Nebuchadnezzar, 952, c, & (G). Elatb, a sea-port on the shore of the Arabian gulf, called also Aela, Ailat, Elat, Elana, and now, by the Arabians, Ailah, 310, a. Taken from the Edomites by David, and re-taken by the Edomites from the house of David, ibid. b. Conquered to Syria by Hazaël, 389, (D). Restored to the kingdom of Judah by Azariah, ibid. Conquered again by Rezin king of Syria, who planted there a colony, 389, c. Elbis, the devil, according to the Mohammedans, 46, b. Elbo island, how formed, 262, c. Elbasus, king of Berystus, 410. To him Sanchoniatho dedicated his History, ibid. Eldat and Medad, two of the number of the elders who went not to the tabernacle, but prophesied in the camp, 525, (H). Said by the Jews to have been brothers to Moses, by the mother's side, ibid.

- A spurious book, quoted by Hermes, entitled, Eldad an Medad, their prophecies, ibid.
- Eleatic* sect, 6, c.
- Eleazar*, the son of Aaron, by Elizabeth, 490, a. Commanded by Moses to take the censers of Korab, and his men, and to beat them into broad plates, for covering of the altar, 530, c. Commanded to strip his father of the priestly robes, and array himself with them, 532, c. Succeeds his father in the high-priesthood, ibid.
- Eli*, judge and high-priest of Israel, 574, c. His indolence and remissness towards his sons, ibid. d. In his time the Jews again slaves to the Philistines, ibid. Threatened with the loss of the high-priesthood, the death of his sons, and ruin of his family, 755, e. His unhappy death, 756, b.
- Eliakim*. Vid. Jehoakim.
- Elijah*, many particulars relating to him, 809, (D). Meets with Obadiab, 810, a. And Ahab, ibid. b. His zeal against Baal, ibid. c.
- Elim*, a place where the Jews encamped on their march to Canaan, and found 12 springs of fresh water, 508, f.
- Elis*, a city and province of Peloponnesus, 168, a.
- Elisa*, or Dido, her husband Sichæus being murdered by her brother Pygmalion, king of Tyre, flies with all the treasure of her deceased husband to Afric, 415, f. & 419, a, b. Lays the foundations of Carthage, 416, c.
- Elisa*, the eighth son of Japhet, according to the Septuagint, 118, b.
- Elizabeth*, the sister of Naasson, and wife of Aaron, 490, a.
- Elisba*, Javan's eldest son, where settled, 168. Iles of Elisba, ibid.
- Elisba* the prophet, his interview with Naaman the Syrian, 385, d. Cures him of the leprosy, 386, b. Persecuted by Ben-badad, 387, a. Smites those who are sent to seize him with a deception of sight, ibid. Consulted by Ben-badad concerning his indisposition, foretels that he would not live, and that Hazeel would be king of Syria, 387, d.
- Elun*, in the Phœnician history the same as Lameth, 88, b. Why this name was given to Noah, 89, (N).
- Elon*, in the Hebrew not a plain, as it is commonly rendered, but an oak, 424, (G).
- Elon* judges Israel ten years, 753, d.
- Elul*, a fast kept to this day by the Jews, in memory of the punishment and death inflicted on the ten spies, who caused, with their ill report, an insurrection, 527, a.
- Elul*, the twelfth month of the Jewish year, answering August, 611, (K).
- Eluleus*, king of Tyre, reduces Gath, 416, d. Defends Tyre against Shalmaneser, king of Affyria, ibid. c. His fleet disperses that of the Affyrians, ibid.
- Elyma* and Elymais, where placed, f.
- Emins*, a great and powerful people, descendants of Ham, why so called by the Moabites, 286, c, d. Driven out by the Moabites, ibid.
- Empedocles* believed the world to be compounded of minute particles, 20, a. Was auditor of Pythagoras and Anaxagoras, 29, a. His physiology explained, ibid. &c.
- En Soph* of the Jews, 25, b.
- Ennon*, the supposed son of Job, 481, a.
- Enoch* translated, 78, b. Divers opinions as to the place, ibid. (N). His skill in mathematical sciences, ibid. Supposed by the Greek Christians to be the same with the first Egyptian Hermes, ibid. By Eupolemus to be the same with Atlas, ibid. A book ascribed to him, different from his prophecies, ibid. Why called Edris in the Koran, ibid. The piece under the title of The scripture or prophecy of Enoch, a manifest forgery, 79, a. Some fragments of it, 82, (N).
- Ensi*, son of Seth, when born, 77, b.
- Ephod* of the Jewish high-priest described, 637, a, b, c.
- Ephraim* born, 453, b. Presented with Manasseh to Jacob, who makes them two tribes of Israel, 460, d. Preferred by Jacob to his elder brother Manasseh, 461, c. Ephraim and the half tribe of Manasseh, their lot in the promised land, 560, b. Ephraim the wood of, 576, a.
- Ephraimites* threaten Jephthah, and are defeated with great loss by the Giladites, 753, a, b.
- Ephron* the Hittite, his generous behaviour towards Abraham, 329, a, b.
- Epicurus* teaches the atomic philosophy with some alteration, but would not acknowledge that he had borrowed his hypothesis from any, 20, c. How he accounted for the animals and mankind, 21, a. Acknowledged that there were gods, and that they deserved to be worshipped, ibid. d. But allows them neither to be the makers nor governors of the world, ibid. Supposed the gods to be immortal, of human shape, and not composed of atoms like other beings, ibid. e. How he accounts for the freedom of will in his system, 21. Admits no principles but the atoms themselves, ibid. a.
- Epigenes*, or Autocribon, called also Uranus, and from him heaven so named, 88, e, 89, a.
- Er*, Judab's son, by his Canaanitish wife, 450, c. Cut off for his wickedness, ibid.
- Ereoffbenet*, his list of the Theban kings considered, 239, d, e.
- Erebus*, in the cosmogony of Aristophanes, what, 18, a.
- Erech*, a city of Chaldæa, 123, (P).
- Ermdineus*, a fabulous king of Egypt, 280.
- Erylus* king of Babylus, 410, d.
- Esar-baddon*, king of Affyria, succeeds his father Sennacherib, 895, b. Unites the kingdom of Babylus to that of Affyria, ibid. c. Proves at first kind to the Jewish captives, ibid. Reduces quite Israel and Syria, 896, a. And transplants the inhabitants, ibid. Invades the kingdom of Judab, takes king Manasseh, and sends him in chains to Babylus, ibid. Subdues Egypt and Ethiopia, and transplants the inhabitants, ibid. After a long reign dies, 896, b. Stiled in scripture, The great and noble Assnappar, ibid. (M).
- Esau*, called also Edom, progenitor of the Edomites, 305, c. Son of Isaac by Rebekah, ibid. His early strife with his twin-brother Jacob, ibid. Born with red hair all over him, ibid. & (B). Sells his birth-right to Jacob for a mess of pottage, ibid. d. On this occasion called Edom, which signifies red, the colour of the pottage which Jacob sold him, ibid. e. In what did his birth-right consist, 306, (C). Marries among the daughters of Hab, ibid. a. Robbed of his father's blessing by Jacob, ibid. b. Goes over to Ismael, and takes to wife his daughter Mahalah, the sister of Nehath, 306, b. Removes with his family to mount Seir, ibid. The spot he occupied called from him the field of Edom, ibid. His generous behaviour to his brother Jacob, on his return from Pader-aram, ibid. c, d. Goes to Mamre, and assists Jacob at the funeral of their deceased father, takes possession of his inheritance, parts with his brother, and returns to Seir, 308, a. Marries Abolihamab, ibid. His character, 307, (H). His descendants dukes of Edom, etymology of his name, 437, (R).
- Esdraelon*, or Sezion, the plain of, 574, b.
- Estangeber*, a sea-port in Edom, 310, a.
- Etham*, second encampment of the Israelites in departing out of Egypt, situate near the borders of Arabia Deserta, 503, b. Supposed to be Be-thee of Herodotus, ibid. (O).
- Eth-baal*. Vid. Isobal.
- Eve*, by whom tempted, 61, a. The time of her death uncertain, 80.

Evi, king or duke of Midian, 303, c.
Evil merodach, Iluoradam, or Ebidan-merodach, succeeds his father Nabocassar, or Nebuchadnezzar, 964, d. While regent for his father, when under distraction of mind, attacks unjustly the Medes, and is defeated by them, 965, a, b, c. This false step greatly exasperates his father against him, by whom he is imprisoned, ibid. d. Succeeding to the throne, takes Jehoiachin out of prison, and entertains him like a king, ibid. Indulging himself in sloth and wickedness, becomes intolerable to his subjects, and after a very short reign, is treacherously murdered by Neriglissar, his sister's husband, ibid. e. Most likely to have been the Belshazzar of Daniel, ibid. Proofs thereof, ibid. f, & 966, a, b.
Eunuchs of all kinds excluded from the congregation of the Lord, 665, d. What meant by that expression, 666, a.
Euphrates, 55, d, & seq. Its course, 909, c, d. An account of this great river, ibid. & seq. The ancient way of navigating it, 910, a, b.
Europa, daughter of Agenor, (according to some of Phœnix) stolen by Jupiter, transformed into a bull, that is, in a ship named the bull, and carried into Crete, 408, b.
Eusebius of Cæsarea, his animadversions on the cosmogony of the Phœnicians, 12, a. And on the Egyptian cosmogony, 13, d, e. Took all advantages to represent the Pagans to the worst, 12, b.
Exinus Pontus, or Axinas, as it was first called by the Greeks, said by some to be a corruption for the sea of Askanax, 166, f.
Excommunication, the most dreadful of all the Jewish punishments, though not a capital one, 674, a. Enoch supposed the author of it, ibid. Passed from the Jews to the Christians, 675, a. Never used by the primitive church in that damning sense, in which the Jews, and some modern churches understand it, ibid. Three kinds of excommunications among the Jews, 674, (E).
Expiation-day, or day of atonement among the Jews, the only one of humiliation, by divine appointment, 617, c. Why ordained, 618, a. How kept, ibid. b. The high-priest's office on this day more solemn and awful, ibid. c, d. Ceremonies practised on this occasion, ibid. & seq. Other expiations were to be performed, 621, a.
Extortion. Vid. Matter.

F.

FAMINE, averted by the murder of seven of Saul's sons, 788, b.
Farabi, al, 4, a.
Feasts, ceremonies used by the Jews at their feasts, 691, d.
Firaon, a fabulous king of Egypt, 280.
First-born of men, why to be consecrated to God, and in what manner redeemed, 502, c, d. First-born of the males not to be restrained to the eldest son, 626, b. Whether Jesus was subject to this law, ibid. (F). How they were to be redeemed, ibid. The first-born of clean beasts also consecrated to God, and could not be redeemed, ibid. Ceremonies used in killing it, ibid. & c. If unclean it might be redeemed, 627, a, & (G). Laws relating to the first product of trees, ibid. First-born of the Egyptians killed by the destroying angel, 501.
First-fruits, every one among the Jews obliged by law to offer those of his fields, orchards, and vineyards, 625, a. Neither the time nor the quantity prescribed by the written law, ibid. Agreed by their wise men, that they ought at least to amount to the sixtieth part of the product, ibid. b. After the building of the temple, all obliged to bring them thither, ibid. Ceremonies used on that occasion, ibid. c, d. Several remarkable particulars concerning these ceremonies, from the Talmud, 625, (C). Under this head included the first cake of every lump of dough that exceeded the bulk of 40 eggs, 626. Laws concerning this offering, ibid.

Flax of Egypt exceeding fine, 183, a.
Flesh, whether permitted to be eaten before the deluge, 112, b, c.
Flier, one of the plagues of Egypt, 497, a.
Flood, the profane history of it, 86, a. Account of it from the Phœnician antiquities, ibid. & seq. The Chaldean account of it, 91, d. The account of it given by the Greeks, 95, (N). All mention of it suppressed by the Phœnician historians, 88, (N) Why, ibid. A short history of it, 95, d, & seq. The prophane testimonies of this catastrophe, ibid. Whether topical, 96, b. Reasons proving that it was general, 97, a, b, c. Conjectures as to the manner wherein it happened, 97, c, & seq. Dr. Burnet's theory of it, 99, f, & seq. Mr. Whiston's, 101, a, & seq. The most rational account of it, 102, c, d. To what height the waters reached, 106, a. They assuage, ibid. b. When the flood began, and when it assuaged, ibid. a. Persian and Indian traditions of it, 107, a, b, & seq. Several particular floods, 96, a. That of Ogyges in Attica, ibid. (N). Of Prometheus in Egypt, ibid. Of Asia minor, ibid.
Fa-hi, first king of China, 116, a. Whether Noah, ibid. (N). His death, ibid.
Forbearance, the 120 years of God's forbearance, 84, b.
Fornication, how punished among the Jews, 676, a.
Frogs swarms of, brought in by Moses and the magicians, 466, c.
Funeral ceremonies used by the Jews, 696, d, & seq.

G.

GABALIS Count, a passage of his, relating to the crime of Ham, 120, (N).
Gad, Jacob's first son by Zilpah, 441, d. His prophecy to him, 464, a, b. How verified, ibid. (M). His lot in the promised land, 569, c.
Gad prophet, sent to David, 789, a.
Gadates and Gobrias, two Babylonians of rank, cruelly treated by Laborsoarched king of Babylon, 969, a. Have a chief hand in the subversion of that empire, ibid.
Galatians, or Gauls, of Asia minor, descended, according to some, from Gomer, and from him called Gomorites, 166, d.
Galilee sea of, 577, b.
Galli, or eunuch priests of the great Syrian goddess, 374, c. How the unnatural custom of emasculating themselves was introduced, ibid. d, e, & seq. Ceremonies used at their funeral, 376, c, f. They used a woman's attire, and were wholly addicted to a feminine life, ibid. e.
Games of no kinds among the Jews, 694, a. Not only forbid, but abhorred by all good Israelites, ibid. (Q). Games of hazard look'd upon by them as a kind of theft, 694, b.
Gardens hanging, of Babylon, described, 961, b, c. & seq.
Gassendi revives the atomic system, 22.
Gath, a city of principal fame in Palestine, and the royal seat of the Palestines for some time, 341, b. Famous for giants, or anakins, who there fixed their abode, ibid. c. The inhabitants fall on the children of Ephraim, 347, d.
Gauls, of Asia minor, according to some, descended from Gomer, the eldest son of Japhet, 166, d.
Gaus, an Egyptian admiral of the Persian fleet, revolts from the Persians, and joins Achris, king of Egypt, 274, c. Is treacherously slain, ibid. f.

- Ge*, father and wife to Uranus, 89, & 135, a. Her name given to the earth; ibid.
- Gedaliah*, the Jewish deputy, murdered by Ishmael, 851, b.
- Gibbazi*, servant to Elisha, takes one talent of silver, and two changes of raiment, wherefore the leprosy is entailed upon him and his posterity, 386, c, & 817, c, & (O).
- Genealogical* table of the Antediluvians, 76.
- Genesart* lake of, 577, b.
- Genesis*, supposed to have been writ by Moses, during his retirement in Midian, 484, (R).
- Genius* tutelar. Vid. Angel. Genii, a sort of intermediate creatures between angels and devils, in the theology of the orientals, 51, inhabited the world, according to them, many thousand years before Adam, ibid. b, c.
- Gemubath*, son to Hadad the fugitive, king of Edom, by Taphene, queen of Egypt's sister, 315, b.
- Genus* and Genua, who, 86, c.
- Geography* the first rise of, 256, b.
- Geometry*, first found out by the Egyptians, 217, c.
- Gerar*, an ancient city of the Philistines, and once the seat of their kings, 341, c.
- Gerar* the vale of, where Isaac sojourned, when he departed from Abimelech, 574, a.
- Gergases*, in what part of Canaan situated, 323, c.
- Gergases* of Canaan, probably fly into Africa, 335, a, & (D).
- Gerizim* mount, 540, c, 573, a.
- Germanicia*, a chief city of Commagene, 361, a.
- Gerosstratus*, king of Arad, 421, a. Served Darius against Alexander, but submits to the conqueror, ibid. b.
- Gershom*, one of the main branches of the Levites, 633, b.
- Geshur*, a kingdom of Syria more ancient than that of Damascus, 380. Series of its kings, ibid. Abraham said by some to have reigned there, ibid. (B). Their kings but petty princes, 391. Not allowed by Josephus to have been kings, but only a family of nobles, ibid. (I). Allied to David, who married Maacha, daughter to Talmai king of Geshur, ibid. b, c. Transplanted by the Syrians, ibid. c.
- Geshurites* and Gexerites unite with the Amalekites against the Israelites, 321, a. What people meant by Geshurites, ibid. (I).
- Geiber*, one of Aram's sons, according to Josephus, prince of the Bactrians, 163, c. Probably seated about the river Centrites, between Armenia and the Carduchi, ibid.
- Gethsemane* vale of, 587, a.
- Gizer*, city of the Canaanites, taken by Pharaoh king of Egypt, and burnt, and the inhabitants put to the sword, 337, a. Afterwards rebuilt by Solomon, ibid. The same city, according to some, given to Solomon by Pharaoh for his wife's dowry, 793, b.
- Gexerites*, allies of the Amalekites against the Jews, 321, a. Some account of them, ibid. (I).
- Giazengian*, king of Egypt before Adam, 278, a.
- Giants*, probably Cain's race, 82, c. Believed by some to be incarnate spirits, ibid. (N). What gave rise to this opinion, ibid. Their origin, according to the prophecy ascribed to Enoch, 82, (N). That there were men of a gigantic size and strength, no ways incredible, 84, (N). Two distinct races of them, ibid. The original cause of their monstrous stature, ibid. Probably they continued to the flood, ibid.
- Gibeath* the inhabitants of, guilty of a horrid breach of hospitality, 740, d.
- Gibetha*, a city of the Philistines besieged by Nadab and after by Elah, kings of Israel, 381, b.
- Gibion*, a city of the Hivites, the inhabitants cunningly persuade Joseph to make a league with them, 331, d, e, f. But are condemned to be hewers of wood, and drawers of water, 332, a.
- Besieged by Adonizedek king of Jerusalem, and relieved by Johua, ibid. Gibion, where Johua commanded the sun to stand, 558, b. The wilderness of Gibon, 575, b.
- Gibionites* revenge themselves on Saul, 788, b.
- Gideon* saluted by an angel, the saviour of his people, 743, d. Miraculously encouraged to undertake the work, ibid. d, e. Destroys the altar and grove of Baal, ibid. Is surnamed Teruah, 744, a. The import of the word, ibid. Defeats with 300 men, the confederate armies of Midian, Amalek, and that of the Arabians, 744, d. His stratagem, ibid. Punishes the magistrates of  Succoth, for refusing him and his men a small refreshment, 745, d. Puts all the inhabitants of Peonai to death for the same fault, ibid. e. Desires the Israelites to present him with the golden ear-rings they had taken from their enemies, 746, b. Causes an ephod to be made with them in his own city, ibid. b. Dies, ibid. e.
- Gibon*, according to the Jews and the fathers, the same as the Gangu, 56, a.
- Gilboab* mount, 573, a.
- Gilead*, or Yegar-sabadutha, etymology of the word, 444, d. A monument erected by Jacob and Laban, in memory of their covenant, ibid.
- Gilead* mount, 573, a.
- Gilgi*, the first and best, said to have been made with the sand of Tyre, 594, d.
- Gnephadus*, king of Egypt, 261, a. Forbids all luxury, curbs Menes who first introduced it, and causes his curse to be engraved on a pillar in the temple of Thebes, ibid. b.
- Goats*, why worshipped by the Egyptians, 211, b.
- Gobrias*. Vid. Gadates.
- God*, creator of the world, both as to matter and form, a, a. His power of creating matter, ibid. b, c. He is a free agent, 5, a. The world not an involuntary effect of his most nature, ibid. a, b. Whether possible that he and his creatures may have always existed together, 5, c, d, e. Essential distinction between his duration, and that of creatures, 5, d, e. The author of matter, and the first sole principle of motion, 11, c. How some pretenders to christianity endeavoured to free God from the imputation of evil, 29, d, c. The 120 years of his forbearance, 84, b. Not the hardener of Pharaoh's heart, 494, (D). The words ought to be translated, that God suffered the heart of Pharaoh to be hardened, ibid.
- Gods*, Egyptian gods, reigning before the flood, 94, d, e. Who meant by their gods, ibid.
- Gog* and Magog, seem to be the same name, 167, c. Called by the Arabs Tajui and Majui, ibid.
- Gogarene*, a country, according to some, deriving its name from Gog and Magog, 167, c.
- Goliath* the Philistine, twelve foot and eight inches high, 353, (N). His armour, ibid. d, & (N). Challenges to a single combat any one of the host of Israel, 354, a, b. Killed by David, ibid. d.
- Goliath*, a son of Goliath, having six fingers upon each hand, and six toes on each foot, killed by Jonathan, David's brother, 357, b, c.
- Gomerites*, called by the Greeks Galatians, the Gauls of Asia minor inhabiting part of Phrygia, descended from Gomer, 166, d.
- Gopher*, what denoted by, 104, (N).
- Gorgus*, a river of Affria, 859, a, & (I).
- Goshen*, where Jacob and his family settled, after their going down into Egypt, 457, d. Its situation, ibid. (A).
- Government*, the first original of civil government, 171, b. At first patriarchal, ibid. Changed into monarchical, ibid. d.
- Greek* philosophers, received their physiology from the Egyptians, 12, (N). Account given by the Greeks of the universal deluge, 95, (N). Settled in Egypt in the reign of Pjammuthis, 266, a.
- Greeks,

Greeks, the first foreigners that were permitted to dwell in Egypt, ibid. b. Presented with lands near the city of Bubastis, in the Pelusian mouth of the Nile, ibid. Begin to be a considerable body in Egypt, in the reign of king Amasis, 271, d. Their pride in slighting the records of other nations, 263, f, g.
Grotius, his opinion concerning the standing of the sun confuted, 559, d.
Gross, near Ofis in Egypt described, 196, f.

H.

H A D A D, the Horite, defeats the Midianites in the field of Moab, 300, e, & 312, c.
Hadad, king of the Edomites, his country being laid waste by David, flies with many of his subjects to Pharao king of Egypt, where he marries the queen's sister, 314, e. Proves a troublesome neighbour to Solomon, 315. Established himself probably in Syria, where the royal family bore the name of Hadad, 315, e.
Hadadazer, or Hadarezer, son of Rheob, the first king of Zobab in Syria, 322, a. Wars with advantage against the king of Hamath, ibid. But his good fortune leaves him in his wars against David, ibid. Reinforced by the Syrians of Damascus, ibid. Beaten out of the field, and David possesses himself of Damascus, ibid. Loses his golden shields, ibid. His two cities Petab and Berothai plundered, ibid. Furnishes Hunin king of Ammon with 20,000 men against David, ibid. Raises a powerful army against him, but is worsted with great slaughter, and his general killed, ibid. c. Becomes tributary to David, ibid. d.
Hadar king of the Horites, 312, c.
Hadramaut, a province of Yaman, or Arabia Felix, why so called, 170, a.
Hadoram, one of Joktan's sons, where settled, 170, a.
Hagar forced to fly from Sarah, 425, d. Persuaded by an angel to return and submit, 426, a. Brings forth a son called Ishmael, ibid. Sent away with Ishmael, 430, b.
Haik, son of Togarmah, from whom Armenia, in the most ancient times, called Haikh, 167, c.
Hailstones make a terrible execution on the confederate army of the Canaanites, 564, a, b. Some remarks on that miraculous transaction, 564.
Hail-storms and thunder, one of the Egyptian plagues, 497. The great mischief done by them, 498, e.
Haliens, who, in the Phœnician cosmogony, 87, c. Haliens and Agrens, inventors of the arts of hunting and fishing, 87, c.
Ham, the youngest son of Noah, 118, c. Thought by many to have been the second, ibid. (N). Import of the word, ibid. Cursed in a branch of his posterity, 119, a. His whole race accursed by Noah, repugnant to scripture, ibid. b. And contrary to fact, ibid. & (N). Some suppose he became a black-moor, and communicated that colour to his descendants, ibid. b. Looked upon by some as the first introducer of wickedness after the flood, ibid. c. Crimes laid to his charge, 120, & (N). Held to have been the inventor of magic, ibid. Many passages to that effect, ibid. (N). Said to have been the first propagator of idolatry after the flood, ibid. The crime he committed represented by some more enormous than it is represented in scripture, ibid. Divers opinions relating to it, 120, a, & (N). Seems to have had the most numerous issue of the three sons of Noah, 121, a. The true reason of Noah's discrediting him, ibid. a. Supposed by some to have been the same with Cronus, 121, a. By others, the same with Menes, the first king of Egypt, ibid. (B). Probably removed from Shinaar, and reigned, according to some, in Phœnicia, according to others in Egypt, 164, a. Nations descended from him, 164, a. Where was his settlement, ibid. a.

Haman called an Agagite, or Amalekite, 321, e.
Hamath, the kingdom denominated from Hamathi, one of the eleven sons of Canaan, 370, f. Chronology of its kings, 380. Hamath, or Hamath the great, placed by Josephus to the north of the land of Canaan, but by Abulfeda, who reigned there, upon the Orontes between Hems and Apamea, 390, (H). The account of their kings short and uncertain, ibid. Their kings, ibid. This kingdom afterwards subject to the kings of Damascus, 391. And at last to the kings of Assyria, ibid.
Hamathites conquered and transplanted by Sennacherib and Ezra hadden, 391, d.
Hamor, king of Sekelem, his submission to Jacob, for the affiant offered by his son to Jacob's daughter, 329, c.
Hannu king of the Ammonites, 297, c. Treats the emissaries of David like spies, ibid. d. Draws together a considerable army against David, ibid. & seq. Is routed by Abijah, 298, c. (I). Besieged by Joab in the capital of his kingdom, which after two years siege is stormed by David in person. Hannu is slain in the assault, ibid. d, e.
Hanani the prophet reproves Aha, 808, b.
Huran, son of Terah, 132. Dies in Ur of the Chaldees, ibid. Various opinions relating to his death, ibid. (Y).
Haran, a city of Mesopotamia, 133, b.
Harbib, a fabulous prince of Egypt, 279, e.
Hareth the forest of, whither David retired, 576, a, & (G).
Harpocrates, one of the Egyptian deities, son of Isis and Osiris, and the god of silence, how represented, 205, f.
Harshal, a fabulous king of Egypt, 278.
Havila where seated, 164, d. Two places and two persons bearing this name, 170, f.
Hawks worshipped by the Egyptians, 208, f, 209, e. Why worshipped by them, 210, e.
Hazael, sent by Ben-hadad II. to consult the prophet Elisha concerning his indisposition, is told by the prophet, that he was to succeed Ben-hadad in the kingdom of Syria, and would prove a cruel and merciless persecutor of the children of Israel, 387, d, e. Suffles his master Ben-hadad with a thick cloth dipped in water, and ascends the throne, 388, a. Provoked by Joram king of Israel, and Ahaziah king of Judah, who possess themselves of Ramoth Gilead, invades the kingdoms of Judah and Israel, ibid. b. Subdues all that belonged to the kingdom of Israel, on the other side the Jordan putting all to the sword, ibid. b, c, d, & (Y). Wages war upon Jehoahaz, the son of Jehu, with great slaughter of the Israelites, ibid. Turns his arms against the kingdom of Judah, and makes himself master of Gath, ibid. c. Is diverted from attempting Jerusalem by king Jehoshaphat, who sends him all the treasures and rich moveables that had been dedicated by his father to sacred uses, ibid. d. Not long after detaches a party to besiege Jerusalem, which city they took and sacked, slaying all the princes of the people, and sending their spoils to Hazael, ibid. d, e. Makes himself master of Elat on the Red-Sea, 389, a. Dies and is deified, ibid. His statue, and that of Ben-hadad, carried about in the days of Josephus, ibid. (A).
Hazarmaveth, or Hazarmoth, the third son of Joktan, where settled, 170, a.
Haxazel, or scape-goat, the etymology of the word, 618, (T). Used on the expiation day, ibid. In what manner the lots were cast, which of the two goats should be sacrificed on that day, and which sent away, 619, (V).
Hazor, city of Canaan, taken by the Israelites and burnt, 333, b. Rebuilt by Jabin II. becomes again the royal seat, 335, b.

- Hebrews*, whether they derive their name and origin from Eber, 128, b, 129, a. Their language thought to have taken its name from Eber, and so have remained, at the confusion of tongues, solely in his family, 129, a, b. Common to the Phœnicians and Canaanites, ibid. Whether the most antient, 152, d, e, & seq. Whether all other tongues may be derived from it, 154, a, b, c. Its purity, simplicity, &c. 718, a, b. Its characters, 719, b, c, &c.
- Hebron*, the chief city of the Edomites who settled in Judea, 317, b. Taken and sacked by Judas Maccabæus, ibid. From whence it took its name, 424, (G). Its antiquity, ibid. Why called Arba, or Kirjath, ibid. Retaken from the Canaanites, 334, a.
- Hecatompylus*, why Thebes so called, 175, c, & (A).
- Heifer*, the ceremony of killing and burning the red heifer, according to the prescription of Moses, 621, d, & seq. The water that was mixed with the ashes of it purified the unclean, and at the same time polluted not only those who were present at the slaying of it, but such also as sprinkled the unclean person with it, 622, (L). Traditions of the Jews relating to this ceremony, ibid.
- Helopolis*, now Balbek, a chief city of Cœle Syria, 361, c.
- Hella*, an antient city, 147, a.
- Henna*, called Alcanna by botanists, a shrub growing in Egypt, 183, c. Description of it, ibid.
- H. pramonis*, or the Middle Egypt, 175, e, f. So called from the seven nomes or præfectures into which it was divided, ibid. Its extent, 176, a. And cities, ibid.
- Heracles*, his natural principles indivisible bodies, 20, a.
- Heracitus* denied the world to have been made by God or man, but by a certain inward plastic virtue of its own, 22, c. His principles of the universe, 22, b. Surnamed the obscure, ibid. Held fire to be the first principle of all things, 22, b.
- Hercules*, made general to Osiris, 240, f. His actions there, 241, & seq. Antiently represented in no form, 400, a. His temple had no images in it, ibid. Egyptians reckoned their Hercules to be 17,000 years older than their king Amasis, ibid. (R). He was the chief god of the Tyrians, under the name of Mekartus, 400, a. Why so called, ibid. (P). A great navigator, and the first who brought lead from the Cassiterides, or islands of Britain, ibid. (P). Said to have invented the shell-purple, by an accidental remark of a dog's mouth stained therewith, ibid. All the Phœnicians paid him great honours, 402, a. Ceremonies used in the worship of the Tyrian Hercules, ibid. b.
- Hermæic* books now extant, contain some remains and tincture of the old Egyptian and Hermæic doctrine, 14, a. Some account of them, ibid. & 218, e.
- Hermophradites*, mentioned by Plato, 45, c.
- Hermes Trismegistus*, secretary to Cronus, son of Uranus, 135, a. Hermes the first said to have inscribed his learning upon columns, 222, d. His pillars in Egypt, ibid.
- Hermes*, Mercury, Thoth, Tanautes, Trismegistus, supposed by many to have been one and the same person, 240, b, c. His inventions, ibid. Called from his eloquence, Hermes, that is, interpreter, or speaker, ibid. Author of 20,000 books, according to Selencus, of 36,525 according to Manetho, ibid. e, f.
- Hermogenes*, an assertor of the self-existence and im-production of matter, 29, d.
- Hermion* mount, remarkable for the dews that fall upon and about it, 571, a.
- Hermontbis*, an antient city of Thebais, 175, e.
- Hermotyrians*, a name given to a particular kind of military men among the Egyptians, 200, b.
- Hesiod*, his cosmogony, 18.
- Hexekiah*, king of Judah, over-runs the country of the Philistines, and forces ample contributions from them, 359, b. His good reign, 833, b. Causes the temple to be opened and purified, ibid. c. And a solemn passover to be celebrated, ibid. d. Invites Israel to it, ibid. e. Several of them come to the feast, 834, a. Refuses to pay tribute to the king of Assyria, ibid. e. Recovered, by his confidence in God, from a dangerous distemper, 837, a. His vanity punished, 839. His death, ibid. c.
- Hexion*, the second king of Damascus, supposed to be the same with Rezon, 382, e. Lives at peace and amity with the kings of Judah and Israel, ibid.
- Hiel*, the Bethelite, rebuilds Jerico, 555, b.
- Hieracon* the island of, in the Arabian gulf, 170, a. Also a town of the same name on the river Lar, ibid.
- Hierapolis*, or the holy city, or Magog, a city of Cyrrhestica in Syria, 361, b. Famous for the temple of the great Syrian goddess, 372, c. A. description of the temple, ibid. Of idols, statues, &c. in and about it, 373, a, & seq. Its sacred lake, oracle, riches of the temple, priests, sacrifices, festivals, religious customs, laws, and traditions of the place, 373, & seq. Ceremonies used by such as undertook pilgrimages to that city, 376, d, e. An antient tradition of the inhabitants, relating to the flood, 95, e, & 96, (N).
- Hieroglyphical* figures used by the Egyptians, said to have been the invention of Hermes, 223, c. Made use of to conceal their doctrines from the vulgar, ibid. c.
- High places*, expressly forbidden the Jews by God, 693, b, & 662, (H). Abominations committed in them by the Jews, ibid. c, d.
- High-priest*. Vid. Priesthood, Priest.
- Hinnom* vale of, near the walls of Jerusalem, 574, a. Remarkable for the superstition practised there in former times, 522, (N).
- Hippasus* held fire to be the first principle of all things, and to be God, 22, b.
- Hippocrates* held the heat and fire to be immortal and omniscient, 22, c.
- Hippotamus*, or river-horse, common in the Upper Egypt, 181, d, e.
- Hiram* king of Tyre, called also Hieromus, Hieromachus, Irom, &c. concludes an alliance with David, presents him with cedar-trees, and sends him workmen to build him a palace, 413, d. Congratulates Solomon on his accession to the crown, ibid. Copy of Solomon's letter to him, and his answer, ibid. e, & 414, a. His embassy and treaty with Solomon, 794, b. Proves very serviceable to Solomon in the building of the temple, and fitting out his fleet, ibid. b, c, d. Improves Tyre, builds temples, and enriches them with donations to a very great value, ibid. e, f. Said to have given his daughter in marriage to Solomon, by whom Solomon was induced to adore Astarte the goddess of the Sidonians, 415, a. Dies, ibid.
- History* profane, why so corrupted in what regards Assyria, 862, b.
- Hiti*, or Is, a city in the neighbourhood of Babylon, 144, c, & (I).
- Hittites*, descendants of Ham, 322, a. One of the primary nations of the Canaanites, ibid. Dwelt about Hebron, 323, c. Their generous behaviour towards Abraham, 329, a. Some of them left to prove the Jews, who dwelt in the land of Canaan in common with them, 335, a. But were reduced to a state of slavery by Solomon, 337, b.
- Hivites*, inhabitants of Canaan, 323. Left to prove Israel, and lived in common with the Jews, 335, a. But reduced to a state of slavery by Solomon, 337, b.
- Hobab*,

- Hobab*, son of Jethro, serves the Israelites as a guide through the wilderness, 302, b.
- Hobbes* held that there was no substance distinct from nature, 9, b, c. Absurdity of this opinion, ibid.
- Hobam*, king of Hebron, joins Adonizedek, king of Jerusalem, against the Gibronites, 332, a. Is cut off by Joshua in a miraculous manner, ibid. b, c.
- Holofernes*, the chief captain of Chyniladan, or Nabuchodonosor, marches with a powerful army against those who had refused to attend his master in his war with Media, 899, a. Lays waste whole countries, ibid. Marches against the Jews, who resolve to oppose him, 900, b, c. Invests Betulia, and sets guards over their springs of water, ibid. e, f. Killed by Judith during the siege, 901, c.
- Homer*, a Jewish measure, about five pints, 509, d.
- Hon*, one of the heads of the house of Reuben, 259, a. Joins with Korab in a conspiracy against Moses, ibid. His punishment, 530, b.
- Hophni* and Phinehas, their vile characters, 755, b.
- Hor* mount in Edom, where Aaron died, 310, b.
- Horites*, the antient inhabitants of Edom, 308, b. Their forms of government, 310, c. Their kings, 312, a. Their monarchy broken into several little and independent principalities, and governed by the posterity of Esau, and that of Seir, 312, c. Driven from the land of Seir by the posterity of Esau, 313, a.
- Horeb* mount, 511, a.
- Hormah*, or Chormah, i. e. utter destruction, the field where the Israelites gained the first Victory over Arad, one of the kings of Canaan, 531, c.
- Horonaim*, city of Moab, 285, c.
- Hothai*, the son of Elab, succeeds Pekah in the kingdom of Israel, 830, d. Rout and puts to the sword 120,000 of Abaz's best subjects, 831, c. His troublesome reign, 833, a.
- Hud* of the Mohammedans, supposed to be the same with Eber, 130, a, b.
- Hul*, son of Aram, Shem's fifth and youngest son, where settled, 163, c.
- Hunting*, nothing more proper after the deluge to procure a man esteem, 122, c. Considered antiently among the Persians as one part of a regal education, ibid.
- Hur*, king or prince of Midian, 303, c.
- Hur* retires with Moses and Aaron to a hill, while the Israelites, under the command of Joshua, engage the Amalekites, 511, c. Holds up Moses's hands with Aaron, by which means the Israelites gain a complete victory, 512, a. Thought to have been of the tribe of Judah, and the son of Efron the grandfather of Bezaleel, 512, a.
- Husbandry*. Vid. Agriculture.
- Hyba*, his fidelity to David, 78, c. By David's advice joins Abulom, and disappoints the counsels of Abimelech, 783, c, & 784, c, d.
- Husham*, of the land of Temani, king of the Horites, 312, c.
- Huz*, the eldest son of Nachor by Milkab, supposed to have peopled and given name to the land of Huz, 431, (D).
- Hycsos*, or king shepherds in Egypt. Vid. Shepherds.
- Hyle*, the same with matter, 31, b.
- Hyfistur*, who, 88, c, & 89, a.
- Hyppuranius*, who, in the Phœnician History, 89, a.
- other tribes, except their virgins, who are given in marriage to the Benjamites, 742, a.
- Jabin*, king of Hazor, joins several other princes against the Israelites, 332, c. Is routed by Joshua, ibid. f. Perishes with his city, 333, a.
- Jabin II.* king of Canaan, rebuilds Hazor, and re-establishes the royal seat there, 335, b. Reduces the Israelites to a state of slavery, 336, a. His army under the command of Sisera routed, and his dominions forced from him by the children of Israel, ibid. b, c. Himself slain, ibid. & (K). & 743, a.
- Jacob* born, 437, a. Etymology of his name, ibid. (R). His mother's favourite, ibid. Buys his brother's birth-right, 438, a. His ungenerous behaviour to his brother, 305, d, & 307, c, d. Sent to Padan Aram, 440, b. His vision near Luz, ibid. Serves seven years for Rachael, 440, d, e. Is cheated by Laban, ibid. Marries Rachael, 441, a. Reuben born to him by Leah, 441, b. Simeon, Levi, and Judah, ibid. c. Dan and Naphthali born to him by Bilhah, ibid. d. Gad and Asher by Zilpah, ibid. His stratagem of the speckled sheep, 442, c, d. Ill used by Laban, 443, a. Steals away from him, ibid. b. Over-taken by Laban, 444, a. Enters into a covenant with him, ibid. d. His vision of an host of angels, ibid. d, e. In memory of the vision, calls the place Mahanaim, ibid. Sends presents to Esau, 445, a, b. His wrestling with an angel, ibid. b. Whether to be understood in a spiritual sense only, ibid. (D). Changes his name from Jacob to Israel, ibid. b. Meets his brother Esau, and their interview, 446, b, c. Stops some time at Succoth, ibid. c. Buys a piece of ground near Shechem, 447, a. The treachery of his sons, Simeon and Levi, towards the Shechemites, 447, d. Is bid to go and dwell at Bethel, 448, a. Orders all his family to bury all the idols they had brought from Padan Aram, and taken from the Shechemites, ibid. Benjamin born to him by Rachael, 448, e. Grieved for the incest of his son Reuben, ibid. Goes to Mamre to see his old father Isaac, continues with him till his death, and buries him in the cave of Macphelah, ibid. d. Continues at Mamre, ibid. Joseph his darling, ibid. d. Supposes his son Joseph killed by a wild beast, his affliction, 449, e. Sends ten of his sons to Egypt to buy corn, 453, d. Keeps Benjamin with him, 454, a. But is prevailed upon, the provision which the others had brought being spent, to part with him, ibid. d, e. Sends presents to Joseph into Egypt, 455, a. What presents, ibid. (V). Is sent for by Joseph, 457, a. Goes down into Egypt, ibid. c. Is presented by Joseph to Pharaoh, 458. A list of his children and grandchildren who went down with him into Egypt, 459, a. Difficulties in adjusting the Account of them, and reconciling it with some other places of scripture, 458, (B). His request before his death to Joseph, 460, b. Makes Ephraim and Manasseh two tribes in Israel, ibid. e. Prefers Ephraim, the younger, to Manasseh in blessing them, 461, b. His last blessing to his twelve sons, 461, d, & seq. What portion bestowed on his son Joseph, and how he is said to have conquered it with his sword, 461, (D). Dies, being 147 years old, 466, a. Work ascribed to him by the Jews, (V). Jacob's well where situate, 588, d. Well known by that name in our Saviour's time, 466, a. Description of it, as at present, 588, d. Jacob's sword, 466, a. An account of his funeral, 467, a, b, c.
- Jadoniac*, a fabulous king of Egypt, 278.
- Jael*, the wife of Heber the Kenite, invites Sisera into her tent, and while he is asleep, drives one of the tent nails into his temples, 336, d.
- Jael* defeats the Canaanites, 743, b.
- Jair*, the seventh judge of Israel, 750, b. Judges Israel 22 years, 750, b.

Jamblichus's

I.

- I Wrongly made use of by the interpreters of scripture instead of Y, 55, (N).
- Jabal*, 77, a. Thought to have been the Apollo of the Heathens, ibid.
- Jabesh* besieged by Nabab king of the Ammonites, 295, d, & 759, c. Relieved by Saul, ibid. All the inhabitants of this place destroyed by the

- Jamblichus's* answer to a passage in Porphry's epistle concerning Chæremôn, 13, e. Contemporary with Eusebius, 14.
- James of Edessa*, invented seven new characters in the Syriac for all the Greek vowels, 378. Restores the Syriac to its ancient purity, 379, a. The first that wrote a grammar in Syriac, ibid. Character of this book, ibid.
- Jambres*, mentioned by the apostle: Vid. Jannes.
- Jannes and Jambres*, mentioned by the apostle, thought by some to have been the two quarreling Jews, whose difference Moses endeavoured to compose in Egypt, 840, (P). Jannes and Jambres, called by Pliny, Janne and Jotaphæ, were the magicians of Egypt who withstood Moses, 494, (E). Called by Pliny the heads and founders of magic, ibid. Celebrated in the Talmud under the names of Jochani and Mamri, ibid. Said in the Targum of Jonathan to have been the sons of Balaam, ibid. Jannes and Jambres, an apocryphal book so entitled, 494, (E).
- Japense*, opinion of a sect among them touching the origin of the universe, 8, a. Some of them acknowledge the creation of the world, 34, d.
- Japhet* the eldest son of Noah, 117, d, & (N). The import of the word, ibid. His posterity, 117, d, 118, a, b. The Persians give him eleven sons, 118, (N). Their names, ibid.
- Japhia*, king of Lachish, joins Adonizedek, king of Jerusalem, against the Gibeonites, 332, a. Is cut off by Joshua in a miraculous manner, ibid. b, c, & seq.
- Jared*, descendant of Setb, 78, a.
- Jasar*, or Jazar, a city of the Ammonites, 294, f. Plundered and burnt by the Jews, 300, a.
- Jasher*, or the upright book of, 561, c, d, e.
- Javan* where settled, 168, d.
- Ibis*, a bird frequenting the Nile, 182. Pines away and dies if carried elsewhere, ibid. b. Destroys the flying serpents, ibid. Two kinds of Ibis's, ibid. Described, ibid. Why adored by the Egyptians, 210, b, c.
- Ibzan*, tenth judge of Israel, 753, c. Judges seven years, ibid.
- Ichneumon*, or Egyptian rat described, 181, f. Of great service in Egypt, by hunting out and breaking the eggs of the crocodile, ibid.
- Ichthyophagi* and Troglodites inhabit the coast of the Red-Sea, and are called in scripture Sukkim and Ziyim, 165, d.
- Idolatry* the first introduction of, 86, (N). Worshipping of men when begun, 88, (N). The origin of idolatry by image-worship ascribed to the age of Eber; by others, namely the fathers, to that of Seruz, 130, a. Several opinions about the rise and progress of it, 851, e. What seems to have been its true origin, 852, d. Several steps of its progress, 913, e, f, & seq.
- Idumæa*, mentioned by Pliny, Ptolemy, and Strabo, the lot of the tribes of Simcon and Judah, 316, e.
- Idumæans*, the Edomites who settled in Judæa, 316, e. Incorporated with the Jews, 317, c. In the first century of Christ the name of the Idumæans lost and disused, ibid. But still used among the Jews, ibid. (Y). The whole nation of the Jews sometimes so called, and their country Idumæa from the Edomites, who seized on the southern parts of the country during the Babylonish captivity, 568, a, & (E).
- Jealousy* waters of. Vid. Waters.
- Jebo* city, in the land of Canaan, 324, a. Afterwards called Jerusalem, 323, e.
- Jeboites*, inhabitants of Canaan, 323, c. Where was their habitation; assaulted by the Benjamites, but cannot be dislodged, 334, a. Left to prove Israel, and live in common with the Jews, 335, a. Hold the city or fortress of Zion till the time of David, 336, a. Besieged by him, ibid. Who were the lame and blind whom they posted for a defence, ibid. (L). Their formels carried by storm, 337, a. And the remnants of them reduced by Solomon to a state of slavery, 337, b.
- Jeboabaz*, king of Israel, reduced to a low condition by Hazael king of Syria, 388, c. His short reign, 846, a. Deposed and carried captive into Egypt, ibid. b.
- Jeboash*, king of Judah, sends Hazael all the treasure and rich moveables, dedicated by his father to sacred uses, to divert him from the siege of Jerusalem, 388, d. In his reign Jerusalem taken and sacked by the Syrians, ibid. d, e.
- Jeboash*, the son of Jeboabaz, king of Israel, defeats, in three successive battles, Ben-hadad III. king of Syria, and recovers whatever Hazael had wrested from Israel, 389, a.
- Jeboiabab's* wicked reign, 848, c, d. And captivity, ibid.
- Jeboiada*, high-priest, places Joash on the throne, 822, d. Causes Atthalah to be put to death, 823, b. Dies, ibid.
- Jeboiakim's* wicked reign, 846, b. Commands the prophet Uriah to be put to death, ibid. d. His tyrannies, rapines, bloodshed, 847, d. His unhappy death, 848, b.
- Jebooram*, king of adab, in his reign the Philistines break into his kingdom, raze his house, put to death all his family, except Atthalah and her son Abaziah, 358, c. Influenced by his wife Atthalah, falls into idolatry, 814, d. Punished for it, 815, c. His unhappy death, ibid. d.
- Jebooram*, king of Israel, falls into idolatry at the instigation of his mother Jezebel, 814, d. His expedition against Ramoth, 818, b. Wounded at the siege, ibid. c. His death, 819, b.
- Jebozaphat*, king of Judah, the Philistines pay him a voluntary tribute, 358, b, c. Situation of the valley of Jebozaphat, 574, (Q). Why so called, ibid. Supposed to be the place appointed for the last and general judgment, 574, a. What gave birth to this tradition, ibid. (R). Jebozaphat king, his piety and success, 809, b. Reproved by the prophet Jebo, 813, b. His miraculous success against the Ammonites, Moabites, &c. 814, b. His death, ibid.
- Jebozaphat*, David's chief secretary, 778, a.
- Jebovah*, the ineffable name of God, never pronounced by the Jews, 484, (T). Only by their high-priest once a year, ibid. A most horrid curse left in the Talmud against such as shall dare to utter it, ibid. The pronunciation of it uncertain, ibid. The excessive and superstitious respect of the Jews for that word, ibid. The signification of it, ibid. Not unknown to the wisest sort of the Heathens, ibid. Why the word Jebovah is thought by some ineffable, ibid.
- Jebovah Missi*, (the Lord is my banner) an altar erected by Moses, 512, b.
- Jebo* kills the king of Israel and Judah, and is anointed king of Israel, 818, c. 819. Causes Jezebel to be thrown out of the window, ibid. Puts to death Abab's 70 sons, 819, f. And 42 princes of the house of Judah, 820, a. Destroys Baal's priest and temple, ibid. Invaded by Hazael king of Syria, loses all that belonged to Israel on the other side Jordan, 388, b.
- Jebo* the prophet reproves Baalha for his idolatry, 808, d.
- Jebothab*, the son of Gilead, one of the judges, by a concubine, 750, d. Chief of a band of fugitives, ibid. Entrusted with the command of the army of the Israelites, ibid. His rash vow, ibid. e. Defeats the Ammonites, ibid. Sacrifices his own daughter, 751, b.
- Jebo*, one of Joktan's sons, where settled, 170, a.
- Jeremiah*, his lamentations, on what occasion composed, 845, d. The only poetic piece of that kind

- kind in holy writ, ibid. Denounces severe judgment against the Jews unless they repent, 846, b. Threatened by Jeboiakim, ibid. Foretells the Babylonish captivity, 847, a. His prophecies burnt by Jeboiakim's order, ibid. Put in prison, ibid. Ill used by Zedekiah, 850, b. Well treated by Nebuchadnezzar, and lives after the captivity with Gedaliah, ibid. d.
- Jericho, a city of the land of Canaan, 324, a. Why so called, 556, c. Dismantled by the shouts of the Israelites, taken and laid in ashes, no soul being spared but the harlot Rabab, 330, e, & 556, b. A prophetic curse, added by Joshua, on the man that should attempt to rebuild it, ibid. b. Rebuilt by Hiel the Bethelite, and becomes a famous city, ibid. (C). Balsam of Jericho famous beyond any thing of its kind, 580, b. Roses at Jericho said to be of a miraculous nature, 583, c.
- Jeroboam chosen king by the ten tribes, 805, b. His idolatry, ibid. Defeated by Abijah king of Judah, 807, b. Dies, ibid.
- Jeroboam II. king of Israel, 827, a. Takes Damascus and Hamath, ibid. His reign glorious, ibid. b. His death, ibid.
- Jerusalem, according to the Arabians, built by 12 neighbouring kings in honour of Melchisedec, or for his convenience, 328, (Q). When built, 258, f. Taken and sacked by Hazeel, king of Syria, in the reign of Jeboash, 388, d, e. Taken by David, and made the metropolis of Judea, 775, a. Taken by Nebuchadnezzar, 848, c. Again besieged and taken by him, ibid. The third time taken, plundered and burnt by the same, 849, f.
- Jerusalem described, according to the sacred historians, Append. after p. 796, p. xv. & seq.
- Jeshurun, righteous, name given to the Jews, not for their righteousness, but for that of their progenitors, 666, e.
- Jethro, priest or prince of the southern Midianites, 301, a. & 302, b. (C). Receives Moses into his family, gives him his daughter, and entertains him in his family 18 years, ibid. b, c, d. Consents to part with Moses and his daughter, and grand-children, hearing that his son-in-law was commissioned by God, to lead the children of Israel out of bondage, ibid. c. Dispute between his daughter and Moses, ibid. d. Sets out to congratulate Moses on his delivering the Israelites, and is received very officiously by him, ibid. e. (D). His prudent advice to Moses, in the due regulation of government, ibid. His son Hobab serves the Israelites as a guide in the wilderness, 303, a. (E). His descendants called Kenites, joined the children of Judah, and marched with them from Jericho, into the wilderness of Judah, ibid. Rewarded with a large piece of ground, upon the taking of Hebron, ibid. Spared by Saul, in the destruction of the Amalekites, ibid. Carried into captivity, by the Assyrians, with the ten tribes of Israel, ibid.
- Jedid, son to Cronus the younger, 83, b.
- Jews, not so called till after the Babylonish captivity, when the tribe of Judah became the most considerable, 421, (A). Their first name Hebrews, ibid. The etymology of this name, ibid. How long they dwelt in Egypt, 425, (K). The manner of living, religion, and other virtues of their fore-fathers in partially considered, 469, 470, 471, 472. Their great increase in Egypt, 473, a. Not miraculous, as the Jews would have it, ibid. b, & (B). Cruelly oppressed by the Egyptians, ibid. c. The cause of the hatred which the Egyptians bore them, 4-3. Their cruel bondage began under a king who knew not Joshph, 474, b, & d. What prompted him to such violent measures against them, 475, (E). Divers opinions of the learned touching the king, who began to treat them so inhumanly, 474, (D). Commanded to drown all their male children, 477, a, b. Their burthens increased after Moses's soliciting for their departure, 493, b, c. Celebrate the passover the first time, 499, d. Depart out of Egypt under the conduct of Moses, being to the number of 600,000 men able to bear arms, 501, e. March from Rameses, Moses's dwelling-place, to their first encampment at Succoth, 502, a. Their first-born consecrated, and the law concerning it, ibid. c, d. They carry Joseph's bones out of Egypt, ibid. d. Order of their march, 503, b. Arrive the second day at Etham, near the borders of Arabia Deserta, 503. Conducted by a pillar of light in the night-time, and by a column of smoke in the day-time, 504, a. Commanded to wheel about from Etham towards Phihabiroth, between the Red-Sea and Migdol, ibid. c. And overtaken by the Egyptians, ibid. d, e. Their consternation, ibid. Moses comforts them, g. The Red-Sea is divided, and they pass through safe, while Pharaoh with his army is drowned, 505, 506, 507. Whether their passing was really miraculous or not, 505, (P). The place where they crossed the Red-Sea uncertain, 507, c. Murmur for want of water, 508, d, e. A new murmur for want of provision, 509, a. Manna promised, and quails sent in abundance, ibid. d, e. Manna falls at some distance from the camp, ibid. d, e. A new murmuring for want of water, 511, a. Which flows from a miraculous rock, ibid. Whether this rock accompanied them, ibid. (T). Attacked by the Amalekites, whom, under the command of Joshua, they put to flight, while Moses held up his hands to heaven, 511, c. March from Rephidim to the wilderness of Sinai, 512, d. They encamp near mount Sinai, 513, a. Which appears covered with fire and smoke, ibid. e. The decalogue delivered to Moses, 514, a. Some of their ceremonial laws instituted, 516. Whether they borrowed any of their ceremonies from the Egyptians, ibid. (Y). Ratify the covenant with God, 518, c, d. Give him over, during his 40 days above on mount Sinai, for lost, 520, a. Set up a golden calf, and fall a worshipping it with burnt sacrifices, &c. ibid. b, c, d. Moses returning from the mountain, commands the sons of Levi to put 300 of the delinquents to death, 521, d. They make a free offering of all their most precious things, for the making of the tabernacle, 521, b, c. The heads of each tribe appear before Moses and Aaron, and present offerings to God, 523, c. Again they rebel at Taberah, and an extraordinary fire begins to consume the extremities of the camp, 524, b. Which is extinguished at the prayers of Moses, ibid. A supply of quails sent them, which lasted ten days, 525. A fresh plague destroys a great number of the rebels, 526. Spies sent to view the promised land, ibid. a. Ten of them bring an ill report, ibid. c. And cause an insurrection, ibid. d. Think of returning into Egypt, ibid. d. Threaten to stone Moses, endeavouring to quell the tumult, ibid. e. All above 20 years of age excluded from entering into the promised land, ibid. f. Their rash and ill-timed exploit against the Amalekites punished with a great slaughter, 527, c, d. God's wonderful care of their new generation in the wilderness, 528, a. Their raiments continue whole, ibid. Whether this was miraculous, ibid. (L). Stone a sabbath-breaker, ibid. c. Several of them form a conspiracy against Moses, 529, d. And are miraculously punished, 530, b, c. Murmur afresh against Moses, and are punished with a plague, which destroyed 14,700 men, ibid. d. Guilty of several idolatries not recorded by Moses, 531. Attempt to enter Canaan by the narrow passes, called the way of the spies, ibid. b. But routed by Arad, one of the kings of Canaan, ibid. make a second push, defeat the king, and destroy some of his towns, ibid. c. A new murmuring for want of water, 532, a. Another for want of provisions, ibid. d. Multitudes of them destroyed by fiery serpents, ibid. Recur to Moses, who, by God's command, sets up a brazen serpent, 533, a. By looking upon it, those who were bitten by the fiery serpents are healed, ibid. God forbids them to commit any hostilities against the Moeabites, and Ammonites, 533, b. Arrive at the land of the Amorites, and beg a peaceable passage through their territories, which Sihon king of Heshbon refusing them, they attack him, and overthrow his army in a pitched battle, seize upon his kingdom, and put men, women and children to the sword, 534, a, & 303, a. Og, king of Basban, attempting in like manner to obstruct their passage, undergoes the same fate, ibid. a. Debauched by the women to idolatry, 535, a. Punished by a plague, which carried off 24,000 of the offenders, ibid. b. One thousand more put to death by God's command, ibid. Gain a signal victory over five kings of Midian, 536, a. Put them all to the sword, ibid. Commanded by Moses to put to the sword all the male children, and such women as were not virgins, ibid. b. Being numbered by Moses, before their entering into the land of promise, are found to amount to six hundred and one thousand seven hundred and thirty men, able to bear arms, besides the Levites, 536, c. Offer part of the Midianitish spoils to God, 539, a. Commanded to destroy the idols of Canaan, 539, b. The limits of the promised land appointed, ibid. A form of acknowledgment prescribed to them by Moses, which they were to make every year, 540, b. The whole nation renews the covenant which their fathers had made with God in Horeb, 541, a, b. Why they discontinued circumcision in the desert, 545, a. Their manner of encamping, 545, b, c. Their standards, 547, e, & 548, a, b. Their manner of decamping, 549, b, c. Their method of engaging their enemies, 550, d. The state of their host, at their entering into the promised land, 551, b, c. Prepare to march towards Jordan, 553, b. The order of crossing the river, ibid. c. Which divides itself to open a dry passage, ibid. e. Renew the passover, 555, a. The manner of their taking Jericho, 556, a. Repulsed at Ai, 557, a. Achan's crime occasion of this loss, ibid. b. Who is stoned by the people, ibid. c. Defeat the confederate army of the Canaanites, 558, a. Some remarks on the two miraculous transactions which happened on this occasion, viz. The stopping of the course of the sun by Joshua, ibid. b. And the rain of stones, which fell upon the Canaanites, 564, b, c. They finish the conquest of Canaan in six years, 558, a. Description of this land, 566, & seq. Their government a theocracy, 594, a. Their laws, ibid. Laws against idolatry, 597, e. Their positive laws concerning the worship of one true God, 598, c. Laws positive and negative concerning the sabbath, passover, and other festivals, holy-days and fasts, 600, e, & seq. Laws concerning vows, 630, a, & seq. Laws concerning the priests, Levites, and Nethinims, 632, & seq. Concerning the cities of refuge, 647, & seq. Relating to judges and courts of judicature, 669, & seq. Against murder, 675, b, & seq. Against adultery, and all other unlawful commerce of sexes, 676, & seq. Against theft, 683, c. Against false witness, coveting another's property, relating to food, raiment, planting, sowing, &c. 686, & seq. Of their customs, 690, d, & seq. Their arts and trades, 700, d, &c. Their war, arms, alliances, &c. 701, & seq. Their agriculture, 705. Their trades and manufactures, 707, a, b. Dress, ibid. Their poetry, 709, c, d. Music and musical instruments, 714, a, & (O). Their language, 717. Their manner of writing, 727, a. Education and learning, 727, c. Their measuring of time, 729, d, e. Their hared to all foreign, and especially the Greek language, 730, c, d. Their synagogues, 730, d. Schools, 731, a. Their prophets, ibid. b. Their chronology, 733, b. A table of their judges, 737. Their kings before Jeroboam's revolt, ibid. History of their judges, from the death of Josiah to Saul their first king, 738, &c. Worship the idols of the Canaanites, 739, a, b. For their iniquity fall under the Midianitish bondage, 743, b. Are delivered from it by Gideon, ibid. & seq. After his death, fall anew into idolatry, 747, a. Return to their idolatry, and become slaves to the Philistines and Ammonites for 18 years, 750, b. Delivered by Jephtha, 751, b. Relapse again, and suffer the heavy yoke of the Philistines for 40 years, 754, a. Defeated by them with the loss of the ark, 756, a. Desire Samuel to appoint them a king, 758, a. Divided into two kingdoms, 773, a. Reigns of their kings, ibid. & seq. Their city is taken, the temple burnt, and all, except some of the meaner sort, carried into captivity, 850, c, d, & seq. Their doctrine, as to the creation of the world, 48, d. They say that God created seven things before the world, ibid. Their cabalists how supposed to account for the origin of things, 25, a. Their En Soph, ibid. b.

Jezabel, wife to Ahab, and daughter to Eth-Baal king of Sidon, 809, a. Stir up Ahab to the murder of Naboth, 812, a. Her unhappy death, 819, d.

Jezreel the plain of, in Palestine, 575, a.

Jin, or Genii, among the Mohammedans, a sort of intermediate creatures between the angels and devils, 51, b.

Jit-abarim, the 38th encampment of the Israelites on their march to the promised land, 533, a.

Inarus, king of Lybia, chosen by the Egyptians for their king, 273, a, b. Defeats the Persians, ibid. c. Is himself defeated and taken, ibid. e, f. Being set at liberty, besieges Memphis, ibid. c. Is forced to raise the siege, d. Carried prisoner to Susa, and there crucified, ibid. f.

Incense offering how performed, 629, a. Divers opinions about the place where the altar of incense stood, ibid. (N). When offered, 629, a. The reason of their continual burning of incense, ibid. (N). The altar incense of perfume called the golden altar, because covered over with gold, though of shittim-wood, 656, e. Kept in the holy place, ibid. c. Its dimensions, ibid. How the roof of it could be ordered, so as to bear the heat of the burning coals without burning the wood, 657, a, b, & seq. Its situation, ibid. c.

Incubi, demons, from whence proceeded the notion of them, 82, (N).

Indian traditions of the flood, 107, a, b.

In-san-wang, 24, e.

Innocence state of. Vid. Adam.

Inscription mentioned by the Copts, as engraven on the pyramids of Egypt, 184, e. A remarkable one on the temple of Nuth at Sai, 204, d. An inscription to Ihu still remaining at Capua, ibid.

Joab, the son of Zeruiab, David's general, 773, b. Defeats Abner, ibid. d. And kills him, 774, b. Made chief general of Israel for his bravery in the siege of Jerusalem, 775, a. Gains a complete victory over the Ammonites, 779, a. Takes their metropolis, ibid. e, & seq. His stratagem to get Abshalom recalled from banishment, 782, a. Murders treacherously Amasa, 787, e. Kills Abshalom, 786, a. David's advice to Solomon touching him, 791, d. Put to death by Salome, 792, d.

Joab,

Joseph, his piety and zeal, 823, c, d. His defection, 824, c.

Joaz king of Israel, 825, f. Defeats Amasiah, 826, b.

Job, divers opinions of the learned relating to him, his book, and country, 312, a, b. According to the ancient monuments of his genealogy received by Aristus, Philo, Polychistor, and several ancient fathers, was the son of Zarab, and the fifth in descent from Abraham by Esau, 482, a. His first name Jobab, ibid. Married an Arabian, by whom he had a son named Emon, ibid. Reigned in Idumæa, ibid. The order of the kings that reigned before and after him, ibid. & d. Contemporary with Moses, being both but three generations from Isaac, ibid. Reigned in the city of Denaba, or Dinbabab, ibid. c. Lived before the miraculous deliverance of the Israelites, ibid. d, e, f, & 483, a, b, c. His book, ibid. The three or four last verses of it probably added afterwards, in order to make the history complete, ibid. In what language first writ, ibid. c. What gave birth to the notion of its being originally writ in Syriac, or Arabic, ibid. c, d. Cleared from the imputation of a modern critic, ibid. e. Several particulars added to his History by the Jews, ibid. e, f.

Jobab, the 12th son of Joktan, where settled, 171, a. Jobab, the son of Zerah, or Bozrah, king of the Horites, by some taken for the patient Job, 12, a. Whether this was Job's first name, 482, a.

Jobab, king of Madan, joins Jabin, king of Hozar, against the Israelites, 332, e. Is defeated, ibid.

Jocabith, the daughter of Amram and mother of Moses, 477, b. Conceals Moses for three months, but after exposes him to the common fate, 478, a. Her son is saved, and delivered to her by Pharaoh's daughter to be educated, ibid. c, d.

Joktan, son of Eber, 130, e. Thirteen sons given him by the scripture, and 31 by the Arabs, 131, a. Countries possessed by his descendants in a second migration, 169, d.

Jothiel, formerly Selab, so called by Amasiah, after having taken it from the Edomites, 316, c.

Jonadab, his wicked advice to Ammon, 781, a.

Jonathan, the son of Saul, his intimate friendship with David, 764, c. Accompanied by his armour-bearer, falls upon the Philistines, makes a considerable slaughter of them, and puts them in confusion, 762, a, & 359, b. His father is prevented from putting him to death by the army, 762, d. He and David swear a perpetual friendship, 767, d. His death, 356, d.

Jonathan, the brother of David, kills a son of Goliath, who had six fingers upon each hand, and six toes on each foot, 357, c.

Ionic sect, all who preceded Anaxagoras meer materialists, 18, a.

Joram, king of Israel, confederates with Abasiah, king of Judah, to take Ramath-Gilead from Hazael king of Syria, 388, a, b. Dangerously wounded in this Expedition, ibid. b.

Joram, son of Toi king of Hamath, sent by his father with costly presents to David, 390, d.

Jordan river, its source, 578, a, & 577, (S). Its course, ibid. The origin of its name, ibid. & (T). Must fall in the time of harvest, ibid. c. Some of opinion that it has a subterraneous communication with the Nile, ibid. & (X). Described, ibid. d, & seq. The order of the Israelites in crossing it, 553, c. Divides itself to open a dry passage, ibid. e. Two monuments of this miraculous passage raised, 554, b.

Jorham, the younger son of Joktan, founded the kingdom of Hejaz, containing Arabia Petrea, 131, b.

Josaph born, 442, b. The darling of his father Isaac, in regard of the excellencies both of his body and mind, 448, e. Hated by his brethren, 449, a.

His two dreams, ibid. b, & seq. Sold, and carried down into Egypt, ibid. d, e. Sold to Potifar, 450, a. Solicited to an amour by his mistress, ibid. His refusal makes her accuse him, ibid. b. Sent to prison, ibid. c. Dreams of two prisoners explained by him, 452, b. Interprets Pharaoh's two dreams, ibid. e. Made master and overseer of Pharaoh's house, and other honours heaped upon him, 453, a, b. The title of Zaphnath-paaneah given him, and the meaning of these words, ibid. b, & (T). Marries the daughter of Potiphar, priest or prince of On, ibid. Has two children, Manasseh and Ephraim, by his wife Asenath, ibid. During the famine, his brothers come to him for corn, 454, a. His rough behaviour to them, ibid. b. Commands Simeon to be bound, ibid. c. Commands their money to be returned in the mouth of their sacks, ibid. c. His behaviour towards his brethren considered, 455, b, c. Orders his drinking cup to be put into Benjamin's sack, 456, a. And he brought back to him, ibid. Discovers himself to his brethren, ibid. c, d. Sends for his father, 457, a. Receives and presents him to Pharaoh, ibid. d, e. During the great famine in Egypt, buys all the lands and persons of the Egyptians for the king's use, 459, d, e. Settles that the fifth part of all the product of their lands should go to the king, 460, a. Brings his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, to Jacob, who makes them two tribes, in Israel, 460, d, e. Jacob's blessing to him, 465, a, b. Buries his father with great funeral pomp, 467, a, b, c. Treats his brethren with the same affection as in his father's life time, 467, c, d. Finding his death approach, sends for his brethren, assures them that God, according to his promise, would bring their posterity out of Egypt into the land of Canaan, 467, d. Charges them to lay his body in a coffin, to carry it away with them, and bury it in the spot of ground which Jacob had given him by his last will, 467, e. Dies about 60 Years after his father, being 110 years old, ibid. e. Many particulars added by the Jewish rabbies to his life and death, (W). Mahomet's history of him, 468, (X). His bones carried out of Egypt, 502, d.

Joshua chosen one of those that were sent to view the land of Canaan, 526, a. His report, ibid. c. Deputed by Moses to make head against the Amalekites, 511, c, d. Gains a signal victory by the prayers of Moses, 512, a. Confirmed by Moses his successor in the most solemn manner, 537, d. Inferior in many particulars, not only to Moses, but to the generality of the prophets, ibid. (C). Ninety-three years of age when he undertook the conquest of the promised land, 551, b. Sends two spies to Jericho, ibid. d. Causes to be proclaimed through the camp, that they should pass the Jordan within three days, 553, b. Communicates to each tribe the order they were to observe in their march, ibid. c. Signalized in a miraculous manner, ibid. e. God appears to him in the shape of a warrior, 555, a. And directs the manner in which he would have Jericho besieged, ibid. c. Takes Jericho in a miraculous manner, adding a prophetic curse on the man that should attempt to rebuild it, 556, a, b. Ordered by God to discover the person guilty of sacrilege at Jericho by lot, ibid. b. How these lots were cast, ibid. (E). The sun stands still at his order, 558, b. The system of some authors concerning it examined, 559, b, c, & seq. Defeats Johab king of Hazor, and other confederate kings of Canaan, 332, e, f. His death, 378, a. Josiah king of Judah, miraculously promised, 841, c. His good reign, ibid. & seq. A total reformation in his kingdom, 842, b, c, d. Repairs the temple, 843, b. The book of the law found in his

- his reign, ibid. c. The passover kept, 844, c. d. mortally wounded, 845, b. Dies at Jerusalem, ibid. c.
- Jotham*, the son of Gideon, the only saved by Abimelech, 747, b. His apologue to the people, ibid. c. d. Flies to Beer, 749.
- Jotham* succeeds his father Azariah in the kingdom of Judah, 830, a. Dies after a glorious reign, ibid. c.
- Iphigenia* the fable of, had its birth probably from the sacrifice of Jephthah, 751, (O).
- Iron king of Tyre, 417, e.
- Isaac* born, 429, d. Etymology of the word, 427. (Q). Mocked by Ismael, 430, a. How old when Abraham was ordered to offer him, 431, (B). Marries Rebecca, 433, d. Has two sons, Esau and Jacob, 437, a. Goes to Gerar, 438, b. Is envied by the people, ibid. d. Jacob gets his brother's blessing from him, 439, b. Blesses also Esau, 440, a. Dies and is buried by his two sons in the cave of Macpela, 448, d.
- Isaiah* heartens Ahaz, and frees him from all fear, 831, a. His prophecy of a virgin conceiving, ibid. b. The miracle wrought by him to encourage Hezekiah, 838, e, & (T).
- Ishbosh* is preserved from Achish's bloody hands, 822, d. Anointed and crowned king, 823, a.
- Ishbi-benath*, son of Goliath, very near killing David, 357, b.
- Ish-bogab* proclaimed king of Israel, 773, a. Barbarously murdered, 774, d.
- Ismael* born, 426. Etymology of his name, ibid. (L). The prophecy of his descendants verified in the several tribes of the Arabs, ibid. (M). Mocks Isaac, 430, a. Is by Abraham sent away with his mother Hagar, ibid. b.
- Ismael*, one of the princes of Judah, murders Gedaliah, and all the Chaldeans about him, 851, b. And 80 Israelites, ibid.
- Isis*, according to the Egyptian philosophy, the same as the moon, 13, c. Isis and Osiris, the chief deities of the Egyptians, 204, a. How represented, 205, d. Her festival celebrated with the utmost solemnities, 207, a. Ceremonies observed on that occasion, a, b. Said to have invented several medicines, whence she was called the goddess of health, 218, e. Believed to have been the daughter of Mercury, 238, f. Her history, ibid. & seq. A most stately temple erected to her at Bufiris, 243, d. Description of its ruins, ibid. (C).
- Ishara*, a god among the Malabarians, 33, d.
- Isparetta*, among the Malabarians, the first principle, 33, c.
- Israel* land of. Vid. Land of Promise.
- Israelites*. Vid. Jews.
- Israelitish* kingdom destroyed, 835, b.
- Issachar*, Jacob's fifth son by Leah born, 442, a. Jacob's blessing to him, and prophecy, 463, b. How verified, ibid. (K).
- Ithobal*, son of the chief priest of the goddess Astarte, murders Phelles king of Tyre, and seizes on the throne, 415, c. Called Eth-baal in scripture, and stiled king of the Sidonians, ibid. Builds Botrys in Phœnice, and Auzates in Afric, ibid. d. Marries his daughter Jezabel to Abab, ibid.
- Ithobal* II. king of Tyre, 416, f. In his time Tyre taken and razed by Nebuchadnezzar, 417, a. Slain in this war, ibid. b.
- Jubilee* year, 614, a. The etymon of the denomination, ibid. & (O). The beginning of it fixed to the seventh month Tisri, about the time of the autumnal equinox, 615, a. In what year the jubilee was celebrated, after the entrance of the Israelites into the land of Canaan, ibid. b, c, & seq. Whether celebrated on the 49th or 50th year, 616, b, c. How it was to be celebrated, 617, b. The design of this ordinance, ibid. c.
- Jucatan* the province of, according to Arianus Montanus, took its name from Joktan, 169, e.
- Judea*, the land of promise, so called from Judah, the head or chief of the tribes, 567, c. Vid. Land of Promise.
- Judah*, Jacob's fourth son by Leah born, 441, c. Persuades his brethren to sell Joseph to the Ismaelites, 449, d. Marries the daughter of a Canaanite, by whom he has three sons, 450. Deceived by a stratagem of Tamar, has two children by her, Pharus and Zarah, 452, b, c. Orders her to be burnt, but afterwards pardons her, ibid. a. Jacob's last blessing to him, The scepter shall not depart from Judah, &c. explained, ibid. (G). His lot in the promised land, 569, a.
- Judah* wilderness of, 575, b.
- Judah* tribe of, appointed to begin the war against the Canaanites, 738, d. This tribe defeated with great loss by the Benjamites, 741, a, b, &c. At last defeat the Benjamites, who lose 25,000 men, ibid.
- Judges* and courts of judicature among the Hebrews, and the qualities requisite in them, 670, a. Their courts held at the gates of the cities, ibid. b. Laws relating to these courts, 669, b. Traditions of the Talmudists concerning these courts, 671, (Y).
- Judith*, the daughter of Beeri, Esa's first wife, called by Moses, Adah the daughter of Eloa the Hittite, when he speaks of the posterity Esa had by her, 441, (X).
- Judith* frees her country by putting to death Holofernes, 901, c. Whether Judith a fictitious character, ibid. (Y). What credit to be given to this apocryphal book, ibid.
- Jugens*, king of Babylon, 945, c.
- Jupiter*, or Ammon, one of the Egyptian deities, 204, b. How represented, 205, e. Jupiter, principally worshipped at Thebes, thence named Disipolis, 207, c. What victims were offered to him, and with what ceremonies, ibid.
- Juviah* a fabulous prince of Egypt, 281, f.

K.

- KABUS king of Egypt, supposed by some oriental historians to be the Pharaoh of Moses, 282, c.
- Kadesh*, in the wilderness of Zin, 531, b.
- Kadmonites*, why called children of the east, 324, (E).
- Kaphoroth*, or mercy-seat, etymology of the word, 654, (T). Vid. Mercy-seat.
- Karun*, who, according to the oriental writers, 132, (X).
- Kelkeli*, king of Egypt, said to have been the first who introduced the use of magic, 280, c.
- Kendi al*, 4, a.
- Kenites*, the descendants of Jethro, 303, a. March with the children of Judah from Jericho to the wilderness of Judah, ibid. b. Rewarded by the Israelites with a large portion of ground, upon the taking of Hebron, ibid. c. Spared by Saul in the extirpation of the Amalekites, ibid. c. Carried away into captivity, with the ten tribes of Israel, by the Assyrians, ibid. e. Kenites, mentioned as a tribe of the Canaanites, seem to be a different people from the Kenin of Jethro's family, 324, (E). Called by the Chaldees interpreter Schalmite, ibid.
- Kenizzites*, 324, (E).
- Kibroth-hatarav*, or the sepulchers of concupiscence, 526, a.
- Kibt*, or Kut, one of the sons of Haw, founds a monarchy in Egypt, according to the oriental historians, 479. Great part of that nation being, according to them, his descendants, ibid.
- Kingdoms* establishment of, 171, g. Small at first, 172, b. Great kingdoms not soon formed, ibid. d, e.

Kings began early to govern tyrannically, 667, b. God relents the Jews desire of being governed by a king, ibid. Nothing in the whole body of the Mosaic laws to enforce obedience to kings, ibid. c. What meant in scripture by the forbidding kings to multiply wives and horses, ibid. Several divine prescriptions to the kings of Israel, ibid. Their kings uncontrolled, ibid. d. Had a full power, not only in civil and military affairs, but in ecclesiastical also, 668, a. Their attire, ibid. d. Kinnereth sea of, 577, b. Kir-harasheth, one of the principal cities of Moab, 293, d. Kittim, where settled, 168, f. Kiwelinga worshipped by the Malabarians, 33, d. Kobath, one of the three main branches of the Levites, 633, b. Korah, the great-grandson of Levi, by his father Jahar, one of the heads of the tribe, 529, a. Forms a conspiracy against Moses, ibid. In what year and place this conspiracy happened, ibid. (M). Draws into his interest Dathan, Ahiram, and Hon, heads of the house of Reuben, ibid. Upbraids Moses and Aaron with engrossing all the power to themselves, ibid. b. Destroyed with all his accomplices by supernatural fire, 530, b. Kraus, king of Egypt, according to oriental writers.

L.

LABAN, father to Rachel, 440, e. Cheats Jacob, and gives him Leah instead of Rachel, ibid. & 441, a. At last gives him Rachel, ibid. Obliges him, with his hard treatment, to steal away, 443, a. Pursues and overtakes him, 444, a. Searches for his gods, ibid. b. Makes a covenant with Jacob, ibid. Returns, ibid. Labaris, king of Dispolis, chose the labyrinth of Arfnoe for his sepulchre, 230, (K). Laborsarchod, or Labosarache, falsely supposed to have been the last king of Babylon, 968, f. His cruelty towards Gadates and Gobrias, 969, a. Murdered after having reigned but nine months, 968, f. Why omitted in Ptolemy's canon, ibid. Labyrinthus, or Labyntus. Vid. Nabonadius. Labyrinth the Egyptian, 193, a, & seq. Where placed, ibid. For what designed, ibid. d. Description of it from Herodotus, ibid. d, e. Some remains of it still extant, 194, c. Described, ibid. d. Ladice, a Greek, wife to Amasis king of Egypt, 271, e. A miracle on occasion of her marriage, ibid. f. Lajsh city taken and destroyed by the Dannites, 740, b. Lamb the paschal, the ordinance of it appointed in opposition to the Zabian and Egyptian worship, according to some moderns, 604, (R). Lamech, the fifth in descent from Cain, 77, a. Father to Noah, 78, a. Land of promise known by several names, as the land of Israel, of God, the holy land, Judea, Palestine, Syria, Palestina, Idumæa, &c. 567, c, & seq. Why called by these several names, ibid. b, c, & seq. Its situation and boundaries, 568, b, c. Its division among the children of Israel, 569, a. Its mountains, 570, a, b. Its valleys, 573, a. Plains, 574, b, c. Wildernesses and deserts, 575, b. Its seas, lakes, &c. 577, b, c. Its fertility, 579, c. Its extent and soil, 580, c, d. Why so much altered for the worse, 581, b, c, & seq. Its cities, 582, b. Natural curiosities, ibid. c, d, & seq. Artificial rarities, 588, a, b, c. Language, whether a new one was formed at Babel, 155, a, b. The number of languages at Babel, and the consequences of the confusion, 158, d, e. Vid. Speech. Laodicea, a town of Seleucis on the Mediterranean, 361, a. Laodicea Cabisga, or ad Libanum, the chief city of Laodicea in Syria, 361, d.

Laodicea, a province of Syria, 361, d. Latona oracle of, in the city of Batus in Egypt, 211, e. Latopolis, an antient city of Thebais, 175, e. Latos of the antients, called now Kyber, a kind of fish in the Nile, 182, d. Laver, the brazen laver in the court of the tabernacle, 662, e. Its use, ibid. Described, 663, a, b. Law the volume of, kept in the most holy place, 656, a. This was not the only copy, ibid. b. Why the prototype thus carefully preserved, ibid. The book of the law found in the reign of king Josiah, 843, c. Agreed to have been the archetype of Moses, ibid. e. Leah, daughter of Laban, given to Jacob instead of Rachel, 440, e. Bears to Jacob Reuben, 441, a. Simeon, Levi, and Judah, b, c. And Issachar 442, a. And Zabulon, and a daughter called Dinah, 441, b. Lebanon the forest of, 576, a. Le Clerc, his system concerning the standing of the sun considered and confuted, 561, a, b, & seq. Legion the great plain of, 575, a. Lebabim, who, and where settled, 165, d. Some suppose him to be the same with Labim, who came out of Egypt with Sihphak to invade Judæa, 165, d. Leopard mountains of, near Jerusalem, 121, d. Lepidotus, a fish highly esteemed by the antient Egyptians, now called Bonni, 182, d. Leprosy, of all diseases reckoned among the Jews the most desiling, 688, d. Three sorts of leprosy distinguished by Moses, ibid. (G). Those who were infected with it forced to live separate from the rest, monarchs themselves not excepted, 688, d. Even buried in separate places, 689, a. The priests the proper judges both of the malady and the cure, ibid. Believed by the Jews to be an immediate judgment from God, ibid. b. Letters the first inventors of, 720, (T). Whether the modern Coptic letters the same with the vulgar letters of the antient Egyptians, 224, (M). Leucippus, according to Laertius, the author of the atomic system, 19, a. Levi, Jacob's third son by Leah born, 441, c. Jacob's prophecy against the tribes of Levi and Simeon, 462, a. How fulfilled, ibid. (F). The sons of Levi join Moses, and kill 3000 of the Israelites, while they were worshipping the golden calf, 521, d. This zeal procures them the Levitical priesthood, entitling them to the tenths of all kinds of beasts, fruits, and grain in Israel, ibid. The tribe of Levi had no inheritance with the rest, 537, a. Being numbered from one month and upwards before entering into the promised land, amount to twenty-three thousand, 536, c. Levirate the law of, among the Jews, 678, d. Left by Moses, in some measure, to a man's choice, ibid. How this law is understood by the Rabbies, (N). Levites, how provided for, 627, b, c, & seq. Consisted of three main branches, viz. Gershon, Kobath, and Merari, 633, b. Their consecration and dress, 644, a, b, c, & seq. Their revenues, 645, b, c, d. Their rights, privileges and immunities, 646, a, b. Libanus mount, whence so called, 87, a. An account of its cedars, 362, b, c, &c. Libnah revolts from Jehoram, 815, c. Lice dust turned into, by the rod of Moses, 496, e. Thought by some to have been gnats, ibid. The magicians not able to imitate this miracle, ibid. Lilith, a woman with whom Adam lived, according to the Rabbies, 130 years, after his fall, 72, (N). Locusts, one of the plagues of Egypt, 498, e, f. Lot, son of Harax, brother of Abraham, after his father's death is brought by his grand-father Terah from Ur of the Chaldees to Harax in Mesopotamia, 283, & seq. Is adopted by Abraham, and carried into

- Canaan*, 284, a. Abraham and Lot part, ibid.
Lot chuses the plain of Jordan and dwells in Sodom, ibid. b. Assists the Sodomites against Cbedar-laomer, but is taken by the enemy, and rescued by Abraham, ibid. c. Warned by two angels to abandon Sodom, ibid. d. Retires to Bela, or Zoar, 285, b, c. His wife changed into a pillar of salt, ibid. What was her crime, ibid. (C). Various Opinions relating to it, ibid. & seq. The inhabitants of the country pretend to shew some remains to this day of his metamorphosed wife, 577. Lot retires with his daughters to the east side of the dead sea, and dwells in a cave, 285, c. His incestuous commerce with his daughters, 286, a. The eldest daughter's son named Moab, that is, of a father, and was the progenitor of the Moabites, ibid. b.
Lotus grows plentifully in the Lower Egypt, and is called by the inhabitants Al-bosbnin, being a species of Nymphaea, or water-lily, 183, b. Described, ibid.
Love made by the old Pagan poets to preside at the ranging of the confused matter, 15, d.
Lud, son of Shem, and one of the chiefs of the line of Shem, 162. Where settled, 163, c, d.
Ludim, supposed to be the people above Egypt, called by the Greeks Ethiopians, and at present Abyssines, 165, c.
Lubith, city of Moab, 287, a.
Luz. Vid. Bethel.
Lycopolites, a nome of Egypt, why so called, 211, a.
Lycus, a river of Assyria, 859, a. Why so called, ibid. (I).
Lydians, first called Mæones, and afterwards Lydians, from Lydus, 163, d.
Lydus, the son of Atys, gives his name to the Lydians, 163, d.
- M.
- MA A C A H, the favourite wife of Reboboam, 806, c.
Maakah, daughter of Tolmai king of Geshur, wife to David, 773, a.
Maazaiab, Ahaz's son, killed, 831, c.
Macedo, son of Ofris, gives his name to Macedon, 241, b.
Macedonia, plainly denoted by the land of Cbettim, 168, f.
Macphelah the cave of, purchased by Abraham, 452. Etymology of the word, ibid. (G). Sarah buried there, ibid. And Abraham, 434, d. And Isaac, 448, d.
Madai planted Mdia, 168, b, c. Whether Macedonia the settlement of Madai, ibid.
Mages among the Persians, their physiology, 31, c, d. Their traditions, with relation to their gods, and the introduction of evil into the world, 32, b.
Magic, by whom, and when invented, 120, (N). In great repute among the Egyptians, 220, c. Uncertain what were the real grounds of that science, ibid. e. Moses, Jannes, and Jotapha, said by Pliny to have been the heads and founders of it, 494, (E).
Magicians of Egypt imitate the greatest part of Moses's miracles, 434, (E). Who were these magicians, by what power they performed these wonders, and why they came short of some of those of Moses, ibid. & 495.
Magog, the second son of Japhet, various opinions with regard to his settlement, 167, d. Mistake of the modern writers, who placed Magog in Syria, ibid. Magog in Pliny by a mistake of the transcriber for Magog, 168, b. Magog, a city of Cyrrhestica in Syria, 361, b.
Magus, 88, b. Magus and Amyrus in the Phœnician records, 134, a.
Mahalalet, descendant of Setb, 78, a.
Mahalab, daughter of Ishmael, one of Esaú's wives, 307, b, & 441, a. Called Bethshemaib by Moses, when he speaks of the posterity of Esaú by her, 441, (X).
Mahanaim, or two camps, the place where Jacob saw, in his dream, an host of angels, 444, e.
Maimonides, his system, concerning the miraculous event of the sun's standing still, examined, 559, b.
Majuma, the port of Gaza, called by Constantine Constantia, and by Julian, port of Gaza, 339, c.
Malabarians, their notions as to the origin of things, 33, c, d. Their theogony, ibid. e, f.
Mali, a place so called in Arabia, 170, b.
Malkom, one of the Jewish idols in the desert, 531, b.
Mamre communicates his name to the whole country, 424, a. Oak of Mamre, ibid. (G).
Man, why the plural number, Let us make, &c. used in the creation of man, 44, a, & (N). His creation, 44, a. Created in an adult and perfect state, ibid. c. Ridiculous notions of the Talmudists in that respect, ibid. The happy state of the first pair, 53, a, & seq. Vid. Adam.
Manasseh born, 453, b. He and Ephraim presented to Jacob, who makes them two tribes in Israel, 460, d, e. The lot of the half tribe of Manasseh in the promised land, 569, b.
Manasseh king, his wicked reign, 839, c. His idolatries, sacrileges, &c. ibid. e. His murders, tyranny, &c. 840, a, b. His miserable captivity, ibid. c. Restored to his liberty, his repentance, and reformation, ibid. d. His death, 841, b.
Mandrakes brought home by Reuben, what meant by, 441, (Y).
Maneros, several traditions relating to him among the Egyptians, 213, e.
Manichæans maintained two self-existent gods, 31, c.
Mankind incorrigible, 85, b. Destroyed by the flood, ibid. c, d. Abandoned to all wickedness, ibid. a, b, &c. First migration of from about mount Ararat, 141, d, e, & seq.
Manna promised the Israelites, 509, b. Falls at some distance from the camp, ibid. d. Why called Mau, or Manna, ibid. e, & (R). The quantity that was to be gathered prescribed by Moses, ibid. d. That which was gathered on Friday lasted two days, ibid. e. Had nothing common with what we now call manna, and is to be seen in great plenty in the deserts of Arabia, ibid. (S). Proofs of its being miraculous, ibid. Moses ordered to preserve a homer full of it in a vessel, to be afterwards deposited in the ark of the covenant, ibid. d.
Marab, so called in memory of the bitter waters, 508. The Jews encamped there on their march to Canaan, ibid.
Maran-atta, or the Lord comes, or, is at hand, excommunication among the Jews, 674, a.
Marcheshvan, the second month of the Jewish year, answering our October, (K).
Marcionites, maintained two self-existent gods, 31.
Mardoc-empad, the Merodach-baladan of the scripture, who sent an Embassy to Hezekiah king of Judah, 945, c. The business of this embassy, ibid. e, f.
Marcotis, part of the Lower Egypt, 176, b.
Marna, Marnes, or Marnaß, an idol of the Philistines, worshipped at Gaza, and said to have migrated into Crete, 343, a.
Mars, son of Ofris, builds the city Maronea in Thrace, 240, a.
Marriage, no man obliged by the laws of Moses to marry, 677, (L). The Jews have always looked upon it as an indispensable duty implied in the words increase and multiply, ibid. The Jews restrained by Moses from marrying within certain degrees of consanguinity, 678, a. Degrees forbidden as incestuous, under pain of death, by Moses, ibid. Laws of Moses concerning marriages, ibid. & 679, c, & 680, a, b. Their way of counship,

- courtship, 675. Their manner of celebrating marriage, 680, c, d, & seq. Ceremonies relating to marriage from the Talmudists, 681, (S).
- Mari*, ceremonies used by the Egyptians in celebrating his festival at Papremis, 208, c, d.
- Marus*, or Mendes, king of Egypt, 259, d.
- Maser* the fabulous founder of Egypt, 280, d, e.
- Majb*, Aram's fourth son, supposed to have settled in Armenia about the Majus, commonly held to be the Ararat, and called by the Armenians Masis, 163, f.
- Mafsi* mount, whether the mountain on which the ark rested, 110, & 111. Its description, ibid. b, c.
- Masor*, signifies a fortress, and is also used in scripture as the proper name of Egypt, though by some translated as an appellative, 174, b.
- Missab*, (tempting) the place where Moses smote the rock to supply the murmuring Israelites with water, 511, b.
- Materians*, who so called, and why, 29, e.
- Mattaniab*. Vid. Zedkiab.
- Matter* created by God, 2, a, b, c. Arguments to prove the non-existence of matter, 2, d, e. Perplexing arguments arising from the extension and no extension of matter, 2, d, e. The creation of it must necessarily be admitted, 9, d. Its external motion repugnant, 10, a, b.
- Medad*, one of the elders who went not to the tabernacle, but prophesied in the camp, 525, (H). Vid. Eldad.
- Medes* always called in scripture by the name of Madai, 168, b. Shake off the Affrian yoke in the reign of Sennacherib, 895, b.
- Mediterranean*, called by the Jews the great sea of the Philiptines, and the salt sea, 576, a.
- Meabyzus* defeats the Egyptians, 373, c, d.
- Megarie* philosophers held the eternity and immutability of the world, 6, d.
- Meambolus*, why Egypt so called by the Greeks, 174, d.
- Melcartus*. Vid. Hercules.
- Melchisedec* king of Salem, 327, c. By some thought to have been Shem, ibid. (P). Presents Abraham with bread and wine, and receives from him tythes of all, 328, a. Divers opinions relating to him, 327, (P).
- Melcarthus*, or Hercules, son to Demaroon, 137, a. His temple at Gadira, or Gades, continued to the time of Silius Italicus, ibid. (T). Melcarthus, Melcartus, or Hercules, a Phœnician deity, 397, b.
- Melissus*, holds the eternity and immutability of the world, 6, d.
- Melo* makes the deluge topical, 96, (N).
- Memphis*, the chief city of the Middle Egypt, 176, a. Built by Menes their first king, ibid.
- Memrusus*, who, in the Phœnician cosmogony, 87, b.
- Min*, whether before Adam. Vid. Præadamites.
- Minahem* murders Shallum king of Israel, and seizes on the throne, 828, c. His cruelty, ibid. Invaded by Pul king of Affria, ibid. Dies, 829, a.
- Menas* a fabulous king of Egypt, 279, f.
- Mendes*, or Marus, king of Egypt, 257, c. Builds a labyrinth, ibid. d.
- Menes*, said to have been the first who reigned in Egypt, 255, c. 244, a. (A). & 246, a. Whether Cham, or Ham, the son of Noah, the Jupiter Hummon of the Egyptians, the Thamus or Adonis of the Phœnicians, the Saturn of Sanchoniatho, ibid. (A). Diverted the course of the Nile, built the city of Memphis, and its famous temple of Fulcan, ibid. a. The first that instructed the Egyptians in religious matters, ibid. Introduced luxury, ibid. & 245.
- Menetho*, from whence he extracted his history, 81, (N). His Egyptian chronology, 92, d. Upon what grounds his credit called in question by several writers, 234, & seq. His chronology of the Egyptian dynasties considered, ibid.
- Meneutis*, the name of a bull, representing Ophis, and worshipped at Heliopolis, 206, a.
- Menon*, the husband of Semiramis, 876, a.
- Mentor*, the Rhodian commander of the Greek mercenaries in Egypt, goes over to the king of Persia, 278. Betrays Sidon to the Persians, 411, c.
- Meon*, whether the name of an idol, 286, (F).
- Mezibabseth*, Jonathan's son, treated friendly by David, 778, a.
- Merari*, one of the three main branches of the Levites, 633, b.
- Merbal* king of Tyre, 417, e.
- Mercury Egyptian*, vid. Hermes, 240.
- Mercy-seat*, propitiatory or oracle described, 654, a, b, & seq.
- Meribab*, (contention) the place where Moses smote the rock to supply the murmuring Israelites with water, 511, & 532, b.
- Merodach*, a Babylonian deity, 925, a.
- Meser*, king of Egypt, divides it among his sons, 280.
- Mesessimorcadus* king of Babylon, 946, c.
- Mesha* and Sephar, mentioned by Moses, where situate, 169, d. Mount Mesha, several opinions about it, ibid. e.
- Mesha*, king of Moab, tributary to the Israelites, 292, b. Rebels, but is forced to shut himself up in the city of Kir-harashb, ibid. c. Offers his eldest son for a burnt sacrifice, ibid. d.
- Meshech*, where settled, 169, b.
- Mesr*, Egypt so called by the oriental nations, 174, b. & 280, & c, d.
- Mesram* king of Egypt according to oriental writers, 278.
- Mesraei*, the second race that governed Egypt, 92, d. ibid. (N). 235, c, d.
- Methgammab*, the city of Gath, why so called, 357.
- Methuselah*, grand-father to Noah, 78, a.
- Metrodorus*, his natural principles indivisible bodies, 20, a.
- Mettinus*, king of Tyre, father to Pigmalion, Barca, Elisa, and Anna, 415, e.
- Micah* the story of, 739, c, d, & seq.
- Micah* prophet, 839, (W).
- Micaiah* foretells Abab that his army is to be routed, and himself slain, 812, e.
- Mice*, great numbers of them bred yearly out of the mud left by the Nile, 198, b.
- Michal*, Saul's second daughter, married to David, 765, b. Her stratagem to save David's life, ibid. c, d. Given to another during his exile, 769, a. Restored to him, 774. Despises David for dancing before the ark, 776, c.
- Midian*, the fourth son of Abraham by Keturah, the progenitor of the Midianites, 299, a.
- Midian*, or Madian, two cities of the same name in the country of the Midianites, 300, e.
- Midianites* descended from Midian, the fourth son of Abraham by Keturah, 300, b. Confounded in the most early times with the Ismaelites, ibid. Their religion, ibid. Their country a part of Arabia petraea, ibid. Described, ibid. c. Their manner of life, ibid. e. Had the use of writing very early, and, according to some, instructed Moses therein, 301, b. Those of the south part of Midian enlightened by a rational and sublime system of religion, ibid. d, e. They war with Hadad the Horite, and are smitten by him in the field of Moab, 302. They purchase Joseph of his brethren, and sell him to Potiphar, ibid. a. Signalized themselves above all others, in endeavouring to turn the children of Israel from God, 303, c, d. Are defeated by Phineas, their castles laid in ashes, and all of them, with their king Balaam, put to the sword, ibid. & seq. The loss of this branch supplied by another, who wage a cruel war against the Israelites, under the kings Zebab and Zalmanna, ibid. e. & 304, b. But are utterly routed by Gideon, with no other weapon than a ram's horn in one hand, and a light concealed in a pitcher in the other, ibid. c, d, & seq. This downfall so great, that it is termed in scripture the day

- day of Midian, 305. They were a famous nation many ages afterwards, but in the first century were blended with the Arabians, ibid. a, b.
- Migdol*, signifies a tower, 503, (O).
- Milcab*, wife to Nachor, 431, c.
- Millo*, joined the Shechemites in proclaiming Abimelech, who meant by, 747, (K).
- Minchab*, all offerings which had not life, so called by the Jews, 624, (A). Divers sorts of them, ibid.
- Minerva*, how her festival was celebrated among the Egyptians at Sais, 208, b, c.
- Minuth*, a considerable city of the Ammonites, 294, f.
- Mint*, when first said to have been erected, 131, (U).
- Miriam*, Moses's sister, whether one of the two Jewish midwives mentioned in scripture, 477, (K). Offers to fetch Pharaoh's daughter an Hebrew nurse for Moses, 478, c. Calls her mother Jacobeth, ibid. d. Smitten with leprosy, on account of some reflections cast on Moses with regard to his wife Ziphorah, 526, a. Is cured by Moses, ibid. Dies in the 130th year of her age, 532, a. Her sepulchre was still to be seen, according to Eusebius, in his time, ibid. (Q). Said by some of the fathers to have died a virgin, and to have been the legislatrix and governess of the Israelitish women, as her brother Moses was of the men, ibid.
- Misor*, in the Phœnician record, according to some, Mizraim of the scripture, and Menes of the Egyptians, 134, a, & (D).
- Mitre* of the Jewish high-priest described, 640, a, & (B):
- Mizraim*, supposed by many to have begun his reign before Nimrod, 123, a. Supposed to have been the second son of Ham, 165, a. Whether Mizraim the name of a single person or of a people, ibid. b. Nations descended from him, ibid. A word of the dual termination, 174, b. By land of Mizraim meant in the scripture Egypt, ibid. Its etymology, and why given to Egypt, ibid.
- Moabites*, descended from Moab the son of Lot, by his eldest daughter, 283, c. Description of the country which they possess, 286, b, c. Governed by kings, used circumcision, and employed themselves mostly in pasturage and breeding of cattle, 287, a. The Israelites expressly forbidden to disturb them, ibid. b. Had once the knowledge of the true God, ibid. Their idols, ibid. c, d. (E). They drive out the Emims, but lose part of their acquisitions by the Amorites, 289, & seq. Send their most beautiful women to the Israelitish camp to seduce the Israelites to idolatry, 290, d, e. Not admitted to intermarry with the Israelites, for having hired Balaam to curse them, 291, a. Invade Israel, seize the eastern parts of the country, and exercise great tyranny over them for 18 years, ibid. b, c. Defeated with great slaughter by Ehud, 290, c. Treat the parents of David, flying to them, with great hospitality, 292, a. They enter into a confederacy against David when he came to the crown, who puts to the sword two thirds of them, and makes the rest his vassals and tributaries, ibid. b. (S). Rebel against Abaziah, but are routed with great slaughter by Jehoram, ibid. b, c. Attempt to revenge their loss on Jehoshaphat, in conjunction with other nations, but destroy one another, ibid. & seq. Invade the Edomites, and put to a cruel death their king, ibid. A severe judgment denounced against them by the prophet Amos, and probably fulfilled by Salmaneser king of Assyria, ibid. (I). 293, b, c. Entirely subdued by Nebuchadnezzar, into whose hands their king was given, 293, & seq.
- Marris*, or Myris, king of Egypt, dug the famous lake which bore his name, 247. According to some, he recovered Memphis from the pastors, ibid. (G). He built two pyramids, 185, a, & 247.
- Marris* the lake of, 195, c. Its circumference and depth, ibid. By whom dug, and why, ibid. d, e.
- Its communication with the Nile effected by large canals, ibid. Still subsisting, ibid. An isle in the middle of the lake, where there stood anciently two pyramids, 196, a. What sums the fishery of this lake yielded daily to the prince, during the six months of the river's retreat, 195, f. Why called at present the lake of Charon, 196, v.
- Mohammedans*, some divines among them admit atoms and vacuum endued with life and sense, 22, a. What was made, according to them, prior to creation, 48, d.
- Molae*, the primary particles of the earth, 27, b.
- Molech*, or Molech, the chief deity of the Ammonites, 295, b. Etymology of the word, ibid. c. Description of his image, ibid. Some accounts of the learned concerning this idol, ibid. (A). (B). Superstitions paid to him, ibid. & seq. Divers opinions of the learned relating thereunto, ibid. (C). The meaning of the phrase, that they made their sons and daughters pass through the fire, ibid. (C).
- Monad*, of Pythagoras what meant by, 25, d, e.
- Monarchical* government, how introduced, 171, d.
- Monastery* of the ark on the Cardu mountains, 112, d.
- Months*, the Jews had names for them before the captivity, 612, (K). Their names, ibid.
- Moon*, when created, 53, b. Worshipped by the Egyptians, 207, d. What victims offered to her, ibid. And what ceremonies used in offering them, ibid. New moons festivals of the Jews, 610, a. How they fixed the time of the new moon without astronomical tables, ibid. (H). Laws concerning this festival, 610, b, c, & seq.
- Morsh* land of, 424, a. The signification of the word, ibid. (G).
- Moriab* mount, etymology of the word, 431, a, & (C). The same on which the temple was afterwards built by Solomon, ibid.
- Mosaic* account of the creation, 35, a, b. Mosaic creation explained, 41, d, e.
- Moschici*, a people, and a long chain of mountains stretching along the north-west part of Armenia, and separating it from Colchis and Iberia, 167, e. From the people Moschici the Muscovites probably descended, ibid.
- Moschus*, a Phœnician, lived before the Trojan war, 19. Said by Poſidonius to have been the author of the atomic system, 19, e. Thought by some to have been no other than Moses, 20.
- Moses* born, 477, c. Etymology of the name, 153, (H). Concealed three months, but after exposed to be drowned, according to the king's edict, 478, a. But taken up by Pharaoh's daughter, who educated him as her own son, ibid. b, c. Gives him the name of Moses, ibid. Is delivered to his own mother, Jacobeth, to be educated by her, ibid. Brought in due time to Pharaoh's daughter, who adopts him for her son, and has him brought up in all kinds of learning, 479, a, & (N). Pretends the reproachful name of Israelite to all the pomp and glory of Pharaoh's court, ibid. Kills an Egyptian, ibid. c. Forty years of his abode in Egypt how employed, ibid. (O). Reproached with the murder of the Egyptian by an Hebrew, is forced to fly into the land of Midian, 480, b. Received by Jethro, in whose family he continues forty years, 481, b. Supposed by some to have wrote the book of Job during this interval, 481, c. God appears to him, at the end of forty years, in a burning bush, 484, a. And commands him to return into Egypt, ibid. b. Why God was pleased to appear to him in that manner, ibid. (B). Who was it that appeared to him, ibid. (S). God pleased to answer his question, a question which he had formerly refused to Jacob, 485, a. Bids him tell the Israelites that I am, &c. sent him to them, 487. Commanded to bring his people out of bondage, 448, a. His doubts cleared by two miracles wrought in his presence, ibid.

ibid. b. Nevertheless begs to be excused, 489, b. Obeys at last, and leaves Midian, ibid. c. God appears to him again, charging him to perform all the wonders he had shewn him, before the king of Egypt, and to demand the dismissal of the people of Israel, 490, b. Smitten by angel in the inn, 490, c. What was the cause of God's anger against him, ibid. (A). Why he deferred so long the circumcision of his son, ibid. Ziporah circumcises the child, and Moses is restored, 492, b. Joins his brother Aaron at mount Horeb, ibid. b. Declares his commission to the Israelites in Goshen, and establishes his credit among them with miracles, ibid. c. Delivers his message to the king of Egypt, ibid. d. Who instead of complying with his demand, increases the burthens of the Israelites, 493, a, b. Bid to go again to Pharaoh, ibid. d, e. His first miracle before him, his rod turned into a serpent, 494, c. The Egyptian magicians do the same by theirs, which are swallowed up by his, ibid. Second miracle the waters turned into blood, 496, a. Third miracle of frogs, ibid. c. Fourth miracle the lice, ibid. d, e. Fifth miracle swarms of flies, 497, a. Sixth miracle the cattle of the Egyptians killed by murrain, ibid. d. Seventh miracle, boils upon men and beasts, ibid. Eighth miracle, hailstones and thunder, ibid. e. The great mischief done by them, 498, a, b, c. Ninth miracle of locusts, ibid. e, f. Tenth miracle, great darkness during three days, ibid. Fables with which the Mohammedans have stuffed this part of Moses's history, 494, (E). How long a time Moses took in bringing all the plagues upon Egypt, 499, (H). Commands the Israelites to celebrate the passover, ibid. d. And to borrow what jewels, fine raiment, and other precious things they could of the Egyptians, ibid. The last plague sent on the Egyptians, their first-born slain by the destroying angel, 501, c. Sent for by Pharaoh, and ordered to depart, ibid. d. His first encampment at Succoth, 502, a. Consecrates the first-born of men and beasts, ibid. c. Second encampment at Etham, near the borders of Arabia Deserta, 503, b. Commanded to direct his march towards Pihahiroth, where he encamps, 504, c. Pursued by Pharaoh, ibid. c. And overtaken, d. Comforts the despairing Israelites, ibid. g. Divides the Red Sea by stretching out his rod, 505, a. Which makes way for the Israelites to go through it as on dry land, ibid. b. Whether this was really miraculous or not, ibid. (P). His song for this their deliverance, 508, b, c. Commanded to preserve an homer full of manna, to be deposited in the ark of the covenant, as a witness to future ages, 510, d. Smites a rock with his rod, and waters immediately gush out in plentiful streams, 511, b. Smote the rock two different times, and in two different places, ibid. (T). Obtains a signal victory over the Amalekites, by holding up his hands in prayer, 511, c, d, & seq. Ordered to vow a lasting war against the Amalekites, till their very remembrance was quite blotted out, 512, b. By the advice of Jethro, appoints inferior judges, some over thousands, some over hundreds, and some over tens, 512, ibid. & d. Marches from Rephidim to the wilderness of Sinai, 512, d. Encamps near mount Sinai, 513, a. Goes up to mount Sinai, 513, b. Which appeared covered with fire and smoke, ibid. e. Commanded to go down again, give a strict charge to the Israelites not to approach the mountain, and bring up his brother Aaron with him, 513, c. The decalogue delivered, 514, a. Commanded to write the commandments on two tables of stone, ibid. Goes up again to the mountain, where some ceremonial laws were added to the moral ones, 516, b. Ratifies the covenant between God and the people, 518, c, d. Takes seventy of the elders up towards the mountain, and stays forty days, 519, a. Goes himself into the cloud, ibid. Receives the two tables of stone, ibid. Given over by the people for lost, 520, a. Comes down from the mount, 521, b. His great concern in finding the Israelites worshipping the golden calf, ibid. Breaks the two tables, and upbraids his pusillanimous brother in the strongest terms, ibid. c. Destroys the idol, causes it to be ground into powder, and cast into water, of which he made afterwards the people to drink, ibid. e, d. Orders the sons of Levi to punish with immediate death 300 of the delinquents, ibid. d. Returns to the mount, and obtains not only pardon for his people, but a renewal of God's former promises, 522, e. Stays on the mountain forty days and nights, during which he neither eat nor drank, 523, a. Comes down with such a lustre in his face, that the people could not intently behold it, ibid. Commands the people to bring a free-will offering of all sorts of materials for the tabernacle, ibid. b. The tabernacle made and set up at the foot of mount Sinai, ibid. c. Extinguishes, with his prayers, an extraordinary fire which began to consume the extremities of the camp of the rebellious Israelites, 524, b. Ordered by God to appoint the great council of seventy, 524, c. How he chose these seventy out of the 12 tribes, ibid. (G). Obtains by his prayers the cure of his sister Miriam, who was struck with a leprosy, 526, a. Chuses twelve proper men, one out of every tribe, to view the land of Canaan, ibid. Ten of them bring an ill report, ibid. c. And cause an insurrection, ibid. e. Which he endeavouring to quell was like to have been stoned, but miraculously saved, ibid. e. Dissuades in vain, his people from attacking the Amalekites, 527, c, d. The Israelites routed with great slaughter, while he keeps in the camp with the ark, ibid. Supposed to have composed the 90th psalm in memory of this disaster, ibid. d. Commands a sabbath-breaker to be put to death, 528, d. A conspiracy formed against him by Korah and his accomplices, 529, d. & seq. Their dreadful punishment, 530, c. A new insurrection against Moses, which is punished with a plague, which destroyed 14,700 men, 530, d. Puts a stop to its further progress, by standing with his censor between the living and the dead, ibid. Smites the rock again, to supply the murmuring Israelites with water, 532, a. Why excluded from setting his foot in the promised land, ibid. b. Is commanded by God to set up a brazen serpent, that those who were bitten by the fiery serpents that infested the Israelites might be cured by looking upon it, 533, a. Commands all the male children of the Midianites, and such of the women as were not virgins, to be put to the sword, 536, b. The occasion of this severity, ibid. (A). Numbers the Israelites, and directs the distribution of the promised land to be made by lot, ibid. d. Commanded to take a view of Canaan from Nebo, 537, c. Knowing that his end was approaching, takes care to have Joshua confirmed his successor in the most solemn manner, 537, d. His speech to the Israelites, 539, d. A second speech, ibid. e. Prescribes to the Israelites a form of confession, which they were to make every year, when they came to offer the first-fruits of their land, 540, b. Directs Joshua and the elders to set up blessings and curses on mount Ebal and Gerezim, ibid. c. Assembles the whole nation, and makes them renew the covenant made with God in Horeb, 541, b. His song, 542, a. His last blessing to the ten tribes, ibid. c. Why Simeon omitted in this blessing, 543, a. Goes up to mount Nebo, ibid. b. His death, burial, and character, ibid. d. The contest which Michael and the devil had about his body, mentioned by St. Jude, probably from an apocryphal book, ibid. (K). His writings, ibid. His writings, and the wonders of his life, multiplied by the Rabbies, ibid. Several rabbinical dreams, touching his life, embraced and improved by the Mshammedanis, ibid.

Môr what meant by, in the Phœnician system of the world, 12.

Motion eternal of matter repugnant, 10, a.

Mountains, the highest in the world do not exceed five direct miles in height, 102, (N). Mountain of offence, where situate, 586, c.

Mourning, on what occasion used by the Jews, and how performed, 696, b. Of how long continuance, ibid. Much of the severities abated by the Talmudists, ibid. (R).

Mummies, or embalmed bodies described, 215, (I).

Murder wilful, no place of refuge for one guilty of it, 647, d. Accidental and involuntary safe in the cities of refuge, ibid. Subject to be killed by the relations of the deceased, or to be put to death by the hand of justice, if he ventured out of the limits till the death of the high-priest, 648, a. Several laws relating to cases of manslaughter, 648, c, d, & seq. God's abhorrence against it, 675, b. The guilty person to be torn from the most sacred places, ibid. Expiated from the time of the flood by the death of the murderer, ibid. In what cases, under the law of Moses, a man might lawfully kill another, ibid. c. An uncertain murder how to be expiated among the Jews, ibid. d.

Murrain, one of the plagues of Egypt, 497, d.

Muscovites, from whom descended, 167, e.

Music disapproved of by the Egyptians, 213, a.

Musical instruments invented by the offspring of Cain, 81, a, b.

Muth, son of Cronus, the same as Pluto, 138, b.

Mycerinus, the son of Cheops, and king of Egypt, 260, b. His character, ibid. Erected the third of the great pyramids, 184, b. Buries his daughter in an extraordinary manner, ibid. d. The oracle declares him to be short-lived, ibid. e. Endeavours to convict the oracle of falsehood, ibid. & seq.

N.

N A A M A H, daughter to Cain, 77, a. Supposed to have invented spinning and weaving, ibid. And to have been the wife of Noah, ibid. (N).

Naaman, general of Ben-hadad king of the Syrians, cured of the leprosy by the prophet Elisha, 385, d, e. Renounces idolatry, 386, b, c. Entreats the prophet to grant him two mule loads of earth, probably to raise an altar, ibid. Said to have founded an hospital for Gebazi, which is still extant at Damascus, ibid. (M).

Naarfaris, a river of Babylon, 909, a, b.

Nabal, his rude behaviour to David, 768, e. Dies, 769, a. And David marries his wife Abigail, ibid.

Nabopolassar the great Nebuchadnezzar of scripture, 948, e. Subjects the Assyrian empire to the throne of Babylon, ibid. Destroys Nineveh in conjunction with his brother-in-law Cyaxares, 950, a. Crosses the Euphrates and takes Carchemish from the Egyptians, ibid. Reduces Syria, ibid. b. Besieges and takes Jerusalem, ibid. b. Takes Jeboiakim prisoner, but restores him to his liberty, ibid. b. Returns to Babylon, and enlarges the city, ibid. His dream of the image, 950, c. Explained to him by Daniel, ibid. & 951, b, c. Honours bestowed by him on Daniel, ibid. d. Sends several nations to harass Jeboiakim, ibid. d. Takes the second time, and plunders Jerusalem, appoints Zedekiah king over the kingdom of Judah, and leads back to Babylon all the inhabiitants considerable either for valour or ingenuity, 952, c. The increase of his dominions foretold by Jeremiah, ibid. Makes war again upon the Jews, and besieges Jerusalem, 953, b, c. Raises the siege to meet Pharash Hophra, who was coming to relieve the city, ibid. d. Puts him to flight, and again sits down before Jerusalem, ibid. d. The town taken after a year's siege, the king Zedekiah made prisoner, and deprived of his eye-sight, after having seen all his friends and children put to death, 954, a, b. Orders the city to be quite dismantled, ibid. Leads every soul into captivity, except the most miserable of the people, who are left to take care of the soil, ibid. c. Commands Zedekiah's chief officers to be beheaded, and appoints Gedaliah governor of Judah, ibid. d. Of the gold he amassed in this expedition, he causes a monstrous colossus to be erected in honour of his god Bel, and commands all nations to adore it, 954, e. Shadrach, Mishach, and Abdago, refusing to comply, are thrown into a furnace, but miraculously preserved, 955, a, b. He adorns their God, ibid. Crosses again the Euphrates, and lays siege to Tyre, ibid. Which he takes after a tedious siege of thirteen years, but had nothing but an empty city for his pains, the Tyrians having removed their effects to the island, where they built a new city, 955, c, 956, a. Compleats the desolation of Judea to revenge the death of Gedaliah, whom the Jews had murdered, ibid. Subdues or makes tributaries the Egyptians, penetrates into the very heart of Lybia and Iberia, and subdues all the neighbouring countries, 956, b, c, d. Retires to Babylon, and there employs himself in embellishing his metropolis, 957, a, b, &c. Vid. Babylon. His dream of the tree, 962, e. The interpretation of it, 963, b. His pride and metamorphosis, ibid. c, d, e. His death, 964, a. His prophecy, ibid. b, c.

Nabonadus, king of Babylon, 969, b. Had the chief hand in the murder of Laborjarched, ibid. What prompted him thereunto, b, c. In him the scepter falls again into the hands of the old Assyrian race, ibid. Said by Herodotus to have been chosen for mediator between the Medes and Lydians, 970, c. Vanquished by Cyrus, betakes himself to Babylon, ibid. d. Which the Persians take by surprise, ibid. e. Said by some to have retired not to Babylon, but to Borsippa, where being besieged by Cyrus, he surrendered himself to that conqueror, who behaved very kindly to him, and sent him as his lieutenant into Carmania, where he spent the remainder of his days, ibid. Whether he was the Belshazzar of Daniel, or Darius the Mede, 971, f, & 972, a, b.

Nabonassar, likely the Ninias of prophane history, 942, b, c, & seq. His æra, 935, b. First king of Babylon in Ptolemy's canon, 940, c.

Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, said to have wrested that kingdom from the Assyrians, 947, c. Transfers the seat of the Assyrian monarchy to Babylon, ibid. He the Belshazzar of Ctesias, and the Nabopolassar of Nicolas of Damascus, ibid. f.

Nabuchodonosor. Vid. Nabopolassar.

Nachor, Abraham's brother, 431, c. His issue, ibid. d.

Nadab, the son of Aaron, by Elizabet the daughter of Aminadab, 490, a. Solemnly consecrated priest with his brother Abihu, 523, c. Killed by fire from heaven, for presuming to burn incense in the tabernacle with strange fire, contrary to Moses's command, 523, d.

Nadab, king of Israel, lays siege to Gibbethon, a city of the Philistines, 358, b.

Nadius, second king of Babylon, probably the Ninias of Ctesias, 945, b.

Nabar Malea, or Basilicos Potamen, 57, a.

Nabarmatcha, or royal river, supposed to have been the same with the river Cartha, now Cuth, or C.

- Chiti*, an artificial branch, conducted from the Euphrates into the inland parts of Arabia, 908, a, b. By whom dug, ibid. c. Its course, ibid. d.
- Nabals*, king of the Ammonites, 297, a. Wages war with the Israelites at first with good success, ibid. b. But his army is at last entirely routed and dispersed by Saul, c. Proved kind to David, ibid.
- Nahor*, inventions ascribed to him, 131, (W).
- Nabum* prophecies in the reign of Hezekiah, 839, (W).
- Nakraus*, or Bakraus, the first antediluvian king of Egypt, according to the oriental historians, 279, c, d.
- Names*, similitude of a deceitful guide, 56.
- Namyrus*, his story, 938, a, b, & seq.
- Naphtali*, Jacob's second son by Bilhah born, 441, d. Jacob's prophecy to him, 464, c. How verified, (O). His lot in the promised land, 569, e. The tribe of Naphtali carried captive into Affria, 830, b, c.
- Naphtulim* where settled, 165, d.
- Narbal* king of Arad, 421, a.
- Nathan* chosen by God to denounce his severe judgments against David, 780, a.
- Naucratis*, a colony of the Græcians in Egypt, 227, b.
- Navigation*, the first we have account of after the deluge, 136.
- Nazarites*, persons that either dedicated themselves, or were dedicated by their parents, to observe the laws of nazaritehood, 631, e. Some obliged to it for some short space of time, others for all their life, 632, a. Obligated to abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquors, and to wear their hair to its full length, ibid. Women as well as men might bind themselves to that vow, ibid. & seq.
- Nebazaradan*, one of Nebuchadnezzar's generals takes Jerusalem, 954, a. Cruelties there practised by him, ibid. c, d.
- Nebo*, an idol of the Babylonians, 287, d, & 924, a. The Chemosh, or Baal-peor of the Moabites, 278, a. A town of the same name in the dominions of Moab, ibid. The mount of Nebo, from whence Moses is commanded to take a view of Canaan, 537, c. On mount Nebo Moses dies, 543, c.
- Nebuchadnezzar*, king of Affria, takes Tyre, after a siege of 13 years, razes it to the ground, and puts all the inhabitants to the sword, 417, a, b. Defeats the Egyptians, 847, d. Takes Jerusalem, and rifies the temple, ibid. Besieges the city again, takes, plunders, and burns it, 849, d, e.
- Nebuzaradan*, general of the Babylonians, puts all Ammon to fire and sword, and carries away king Baalis, and most of the nobles, into captivity, 298, c.
- Néanabes*, king of Egypt, the first of the Schennytic race, 274, a. Defends Egypt against the Persians, ibid. Dies, ibid. b.
- Nittanebus*, king of Egypt, 275, d. His subjects rebel against him, ibid. & seq. But are vanquished, ibid. b. He is joined by Sydonians, Phœnicians, and Cypriots, against the Persians, 276, b. Is invaded by the Persians, ibid. d. Abandons the kingdom to them, and flies into Ethiopia, ibid. f. He was the last Egyptian that ever governed Egypt, ibid. & seq.
- Necus*, king of Egypt, son and successor to Psalmitchus, 264, f. The Pharaoh-Necho of scripture, ibid. Attempts to cut a canal from the Nile to the Red-sea, but is warned by an oracle to desist, ibid. His expeditions by sea, ibid. Fits out two fleets, ibid. Marches against the king of Affria, 265, a. Defeats Josiah king of Judah, who opposed him in his march, ibid. Routs the Affrians, and takes the city of Carchemish, ibid. Sends Jehoahaz king of Judah in chains to Egypt, ibid. c. Makes Eliakim king over Judah, imposing on him a tribute, ibid. c. Is defeated by Nebuchadnezzar, and loses all Syria and Judea, ibid. d, e. Dies, ibid.
- Nezo*, an Affrian, or Babylonian deity, 925, a.
- Neburdea*, or river of knowledge, an account of it, 908, d.
- Nebemias* the well of, 586, b.
- Neomenie*, or new moons. Vid. Moon.
- Nephe*, or Nephtys, called also Finis, Venus, and Victoria, 239, b, c.
- Nepherius* king of Egypt, 274, c.
- Nepherotes* king of Egypt, and the last of the Mendesian race, 275, a.
- Nephtim*, how interpreted, 82, (N).
- Nephtys*, all the skirts of a country washed by the sea, and the promontories so called by the Egyptians, 165, d.
- Neptune* or Pojidon, son of Pontus, 137, a.
- Nereus*, the father of Pontus, supposed by some to be Juphet, 137, (S).
- Nergal*, a Persian deity, 861, b. Also an Affrian deity, 925, a.
- Neriglissar*, or Niriglissaroor, and Niricassolussurus, kills Evil-merodach king of Babylon, and usurps the throne, 965, e, & 966, c. Invites all the neighbouring nations to join him against the Medes and Persians, 967, b, c. Marches against them at the head of a numerous army, ibid. Battle between the Babylonians and Medes, wherein the former are routed, and Neriglissar himself slain, 968, a, b. Neriglissar most likely to have been Darius the Mede, ibid. Arguments proving it, ibid. b, c, d, e.
- Nethinims*, persons dedicated to the worship of God, 650, c. Etymon of the name, ibid. Not of the children of Israel, but of the Gibeonites, ibid. c. This name not given them before the captivity, ibid. Condemned to the lowest and most laborious offices in the tabernacle under the Levites, ibid. c.
- New Moons*. Vid. Moons.
- Nicholls* holds the creation of other worlds before ours, 43, (N).
- Nile* springs of, anciently unknown, 177, b. Its course, ibid. d. Its seven mouths, and their names, ibid. Now they are reckoned above 30 but only two considerable ones, viz. that of Rosetta, or Rohid, and of Damietta, or Dymid, ibid. e. Its annual overflowing, ibid. e, f. To what height the waters swell, ibid. & seq. How they measure the daily increase of the waters, 178, d, e. To what height it must rise, before the great dam of the Khalis or great canal at Bulek, be cut down, ibid. f. This is one of the greatest solemnities of Egypt, and in ancient times solemnized with the sacrifice of a girl, 178, b, c. This ceremony abolished by the Turks, ibid. The manner of conveying the water on the lands, 179, c, d. Fattens the earth without any other manure, ibid. f. The fecundity caused by its waters, reaches not only the earth, but also mankind, and animals, 180, a, b. In what manner the cities, towns, and villages secure themselves from the inundations of the Nile, ibid. d, e. The cause of such inundations, ibid. e, f. Birds peculiar to the Nile, 182, a, b. What fish it affords, 182, c, d. First called Egyptus, but afterwards took its name from king Nilus, who made it universally serviceable, 259, e.
- Nilometers* described, 178, d, e.
- Nilus* king of Egypt, 257. Makes the Nile very serviceable, whence that river, formerly called Egyptus, took its name, ibid. e.
- Nimrod*, the sixth son of Cush, 122, a. Represented by some as a giant, as a great warrior, a great tyrant, &c. ibid. b. The signification of his name, 122, c, d, & (I). What gave occasion to the injurious opinions which have been entertained of him in all ages, ibid. & (K). Generally thought to have been the first king after the flood, ibid. Made by the eastern writers the first king king of all the world, ibid. (C). And the first that wore a crown, ibid. Founder of the Babylouish kingdom, ibid. Probably not the builder of any of the four cities mentioned by Moses, 122, b, & 124, a. At what time he began to reign, ibid. a, b. Whether the same with Belus, 124, b. Several traditions as to his death, ibid. c, & (W). Whether to be found in profane history, 124, b, c. Several conjectures relating to him, ibid. Kept possession of Shinaar, and erected a kingdom there, making Babel the seat of the empire, 165, a. Thought to have been the first usurper on the rights of others, 172, d, e.

Niniveh built, 874, e. Where situate, 126, (B). Destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, 150, a. In the second, third, or fourth year of Jehoiakim, 949, (N).

Ninus the whole story of, seems a copy of that of the Egyptian Sesostris, 872, (Y). Takes Babylon, 873, a. Subdues Armenia, ibid. Routs Pharmus king of Media, ibid. The nations he subdued, ibid. Returns into his own country, 874, b. Builds Niniveh, ibid. c. Resolves upon a war with the Bactrians, 875, a. His extraordinary preparations for this war, 876, b. Smitten with Semiramis, 877, b. Marries her, and has a son by her, ibid. c. Takes Bactra, ibid. e.

Ninyas employs an eunuch to assassinate his mother Semiramis, 882, e. What prompted him to get rid of her, 882, (H). Succeeds his mother, 883, a. His character 884, & seq.

Nisan, the seventh month of the Jewish year, answering our March, 611, (K).

Nisroch, the chief deity of the Affrians, 861, b.

Nitetic, daughter of Apries king of Egypt, 272, c.

Nitocris, queen of Memphis, a most beautiful woman, 245, a. 247, b. (F). Succeeds her brother, ibid. To revenge his death, puts many of the Egyptians to death, ibid. b. She was by birth an Ethiopian, ibid. c. Builds the third pyramid, ibid.

Nitocris, wife to Evil-merodach, and mother to Nabonadius kings of Babylon, 969, d. Fortifies the city of Babylon, ibid. e. Did several other great works ascribed to Nebuchadnezzar, ibid. A monument erected by her, with an extraordinary inscription, 970, a. Supposed to have been a Mede by birth, 967. Has all the glory of the reign of her son Nabonadius, ibid. d, e, f.

Noachide the policy of, 171, e.

Noah, the import of the word, 85, (N). Endeavours to reclaim men from their wickedness, 84, b. The son of Lamech, 85, a. Groundless surmises with respect to his piety, 84, (N). Departs from among men with his wife and children, 85, a. Directed to make an ark, ibid. c. Retires into it, ibid. d, & 105, b. Different opinions as to the name of his wife, ibid. (N). Comes out of the ark, 114, & 106. The precepts given him by God, ibid. d, & seq. Assured that the world should not perish by a second deluge, 115, c. Becomes a husband-man, ibid. d. Said by some to have invented the tools of husbandry, 85, (N). Where first settled, 115, d. Not Fo bi first king of China, ibid. e, f. Acknowledged a prophet by the Mohammedans, 85, (N). The genealogy of his descendants, 117. First migration of his sons, 141, d, e. Divides the earth among his three sons, 157, a.

Nod land of, where situated, 75, a.

Nomes, prefectures, or governments, into which Egypt was divided, 176, c, d. This division ascribed to Sesostris, ibid. How many nomes the country was divided into, ibid.

Numbers, held by Pythagoras to be the principles of all, 26, c, d.

Numenius, his opinion of the origin of the universe, 30.

Nysa by whom built, 245, b.

O.

O A N N E S, a monster mentioned by Herodotus, 90, a, b. Delivered the knowledge of letters, of arts and sciences, ibid. Called also Oet, ibid. Fabled to have been the first instructor of the Chaldees, and their stories concerning him, 929, c, & seq.

Oasis, two cities of this name on the borders of Lybia, and one of the 16 nomes of the middle Egypt, 175, f.

Obadiab governor of Abab's house, 810, b.

Obedom, the ark deposited in his house, 776, b.

Obollab, a town towards Babrah, 170, b.

Obob, called by Pliny, Oboda, the 37th encampment of the Israelites, on their march to the promised land, 533, a.

Ocean, or water, according to the most ancient phylogogers, the original of all things, 17, d.

Ocela, or Ocelis, as Ptolemy calls it, the port of Sanna, or Uzal in Yaman, 170, a.

Ocellus Lucanus, one of the most ancient asserters of the world's eternity, 3, b. His arguments absurd and ridiculous, ibid. b, c, d.

Oebus, king of Persia, brings all Phoenice under the Persian yoke, 411, & seq. His cruelty to the Sidonians, ibid. e, f.

Offerings, peace-offerings, laws concerning them, 623, c, d. Meat and drink-offerings, ibid. e.

Offerings for cleansing, ibid. f, & 624, a, b.

Offerings of the first-fruits, 625, a, b, & seq.

Of the first cake of every lump of dough, 626, a.

Of the first born, of the tribes, &c. 627, b, c, & seq.

Of incense, 629, a. Burnt-offerings the altar of, where placed, 660, e. Why called the outward, ibid. Described. 661, a, b, & seq.

What meant by the compass of the altar, ibid. b.

Og, king of Babhan, reckoned a king of the Amorites, 330, c. The last king of the race of the giants of Rephaim, 324, (E). & 330, c. Espouses the cause of Sidon the Amorite, and attempts to stop the progress of Moses and his people, ibid.

Falls in battle, and his kingdom is transferred to the Israelites, ibid. d. Jewish fables of his size, 534, (X).

Ogges, his flood, 96, (N).

Olivet mount, or the mount of olives, why called by the Jews the mountain of three lights, 572, d.

Famous on many accounts, 572, a. Described, 573, a. Falsely supposed to be in or on the skirts of Galilee, ibid.

Held in particular veneration by the Christians for our Saviour's ascension into heaven, ibid. Nor much less by the Mohammedans, ibid.

Olympus mount, its height, 102, (N).

Omoroca, a woman so named in the Chaldean cosmogony, 14, e. The governess of living creatures, ibid. Signification of the word, ibid. (N).

Omri chosen king of Israel by the army, 808, d.

On, Heliopolis once so called, and by Ptolemy, Onium, 453, (N).

Onan, Judah's son by his Canaanitish wife, 450, c.

Marries Tamar, his brother's wife, ibid. His sin and death, ibid. d.

Ophir, one of Joktan's sons, where settled, 170, d.

Groundless conjectures touching the place which bears his name, ibid.

Oracles of Egypt, 211, a.

Oreb, prince of Midian, 304, d, e. Defeated by Gideon, ibid. Killed by the Ephraimites, ibid. & seq.

And their heads carried to Gideon, 745, e.

Origen favours the dogm of the Platonists, concerning the world's eternity, 4, e.

Ormazd, or Horminda, the good principle among the Mages, 31, d.

Orontes, a river of Syria, 361, c. A fabulous tradition concerning its origin, ibid.

Ophus,

Orpheus, the introducer of the rites of the heathen worship among the Greeks, 15, c. Followed therein by Homer, ibid. Said to have been quite silent in his theology, as to any thing intellectual, 16. And to have made one of his principles to be a dragon, ibid. Looked upon by the Greek Pagans, as a profound philosopher, ibid. Celsus would have had the Christians take him rather for a god than Christ, ibid. Is thought to have acknowledged one supreme unmade deity, from the esteem he was in with the Pythagoreans and Platonists, ibid. a. His cosmogony made by Timæus the chronographer, ibid. a, b. His verses assert a supreme deity, ibid. d. His theology preferred to that of other Heathens, by the Christian fathers, ibid. d. His establishing of Polytheism owing rather to necessity than to his own approbation, ibid. He held two principles, æther and chaos, 16, e. He first introduced the doctrine of the mundane egg, 17, a.

Orphic theologers, in what sense they taught that God was all things, 17, b.

Orus, an Egyptian deity, 238, & seq. His history, ibid. Confounded often with Apollo, 206, a. How represented, ibid. The last of the Egyptian gods, or demi-gods, 243, d.

Osiris, according to the Egyptian philosophy, the same as the sun, 13, c. Osiris and Isis the chief deities of Egypt, 204, a. How represented by the Egyptians, 205, c, d. Osiris and Isis, said to be the son and daughter of Rhea, 238, f. Their history, ibid. & seq. His tomb, 242, c.

Osmandus, or Imandes, buried in one of the pyramids mentioned by Herodotus, 185.

Osmandus, king of Egypt, according to some, the same as Amenophis and Memnon, 245, (D). Reduced the rebellious Bactrians with an army of 100,000 foot, and 20,000 horse, ibid. & 246, a. His tomb, the most magnificent in Egypt, described, ibid. His statue, with an inscription, ibid.

Othniel takes Kirjath Sepher, 783, f. Marries Caleb's daughter, ibid. The first judge of Israel, 742, d. Gains a signal victory over Cushan-rishataim, king of Mesopotamia, 742, d.

Ovens, used in Egypt for hatching chickens, described, 201, (B).

Oayartes, king of Bactria, routs Ninus, 876, d. But is at last entirely defeated by him, ibid. e.

Oxyrinchus, now called Casbous, a kind of fish in the Nile, 182, d.

P.

PALMYRA, the metropolis of Palmyrene in Syria, 361, c. Its name and situation, 367, a, b. Description of its great court and temple, ibid. c. Of its promiscuous ruins, obelisk, and two pillars, 368, e, f, g. The great piazza, 369, a. Banqueting house, ibid. c. Porphyry pillars and palace, ibid. d, e. Marble pillars, and little temple, ibid. f, g. The sepulchres, 370, a, b, & seq.

Palmyrene, a province of Syria, 361, c.

Pamyles, the nurse of Osiris, 242, c.

Pan, worshipped by the inhabitants of Mendes in Egypt, 207, c, d. Chremis, 240, a.

Pantubibla, seems to be the same with Sippara, 91, b. & (N). Several opinions relating to it, ibid.

Paplagenians, originally called Riphatheans from Riphat, 167, a.

Papyrus, or Byblus, a reed growing in Egypt, 182, f. Called by the natives, al herdi, described, ibid. The ancients made their paper with the pith of its stalk, ibid. Or of the inner rind, 183, a. Of great use to the ancients, affording them both food and cloaths, ibid.

Parables, that of Joshua the first we read of, 48, (I.). The Greeks falsely boast themselves the authors of parables, ibid. In use among the Jews when unknown to the Greeks, ibid. Who the first authors of them uncertain, ibid. How that expression of our Saviour, that he spoke in parables to the people, that hearing they might not understand, is to be understood, ibid.

Paradise, several paradises, 58, a, b. Obscure traditions relating to it among the Heathens, ibid. d, e. Vid. Eden.

Parcentes, the first woman's name in the physiology of the Indian Bramins, 33, b.

Paris and Helen, their arrival in Greece, 259, e.

Parmenides, his opinion of the origin of things, 7, b.

Parfondas, his story, 938, c, d, & seq.

Partamis king of Egypt, 268, a.

Parvaim, the gold of ophir seeming to be so called in scripture, has occasioned some groundless conjectures, 170.

Passover, or Easter, its first institution, 500, a. The order and manner of it, ibid. b. Laws relating to it, 602, a, & seq. Penalties appointed for such as should omit the celebration of it, 604, a, & (P). The etymology of its name, ibid. (Q). At what time it was to begin, ibid. Unleavened bread, 500, c.

Pastors Egyptian. Vid. Shepherds.

Patæci, the tutelar gods of sea-faring men among the Phœnicians, 400, a. Carried about in the prows of their ships, ibid. & (T).

Pathros, wrongly taken by some for Pelusium, the Upper Egypt, or Thebais, 165, e.

Pathrusim, the inhabitants of Pathros, or the Upper Egypt, 165, d.

Patriarchs antediluvian. Vid. Antediluvian.

Paulicians, admitted two self-existent Gods, 31, a.

Pausiris reigns over the Egyptians with the consent of the Persians, 274, b.

Peniel, or the face of God, the place where Jacob wrestled with an angel, 445, b.

Peserius, his system concerning the standing of the sun considered and confuted, 560, a, & seq.

Petab, king of Israel, enters into a league with Rezin, king of Syria, against Aban king of Judah, 389, b. Besieges Jerusalem to no effect, ibid.

Pekabiah succeeds his father Menabem in the kingdom of Israel, 825, a. Murdered, 830, d.

Pelasgians of Greece and Italy not descended from Pelag, 169, d.

Pelag, son to Eber, 129. Signification of the word, ibid. Remained with his posterity in Chaldea, 169, d.

Pelastites, who, 778, (C).

Pelusium, probably first founded by the Philistines, 344, (L).

Pendets, Indian Gentiles, 23, c. Their cosmogony, ibid.

Pentapolis, one of the most beautiful parts of the land of Canaan, 323, b.

Pentecost, or the feast of the weeks, instituted in memory of the law being given on mount Sinai, 606, a. When to be kept, ibid. What sacrifices to be offered, ibid. a, b. Other regulations relating thereto, ibid. & (W), (X).

Pennel refuses a refreshment to Gideon and his men, 745, b. All the inhabitants by him put to the sword, ibid. e.

Peor a moabitish deity, 287, b. Whence so call'd, ibid. (E).

Peræa, the Greek name of the country of Bashan beyond the Jordan, 137, (Q). & 568, c.

Pergamus king, rather the improver than the inventor of parchment, 727, a.

Peri, or series, among the orientals, 51, c.

Perjury, the law of Moses punished it with death, 684, d.

Perizzites, inhabitants of Canaan, 323, d. Their habitation, ibid. The original signification of the word, ibid. (D). Invaded by the tribes of Simcon and Judah, and cut off, 333, d. Some left to prove Israel, and live in common with them, 335, a.

- But reduced by Solomon to a state of slavery, 337, b.
- Persians*, a peculiar tradition of the modern Persians, relating to the creation of the world, 32, c, d.
- Their traditions concerning the flood, 107, a, b.
- Pern* not the true name of that country, but given to it by the Spaniards, on their mistaking the answer of the natives, 170, e, f.
- Petra*, a city of Edom, 309, c. Vid. Selab. Placed by Josephus under the jurisdiction of the Amalekites, 319, a, & (D).
- Peyrerius* held that the flood extended no farther than Judea, 97, (N).
- Phagus* of the ancients, now called Karmûd, a fish to be found in the Nile, 182, d.
- Phalix*, king of Sidon, flourished in the time of the Trojan war, 410, b. Honoured by Homer with the title of most illustrious, ibid.
- Phanes* of Halicarnassus betrays Ameftis king of Egypt 272, b.
- Phares* and Zarab born to Judab by Tamar, 452, a. Their strange birth, ibid.
- Pharaoh*, in the Coptic tongue, signifies king, 280, f. An appellation common to all the kings of Egypt, 423, b. Several etymologies of it, ibid. Wahid, the first king who took that surname, 280, f.
- Pharaoh* surnamed al Araj, or the lame king of Egypt, 281, e. Refuses to deliver up to Nebuchadnezzar the Jews who had fled into Egypt, ibid. f. Is taken by him and hanged, ibid. Pharaoh's two dreams interpreted by Joseph, 452, d. e. Raises him to the highest post of the kingdom, 453, a. Gives him the daughter of Potipherab to wife, ibid. b. Pharaoh's cruel orders to the Hebrew midwives, 475. Several things that may, in some measure, authorize the cruel measures he took against the Israelites, 475, b. His cruel usage of the Jews, 474, b. Several conjectures about his true crime, ibid. d. Commands the Israelites to drown all their male children, 477, a. His heart not hardened by God, 494, (D). The words of the scripture ought to have been translated, that God suffered the heart of Pharaoh to be hardened, ibid. Dismisses at last the Israelites, 501, e. Repents and pursues them, and is drowned in the Red-Sea, 507, b, c. An oriental fable concerning him, 282, (B).
- Pharpar* and Abana, the only streams of the Chrysorrheas, or Barrady, which waters Damascus, 362, a.
- Phasu*, mistakes of the learned about its source, 55, d, e.
- Phelles*, or Helles, kills his brother Astarimus king of Tyre, and usurps the throne, 415, b. Is murdered in the eighth month of his reign by Ithobal, ibid. c.
- Phereides* of Syrus, master to Pythagoras, 25, c. His opinion as to the origin of the world, ibid. c, d.
- Pheryades* Syrus, said by Theopompus to have wrote the first of nature, and the gods of the Greeks, 18, (N). His treatise of the beginning of things extant in the time of Leontius, ibid.
- Phron*, also stiled Sesofus, Sesoftris's son succeeds him, 258, b. Is struck blind, ibid. c. Recovers his sight, and raises two obelisks, ibid. d.
- Phiala*, the lake of the true source of the Jordan, 577, c, & (S). Described, 578, a.
- Phicol*, the chief captain of Abimelech king of the Philistines, 345, e. Name probably peculiar to their chief minister, 347, (Q).
- Philadelphia* antiently the metropolis of the Ammonites, 293, b.
- Philistines*, descended partly from the Castahim, and partly from the Caphisorim, 338, b. Egypt their first seat, ibid. Migrate from Egypt, and seize the land, which was afterwards called by their name, and known to the ancient Greeks and Romans under the name of Palestine, ibid. c, d. Etymology of the word, ibid. & (B). Description of the country, ibid. & 339, a. Gaza their chief city, 339, b. Its situation, ibid. Called Azza in Hebrew, and Aza by the Syrians, ibid. c. Why called Gaza, ibid. Called also Iam and Mina in latter times, c. Description of its present ruins, ibid. & 340, (C). Their other chief cities, 339, b, & seq. Their government monarchical, but limited, 341, d. All their kings honoured with the appellation of Abimelech, ibid. An aristocracy introduced among them, and after that again kings called by the appellation of Achish, ibid. e. But of very small power, ibid. A very warlike, ingenious, and industrious people, ibid. f. Famous for their inveterate enmity against the Israelites, 342, b. The bow and arrow their invention, ibid. d. Under their first kings of one religion with the Hebrews, ibid. In after-times erred into endless idolatries, ibid. e. Their idols, ibid. & 343, a, & seq. Came directly out of Egypt, and expelling the Avims, seized on their country, 344, a. From whence they borrowed their name, 344, (N). The obliging behaviour of their king Abimelech towards Abraham, 345, a, b, & seq. Abraham obliges himself by oath, that he and his posterity should live in love with his posterity, ibid. e. Abimelech II. his kind behaviour towards Isaac and Rebekah, 346, a, b. He renews with Isaac the covenant made by his father with Abraham, 347, c, d. Gaza Askelon, and Ebron taken from them by the united tribes of Simeon and Judab, 347, e. But they get possession again of the said cities, ibid. Hold the Israelites under their yoke till they are delivered by Shamgar, who kills 600 of them with an ox-goad, 347, e, & 348, a. Suffer in common with the Israelites, by the incursions of Zabab and Zalmunna, kings of Midian, 348, a. Oppress the Israelites, in conjunction with the Ammonites, in the days of Jephthab, 348, a. A third time reduce the Israelites, and keep them under for 40 years, ibid. Sustain great losses by Samson, 348, a, b, & seq. Recover their loss, make war upon the Israelites, kill 4000 of them, and put them to a precipitate flight, 350, a. Disheartened at the arrival of the ark, but being by their chiefs inspired with fresh courage, fall upon the Israelites, kill 30,000 of their foot, and take the ark, ibid. c. Smitten with a sudden plague, remove the ark from Ashdod to Gath, from Gath to Ebron, but their affliction gathering strength, send the ark back with a trespass offering, 351, a, b, & seq. The plague they were afflicted with, ibid. & (D). Twenty years afterwards march out against the Israelites, but are frightened by a storm of thunder and lightning, and slaughtered by the Hebrews, 352, b, c. In a few years return more formidable than ever, ravage the country of the Israelites, but are first put in disorder by Jonathan, and after entirely routed by Saul, 353. Overthrown in a battle by David, 355, a. Oblige their king Achish to dismiss David from the army, 356, b. March against Saul, who is routed and killed with his three sons, ibid. c, d. Make war upon David, 356, e. By whom they are routed in four successive battles, and made tributaries to him, 357, e, & seq. Many of their giants killed by the Israelites, 357, b, c. Being increased by the fugitive Edomites, apply themselves to trade, 358, a, & (B). Harassed by Nadab king of Israel, 358, b. Pay a voluntary tribute to Jehoshaphat king of Israel, 358, c. Rebel against Jehoram break into his kingdom, rife his house, and put to death all his family, except Ataliah and her son Ahaziah, 358, c, d. Invaded by Uzziah king of Judab, who dismantles Gath, Jabneb, and Ashdod, ibid. d. War against Ahaz, reduce several of his cities, and settle themselves in them, 356. Their whole country over-run by Hezekiah, ibid. b. Subdued by

- by the Affrians, and their country become the seat of a long and obstinate war between the Egyptians and the Affrians, ibid. c, d. Tributaries to the great monarchies as they succeeded each other, ibid. They are said to have planted the island of Crete, 348, (G). The foundation of this notion, ibid. Called in several places of scripture Cerethites, ibid. Two hundred of them killed by David for their fore-skins, 355, a.
- Phineas*, the son of Nadab, and grandson of Aaron, 490, a. Put to death Zimri, for bringing a Midianitish prince's into the camp, and, for his zeal, the high-priesthood is confirmed to him and his seed, 536, a.
- Phinehas* and Hophni, sons of Eli, their vile character, 755, b.
- Phlox*, who, in the Phœnician history, 87, a.
- Phœnice*, from whence it borrowed its name, 391, d. Called also Clna, being a contraction of Canaan, ibid. Called also Rhabbath and Celphis, etymology of this name, ibid. Its situation, 392, a. And division, b. And cities, ibid. Its soil and climate, 394, c. Natural curiosities, ibid. c, d. Antient curiosities, 395, a.
- Phœnicians*, Canaanites by descent, 396, c. Their territory included several kingdoms, and they were governed by kings, 397, a. Had once a knowledge of the true God, whom they called Baal, or Lord, ibid. But became blind idolaters, ibid. Their duties, ibid. Their religion hardly different from that of the Egyptians, ibid. d. Their religious ceremonies, 401, b, c, d. Said by Herodotus to have used circumcision, which is contradicted by Josephus, 403, f. Abstained from the flesh of swine, ibid. Arithmetic and Astronomy, either took rise among them, or were brought by them to a great perfection, 404, a. Most of the sciences flowed from them into Greece, together with their letters, ibid. Their characters probably the same with the Samaritan, ibid. b. Their manufactures, ibid. c. Their trade and navigation, ibid. c. & 405, a, b. Their shipping, ibid. f, & 406, a, b. Series of the kings of the different kingdoms of Phœnice, 407. Their kings from the ancient fabulous history of the Greeks, 408, a. Enter into a confederacy to shake off the Persian yoke, 410, f. Betrayed by Mentor the Rhodian, and Ienues king of Sidon, 411, c, d. And are again subdued by Ochus king of Persia, 412, a. Their account of the original of the world, 11, d, e, & seq. Their cosmogony, according to Eusebius, directly brings in atheism, 12, a. It was taken from that of Thoyth, and agrees in substance with the Egyptian, 12, c. Phœnician antediluvian history, 86, d. Phœnician history from Sanctoniatho, 133, b. Mentions only the idolatrous line of Cain, ibid. Phœnician records, supposed by bishop Cumberland to have been corrupted, 133, (C). His amendment of them, ibid.
- Phœnicia*. Vid. Phœnice.
- Phœnicopteri*, or Flamingo's bird of Egypt, 182, a.
- Phœnix*, Herodotus's account of one, 211, b, c.
- Phœnix*, son of Agenor, supposed by the Greeks to have succeeded his father in the kingdom of Phœnice, and given his name to the country, 410, a. Said to have been the first that found out the scarlet colour, called therefore at first Phœnicinus, and with a small alteration Puniceus, ibid. b.
- Phos*, who, in the Phœnician history, 87, a.
- Phtha* among the Egyptians, the same as Vulcan among the Greeks, 13, d.
- Phua*, one of the chief Hebrew midwives in Egypt Vid. Shiprah.
- Phunon*, since known by the name of Metallo Phunon, one of the encampments of the Israelites, on their march to the promised land, 533, a.
- Physic* owing probably to the Egyptians, 218, d, e.
- Physicians*, each applied himself among the Egyptians to the cure of one disease only, 218, f. Had a public provision made for them by law, 219, b. Their method of practising, ibid. b, c.
- Pico de Adam*, why so named by the Mohammedans, 45, a.
- Pieria*, part of Seleucia, 361, a.
- Pi-babiroth*, the city of Heroum, on the extreme part of the Arabic gulf, or the Phagariopolis, placed by Strabo near the same place, 503, (U).
- Pillars*, one of brick, another of stone, made by the offspring of Seth, 81, b. Their inventions engraved upon them, ibid. Said by Josephus to have been extant in his time, ibid. What led him into this mistake, ibid. (N). Pillars from whence Menestho extracted his history, 81, (N). Others, mentioned by Sanctoniatho, consecrated to the wind and fire, 87, c, & (N). Of Hermes in Egypt, 222, d. Pthagoras and Plato borrowed their philosophy from thence, ibid. e. Remaining in the time of Preclus, ibid. Used by the Egyptians, and other nations, to preserve the memory of things by inscriptions, 222, d. Miraculous pillars of fire and smoke, which conducted the Israelites in their march, 504, a, b.
- Pircm*, king of Yarmuth, joins Adonizedek, king of Jerusalem, against the Gibeonites, 332, a. Is cut off by Joshua in a miraculous manner, ibid. b, c, & seq.
- Pisgag*, an encampment of the Israelites on their march to the promised land, 533, b.
- Pisón*, some imagine this name preserved in Pasitigris, or Pish-tigris, 55, a.
- Plagues of Egypt*, 496, & seq. How long a time Moses took in bringing all the plagues on Egypt, 499, (H).
- Planets*, how they came first to be worshipped, 730, (L). The planetary division of the week, by whom invented, ibid.
- Plantation*, the order of the first, 161, b, c. The first plantation of the earth, 162, a, b.
- Plato*, several of his followers held the world to be eternal, both in matter and form, 3, a. He himself acknowledged the world to be made by God, 4, b. Some of his expressions misinterpreted by his followers, favouring the eternity of the world, 4, b, c. His own notions as to the origin of the universe, 27, c, & seq. His ideas, 8. Held two distinct principles, God and matter, 25, c. What meant by his finite and infinite, 26. Borrowed his philosophy from the pillars of Hermes in Egypt, 222, e.
- Platonic* argument for the world's eternity, 5, a, b. An answer to it considered, ibid.
- Platonism* early introduced into the church 4, c. Favourably received by Origen, and zealously opposed by others, ibid.
- Platonists* misinterpret some of their master's expressions, as if he had asserted the world's eternity, 4, b, c, d.
- Pliny* the elder, held the eternity and incorruptibility of the world, 8, d.
- Plutarch*, his opinion as to the origin of the universe, 29, & 30, c.
- Poetry*, the nature, meter, cadence of the Hebrew scarce possible to be determined, 710, d, & seq. Lyric poetry not invented by Orpheus, 713, a.
- Poets*, old Pagan poets contributed to the depravation of theology, 15, d. Countenanced the opinion of the world's being produced from a chaos, ibid. d. Make love to preside at the ranging of the confused matter, ibid. d. Their cosmogony the same with their theogony, ibid.
- Poets Hebrew*, when introduced, 724, c, d, & seq. An account of them, 725, (B).
- Polygamy* allowed the Jews, 678, e. Distinction among them between the wives of the first and second rank, ibid. (M). The second no where in the

- the Hebrew text called concubines, harlots, or prostitutes, as most versions render the word Pilgashim, ibid.
- Pools of Solomon* described, 590, b, c.
- Porus* king of Babylon, 945, c.
- Posion*, or Neptune, the son of Pontus, 137, a.
- Postdiluvian* patriarchs, a table of their years to the birth of Abraham, 110, d. Of the same to the call of Abraham, according to the computation of the Hebrew, 111. The same according to the computation of the Septuagint, ibid. The same according to the computation of the Samaritan pentateuch, 112.
- Putiphar*, Joseph sold to him, 450, a. His wife solicits Joseph to an amour, ibid. His refusal makes her accuse him to Putiphar, who sends him into the king's prison, 450, c.
- Putiphar*, prince or priest of On, his daughter married to Joseph, 453, b.
- Porter's field*, now Campo Santo, its earth said to be of an extraordinary nature, 586, d, (C).
- Pourous*, the first man's name, according to the Brahmins, 33, b.
- Pre-adamites* think mankind was in being before Adam, 47, b. Their arguments and objections answered, ibid. & seq.
- Priaps*, or Pballi, columns, or pillars, of an extraordinary height, in the porch of the great goddess of Syria at Hierapolis, 372, c, d. Twice a year a man went up to the top of them, and remained there seven days, 375, f, g.
- Priesthood* among the Jews, or sacriificate at first belonged to the first-born, 632, c. Afterwards the tribe of Levi set apart for the inferior, and the family of Aaron for the higher offices of the ministry, ibid. d. High-priesthood given solely to the family of Aaron, 633, b.
- Priest*, high-priest the head of the Jewish church, 633, a. The final judge of all controversies, both as to religion and common justice, ibid. Laws relating to his office, 634, a, b, c, d. To his consecration, 635, a, b, c, & seq. To his dress, 636, a, b, & seq.
- Priests* among the Jews, their consecration, 641, d. Office, 642, b. Dress, 643, c, d. Subordinate to the high-priest, and of a rank superior to the Levites, 641, d. Laws concerning them, ibid. c, d.
- Procession*, an account of an ancient Egyptian one, given by Clement of Alexandria, 242, d, e.
- Proclus*, a great champion for the world's eternity, 4. Acknowledges the generation of the gods, ibid.
- Prometheus*, his flood in Egypt, 96, (N). Government there, 240, & seq.
- Property*, laws against coveting another man's, 686, c.
- Prophet*, the signification and import of the word, 731, (M). The prophets from Abraham to Malachi, 732, b. Their names, and those of the prophetesses, ibid. (O). How God revealed himself to them, 733, a. Their food, dress, and manner of living, 731, c, d. Their number, 732, a.
- Proselytes* among the Jews, such as were circumcised admitted to eat of the passover, and to all other religious privileges with the Israelites, 664, c. Such as were not circumcised kept in a state little better than slavery, ibid. d. What meant by proselytes of the gate, and proselytes of righteousness, ibid. c. Difference made by Moses, between nation and nation, with respect to their admission, 665, c.
- Proteus*, or Cetes, king of Egypt, 257, c, (K). The fable of Proteus whence derived, ibid. e. In his reign Paris and Helen arrive in Egypt, ibid. Has a sumptuous temple erected to him at Marmphis, ibid. Believed by some to be Setbos of Menebo, the typhon of the poets, Homer's Proteus, &c. ibid. (K).
- Proteogenus* and Een, Adam and Eve in the history of Sanchoniatho, 86, c, & (N). Their issue, ibid. c.
- Psammenitus*, son of Amasis king of Egypt, 271, c. Is overthrown by Cambyses, ibid. f. Taken prisoner, loses his kingdom, 272, a. The particulars of his captivity, ibid. b. His death ibid. e.
- Psammis* king of Egypt, 265, c. Dies in an expedition against the Ethiopians, 266, a.
- Psammithus*, at first king of one of the 12 kingdoms into which Egypt was divided, 263, b. Occasion of his falling out with his colleagues, ibid. Hires an army of Ionians, Carians, and Arabians, and reduces all Egypt, ibid. c, d. He was of the tribe of Sais, ibid. e. Gives great encouragement to the Greeks, ibid. f. His public buildings, 264, a. Keeps an army of foreigners in pay, ibid. b. The Egyptians, upwards of 200,000 desert him, ibid. Opens the ports of Egypt to strangers, ibid. c. Besieges and takes Acatus in Syria, after a siege of 29 years, ibid. d. Prevails upon the Scythians, ready to pour themselves into Egypt, with presents and entreaties to march back, ibid. His expedient to find out which was the most ancient language, 151, (U). Dies, 264, d, e.
- Psammithus* II. king of Egypt, 274, b. A barbarous and inhuman prince, ibid. c.
- Psammuthis* king of Egypt, 275, a.
- Ptolemais*, or St. John d'Acre, or Acre, its ruins described, 588, a.
- Pul*, called also Pbul, and, through mistake, by the Septuagint Phul, 888, (W). The seeming founder of the Affyrian monarchy, ibid. a. The first king of Affyria, mentioned in scripture, from the time that land was planted by Abur, 888, (W). Was a pure Affyrian, and not a Chaldean, or Babylonian, ibid. The same as Belus, ibid. Receives 1000 talents from Manabim king of Isra-el, and seems to have taken that kingdom into his protection, 889, a. Probably received voluntary homage from Syria, as he had from Israel, ibid.
- Punishments*, an account of those which were either appointed by the Mosaic law, or made use of at the prince's will before the captivity, 672, & seq.
- Pur*, who, in the Phœnician history, 87, a.
- Purim*, or lots, feast of, 611, a.
- Pygmalion*, king of Tyre, murders his uncle Sichan in hopes of seizing on his treasures, but is disappointed by his sister Elisa, the wife of Sichan, 415, f, & seq. Said to have built the city of Carpasia in the island of Cyprus, 416, c. Sends a rich donative to the temple of Hercules at Gadu, ibid. d.
- Pyramidal* figure, why made use of by the Egyptians, and also other nations, in erecting monuments, 186, a.
- Pyramids* of Egypt, the most remarkable on the west side of the Nile, not far from Tizab, about 20, in number, 183, e. Whence so named, ibid. f. By whom built, 184, a, & seq. Some mentioned by Herodotus and Pliny, long since ruined, 185, a. The time when they were built, ibid. e. The end for which they were erected, ibid. e, f. Three most remarkable ones, 184, b. Their description, 186, c, & seq. The dimensions of the first pyramid, ibid. c, d, & seq. The outside of it, 187, a. The inside, ibid. d, & seq. The second pyramid, 190, c, & seq. The priests lodgings near it, ibid. f. The third pyramid, 190, c, & seq. A fourth pyramid, ibid. d. Other pyramids, 193, a. How the pyramids were built, 191, f. Inscriptions on them mentioned by the Copts, 184, e.
- Pythagoras* held two distinct and independent principles co-existent from eternity, viz. God and matter, 25, c. What meant by his dyad and monad, manud. ibid. d. The reason of his superstitious abstinence from beans, 26, a. His theology, 26, a, b. Borrowed his philosophy from the pillars of Hermes in Egypt, 222, c. With what reluctance of the Egyptian priests he was admitted to their secret learning, 223, a, b. Pyth. orans. their reasons why God should be called Sotiafys, 26, b, c.

Q

QUAILS sent to the Israelites, thought by some to have been locusts, 509, (Q). Quarantana, or Quarantania, the mountain where the devil, they say, took our blessed Saviour to tempt him with the delusive sight of the earth, 583, a. Stones shewn here, which the inhabitants believe to be the same which the devil would have converted into loaves, ibid.

R

RAAMAH, or Rhegma, where settled, 164, d. Rabbab, the metropolis of the Ammonites, called Rabbab of the children of Ammon, 294, c. Famous for being the place where the great iron bedstead of Og king of Hasan was to be seen, ibid. f. In process of time called Philadelpbia, from Ptolemy Philadelphus, who rebuilt it, ibid. Besieged by Joab, and after two years siege, stormed, plundered, and laid level with the ground, 298, d, e. Rachel, daughter of Laban, Jacob serves Laban 14 years for her, 440, e. Marries her, 441, a. Being long barren, is at last brought to bed of a son, whom she calls Joseph, 442, b. Steals her father's gods, 443. Vid. Teraphim. What induced her to it, ibid. (R). Brought to bed of Benjamin, 448, c. Dies and is buried in the way to Ephraim, 448, e. Her tomb near Bethlem remarkable for small stones to be seen there resembling peas, and ascribed to a miracle of the virgin Mary, 582, d. Rack, one of the Babylonian and Affyrian gods, 294, a. Raguel the same as Jethro, 303, (E). Rahab of the scripture, supposed to have been the western part of the Delta in Egypt, called at present el Rif, 176, c. Rahab spared in the destruction of Jericho, 330, e. Because she received and concealed in her house, the two spies sent by Joshua, 554, a. It does not appear from the text that she was an harlot, but an inn-keeper, ibid. (X). Receives assurance that her house should be exempted from the common ruin, ibid. b. Her whole family saved with her, 556, a. Embraces the Hebrew religion, is married to Solomon, and incorporated into the Hebrew common-wealth, ibid. Rain, some deny that there was any on the primitive earth, 111, b, c. Rain of stones, which fell upon the Canaanites, considered, 564, b, c, & 103. Like instances out of history, ibid. Rainbow, whether any before the flood, 111, e. Rameses, Moses's dwelling place in Egypt, 502, a. Not above threescore miles distant from the land of Canaan, ibid. b. Reshakeb, one of the Affyrian generals sent against Jerusalem, 892, d. His boasting speech to the deputies of king Hezekiah, ibid. & 893, a. Raven sent out of the ark by Noah, 106. Why chosen, ibid. (N). Rennais, his account of the ruins of Babylon, 146, (M). Rebub, king or prince of Midian, 303, c. Rebecca, daughter of Bethuel son of Nachor by Milcah, 431, d. Given to Isaac, 433, d. After having continued barren a'ove 19 years, brings forth two sons, Esau and Jacob, 436, a, & 437, a. Favours Jacob, 437, a. Procures Isaac's blessing for him, 439, a. Reckabites, who they were, their founder, institution and manner of life, 820, (T). Some wild notions concerning them confused; how far they were bound to their founder's injunction, 821. B. Tudel's fabulous account of them confused, ibid. Red Sea, more properly call the Arabian gulf, 308, (I). Called by the Hebrews, Yam suf, the weedy or flaggy sea; by the Arabians, Bahr Al-kolzum, or the sea of Kolzum, a small town at the northermost end of it, ibid. Why called the Erythrean, or Red Sea, ibid. The Erythrean, or Red Sea of the ancients is the Indian ocean of our days, ibid.

Refuge, cities of, among the Jews, 647, c. Designed to protect innocent persons only, ibid. These cities were designed not only for the Israelites, but for all strangers, 648, a. Several laws relating to them, ibid. c, d, & seq. The tabernacle, and afterwards the temple and altar places of refuge, 649, d, & seq.

Rehoboam succeeds Solomon, 804, d. His folly occasions the revolt of ten tribes, 805, a. Who chose Jeroboam to be their king, ibid. b. His death, 806, d.

Rehoboth the city of, where situated, 126, (B).

Rekem king of Midian, 303, c.

Relicks, the oldest consecration of relicks to be met with in history, 138, (Y).

Rephan, one of the Hebrew idols in the desert, 531, b.

Rephaim the vale of, called also the vale of Titan, or giants, 574, a. One of the ten nations of Canaanites, 322, (N). Men of a gigantic stature placed in Bashan, where Og, the last of their race, reigned, 324, (E). Thought by some to have been the Gephyraei, who followed Cadmus into Greece, ibid.

Rephidim, the place where Moses, by smiting the rock, made waters gush out, 511, a.

Risen city, where situate, 126, (B).

Reu, invention of several arts ascribed to him, 131.

Reuben, Jacob's first son by Leah born, 441, b. What meant by the mandrakes he brought home, 441, (Y). His incest, 448, c. Dissuades his brethren from killing Joseph, 449, c. Designs to save him out of the pit, and send him home to his father ibid. d. His lot in the promised land, 569, c.

Rezin last king of Syria, 389, b. Enters into a league with Peckab king of Israel, against Abaz king of Judah, ibid. Besieges Abaz in Jerusalem without effect, ibid. Marches into Edom, and makes himself master of Elath, ibid. Where he plants a colony, which subsisted many years after the subversion of the kingdom of Syria, 389, c. & 390, a. Invades the kingdom of Judah, and returns to Damascus loaded with spoils, 390, a. Abaz stirs up Tiglath-pileser, king of Affyria, against him, who kills him, and carries the inhabitants of Damascus away to Kir, ibid. a, b.

Rezon, first king of Damascus, revolts from Hada-dizer, whose forces he commanded, 382, b. Seizes on Damascus, and founds that kingdom, 382, c.

Rhabbothin, Phoenice so called, 391, d.

Rhampsinitus. Vid. Rhemphis.

Rhea daughter of Uranus, 136.

Rhebus, Rhebeus, or Rhebanus, a river near Paphlagonia, and a country of the same name, 167, a.

Rhemphis, or Rhampsinitus, king of Egypt, 257, e. Builds the western portico to the temple of Vulcan, 258, a. And a treasure-house, which is plundered by the artiched's two sons, ibid. c, d, e. Said to have gone down to hell, 259, d.

Rheob, the first sole king of Zobah, 382, a.

Rhincolura, a town built by Adisanes king of Egypt, in the desert between Syria and Egypt, 257, b. Why so called, ibid.

Rhopis, or Rhodope, mistress to Charaxus, said by some of the Greeks to have built one of the three great pyramids of Egypt, 184, b. What probably gave occasion to this story, 185, b.

Rbasht, people on the river Ras, or Aras, called by the Greeks, Araxes, 167, c.
Rimmon, an idol of the Syrians, 371, e. Etymology of the word, ibid. (D).
Ripbath, one of Gomer's sons, where seated, 167, a.
Riphei, mentioned by Pliny, a people, 167, a.
Rivers watering Eden, 55, 56, 57.
Riyan king of Egypt, 282, a. In his reign, according to the oriental writers, Joseph was sold into Egypt, ibid.
Rizpah, one of Saul's concubines, her concern for the death of her sons, 788, b.
Red Moses's. Vid. Moses. Stories of the Jews concerning it, 489, (Q). Turned into a serpent, swallows those of the Egyptians, 494, c.
Ruddery, what, in the phytology of the Bramins, 33, b.
Ruel and Yerbro the same person, 302, (K).
Russians, from whom descended, 167, e.

S.

SABA, now Mareb, formerly the chief city of Yaman, or Arabia Felix, by whom built, 164, e. The chief city of the Sabæans, and also called Mariaba, or Maraba, 170, c.
Sabæan nations extended from the Arabian to the Persian gulf, 170. The name of their chief city, according to some, Saba; according to others, Mariaba, or Maraba, 170, c. All names of the same place, ibid.
Sabbaco, the Ethiopian, breaks into Egypt with a powerful army, and forces king Afsu to fly for shelter to the fens, 261, e, f. Thought to have been the So of scripture, 262, a. Excited to the invasion of Egypt by a dream, ibid. Gives high proofs of wisdom and piety, ibid. His policy, ibid. Retires of his own accord into his own country, ibid. c, d.
Sabbath laws positive and negative concerning it, 600, c. The abstaining from work, stretch'd by the Jews to the most superstitious degree, ibid. (M). Several extravagant notions of the Jews about the sabbath, ibid. The observation of the sabbath asserted by some Jews and Christians to be as old as the creation, ibid. Whether given to the Israelites as a memorial of their deliverance from the Egyptian yoke, and to distinguish them from all other nations, ibid. What meant in the gospel by the second sabbath after the first, or the second prime sabbath, ibid.
Sabbatic year, laws concerning it, 612, a. In what time of the year it was to begin, ibid. (L). How soon after their entrance into the land of Canaan it began to be observed, ibid.
Sabian religion, by whom founded, 913, c. Several steps of its progress, ibid. c, f, & seq.
Sabtab, where seated, 164, d.
Sabtecha, where fixed, 164, f.
Sacca, festival among the Babylonians, 928.
Sacrifice, the daily sacrifice, laws concerning it, 623, b, c. Human sacrifices offered by the Egyptians, 211, f.
Sacrificing, the custom of mens sacrificing their children to the devil, when and on what occasion said by some to have taken rise, 131, (W). The manner of sacrificing living creatures among the Jews, 628, (M).
Sabalut, a fabulous king of Egypt, 2-8.
Sais, one of the chief cities, in former times, of the Lower Egypt, 176, c.
Salab, son and successor of Arphaxad, 128, a, b. Conjectures relating to him, ibid. b, & (I). Where settled, 163, b. One of the chiefs at the dispersion, ibid.
Salamba, a goddess of the Affyrians, 923, c. The same with Aparta, ibid.
Salatis, the first king set up in Egypt by the shepherds, 245, b, c.

Salem, by Jehoshaphat called Solyma, and according to him, founded by Melchisedec, and called Jerusalem, 328, (Q). Salem, a place near the city of Shechem in the land of Canaan, where Jacob bought a piece of land from Heber, 446, d. Jacob builds an altar there, which he calls El Elobe Israel, or the mighty God of Israel, ibid. Very likely the same place where Abraham had built one, after his first coming into the land of Canaan, ibid.
Salernum in Italy, said to have been confounded by Shem, 126, (Z).
Salt the valley of, famed for the overthrow of the Edomites there, 310, b, & 574, a.
Salt sea. Vid. Asphaltite Lake.
Samachonite lake, from whence its derives its name, 577, c. Described, ibid.
Samaria city of, besieged by Ben-badad king of Syria, and relieved by Ahab, 383, b, c, d, & 815, e. Again besieged by the same, but miraculously delivered when upon the point of being taken, 387, b. Besieged and taken by Sbalmaneser, 835, a, b. By whom built, 808, f. Called in future ages Sebasta, 588, c. Its ruins, ibid.
Samaritan alphabet, 719, c. Whether the Samaritan was the antient Hebrew, 720, a, b.
Samlab of Mareikab, king of the Horites, 312, c. In his reign it is probably thought, that Efsa came into the country called afterwards from him Edom, ibid.
Samsata, a chief city of Commagene, 360, d.
Samson, his birth and prowess foretold by an angel, 754, c. Smitten with love of a damsel that dwelt at Timnath, 348, a. Proposes a riddle to 30 young men appointed to wait on him, and kills 30 men of Ashalon, whose garments he gives to the expositors of it to make good his engagement, ibid. c. To revenge the affront of his father-in-law, sends out 300 foxes with firebrands at their tails, and consumes all the standing corn, ibid. c, d. Delivered up bound to the Philistines by the men of Judab, 349, a. Breaks his cords, and kills 1000 of the Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass, ibid. Is shut up in Gaza, but takes the city gates, and carries them to Hebron, ibid. b. Betray'd by Delilah, his hair cut off, his eyes put out, and condemned to grind in the prison-house, ibid. Kills himself and many thousands of the Philistines by pulling down the house he was in, 350, a, & 348, & seq.
Samuel obtained by the prayers of his mother, 755, d. Dedicated to God by a solemn vow, enters into his service at the age of three years old, ibid. The heavy judgment against Eli's house revealed to him, 756, a. Obtains by his prayers a signal victory over the Philistines, 757, c, d. The Jews enjoy a profound peace in the time of his government, ibid. Endeavours to dissuade the people from creating a king, 758, a. His sons do not follow their father's footsteps, but suffer themselves to be bribed, ibid. Anoints Saul king, 759, a. Justifies his conduct during the time of his administration, in the presence of the new king, 759, f. His design in so doing, 760, a, b. Upbraids Saul for not waiting for him, 761, b. Anoints David in Saul's room, 763, c. His death, 768, c. His apparition, 771. Circumstances of this apparition, ibid. (P).
Sana, or Sa, king of Egypt, supposed to have built the city Sais, 280, c.
Sanaa, the capital of Yaman, called by the Jews who dwelt there Uzab, 170, a.
Sanchoniatho, his account of the original of the world, 11, d, e. He gives us the idolatrous line of Cain, ibid. 86, b. Begins his history of mankind with the production of the first pair, 86, c. His pedigree of Cain's line compared with that given by Moses, 89, b, c, & seq. His history continued, 133, b. Bishop Cumberland's amend- ments of it considered, 139, (B). His account of the flood. Vid. Flood.

- Sanhedrin* of the Jews, some of opinion that it was the council of 70 elders continued, 525, (H). No mention of such a high court till the time of the Maccabees, ibid.
- Sansuchinus*, or Sansuchus, king of Affyria, 897, a. Thought by some, through mistake, to have been the Nabucodonosor of the book of Judith, ibid. (N). Under him Manasseh was probably restored to his kingdom, and Egypt recovered her liberty, ibid.
- Saph*, son of Goliath, slain by Sibbechai, 357, b.
- Sarac* king of Affyria, 902, a. Nabopolassar, one of his generals, rebels against him, and seizes on the kingdom of Babylon for himself, ibid. The two revolted kingdoms of the Medes and Babylonians conspire against him, ibid. Sarac, dreading the impending calamities, burns his palace, and himself therewith, ibid. In him ends the Affyrian monarchy, ibid. b. Sarac probably the Sardanapalus of the profane historians, ibid.
- Saracenes*, the etymology of the word, 165. Supposed by some to be the descendants of Sabthucha, ibid. a. First ruled, by the Greeks, Sabthucheni, ibid. The word Saraceni no other than Sharkini, or Easterlings, ibid.
- Sarah* passes for Abraham's sister, 422, c. The king of Egypt, smitten with her, shews an extraordinary kindness to Abraham, 423, a. Taken from Abraham by Abimelech king of the Philistines, but upon a vision from heaven restored to him, 345, a, b. A son promised her, 429, a. Prevails upon Abraham to send away Hagar and Ismael, 430, b. First called Sarai, but that name changed into Sarah, 427, a, & (P). Etymology of both, ibid. Her death, 431, c. Is buried in the cave of Machpelah, ibid.
- Sardanapalus*, king of Affyria, his character, 885, a. His reign, ibid. & seq. The Medes, Babylonians, and Perians revolt against him, 886, a. He defeats them thrice, ibid. b, c, d. But at last is attacked by surprise and routed, ibid. e. Besieged in Niniveh, 887, a. Destroys himself and his riches, c. Interfection supposed to have been on one of the pillars erected to him, ibid. (V). Probably the same as Sarac, the last king of Affyria, 902, b.
- Sari*, measure of time in Berosus, 90, a, & (N).
- Sariac* a fabulous king of Egypt, 278.
- Saron*, or Saronas, the northern part of the plain of Legion, 575, a.
- Sartanas*, the Perisan governor of Egypt, 2-6, a.
- Sa'yhis*, king of Egypt, and the second Egyptian legislator, 247, b.
- Saul* of Reboboth, king of the Horites, 312, c.
- Saul*, the son of Kish, anointed king of Israel by Samuel, 758, d. Presented by Samuel to the people, and received with great applause, 759, b. Raises the siege of Jabesh Gilead with a great slaughter of the Ammonites, ibid. e. His moderation, ibid. Defeats the Philistines at Micmash, 353, b, c. Tormented by an evil spirit, finds relief from David's playing on the harp, 763, c, d. Makes David his armour-bearer, ibid. His jealousy against David by what occasioned, 764, d. Endeavours to kill him, 765, a. Gives him his second daughter, ibid. b. Commands the high-priest Abimelech, with others, to be put to death in his presence, 767, a. And orders the whole city of Nob to be put to the sword, ibid. Consults the witch of Endor, 771, a, b. Offers up victims without attending Samuel, 761, b. Upbraided by Samuel, ibid. He is rejected, 762. What was the crime he was guilty of, 761, (C). Defeated by the Philistines, and killed with his three sons, 356, d. His head cut off, his armour dedicated in the temple of Ashtaroth, and his body, with the bodies of his three sons, hung upon the walls of Bethshan, ibid. & 772, a, b.
- Saurid*, believed by the Cypriots to have built the pyramids before the flood, 184, d. Vid. & p. 278, f. & seq.
- Scythians* about mount Caucasus, supposed by the fathers to be the descendants of Magog, 167, d.
- Sea salt*. Vid. Asphaltite.
- Sea dead*. Vid. Idem.
- Sea*, where seated, 164, d.
- Sebajia*, or the ancient Samaria, its ruins, 583, c.
- Sebat*, the fifth month of the Jewish year, answering our January, 611, (K).
- Sebta*, or Centa, a maritime town in Africa, said to have been built by Shem, 126, (Z).
- Seels* among the ancient Jews, according to the Talmudists, 732. Alluded to by St. Paul, Rom. 5, ibid.
- Seir* mount, the settlement of Esau, 307.
- Seir*, a Horite, from him the mount and land of Seir had its name, 308, b. His descendants dukes in the land of Seir, while the descendants of Esau governed, as dukes, the land of Edom, 312, c. The wilderness of Seir, 527, d.
- Selab*, or Petia, city of Edom, called by some the chief place of the Nabataeans, the capital of Arabia, &c. 309, c, d. Taken by Amaziah and called Joktheel, 316, b, c.
- Seleucia*, a town in Seleucia, 361, a.
- Seleucia*, part of Syria, its situation, 361, a.
- Semiramis*, her birth, 875, a. Married and carried to Niniveh, 876, a. Goes to the camp of Ninus before Babylon, ibid. e. She is the cause of the city's being taken, 877, b. Ninus smitten with her, marries her, and has a son by her, ibid. c. Her character, 878, a, & (Y). Resolves to build Babylon, ibid. The manner she contrived to have the city built in a short time, ibid. b. The lake she dug, 879, c. Builds the temple of Belus, ibid. d. And several cities, ibid. e. Her obelisks, ibid. She wars upon the Medes, 880, a. Resolves to invade India, ibid. d, e. Her mock elephants, 881, a. Passes the Indus, 882, b. Engages Stabrobates king of India, and is routed, ibid. e. Assassinated by an eunuch, ibid. e. The etymology of her name, 875, (P). The story of her pretending to pass with the people for her son Ninyas exploded by some, 877, (W). Worshipped by the Affyrians in the form of a dove, why, 862, a. How represented, ibid. Most likely to have been the wife of Nabonassar, 942, f. Whence it came to pass that she ruled over Babylon, 943, b. Her reign but short, ibid. e, f. Particulars concerning her, 944, c, d, & seq.
- Semron* a fabulous king of Egypt, 278.
- Senjar* city, its situation, 142, c, & (F). Called also Samara, ibid. d.
- Sennaar* of Babylon, 142, b.
- Sennacherib*, or Sanherib, succeeds Shalmaneser in the kingdom of Affyria, 892, b. Besieges Lachish, ibid. c. His proud letter to Hezekiah, 838, a. Sends three officers at the head of a great army to besiege Jerusalem, ibid. His expedition against the Jews proves unsuccessful, 894. One hundred eighty-five thousand Affyrians smitten by the angel of the Lord, 895, a. What meant by the angel of the Lord, ibid. (Z). Returns home, grows tyrannical, especially towards the captive Jews, ibid. a. Murdered by his two sons, Adrammelech and Saraxer, in the temple of his favourite god Nisroch, ibid.
- Sephar* and Misba, mentioned by Moses, where situate, 169, d, e. Various opinions about mount Sephar, ibid. & seq.
- Sepulchres* of the kings of Jerusalem, 589, a. What kings buried there, ibid. (K). Description of the place, ibid. Sepulchres of the Jews, 698, b. The sepulchres of the kings of Judab in that part of Jerusalem where the temple stood, ibid. d. That of David still to be seen, ibid. c. Description

- tion of it, 589, b. Broken open by Hircan the high priest, and 3000 talents taken out of it, 691, a. A prodigious treasure taken out of it by Herod, ibid.
- Serapis*, one of the Egyptian deities, 204, e. Supposed by some to be the same as Osiris, ibid. How represented, 205, e.
- Serpent* the body of, abused by the devil to seduce Eve, 61, a. Why chosen by the devil for that end, ibid. b, c. Of what kind was this serpent, 62, a. His accosting Eve, ibid. b, c. His punishment reasonable, ibid. d, e. Supposed by Josephus to have been endowed with speech, 61, (N). Ridiculous traditions of the Mohammedans on the serpent, ibid. The nature of the fiery serpents that infested the Israelites, 532, (S). Craft of enchanting serpents considered, 853, f.
- Serap*, the invention of coining ascribed to him, 131, b, & (W).
- Sibor*, a Babylonian deity, 923, d.
- Sesoftris*, king of This in Egypt, said to have been five cubits high, and three broad, 239, (E).
- Sesofis*, or Pheron, king of Egypt. Vid. Pheron.
- Sesoftris* king of Egypt, 247, d. Whether the Sesof, or Shyſak of scripture, ibid. (H). Whether the Pharaoh who perished in the Red-Sea, 249. His father, who, 251, a. Gathers in all the boys in Egypt that were born on the same day with him, 252, a. Sesoftris undertakes to conquer the whole world, 252, & seq. Subdues the Arabians, and the greatest part of Afric, ibid. b, c. Divides Egypt into 36 nomes, 253, a. Institutes a military order, ibid. b. Conquers Ethiopia, ibid. c. Invades the Scythians, ibid. f. Supposed to have planted a colony in Colchis, 254, a. His pillars and statues, ibid. c, d. Returns to Egypt, ibid. e. Is miraculously delivered from the murderous designs of his brother, ibid. f. His religious, civil, and military works, ibid. & seq. His insolence, 255, e. Lays violent hands on himself, ibid. f.
- Seth*, when born, 75, d. His race supposed to be meant by the sons of God, 77. The religious life of his offspring, 81, b. Their defection, ibid. The cause of it, ibid. How long they continued religious, ibid. b, c, d. Who intended by the children of Seth in the prophecy of Baal, 289, (N). His name not unknown to the Egyptians, 81, (N). His line as it stands in Sanchoniatho, 134, (N). The same corrected, ibid. The issue of the Sethites, and the daughters of Cain, and their impiety, 83, b, c.
- Sethon*, priest and king of Egypt, 262, c. Obtains a signal and miraculous victory over the Affrians, ibid. e. A statue erected to him with a rat in one of his hands, in memory of the victory he obtained by their assistance, ibid. f.
- Shchemites*, and those of Millo, proclaim Abimelech king, 747, c.
- Shallum* murders Zecheriah, seizes on the kingdom, and, after a reign of 30 days, is murdered by Menabem, 828, c.
- Shalmaneser*, king of Affria, succeeds Tiglath-pileser, and invades the kingdom of Israel under Hysbea, 891, a. Reduces Samaria after three years siege, makes king Hysbea prisoner, and transplants the inhabitants into Affria, 891, b. Carries the ten tribes into captivity, 835, a, b. Keeps Tyre besieged for the space of five years, but not able to reduce it, 416, f. His fleet routed by the Tyrians, 892, a.
- Shamgar* delivers the Israelites from the yoke of the Philistines, 348, a. Kills 600 of them with an ox-goad, ibid. This event not mentioned by Josephus, ibid. (S). & 742, f.
- Shang ti*, the supreme governor of all things, in the philosophy of the Chinese, 34, a.
- Sharazer*, with his brother Abimelech, murders his father Sennacherib king of Affria, 895, b. What prompted them to this parricide, ibid. (C). Sharon the country of, 575, (A).
- Shaveb* the valley, called the field of kings, or the king's dale, 574, b, & (T). Famous for the interview between Abraham and Melchisedec, ibid.
- Shiba*, what parts peopled by him, 161, d.
- Sheba* raises a revolt of the tribes against David, 787, c. Murdered, ibid. f.
- Sheba* queen of, visits Solomon, 501, b. An account of her, ibid. (S).
- Shechem*, son of Hamor, deflowers Dinah the daughter of Jacob, 329, b. He and all his tribe consent to be circumcised to pacify Jacob, ibid. c, d. But the third day are all cut off by Simron and Levi, ibid. e, & 447, d.
- Shechem*, the name of a city in the land of Canaan, 446, d.
- Shel* Jewish, an account of, 721, b.
- She Kia*, 24, e.
- Shelub*, Judah's son by his Canaanitish wife, 450, c.
- Shelaph*, one of the sons of Jektan, uncertain where settled, 170, a.
- Shem* and his posterity, 125, a. When born, ibid. b. Invention of astronomy ascribed to him by the Jews, 125, e. Confounded by mistake with Melchisedec, ibid. A treatise of physic ascribed to him, 126, a. Said to have been the first king, ibid. His death, ibid. b. Thought by some to be the same with Pluto, by others with Typhon, ibid. b, & (A). What countries planted by his descendants, 162, e, f.
- Shemaiah* prophet, 806, d.
- Shematta*, or excommunication, 674, a.
- Shemeber*, king of Zebonim in the vale of Siddim, routed by Chedorlaomer, 327, b.
- Shepherds* the interruption of, into Egypt, 345, b, & seq. Believed to have been the Canaanites, ibid. Do their utmost to root out the native Egyptians, ibid. d. Called Hyksos, the etymology of the word, ibid. Held Egypt 511 years, ibid. Of what country, ibid. & (B). The time of their invasion, 245, (B). Driven out of Egypt, 256, d. Build the city of Jerusalem, ibid. Some mistake them for the Israelites, 25, a, & (I).
- Shelbai*, one of the three sons of Anah, driven from Hebron by Caleb, 334, a, & (B).
- Shew-bread*, why called in the original bread of faces, 624, b. How and of what made, ibid. Laws concerning it, ibid. The table of the shew-bread described, 658, d, & seq.
- Sibboleth*, pronounced by the Ephraimites Sibboleth, 753, b.
- Sibob* what meant by, in Jacob's famous prophecy to Judah, The scepter shall not depart from Judah, Ec. 462, (G).
- Shimei's* villainous behaviour to David, 784, b. Instructions, relating to him, given by David to Solomon, 792, a. Put to death, 793, a.
- Shimran* king of, joins Jabin king of Hezar against the Israelites, and is defeated, 332, e, f.
- Shinaar*, first migration of the sons of Noah to the plain of Shinaar, 141, b, c. The situation and extent of the land of Shinaar, 142, a. Etymology of the word, ibid. & (D). Footsteps of the name met with both in ancient and modern writers, ibid. b, c.
- Shiprah* and Phuah, the two chief Hebrew midwives, strictly charged by Pharaoh to destroy all the males, 475, d. Reproved by Pharaoh for their disobedience, and rewarded by God for their obedience, 476, a, b.
- Shittim* the vale of, its situation quite uncertain, 574, a.
- Shittim-wood*, various opinions of authors concerning it, 652, (Q).

- Sheaib's* cave, one of the stations in the pilgrimage from Egypt to Mecca, why so called, 305, (R). Formerly named Madyan, ibid.
- Shobach*, general of the Assyrian forces against David, is routed and killed, 382, d.
- Sbur* and Cadish, the names of two deserts, 429, c. & (V).
- Shusham*, the capital of Susiana, sometimes honoured with the presence of the Babylonian monarchs, 952, c.
- Siamefe* agree with the stoics, in their notion of the alternate destruction and renovation of the earth, 25, a.
- Subæus*, a priest of Hercules, murdered by his brother Pygmalion king of Tyre, 415, f.
- Siddim* vale of, its inhabitants invaded by Chedorlaomer king of Elam, and reduced to pay tribute, 326, c. The five kings of Siddim rebel against Chedorlaomer, but their armies are routed, their people either killed, carried away captives, or obliged to fly to the mountains, 327, c. The wickedness of the inhabitants of this vale punished with fire and brimstone, 328, b, c. How this destruction was effected, ibid. (T). Vid. Pentapolis.
- Sidon*, daughter of Pontus, found out first hymns, 137, a.
- Sidon* the metropolis of Phœnice, so called from Sidon the eldest son of Canaan, 392, b. Who, according to Josephus, was the founder of it, 410, e. Various opinions about the derivation of its name, 392, (E). Its harbour described, ibid. Now called Seyde, ibid. c. History of its kings, 410, e. No mention made in scripture of its kings, till the time of the prophet Jeremiah, 410, e. Betrayed by Tennis, king of the country, and by Mentor the Rhodian, to Ochus king of Persia, 411, c. Set on fire by the Sidonians, who consume themselves to the number of 40,000, and their city, ibid. f. Ochus sells the ashes of the burnt city for a great sum of money, 412, a. Rebuilt by such of the citizens as had been absent, ibid. b. Delivered to Alexander, ibid.
- Sihon* the Amorite, drives the Ammonites from their ancient habitation, 294, c. Invades the children of Meab, and dispossesses them of their country on the other side the Jordan and the Dead Sea, 330, a. Refuses Moses a free passage through his country on his way to Canaan, but is defeated with a fatal overthrow, ibid. c.
- Siloam* the pool of, 586, b, & (E).
- Siloe* where situate, 586, c.
- Simeon*, Jacob's second son by Leah, born, 441, b. Kept by Joseph in Egypt, 454, b. Jacob's prophecy against the tribes of Simeon and Levi, 462, a. How fulfilled, ibid. (F). Simeon why omitted in Moses's blessing, 543, a. His lot in the promised land, 569, a.
- Simeonites* utterly destroy and disperse the Amalekites, 321, d.
- Simma* adopts Semiramis, and gives her this name, which signifies doves, or pigeons, 876, a.
- Simplicius*, his opinion touching the system of the Eleatics, 7. A zealous contender for the world's eternity, 14, a. Affirms the Mosaic history of the creation of the world by God, to have been a fabulous tradition, drawn from the Egyptian fables, 14, a.
- Singara* city and mountain of, 142, b, c.
- Sion* mount, 573, b.
- Sippara*, the city of the sun, 91, d.
- Sirbon*, a lake in Egypt, 242, (B). Described, ibid.
- Siriad* land of, mentioned by Josephus, where seated, 81, b. & (N).
- Sisera*, general of the armies of Jabin king of Canaan, 335. Routed by Deborah and Barak, 336. And killed by Jael, ibid. c.
- Sisbak*, king of Egypt, strips the temple of Jerusalem, 806, d.
- Sittacene*, a province of Assyria, 858, b.
- Sivan*, the ninth month of the Jewish year, answering our May, 611, (K).
- So in scripture thought to be the same with Sabbaco, the Ethiopian king of Egypt, 264, b.
- Sodom* and Gomorrah taken and pillaged by Chedorlaomer king of Elam, 327, c.
- Solomon*, several princes of that name, according to the doctrine of the orientals, reigning many thousand years before Adam, 51, b.
- Solomon*, king of Judæa, born, 780, d. Proclaimed king, 790, c. Put to death Adonijah and Joab, 792, d. And Shimei, 793, a. Marries the daughter of Pharaoh king of Egypt, 793, b. Chuses wisdom, ibid. c. A pregnant proof of it, ibid. His magnificence, ibid. e. Builds the temple, 795, a. The dedication of it, 797, a. Its utensils and ornaments, ibid. (M). Vast number of victims, 798, c. His palaces, 799, a. His navy, 800, a. Visited by the queen of Sheba, 801, b. His desertion, 802, c. Idolatry, ibid. And death, 803, a. Whether he ever repented, 801, (W).
- Sons of God, who meant by, 81, b, c, & seq.
- Sophene*. Vid. Zobah.
- Soul of man a spiritual substance, 46, a. Whether infused immediately by God into man, or derived ex traduce from their parents, ibid. b. Whether all created at once with Adam, or successively, ibid. c. Pre-existence of souls believed by several ancient philosophers, Christians, Mohammedans, and Jews, 46, c, d, e, & seq. Souls of brutes, according to some particular emanations from the source of life, 46, e.
- Speech the original of, 149. Whether the first language was of divine formation, ibid. c, & 150, a. The first language consisted of few words, 150, d. Whether more tongues than one before the flood, 151, b, c. Enquiry concerning the primitive tongue, ibid. b, c, & seq. Several languages claim this honour, ibid. An experiment used by Psammetichus, king of Egypt, to know which was the primitive language, 151, (U). The pretension of the Hebrew tongue considered, 152, c, d.
- Sphinxes*, used formerly to shew the beginning of the Nile's rising, 176, a. Several of them still to be seen, ibid. b. the size of one mentioned by Pliny, ibid.
- Spider*, an immense spider the first cause of all things, according to the system of the Pendets, 23, d.
- Spies*, twelve sent by Moses to view the promised land, 526, a. Ten of them bring an ill report, ibid. c. And cause an insurrection, ibid. e. All destroyed by a sudden death, 527, a. A fast kept by the Jews to this day in memory of their punishment, ibid. Spies sent by Jehua to Jericho, 554, a. Concealed by Rabab, swear to save her and her family, 554, a. Return to the camp and make their report, 553, a, b.
- Spinoza*, the first who reduced atheism into a system, 6, c. His monstrous system of the universe, 8, e. 9, a. His system concerning the sun's standing still examined and confuted, 559, b.
- Spirits* evil, no mention of among the Greeks or Romans, 51, c.
- Spirits*. Vid. Angels.
- Stabrobates*, king of India, routs Semiramis, 882, c.
- Statuary in great perfection among the Egyptians, 221, f.
- Stilpo* holds the eternity and immutability of the world, 6, d.
- Stoics* admitted two principles, the one active, the other passive, 22, d. Acknowledged no incorporeal substance, ibid. Affirmed God to be an immortal, rational, and perfect animal, ibid. Confounded God and nature together, 23. Some stoics supposed the world to be governed by a plastic nature only, 23, a. Their peculiar dogm, as to the constitution of the world, ibid. a.

- Conformity between their notions and the doctrine of the Pandets, or Indian Gentiles, 23, c. Their opinion secretly entertained by the Sûfs of Persia, 23, c.
- Stones* rain of, which fell upon the Canaanites, 564, b. Le Clerc's notion confuted, ibid. Several like instances out of history, ibid. e, & 565, a. Some caused by hurricanes and earthquakes, ibid. b, c. Others engender in the air, ibid. a.
- Stoning*, the most usual capital punishment among the Jews, 672, c. What crimes deserved this death, ibid. d. The manner of this execution, 673, a.
- Strangling*, one of the capital punishments among the Jews, 673, d. What crimes were punished with this death, ibid. The manner of this execution, ibid.
- Strato* of Lampsacus, his opinion of the origin of things, 7, c, d.
- Strato* king of Sidon, 412. Deprived of his crown by Alexander, ibid. A lewd prince, ibid. e.
- Strato* king of Tyre, 417, f. How he was assumed to the throne, ibid. & 418, a, b, c.
- Stratonice* built the famous temple of the great Syrian goddess at Hierapolis, 374, d. Her story with relation to Combabus, ibid. & seq.
- Syn*, why the gods said to swear by it, 17, d.
- Succoth*, or booths, the place where Jacob stopped, after his interview with Esau, 446, c. Afterwards a city, its situation, ibid. d. The first encampment of the Israelites, on their departure from Egypt, 502, a. This different from that which Jacob called Succoth, when he came out of Mesopotamia, 509, (G). Called by Josephus, Latopolis, ibid. Thought by many to be the country called Troglocliss by the Red-Sea, ibid. The city of Succoth refuses Gideon and his men a refreshment, 745, d. Who punishes 77 of the chief magistrates, ibid. What punishment inflicted on them, ibid. (E).
- Succoth Benoth*, the Affryan Venus, 916, c.
- Suffetes*, judges who governed Tyre for some years, 417, d. Etymology of the word, ibid. (C).
- Sukkim*, the Ichthyophagi inhabiting the coast of the Red-Sea, 165, d.
- Sun*, when created, 35, b. Said by Herodotus, to have inverted his course four times, and rose in the west, 67, (N). Idolatry began with the worship of this planet, 86, (N). His standing still at Joshua's order, 551, b. How his words must be understood, ibid. (G). The system of Maimonides and Spinosa concerning it considered and rejected, 559, a. And that of Grotius, ibid. d. And of Piererius, 560, a, b, & seq. And that of Le Clerc, 561, a, b, & seq. The sun's going back ten degrees, how understood, 838, (I).
- Suphis*, king of Memphis, reported to have seen the gods, to have wrote a sacred book greatly esteemed by the Egyptians, and built the largest pyramid near Memphis, 239, (G).
- Sufiana*, part of Elam, or Persia, taken by Stephanus to be part of Affryia, 162, c.
- Sydic* in the Phœnician records, supposed to be the same as Melchisedec, 134, (E).
- Sydon*, antiquities to be seen there, 395, c. Series of its kings, 407.
- Syene*, an ancient city of Thebais, 175, c.
- Synagogues*, when introduced among the Jews, 730, d.
- Synellus*, his series of the Egyptian kings considered, 254, & 240.
- Syria*, in Hebrew, Aram, so named from Aram the youngest son of Shem, 360, a. Various opinions relating to the name of Syria, ibid. Its situation, ibid. b. Its various divisions, ibid. e. How divided under the Romans, 361, d. Its climate and fertility, ibid. e. Its rivers, ibid. Natural rarities, 362, a, b. And artificial, 363, b, c.
- Syriac* allowed to be the most antient of the oriental tongues, 152, a. Some names in Moses more happily derived from the Syriac than from the Hebrew, ibid. (X). Became a distinct tongue so early as the days of Jacob, 377, c. Common to Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and Affryia, ibid. d. The Syriac character supposed to have been in use above 300 years before the birth of Christ, 377, e. Two sorts of characters, the Estrangelo and Epheso, ibid. Was destitute of vowels till the end of the eighth century, 378. Restor'd to its ancient purity by John of Edessa, the first who wrote a Syriac grammar, 379, a. Character of this work, ibid. The Syriac translations of the old and new testament equal to any other whatsoever, ibid.
- Syrians*, the first who inhabited Syria, descended partly from Shem, and partly from Ham, 370, e. Governed by heads of families, called kings, to the days of Saul, 371, b. And divided into several small kingdoms, ibid. Were idolaters, but often changed their religion, 372, a, b. Their idols and temples, 374, c, d. Sacrifices, festivals, 375, a, b, c. Their religious customs and traditions, ibid. f, g. Their temper, learning, arts, language, 377, b, c. Syriac alphabet, 378. Their trade, 379, b, c. The chronology of the ancient Syrians, 380. The reigns of the ancient kings of Syria, 383, b, c, & seq. The kingdom of Syria abolished, according to the prophets, by Tiglath-pileser king of Affryia, 390, b. The Syrian monarchs older than the Affryan, 868, f.
- Syrian* goddess, her temple at Hierapolis, 372, c. Description of this temple, the statues, sacred lake, oracle, &c. 373, a, b, c, & seq. Her different sorts of priests, 374, c. Sacrifices, festivals, &c. performed in her temple at Hierapolis, 375, a, b.
- Syringes*, a place so called, 81, (N).
- Syrophœnicians*, who, 392, (B).

T.

T A U T U S, the same with the Egyptian Thoth, or Hermes, 11, a. According to the Phœnician records, found out the writing of the first letters, 134, a. The same with Thon of the Egyptians, &c. ibid.

Taberah, (or burning) the place where the Israelites beginning to rebel, an extraordinary fire began to consume their camp, 524, b.

Tabernacle, made and set up at the foot of mount Sinai, 523, b. Built by the direction of God himself, 651, b. Why called Obel in the Mosaic writings, ibid. c. Whether borrowed from the Egyptians, ibid. d, e. Its form, make, dimensions, &c. 652, a, b, c, & seq. Its court described, 659, c, d, & seq.

Tabernacles feast of, ordained in memory of the 40 years abode of the Israelites in the wilderness, 606, b. Of what trees their tabernacles, or booths, were to be made, 607, a, & (B). On what time this feast was to be celebrated, ibid. Laws relating to this festival, ibid. & 608, a.

Tabir. Vid. Nomes.

Table of Cain's descendants, according to Sanchezius and Moses, 89, b, c. Of the Chalzan kings before the flood, 90, d. The length of their reigns, 91, a. Of the gods, and demi-gods, supposed to have reigned in Egypt before the flood, 93, a. Of the computation of mankind, from the creation to the flood, by Mr. Whiston, 105. Of the years of the postdiluvian patriarchs to the birth of Abraham, 110, d. Table of the years of the postdiluvian patriarchs to the call of Abraham, according to the computation of the Hebrews, 111. According to the computation of the Septuagint, ibid. And according to that of the Samaritan pan-

- pentateuch, 112. Table genealogical of the descendants of Noah, 117. Of the gradual increase of mankind after the flood, 159, 160. According to several authors, ibid. Table of the last 16 of the 30 Egyptian dynasties, according to the old Egyptian chronicle, 228. Of the Egyptian dynasties from Menetho, ibid. f. Egyptian kings from Menetho, according to Josephus, 234. Of the Theban kings from the Laticulus of Eratostratus, ibid. Of the Egyptian kings, according to Synellus, 234. Of the kings of Egypt, according to Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, 235. Of the Israhelish judges, 737. Of the Jewish kings before Jeroboam's revolt, ibid. Of Judah and Israel, after the division of the two kingdoms, ibid.
- Tables of the decalogue, Jewish fables relating to them, 519, (A). The stone, where the commandments were written, given to Moses, 519, a. How many were they, ibid. Their shape, bigness, the matter they were made of, ibid. In what sense written by the finger of God, ibid. Fables of the Mohammedans touching this subject, ibid.
- Tabrimon*, the son of Hezion, king of Damascus, lives at peace and amity with the kings of Judah and Israel, 383, a. Thought by some to have been subject to the Egyptians, ibid. (B).
- Tachos*, king of Egypt, 275, c. His impolitic conduct towards Agesilaus king of Sparta, ibid. d. Marches out of Egypt to attack the Persians in Phœnicia, ibid. e. In his absence his subjects revolt, and oblige him to fly into Persia, ibid. f.
- Tachmûrah*, a fabulous king of Persia, said to have waged war with the Gentii, 342, a.
- Talmûi*, one of the three sons of Anak, driven from Hebron by Caleb, 334, a, & (B).
- Talmûi* king of Geshur, 391, c. David marries Maacha his daughter, ibid.
- Talmudists*, their ridiculous opinions of the first man, 44, c.
- Tamar*, Er's wife, is married to Onan, 450, c. Deceives Judah, and proves with child by him, 451, c. Condemned to be burnt, ibid. c, d. But absolved, 452, a. Brings forth twins, Phares and Zarah, ibid.
- Tamar* ravished by her brother Ammon, 781, a.
- Tamus* treacherously murdered by Psalmitichus II. king of Egypt, 274, c.
- Tanais* a chief city, in former times, of the Lower Egypt, 176.
- Tamitic* mouth of the Nile, why abhorred by the ancient Egyptians, 243, c.
- Taphene*, the queen of Egypt's sister, given in marriage to the fugitive Hudad king of Edom, 314, c.
- Tarichneute*, embalmer among the Egyptians, 215, a.
- Tarsish* where settled, 161, c. Gave name, according to Josephus, to Tarsus and all Cilicia, 168, c.
- Tartan*, general of the Assyrians, takes Asbed from the Philistines, whom he reduces, 359, c, d, & 856, b.
- Teleides* and Theolorus, the sons of Rhæcus, made the famous statue of Apollo Pythius, 221, f.
- Teman*, a city of Edom, mentioned for the wisdom and conduct of its inhabitants, 309, b. The country round it called Temani, of which was Eliphaz, one of Job's friends, ibid.
- Temple of Jerusalem, 795, a. The dedication of it, 797, a. Its utensils, ornaments, &c. ibid. (M). Vast number of victims, 798, c. Twice plundered by Nebuchadnezzar, 848, a, c. And burnt to the ground, 850, d.
- Temple of Solomon described, according to the sacred books, Append. after p. 796, i, & seq.
- Temples Egyptian structure of, 112, d.
- Teneriff* pike of, its height, 102, (N).
- Tennes* king of Sidon, 410, f. In his reign the Sidonians and Phœnicians enter into a confederacy with Nesanebus king of Egypt, and shake off the Persian yoke, ibid. & 411, a. Joins Ochus king of Persia against his own countrymen, and delivers Sidon into their hands, 411, c, d, e, &c. Is put to death by Ochus, ibid. g.
- Tentyris*, an ancient city of Thebais, 173, e.
- Terah*, father of Abraham, of what age when Abraham was born, 112, a, b, & (N). Said to have invented the art of coining, and erected the first foundery, 131, (U). Supposed to be the same whom the Asiatics call Azer, 132, a. Was an idolater, ibid. b. Several traditions relating to him, ibid. (Z), & (A). & 133, a. Leaves Ur, 133, a, & (B). Converted from idolatry before his death, ibid. Dies in Haran, 422, a. Difficulties in the account of his age, ibid. (B).
- Teraphim* what meant by, in Hebrew, 443, a.
- Tetractys*, God so called by the Pythagoreans, and why, 26, b, c.
- Tetramnestus*, king of Sidon, 410. Assists Xerxes in his expedition against Greece with 300 gallies, ibid. f. Was one of the chief commanders of the Persian navy, ibid.
- Tetrogrammaton*. Vid. Jebova.
- Thabor* mount, called also Itabyrion, and Atabyrion, described, 571, a. Called Tabor in Hebrew, or Nazet, from its form, ibid. Remarkable for the regularity of its form, and proportion of its parts, ibid. b. In great veneration from the earliest times, ibid. (A). Doubted by some, whether the miracle of the transfiguration was wrought here, 572, a.
- Thales*, prince of the Ionian philosophers, 17, e. Held water to be the first principle, ibid. Whether he acknowledged any intelligent being, as assisting in the formation of the world, ibid. & 18. The first who foretold an eclipse, 218, d.
- Thammuz*, or Adonis, ceremonies practised in his honour by the Phœnicians, and their origin, 402, c, d, & 403, a.
- Thammuz*, the 10th month of the Jewish year, answering our June, 611, (K).
- Thebais*, the Upper Egypt, so named from its principal city Thebes, 175, b. In scripture called Pathros, and at present al Said, ibid. b. Its situation and extent, ibid. The ancient cities of note in Thebais, ibid. c. The inhabitants of this part of Egypt worshipped only the immortal and unbegotten Cneph, 204, d.
- Thebes*, called Diopolis, or the city of Jupiter, the metropolis of Thebais in Egypt, 175, e. Why called Hecatompyles, ibid. Its great power, extent, wealth, &c. in ancient times, ibid. d. By whom founded, ibid. d. The name of Thebes given formerly to all Egypt, ibid.
- Theban kings, according to Eratostratus, 237, & seq.
- Thebes* in Beotia founded by Cadmus, and from him called Cadmea, 499, b. Enlarged by Amphion and Zethus, and by them called Thebes, in honour of Thebe their aunt, 409, b.
- Thebet*, the fourth month of the Jewish year, answering our December, 611, (K).
- Theft*, the stealing of a man the only capital theft under the law of Moses, 683, c. Other thefts how punished, ibid. d. Petty larcenies how punished, 684, b.
- Theophilus* of Edeffa, chief astrologer to Khailif al Mobdi, supposed to have introduced the use of vowels into the Syriac language, 378.
- This*, an ancient city of great note in Thebais, 175, e.
- Tholab*, the son of Phuab, of the tribe of Issachar, sixth judge of Israel, 750, a. Judges Israel 23 years, ibid.
- Thoth* Egyptian. Vid. Hermes, 240.
- Tiberias* the sea of, called also the sea of Kinnereth, the water of Genesar, the lake of Genesaris, the sea of Galilee, 577, b. From whence it borrowed these names, ibid. (P). Described, ibid. b.
- Tibni* elected king of Israel by part of the army, 808, c. Builds the city of Samaria, ibid. A wicked prince, ibid. His death, ibid.

- Tiglat-pileser* king of Affyria, supposed by some to have been the son of Pul, whom he succeeded, 890. By others, to have been a stranger to his line, and a Mede, ibid. (A). Opinions of the learned concerning him, ibid. Falls upon the kingdom of Israel, and takes many cities, ibid. a. Carries the inhabitants into captivity, ibid. b. Marches against Damascus, solicited by Abaz king of Judab, takes that city, transplants the people to Kir, slays Rezin king of Damascus, and puts an end to that antient kingdom, ibid. b. Carries the whole tribe of Naphtali captive into Affyria, 830, c.
- Tigris* river, 55, d, e, & seq. & 858. Why so called, 858, (H).
- Timæus* Locrus, his account of the origin of things, 27, c, &c.
- Timotheus*, his epitome of the Orphic cosmogony, 16, a. His testimony of Orpheus, ibid. c.
- Timotheus*, governor of the Ammonites, is often worshipped by Judas Maccabæus, 298, d, e.
- Tina*, the true Pelusium, 166, a.
- Tiras*, where settled, 169, b.
- Tirbakab*, king of Ethiopia, probably the same with Sabbaco, mentioned by Herodotus, 893, (V).
- Tisri*, one of the Jewish months, answering to part of our September, 607, a. The first of the civil year, 609, a.
- Titanides*, or Artemides, the seven daughters of Astarte, 136, b.
- Tithes*, the chief income of the priests and Levites, 627, b. None consisting of clean animals to be redeemed at any rate; and those which consisted of the fruits of the earth, not to be bought off without paying one fifth part more than their intrinsic value, ibid. c. Several sorts of tithes, and laws relating to them, ibid. & seq. The manner in which the cattle was decimated, 628, c.
- Titles* unknown among the Jews, 695, c.
- Tobiah*, called the servant, at the head of the Arabians, Moabites, and Samaritans, endeavours to prevent the rebuilding of the temple of Jerusalem, 298, d.
- Togarmab*, the last son of Gomer, where settled, 167, a.
- Tol*, called by Josephus, Thænus king of Hamath in Syria, 390, c. Delivered by David from being subdued by Hadadzer king of Zobab, sends his son Joram with a costly present to him, 390, d.
- Tongues* confusion of, whether a punishment, 144, a. How effected, 154, c, d. Whether a new language was formed, 155, a, b, c. Vid. Speech.
- Tosorthrus* king of Mempbis, the Egyptian Æsculapius, excelled in physic, found out the manner of building with hewn stones, &c. 239, (F).
- Totis* a fabulous king of Egypt, 281.
- Tournefort*, his account of mount Ararat, 112.
- Tower of Babel*, of Nimrod. Vid. Babel.
- Tree*, of the knowledge of good and evil, why so called, 63, b. The heathens had some notion of it, ibid. What particular tree it was, ibid. c.
- Tripoli*, city of Phœnice, derived its origin from the joint contribution of Sidon, Tyre, and Aradus, 394, a. At first three distinct cities, at a furlong distance from each other, and inhabited by three distinct colonies, ibid.
- Triptolemus* first sows corn in Egypt, 240, a.
- Trismegistus* Hermes, secretary to Cronus son of Uranus, 135, a.
- Trochilus* of the antients, the Saksak of Egypt, 182, a. A kind of bird, and the only creature with which the crocodile is in friendship, ibid.
- Troemi*, Trogmi, and Troceni, a people inhabiting the borders of Pontus and Cappadocia, 167, b.
- Trogodites* and Ichthyophagi inhabit the coast of the Red-Sea, and are called in scripture Zijim and Sukkiim, 167, b.
- Trumpets* the feast of, among the Jews, 609, b. Authors much divided about the reason of this festival, ibid. Sacrifices proper for this solemnity, 610, a.
- Tubal* where settled, 169, b. Tubal Cain thought to be the same with the Fukan of the Genius 77, a, & (N), & 94, c.
- Tulis* king of Egypt, 280, d. In his reign Abraham, according to the Gentiles, came into Egypt, ibid.
- Tuscans*, their account of the creation of the world, 31, a.
- Typhon*, who, 94, b. The Egyptian Typhon one of the Egyptian deities, and brother to Osiris, 204, c. Called also Seth, Bebon, and Sm, ibid. The history of Typhon, 238, & seq. Kills Osiris his brother, 241, c, d.
- Typhonian*, name given to those men among the Egyptians, that were sacrificed, 212, a.
- Tyre*, city of Phœnice, its situation, 393, a. Ought to be distinguished into three different cities in order of time, viz. Palæ Tyrus, or Old Tyre, Tyre on the island, and Tyre on the Peninsula, 393, a. Called also Sar, and Sarra by the Latines, ibid. & (I). The etymology of its name, ibid. Four different places in Phœnice bearing the same name, ibid. (K). Tyre on the island, and Old Tyre on the main, considered as but one city, ibid. (L). Its walls 150 foot high, ibid. Besieged by Shalmaneser king of Affyria, 416, c. The siege raised, ibid. f. Besieged, taken, after a 13 years siege, and razed by Nebuchadnezzar, 417, a, b. Rebuilt by the inhabitants, who had saved themselves by their shipping, 417, c, d. The royal dignity changed into that of temporary magistrates, called Suffetes, or judges, ibid. d. The royal dignity restored, ibid. The memorable siege and reduction of that city by Alexander the great, 418, d, e, & seq. The city burnt down to the ground, and the inhabitants either put to the sword, or enslaved by the conqueror, 420. The city re-peopled by Alexander, and Æulmic restored to the throne, ibid. Now called Sar, 393, b. Its present abandoned situation, ibid. (O). Description of the city, and its parts, ibid. a, & (M). Antiquities to be seen there, 395, a. Particularly the wells, or cisterns, called by the Turks Rosclayne, commonly Solomon's Wells, ibid. b. Series of the kings and judges of Tyre, 407. History of its kings, 413, b, &c.
- Tyrians*, dispersed, with 12 vessels, the mighty fleet of the Affyrians, 416, e. Hold out a five years siege against Shalmaneser, king of Affyria, ibid. f. Tributary to the Affyrians for 70 years, 417, e. All murdered in one night by their slaves, except Strato, who was assumed to the crown, 417, f. & 418, a, b, c.

U.

VACUUM. Vid. Matter.

Valid a fabulous king of Egypt, 282.

Uchortus king of Egypt, 247, a. Some ascribe to him the building of Mempbis, ibid. Translates the imperial seat from Thebes to Mempbis, ibid. b.

Ueadar, or second Adar, the intercalary month among the Jews, 611, (K).

Veil of the tabernacle described, 653, a.

Ventphes, king of This, built the pyramids at Cochome, 238, (C).

Venus the Affyrian, called Sacoth Benoth, 916, c. Derivation of the name Venus, ibid. d. Both masculine and feminine, ibid. f. Whether the same with the Phœnician Astarte, 919, b.

Vishnou, the supreme God in the physiology of the Bramins, 33.

Unclean meats the prohibition of, had not its origin from the mosaic law, 108, & 687, b. Which clean, and which unclean, ibid. c. Why the fat of the clean beasts forbidden, ibid. & (E).

Universe. Vid. World.

Vows of a two-fold nature among the Jews, 630, a, b, c. Various instances of anathemas, or things vowed vowed to destruction, ibid. e, & seq. Laws concerning all sorts of vows, 630, a, b.

Uranus, why so called, 89, a. The heaven, ibid.
 His sons, 134, b. Killed by his son Cronus, or Ius, 137, b.
Uriah, killed by David's direction, 779, d.
Uriah prophet, put to death by Jehoiakim, 846, d.
Urim and Thummim, an appendage of the high-priest's garment, 557, (C). Signify in the original light and perfection, ibid. By whom it was to be consulted, ibid. How the ceremony of consulting it performed, ibid. How this divine oracle gave its answer; how long it continued, ibid. The Egyptians had an oracle not unlike this, which they called truth, ibid. Various opinions of the learned about its form and make, 638, a, b, & seq.
Ufus, in the Egyptian cosmogony, who, 87, b, & (N).
Usury all kind of, forbidden from one Israelite to another, by the law of Moses, 685, c. How punished, ibid. It was permitted to take some usury from the Gentiles, ibid.
Vulcan, one of the demi-gods that reigned in Egypt, 93, a. Invents working of metals, 94, c. Thought to have been the same with Tubal Cain, ibid. c.
Vysney what meant by, in the physiology of the Bramins, 33, b.
Ux son of Aram, Shem's fifth and youngest son, built Damascus, and gave name to the country about that city, 163, c. Ux the country of Job, different from this, and lying within the limits of ancient Edom, 163, c, & 309, b. Ux the land of, or the place where Job dwelt, thought to have been the city of Asharoth Kernaim, on the other side the Jordan, 482, d.
Uzal, one of Joktan's sons, 170, a. His name given to Sanaa, the capital of Yaman, by the Jews who dwelt there, ibid.
Uzzab smitten with immediate death for touching the ark, 776, a.
Uzziah, king of Judah, dismantles Gath Jabneh, and Ashdod, cities of the Philistines, and builds strong towns among them to keep them in subjection, 358, d.

W.

WALID, the first king of Egypt, of the race of Amalek, 282, d. Takes the surname of Pharaoh, which, in the Coptic, signifies king, ibid. Supposed to be the Pharaoh of Moses, 281, c.
Wall built by Sesostris to prevent the incursions of the Syrians and Arabians into Egypt, 257, c.
Washing the feet, how and on what occasion this ceremony was performed among the Jews, 692, a.
Water, according to the most ancient physiologists, the original of all things, 17, d. Why the bath of the gods said to be by water, ibid. Held by Thales to be the first principle, ibid. e. What meant by waters above the firmament, 98, (N). Waters turned into blood by Moses, 496, a.
Waters of jealousy, Moses commanded to appoint them, 676, c. In what manner was this ceremony performed, ibid. & seq.
Weeks feast of, so called from the seven weeks which were reckoned from that of the passover, 606, a. & (Y). Vid. Pentecost.
Whiston's theory, 38, b, c, & seq. How he accounts for the change in the constitution of the earth, after the fall of man, 67, a, b, & seq. His theory of the deluge, 101, a. How he accounts for the changes made in the world at the deluge, 110, c.
Wishnum, a god among the Malabarians, 33, d.
Witchcraft, some account of its origin, 853, c, d. & seq.

Witness, laws against false witnesses, 686, a. Who excepted among the Jews from being witnesses, ibid. (B).

Wolf, why adored by the Egyptians, 211, a.

World created both as to matter and form, 2, a.

Several opinions held by the ancients and moderns as to the origin of it, 3. The opinion of those who held it eternal, both in matter and form, 3, a. Held eternal by Aristotle, and several of Plato's followers, ibid. Arguments proving the possibility of its eternity, 5, c. The controversy about the possibility of its eternity, a dispute about words only, 5, c, d. The opinion of those who held the universe to be God, 6, b, c. That God and the world are but one thing, first taught by Xenophanes, ibid. c. Whatever changes seem to happen in the world, maintained by some to be mere illusions of our senses, 6, d. The opinion of those who held the matter of the world to be eternal, but not the form, 9, c, d. The principles they proceed upon examined, ibid. d. Strong proofs shewing, that the present frame of the world has been of no very ancient date, 11, a, b, c. The Phœnician account of the original of the world, ibid. d, e, &c. The opinion of those who held the world to be absolutely created, and liable to dissolution, 31, & seq. The creation as delivered by Moses, 35, a, b, c, & seq. Whether the formation of the world was completed in the space of six days, 48, b. In what season of the year made, 48, c. Whether any thing created before the world, ibid. c, d. World destroyed by the flood, 85, c, d. Changes made in it at the deluge, according to Burnet and Whiston, 110, c, d, e. Production of the world, according to the Phœnicians, Egyptians, Chaldeans, &c. Vid. Phœnicians, Egyptians, &c. World antediluvian. Vid. Antediluvian.

Worshipping of animals among the Egyptians. Vid. Animals, Egyptians.

X.

XENOCRATES, his natural principles indivisible particles, 20, a.

Xenophanes, author of the opinion holding God and the world to be one and the same thing, 6, c. Founder of the Eleatic sect, ibid. Holds the eternity and immutability of the world, ibid. d, e. His opinion qualified by several learned men, ibid. e.

Xisathrus the tenth of the Chaldean kings, according to Berosus, who reigned before the flood, 90, d. & 92, a.

Xois, one of the chief cities of the Lower Egypt, 176, c.

Xylophoria, a festival of the Jews, so called by Josephus, 650, d.

Y.

YA, emperor of China, 34, c.

Yaman, or Arabia Felix, 164, e. The import of the word among the Arabians, 170, d.

Yany what meant by, in the Chinese physiology, 34, b.

Yarab, according to the Arabs, the son of Joktan, 169, f.

Yarab, the son of Joktan, gave his name to Arabia, and the Arabic language, according to the Arabs, 131, a, b. Founded the kingdom of Yaman, or Arabia Felix, ibid.

Years antediluvian, 110, (N). Four sorts of years distinguished by the Mosaic law, 611, c. The year of the Jews consisted of 365 days, of 12 solar months, months, the last of which consisted of 35 days, ibid. (K). Sabbatic year, jubilee year. Vid. Sabbatic, Jubilee.

Yezad, or Yezadan, the good principle among the Persian Magi, 31, d.
Yiar, the eighth month of the Jewish year, answering our April, 611, (K).
Yn what meant by, in the Chinese physiology, 34, b.

Z.

- ZAB, a river in Affrica, 859, (I).
Zabulon, Jacob's sixth son by Leah, born, 442, a.
Zachariah slain by Joash, 824, c.
Zachary sepulchre of, in the valley of Jehoshaphat, described, 592, c, & (M).
Za-chu-ne, a remarkable fruit in the plain of Jericho, so called by the Arabs, 583, b.
Zadoc, the son of Abitub, high-priest of the Jews, 791, c.
Zala Cusa, an old woman, 107, b. Tradition of the Easterns relating to her, ibid.
Zaimonab, so called from the image or figure of the brazen serpent, which Moses caused to be erected there, 532, d.
Zalmunna wages a cruel war against the Jews, at the head of the Midianites, Amalekites, and Arabians, 304, b. Defeated by Gideon, and killed, ibid. & seq.
Zamzummins, people of a gigantic race, the ancient inhabitants of Ammonitis, driven out by the Ammonites, 294, c. & 296, b.
Zaphir, Moses's rod so called by the Jews, 489, (Z). Their stories concerning it, ibid.
Zaphnath-paaneh, name given by Pharaoh to Joseph, 453, b. The meaning of it, ibid.
Zarab and Phares born to Judab by Tamar, 452, a. Their strange birth, ibid.
Zarab supposed to be the father of Job, 481, a.
Zarcaum, a mountain, said to have been levelled by Semiramis, 880, c.
Zaretan, a city, called afterwards Zeredathab famous for the copper-works which Hiram cast there for the temple of Solomon, 553, e, & (Y).
Zeal the right of, made it lawful to kill some kind of offenders upon the spot, 675, c.
Zebab heads the Midianites, Amalekites, and Arabians against the Jews, and wages a cruel war, 304, b. Defeated by Gideon, and killed, ibid. c, d.
Zebul, servant of Abimelech, by his command kills him, 749, d.
Zebulon, Jacob's blessing to him, 463, a. His lot answered exactly to Jacob's prophecy, ibid. (I).
Zechariah succeeds his father Jeroboam II. 827, c. Massacred by Shallum, after a reign of six months, 828, b.
Zedekiah's impious reign, 849, a. Deceived by his false prophets, rebels against Nebuchadnezzar, 849, d. Jerusalem besieged, ibid. Taken and sent into captivity, 850, ibid. His miserable end, ibid. c.
Zeib, prince of Midian, 304, d, e. Defeated by Gideon, and killed by the Ephraimites, ibid. & seq.
Zelophchad, of the tribe of Manasseh, his five daughters petition Moses and Eleazar for an inheritance with their father's brethren, 530, a. A portion allotted to them in their kindred's inheritance, ibid. A law made in favour of the daughters on this occasion, ibid. b.
Zelus, Belus, or Baal, one of the Phœnician deities, 397, b.
Zenadika, a sect among the Mohammedans, maintaining, that whatever we see is God, 8, a.
Zeno of Elea, holds the eternity and immutability of the world, 6, d. His notions of the origin of things, 23, b, c.
Zerab, the Ethiopian, at the head of 10,000,000, Defeated by Asa king of Judab, 807, e.
Zeus Belus, son of Cronus, supposed by some to have been Mizraim, 137, (R).
Ziba, the treacherous servant of Mephibosheth, his behaviour towards David, 784, a.
Zidon. Vid. Sidon.
Ziglag, the abode of David, taken and burnt by the Amalekites, 321, b, & 769, f. 770, a.
Zilpah, Leah's maid, bears Jacob two sons, Gad and Asher, 441, d.
Zimri, one of the chiefs of Simoon, brings a young Midianitish princess into the camp, 555. For which crime he is killed by Phineas, son of Eleazar, 536, a.
Zin wilderness of, 531, b.
Zion fortress of, taken by Joab from the Jebusites, 775, a. Enlarged and fortified by David, and made his residence, ibid.
Zipporah, Yethro's daughter, and wife of Moses, 302, c. Falls out with her husband about circumcising a child, and is by him sent home to her relations, ibid. Moses is reconciled to her, ibid. d. Why called by Miriam and Aaron a Cushite, or Ethiopian, 489, (Y). The cause of her falling out with Miriam, Moses's sister, ibid. Circumcises her child, 492, a. Comes to Moses with her two children, and her father Yethro, 512, c.
Ziyim, Troglodites so called in scripture, those who inhabited the coast of the Red Sea, 165, d.
Zoar king of, defeated by Chedorlaomer, 327, b.
Zebab kingdom of, in Syria, 371, b. The kingdom of Damascus rose upon its ruins, 371, c. The chronology of its kings, 380. Called also Sophene, ibid.
Zophasemen, what in the Phœnician cosmogony, 12, b.
Zoroastres, an account of the Chaldean cosmogony, from his Chaldaic or magic oracles, 15, b. His description of the supreme deity, 31, e.
Zur, king of Midian, 303, c. Sends his own daughter among the rest to debauch the Israelites, ibid. d.